0 2007 0489978 6
California State Library

S[illegible]EY.

Accession No. 12532 June 1917

Call No. fc 051 C15

Mar 28 1864 - Jan 21 1865

The California.

"SURELY THERE IS A VEIN FOR THE SILVER AND A PLACE FOR GOLD WHERE THEY FINE IT."

VOL. 1.--NO. 1. SAN FRANCISCO, MAY 28, 1864. TERMS { $5 A YEAR, BY MAIL, IN ADVANCE. 50 CENTS A MONTH, BY CARRIER.

CONTENTS:

ORIGINAL ARTICLES:

Neighborhoods I have moved from.
Four o'clocks.
About Earthquakes.
Things.
The Ballad of the Emeu, } Poetry.
The Light at the Window. }

THE COUNTESS DIANA—A Translation.

SELECTED SKETCHES, STORIES and EXTRACTS:

Lovely Lady Coventry.
Familiar Quotations.
An Astral Criticism.
Tripping up Tupper.
A New York Fire as seen by a "Lunnuner."
The new Religious movement.
Finding a sensible Tongue in Trees.
"Thinking of the Soldiers"—A poem.
Echo men.
The best men of the Senate.
Dieting.
Dress.

MISCELLANEOUS ARTICLES.

EDITORIALS:

Our paper.
Nathaniel Hawthorne.
Freedom of the Press.
Our Armies and the Prospects.
Of what Sex, Zoyara?
Fashion in San Francisco—Past and Present.
Business matters generally.
Financial affairs, Stocks, etc.
Editorial paragraphs.

NEW BOOKS RECEIVED.

DRAMATIC MENTION.

NEIGHBORHOODS I HAVE MOVED FROM.

BY A HYPOCHONDRIAC.

NUMBER ONE.

A BAY WINDOW once settled the choice of my house and compensated for many of its inconveniences. When the chimney smoked, or the doors alternately shrunk and swelled, resisting any forcible attempt to open them or opening of themselves with ghostly deliberations, or when suspicious blotches appeared on the ceiling in rainy weather, there was always the bay window to turn to for comfort. And the view was a fine one. Alcatraz, Lime Point, Fort Point and Saucelito were plainly visible over a restless expanse of water that changed continually, glittering in the sunlight, darkening in rocky shadow, or sweeping in mimic waves on a miniature beach below.

Although at first the bay window was supposed to be sacred to myself and my writing materials, in obedience to some organic law, it by-and-bye became a general lounging place. A rocking-chair and crochet-basket one day found their way there. Then the baby invaded its recesses, fortifying himself behind intrenchments of colored worsteds and spools of cotton, from which he was only dislodged by concerted assault, and carried lamenting into captivity. A subtle glamour crept over all who came within its influence. To apply oneself to serious work there was an absurdity. An incoming ship, a gleam on the water, a cloud lingering about Tamalpias, were enough to distract the attention. Reading or writing, the bay window was always showing something to be looked at. Unfortunately, these views were not always pleasant, but the window gave equal prominence and importance to all, without respect to quality.

The landscape in the vicinity was unimproved, bnt not rural. The adjacent lots had apparently just given up bearing scrub-oaks, but had not seriously taken to bricks and mortar. In one direction the vista was closed by the Home of the Inebriates, not in itself a cheerful-looking building, and, as the apparent terminus of a ramble in a certain direction, having all the effect of a moral lesson. To a certain extent, however, this building was an imposition. The enthusiastic members of my family, who confidently expected to see its inmates hilariously disporting themselves at its windows in the different stages of inebriation portrayed by the late W. E. Burton were much disappointed. The Home was reticent of its' secrets. The County Hospital, also in range of the bay window, showed much more animation. At certain hours of the day convalescents passed in review before the window on their way to an airing. This spectacle was the still more depressing from a singular lack of sociability that appeared to prevail among them. Each man was encompassed by the impenetrable atmosphere of his own peculiar suffering. They did not talk or walk together. From the window I have seen half a dozen sunning themselves against a wall within a few feet of each other, to all appearances utterly oblivious of the fact. Had they but quarreled or fought—anything would have been better than this horrible apathy.

The lower end of the street on which the bay window was situate, opened invitingly from a popular thoroughfare; and after beckoning the unwary stranger into its recesses, ended unexpectedly at a frightful precipice. On Sundays when the travel North-Beachwards was considerable, the bay window delighted in the spectacle afforded by unhappy pedestrians who were seduced into taking this street as a short cut somewhere else. It was amusing to notice how these people invariably, on coming to the precipice, glanced upward to the bay window and endeavored to assume a careless air before they retraced their steps, whistling ostentatiously, as if they had previously known all about it. One high-spirited young man in particular, being incited thereto by a pair of mischievous bright eyes in an opposite window, actually descended this fearful precipice rather than return, to the great peril of life and limb, and manifest injury to his Sunday clothes.

Dogs, goats and horses constituted the fauna of our neighborhood. Possessing the lawless freedom of their normal condition, they still evinced a tender attachment to man and his habitations. Spirited steeds get up extempore races on the sidewalks, turning the street into a miniature Corso; dogs wrangled in the areas; while from the hill beside the house a goat browsed peacefully upon my wife's geraniums in the flower-pots of the second-story window. "We had a fine hail-storm last night," remarked a newly-arrived neighbor, who had just moved into the adjoining house. It would have been a pity to set him right, as he was quite enthusiastic about the view and the general sanitary qualifications of the locality. So I didn't tell him anything about the goats who were in the habit of using his house as a stepping-stone to the adjoining hill.

But the locality was remarkably healthy. People who fell down the embankments found their wounds heal rapidly in the steady sea breeze. Ventilation was complete and thorough. The opening of the bay window produced a current of wholesome air which effectually removed all noxious exhalations, together with the curtains, the hinges of the back door, and the window shutters. Owing to this peculiarity, some of my writings acquired an extensive circulation and publicity in the neighborhood, which years in another locality might not have produced. Several articles of wearing apparel, which were mysteriously transposed from our clothes line to that of an humble though honest neighbor, was undoubtedly the result of these sanitary winds. Yet in spite of these advantages I found it convenient in a few months to move. And the result whereof I shall communicate in other papers.

THE BALLAD OF THE EMEU.

O say, have you seen at the Willows so green—
So charming and rurally true—
A singular bird, with a manner absurd,
Which they call the Australian Emeu?
Have you
Ever seen this Australian Emeu?

It trots all around with its head on the ground,
Or erects it quite out of your view;
And the ladies all cry, when its figure they spy,
O! what a sweet, pretty Emeu!
O! do
Just look at that lovely Emeu!

One day to this spot, when the weather was hot,
Came Matilda Hortense Fortescue;
And beside her there came a youth of high name—
Augustus Florell Montague.
The two
Both loved that wild, foreign Emeu.

With two loaves of bread then they fed it instead
Of the flesh of the white cockatoo,
Which once was its food in that wild neighborhood,
Where ranges the sweet Kangaroo;
That too
Is game for the famous Emeu!

Old saws and gim-lets but its appetite whets
Like the world-famous bark of Peru;
There 's nothing so hard that the bird will discard,
And nothing its taste will eschew
That you
Can give that long-legged Emeu!

The time slipped away, in this innocent play,
When up jumped the bold Montague:
"Where 's that specimen pin that I gaily did win
In raffle, and gave unto you,
Fortescue?"
No word spoke the guilty Emeu!

"Quick! tell me his name whom thon gavest that samo, Ere these hands in thy blood I imbrue!"
"Nay, dearest," she cried, as she clung to his side,
"I 'm innocent as that Emeu!"
"Adieu!"
He replied, "Miss M. H. Fortescue!"

Down she dropped at his feet, all as white as a sheet,
As wildly he fled from her view;
He saw but her sin—for he knew not the pin
Had been gobbled up by the Emeu,
All through
The voracity of that Emeu!

THE COUNTESS DIANA.

[TRANSLATED FROM THE FRENCH OF MARIO UCHARD.]

I.

I HAD a godmother and a guardian—fate had made them man and wife. Do not laugh, dear William, if I commence these memoirs as if I were going to tell you the fairy story of The Blue Bird. We have to do with facts, as you will soon iscover. . . .

My guardian was old, hard, and fierce; my godmother was young, gentle and beautiful—a dove mismated with a falcon. Fortunately, she had a high and proud spirit which somewhat intimidated him and which he dared not wound beyond endurance. I lived with them in a sombre chateau in Ardennes, an old feudal stronghold, built on a rock and judiciously and thoroughly repaired, wild and at the same time beautiful—a vulture's eyrie in a thicket of myrtle.

"André," said she to me one day as we rode pensively side by side under the great oaks of my forests, "June approaches and you are twenty years old; the time has come, my child, for you to think of your visit to England." . . .

I thought of nothing, and, galloping near her, I became drunken with the prospect which opened before me, so much liberty The fragrance of the morning, the depths of the foliage where the dew still trembled, the low cries of birds startled in the underwood, the mystery, the silence—I know not what—perhap my twenty years singing in my heart, or the beauty of my godmother which shone in this spring-time, all this had filled my soul with pure and tender delight. I thonght of nothing.

"I received a letter this morning from your cousin, Lady Clarencey," resumed she, as I did not reply; "she expects to see you at Clarencey Castle before her return to London."

"Well!" added she, laughing at my bewildered air, "are you dumb, André?"

The fact is I did not know what to say; the idea of this journey, long since decided upon, surprised me out of my indolent state, so full of enchantments, and I experienced a sudden tightening of the heart.

"Leave you?" I exclaimed; "go away so far—all alone?"

"O, poor child!" said she, pouting her rosy lips in a bantering grimace, "How timid he has become!"

And we burst out laughing. The fact is that my reply was strange, for I am five feet four inches high, have blonde mustaches sufficiently abundant, and it appears a certain bravado air which my godmother strives to correct. Scarcely six months had passed since I quitted the University of Heidelberg, where from the age of fifteen, I had lived without a Mentor as student, and not one of the quietest, as a smart rapier cut coming from my fifth duel—which drove me from the town, and which withal brought me home to my guardian in a pitiable enough state—could attest.

"You must not be afraid," added she, "there are no Bluebeards in England—nor wolves."

"Yes, but there are ogres!"

And we laughed more than ever. However, when we at last became serious she returned to her theme. I know not what terror seized me. While she spoke I watched her, silent and troubled; and truly felt terrified at the idea of going away "so far and all alone." I had become timid; it seemed to me that the confines of the enlightened universe were limited to the horizon on which her glance could rest, and beyond reigned night.

"Think of it, my child," said she, with that charming air of judgment which suited her so well, "the rich patrimony which will be yours at your majority imposes on you a great many duties; you should learn life and the world, in order to know how to diffuse beneficially the happiness which destiny has placed within your reach."

"The world?—life?—but I have all that at my fingers' end."

"Certainly, Baron d'Orbach, that you are philosophical, I do not ignore, and you could even aspire to a professorship with your diplomas in pocket; but, as you said the other day, Charles V. says, that in each language a man learns, he adds to his valor. a new man—to his understanding, a new intelligence—to his will, a new impetus. The great Emperor might have inferred that, in visiting a foreign nation a traveler who understands how to reap benefit. doubles his civic force."

I must confess it to my shame that I heard, but did not listen. We went along slowly. I admired the harmony of her flexible form—the curves of her neck, where snow and roses mingled, bringing to my mind the beautiful lines where Virgil pictures Venus presenting herself, in the form and dress of a huntress, to the view of her son Eneas, shipwrecked on the shores of Carthage—

"Dixit et avertens rosea cervice refulsit."

However, the Countess Diana, my godmother, does not at all resemble the blonde Cypris; but she is not any the less beautiful as any one can convince themselves by going to the Ritti palace in Florence to see her portrait, which is called in the catalogue I know not why, "Allori's Judith." This Judith, it is she herself, with all her charm of manner, and all her grace—serious and at the same time tender. It has the same lovely forehead crowned with a profusion of black hair, the same sparkling and humid eyes shaded by long brown lashes which veiled their depths; the same complexion, warm and milky like the petal of a white camelia. When she walks, you would say it was a young goddess who wandered in the sacred woods. She is just three summers older than I, and when at the age of thirteen I lost my mother she married the guardian whose place it was to receive me, and her sweet smile almost consoled my childhood in its mourning.

"Well! what say you to my little argument?" renewed she.

"I think it is profoundly wise."

"And from it you infer?"—

"Nothing, except that I shall be very far away, and very lonesome!"

At the great sigh that I heaved in repeating this word, she turned round and surprising my look fixed on her neck, she mistook the pleased expression.

"You are a mocking and impertinent person, my godson," cried she a little confused. "You notice, I am sure, that my hair is disarranged."

"Oh! on the contrary—I think this little disorder is charming!"

"Bah!" said she, threatening me with her riding whip.

We set off at a gallop, she humming an Italian air—I lost in the fresh thoughts that had blossomed on this June morning.

When we came out from the woods, I had discovered that I loved my godmother so much that it was impossible to live away from her. . . . .

Alas! William, I write these lines from behind walls. I have been for more than a year confined in the mad-house of Dr. Schultz at Carlsruhe! I await her always—she does not come—she forgets me! No; she is dead like myself, and they will not tell me for fear that I will go and find her again.

You see my dear friend, I follow the counsels that you give me; I divert myself, I try to abridge the long hours of my captivity in writing for you the romance of my life. It is my soul that I send to you—it can be of no more use to my captive and discouraged body. Nevertheless—shall I tell you? this corpse still palpitates at the recital of the two years slipped away since I quitted you, and I find a bitter delight in bringing back my poor buried joys. Under the golden bough of memory they rise up and flutter about me, pale as a choir of Willis sporting under the moonbeams in the depth of thy German forests. I see them through my half-closed eyelids, and I hold my breath for fear they will vanish. There is one I am captivated with; she wears a wreath of blue corn-flowers intertwined with red poppies; I love her, because she sometimes murmurs in my ear a song of hope—a pretty song, which I cannot repeat to you, for it is written in heavenly language. As for me, I comprehend it, but I do not hope.

Thus, then, dear friend, every day—as to-day—you will receive some lines from me; real fragments of my heart. I laugh beforehand at the astonishment of Dr. Schultz when he discovers I have none left. But I am tired. To-morrow the continuation of my romance.

GOLD IN ANCIENT TIMES.—Whatever may have been the source whence the ancients obtained their gold, there is abundant evidence that this metal was admired and valued by them much as it is at the present day. Many of the accounts given by early writers dazzle us into the supposition that the stores of gold in those days were much larger than can be commanded at present. Thus, Semiramis is said to have erected statues of Jupiter Juno, and Rhea, forty feet in height, and made of beaten gold. Drinking-vessels made of gold, and weighing twelve hundred talents, are also spoken of. The sumptuous display of precious metals in the palaces of the great are frequently alluded to; but it has been aptly observed that the quantity diffused among the bulk of the English population at the present day would make a sum total far outbidding the golden wealth of those earlier days, though less obvious and glittering from being so much more diffused.

With the most ardent nature it is either love or hate; there is no twilight in the tropics.

FAMILIAR QUOTATIONS.

THERE are many phrases and quotations which are as "familiar in our mouths as household words," whose origin is either unknown or misconceived. We take the following extract from a book entitled Things Not Generally Known:

"There is death in the pot," is from the Bible, II. Kings, iv., 40. "Lovely and pleasant in their lives, and in death they were not divided," is spoken of Saul and Jonathan, II. Samuel, i., 23. "A man after his own heart," I. Samuel, xiii., 14. "The apple of his eye," Deut. xix., 21. "A still small voice," I. Kings, xix., 12. "Escaped with the skin of my teeth," Job, xix., 20. "That mine adversary had written a book," Job, xxi., 35. "Spreading himself like a green bay tree," Psalm xxxvii., 35. "Hanged our harps upon the willows," Psalm cxxxvii., 2. "Riches certainly make (not take, as it is often quoted) themselves wings," Proverbs, xxiii., 5. "Heap coals of fire upon his head," Ibid, xxv., 22. "No new thing under the sun," Ecclesiastes, i., 9. "Of making many books there is no end, Ibid, xii, 12. "Peace, peace when there is no peace," (made famous by Patriek Henry) Jeremiah, viii., 11. "My name is Legion," Mark, v., 9. "To kick against the pricks," Acts, ix., 5. "Make a virtue of necessity," Shakspeare's Two Gentlemen of Verona. "All that glitters is not gold," usually quoted, "All is not gold that glitters," Merchant of Venice. "Screw your courage to the sticking place," (not point) Macbeth. "Make assurance doubly sure," Ibid. "Hang out your banners on the outward (not outer) walls, Ibid. "Keep the word of promise to our (not the) ear, but break it to our hope," Ibid.

"It's an ill will turns none to good," usually quoted, "It's an ill wind that blows no one any good," Thomas Tasser, 1580. "Christmas comes but once a year," Ibid. "Look, ere you leap," Ibid, and "Look before you, ere you leap," Hudibras, commonly quoted, "Look, before you leap." "Out of mind as soon as out of sight," usually quoted, "Out of sight, out of mind," Lord Brooke. "What though the field be lost, all is not lost," Milton. "Awake, arise, or be forever fallen," Ibid. "Necessity, the tyrant's plea," Ibid. "That old man eloquent," Ibid. "Peace hath her victories," Ibid. "Though this may be play to you, 'tis death to us," Roger L'Estrange, 1704. "All cry and no wool," (not little wool) Hudibras. "Count their chickens ere (not before) they're hatched," Ibid. "Through thick and thin," Dryden. "When Greeks joined Greeks, then was the tug of war," usually quoted," "When Greek meets Greek, then comes the tug of war," Nathaniel Lee, 1692. "Of two evils, I have chose the least," Prior. "Richard is himself again," Colley Cibber. "Classic ground," Addison. "As clear as a whistle," Byron, 1763. "A good hater," Johnsonianna. "A fellow feeling makes one (not us) wondrous kind." "My name is Norval," John Home, 1808. "Ask me no questions and I'll tell you no fibs," Goldsmith. "Not much the worse for wear," (not none the worse) Cowper. "What will Mrs. Grundy say," Thomas Morton. "No pent up Utica contracts your powers," Jonathan M. Sewell.

"Hath given hostages to fortune," Bacon—"His (God's) image cut in ebony," Thomas Fuller. "Wise and masterly inactivity," Mackintosh in 1791 though generally attributed to Randolph. "First in war, first in peace, and first in the hearts of his fellow-citizens," (not countrymen,) resolutions presented to the House of Representatives, Dec. 1799. Prepared by General Henry Lee. "Millions for defense, but not one cent for tribute," Charles C. Pinckney. "The Almighty Dollar," Washington Irving. "As good as a play," King Charles, when in Parliament, attending the discussion of Lord Ross's Divorce Bill. "Selling a bargain," is in Love's Labor Lost. "Fast and loose," Ibid. "Pumping a man," Otteway's Venice preserved. "Go snacks," Pope's Prologue to Satires. "In the wrong box," Fox's Martyrs. "To lamm in the sense of to heal," King and no Kiug, by Beaumont and Fletcher. The hackneyed newspaper latin quotation, "Tempora mutantur, nos et mutamur in illis," is not found in any classic or Latin author. The nearest approach to it was "Omnia mutantur, etc." and this is found in Borbonius, a German writer of the middle ages.

"Smelling of the lamp" is to be found in Plutarch, and is there attributed to Pythias. "A little bird told me," comes from Ecclesiastes, x., 20: "For a bird of the air shall carry the voice, and that which hath wings shall tell the matter."

He that fights and runs away,
May live to fight another day.

These lines, generally attributed to Hudibras, are really much older. They are to be found in a book published in 1656. The same idea is, however, expressed in a couplet published in 1542, while one of the few fragments of Menander, the Greek writer, that have been preserved, embodies the same idea in a single line. The couplet in Hudibras is:

For those that fly may fight again,
Which he can never do that's slain.

"Hell is paved with good intentions," though found in Johnson and Herbert, was obviously in their day a proverbial expression. Walter Scott ascribes it to "some stern old divine."

"There's a good time coming," is an expression used by Sir Walter Scott in "Rob Roy," and has doubtless for a long time been a familiar saying in Scotland.

Eripuit cælo fulmen, sceptrumque tyrannis, was a line upon Franklin, written by Turgot, the Minister of Louis XVI. It is, however, merely a modification of a line by Cardinal Polignac, Eripuitque Jovi fulmen, Phœboque sagittas, which in turn was taken from a line of Marcus Manilius, who says of Epicurus, Eripuitque Jovi fulmen viresque Tonanti.

Vox populi, vox Dei. The origin of this familiar phrase is not known, but it is quoted as a proverb by William of Malmsbury, who lived in the early part of the twelfth century.

Ultima ratio regum. This motto was engraved on the French cannon by order of Louis XIV.

Whistling girls and crowing hens
Always come to some bad end.

In one of the curious Chinese books recently translated and published in Paris, this proverb occurs in substantially the same words. It is also an injunction of the Chinese priesthood, and a carefully observed household custom, to kill immediately every hen that crows, as a preventive against the misfortune which the circumstance is supposed to indicate. The same practice prevails throughout many portions of the United States.

LOVELY LADY COVENTRY.

THE STORY OF A BELLE.

FOR the greedy print-gatherer—omnivorous, rapacious and profuse—there is now, happily, but little toleration. This artistic craze is but a species of the other established insanities. The spectacle of the frantic virtuoso, hungering after proofs before letters, first, second and third stages, plates that have been retouched, India proofs, and other developments of this fatal frenzy, excites only pity and contempt, and suggests serious thoughts as to the gracious interference of the Chancellor, and the wholesome restraint of a Commission.

Still, there is one agreeable shape of this mania, for which there may be indulgence. And when the print-devouring Vitellius is content to gorge himself on such delicacies as the public delighted in towards the close of the last century, and purchased and appreciated—when he becomes deranged in reference to PORTRAITS, and amasses such treasures as all the noble ladies and gentlemen of that day, turning his portfolio into a high Walhalla—it is hard to be wroth with this agreeable lunatic, who furnishes so delightful an entertainment—not for himself merely, but for his heirs and assigns, and but too often, unhappily, for the cheap longers of the auction room. These were the "heads" that "were stuck in the print-shops," like that admirable boaster's, Mr. Lofty; such a print also, "in all the print shops," did amiable Goldsmith send home to his Irish relations, to show them how much considered he was; such a print was issued of the fashionable Mr. Sterne—afterwards reduced in size and placed as a frontispiece for his sermons. It was Sir Joshua with the dainty brush and honied coloring, that first spiritualized the famous lord or lady upon canvas. Then followed the mezzotinto plate—the most perfect translation that could be conceived outside the world of color—of the master's exquisite and most tender manner. They are to be seen now with the bloom still on, so clear, and cold, and delicate, brilliant, full, deep, and full of marvellous effects. Modern work halts after these examples lamely; Smith MacArdle, and others were the masters of this school. They have long since laid by their acids and burins, and would seem as though their cunning was lost.

The London crowds drifting through the Strand often stopped to stare at a new print—one of this matchless series—which was then "stuck in the print shops." The beautiful Lady Coventry, perhaps the most notorious on the crowded roll of English beauties, was painted by a fashionable artist, and is now to be found in the portfolios, sometimes in "good condition," clean, fresh, bright, and, above all, not "cut down." Looking on that attractive face and graceful figure, which turned half the fashionable heads in London, her strange and romantic story, as yet never told consecutively, seems to rise out of the past, more entertaining than a romance, and quite as profitable as a sermon.

There was a certain Irish country gentleman living down in the West, who is set down in the books of heraldry as 'John Gunning, Esquire, of co. of Roscommon.' That is a notorious boggy district; and it may be presumed "John Gunning, Esquire," fulfilled the customary function of many Irish gentlemen of that day, shooting snipe, and other Irish gentlemen, and certainly never dreaming of the prodigious destiny that was in store for his two little daughters. He had made a good connection, marrying a sister of the Earl of Mayo; so that the obscurity of the little girls is not quite so great as has been represented. They were born at Castlecoote—their father's place—still in the vast bog country; Maria, the eldest, coming into the world in the year seventeen hundred and thirty-three, the other, Elizabeth, the year after. Bridget was the name of the daughter of the Mayo family, and the result of the alliance was one son and five daughters, namely, John, Mary, Elizabeth, Catharine, Lizzy, and Sophia. That John grew up from being "a sweet little boy," as one who knew him called him, entered the army, fought with distinction at Bunker's Hill, became a major-general in the army and Sir John Gunning. The first was to be hereafter Countess of Coventry and titular belle of the English court; the other was to wed successively the Duke of Argyle and Duke of Hamilton—elevations which, however striking, have been parallel; not so, however, that union of beauty, fortune and romance

What become of "John Gunning, Esquire, co. Roscommon," has never distinctly appeared, nor would public curiosity be likely to be much excited in his behalf. One glimpse that we have of John Gunning, Esquire, is characteristic, and shows that the world had gone a little hard with him. He had come up to Dublin, and had lived in that gay capital during one of its gayest epochs, until he could reside there no longer; and, as we are naively told, had been "obliged to retire into the country, to avoid the disagreeable consequences that must ensue."

A strange, irregular actress, who about this time had an engagement at Mr. Sheridan's theatre, happened to be one day returning from rehersal. When at the bottom of Great Britain street she heard what she called "the voice of distress." These were the times when sentiment was fast coming into fashion, both before and behind the curtain, and all ranks were dilligently petting and cultivating their tender emotions to the very highest point of delicacy. On hearing, then, the voice of distress in Britain street, the actress at once turned in the direction it seemed to proceed from, entered a house, and without ceremony proceeded up stairs. Strange men, however, stood at the door, about whose garments hung the true ca sa flavor; and in the parlor she found a distressed family, consisting of "a woman of a most elegant figure," and who was the centre of a group of "four beautiful girls" and "a sweet boy of about three years." The united voices of this young family had joined in that mournful chorus which had so irresistibly attracted the actress in Britain Street.

The "woman of most elegant figure" proved to be Mrs. Gunning, the wife of "John Gunning, Esquire, co. Roscommon;" she received her guest very politely, and complimented her "upon possessing such humane sensations." She then entered upon an explanation of her position—how they had lived beyond their income, and how John Gunning, Esquire, had been obliged, as before mentioned, "to retire into the country, to avoid the disagreeable consequences that must ensue." Some hopes had been entertained that Lord Mayo, her brother, would have come forward, "listening to the dictates of fraternal affection," and have helped John Gunning, Esquire, and his family; but this reasonable hope had turned out quite unprofitable; and the ill-looking officials at the door were actually preparing to carry out their stern duty, in virtue of the powers confided to them by the high sheriff. The future countess and double duchess were awaiting with tears this indignity in what is now one of the obscurest streets in the city. But what shall be said of John Gunning, Esquire, who had "withdrawn into the country" to avoid the inconveniencies of this proceeding, and left his family to the bailiffs and executions?

The actress and the lady, however, soon arranged a practical plan—a shape that pure sentiment rarely takes. It was resolved that when darkness set in, the actress's man-servant should be dispatched to Britain street, should stand under the drawing-room, and catch any light articles that should be thrown down to him.

12532

Further, the good-natured actress actnally agreed to take in the whole of the young family and their servant until some arrangement could be made. Not long after, "Miss Burke, Mrs. Gunning's sister, a lady of exemplary piety who had passed her probation in the community of Channel Row," sent for the younger children; but the two famous girls remained with the actress. Maria, the elder seems to have been "all life and spirits," a sort of boisterous hoyden; the other was "more reserved and solid."

This charitable actress was the well known George Anne Bellamy, who has left behind her some free, outspoken, vulgar memoirs; but which are yet so natural and characteristic, tinged also with that abundant Boswellian garrulity, as to become very entertaining. These were valuable services, which should have left a lasting sense of obligation; though, indeed, Mrs. Bellamy, who always looked very high, might have hoped to have found her profit in a connection with the Mayo family.

After this odd incident the actress was drifted away to London, and became lost in the whirl of theatrical intrigue. How the Gunning family were finally extricated does not appear; but Maria, our heroine, wrote her benefactress a letter—strange both in orthography and composition; but which seems so overdone in its mistakes as to excite reasonable suspicion. It is known, however, that these beauties were sadly illiterate, and so the letter is to a certain degree in keeping. It was addressed to

"Miss Bellamy in England."

The following are some characteristic extracts:

I reced my dearest Miss Bellamy letter at last; after her long silence, indeed I was very jealous with you, but you make me amen's in Letting me hear from you now. it gives me great joy and all our familey to hear that yr Dear mama and your Dearest self are in perfict health to be sure all yr Relations where fighting to see which of them shod have you first and Longest with ym.....I don't believe it was Mr. Knox you read of at Bath for he is hear. Dublin is ye stupites place.....I believe Sheredian can get no one to play with him is doing all he can to get frinds for him sef to be sure you have bread he is marrd for sirtain to Miss Chamberlan. a sweet pare.

"I must hid a due and shall only say I am my Dr your ever affecnat
M. Gunning."

After all, this spelling was not exceptional. Mr. Sterne's MSS. are full of faults almost as gross; and he talks of "opening a dore."

What became of the "sweet little boy" has been mentioned. Of the three younger sisters who are unknown to fame, one, Catherine, married an undistinguished gentleman who is only known to posterity as one "Robert Travis, Esq." The destiny of the undistinguished portion of the family was written by an ancient parish clerk, in a letter to a Mr. Madder, of Fulham, and, appropriately enough, was adorned with spelling quite as unorthodox. "I take the freedom," says this odd document, which is dated from Huntingdonshire, "in wrighting to you from an information of Mr. Warrington, that you would be glad to have the account of my Townswoman, the Notefied, the Famis, Beautifull Miss Gunnings, Born at Hemmingfordgrey, tho they left the Parish before I had knowledge enough to remember them, and I was born in 32. But I will give you the best account I can, which I believe is better than any man in the country besides myself, though I have not the Birth Register for so long a Date, and since Dr. Dickens is dead, I don't know where it is." He then tells of the two elder sisters; and recollects distinctly seeing the Portrait of the wife of Robert Travis, Esq., in a print shop, "I beleeve in St. Poul's Churchyard, and who had acquired a sort of reflected reputation from her sister's fame. This was an oval after Cotes, with a scrap of doggerel understaud.

This youngest grace, so like her sister's frame,
Her kindred features tell from whence she came,
'Tis needless once to mention Gunning's name.

But which the memory of the ancient parish fashioned into something more elaborate:

The youngest of these Beauties here we have in view
So like in person to the other two
Whoever views her person and her fame
Will see at once that Gunning is her name.

"Which," he adds, "is the best account I can give of them three; but then there was two more, which perhaps you don't know anything about; which I will give you the true Mortalich Regester off, from a Black mavel which lies in our chancel, as follows:

The "black mavel" tells the story of the lives of little Sophia and Lizzy, in a pretty inscription.

By-and-by the two belles, now grown up, were taken over to London, and almost instantly caused a success and a sensation, for which a parallel, in that department, can scarcely be found. They had no fortune, they had slender connections; but fashion in these days was more or less republican. In a society a little wild and frank in tone, and where men of the stamp of Lord March, Selwyn, Mr. Wilkes, and Sir Francis Dashwood were leaders, the chims of dazzling beauty were not to be resisted. They took the town by storm. They burst upon the metropolis in the early months of the year 1751. Walpole, that most full and delightful chronicler, made this appearance a leading item in his next budget for Florence. The wranglings of ministers, he wrote to his friend, were regarded with utter indifference. The Miss Gunnings were in everybody's mouth, "being twenty times" more talked of than the Newcastle family and Lord Granville. These, he says, are "two Irish girls of no fortune, who are declared the handsomest women alive." "I think," says the critical Horace, "their being two so handsome and such perfect figures is their chief excellence, for singly I have seen much handsomer women than either."

Many stories flutter about as to their first entry on the gay London social boards. Mrs. Gunning was not likely to step from Great Britain street into the Mayfair of these days without some miracle of fashionable society being specially worked for her. One legend was that some cruel wag sent them sham cards for a great lady's masquerade, but which the Irish mother was skilful enough to detect, and which she "improved" with the wit and daring of her country. She waited on the noble lady in person, taking care to bring with her one of her matchless daughters. She told of her false card. The eyes of the noble lady were upon the daughter. She thought of her masquerade, and, as may be imagined, substituted a genuine for the forged invitation.

The new belles received a shape of homage that was almost inconvenient, for when they went forth on the public prado, and took the air in the parks at fashionable hours, they were attended by such admiring crowds that it soon became impossible to enjoy that pastime. The public admiration was not restrained by any feeling of delicacy, and was perhaps the more acceptable as an honest testimonial. That was in June. In August they were still cynosures, and "make more noise than any of their predecessors since the days of Helen." No wonder Mrs. Montagu spoke of them as "those goddesses the Gunnings."

But their fresh Irish naivete and, it must be said, rough brusquerie, laid them open to all manner of strange stories and ill-natured remarks. An odd legend went round the clubs. They went down to see the paintings at Hampton Court; and having passed into what is called the Beauty Room, where are the questionable shepherdesses of King Charles, they heard the housekeeper show another company in with this introduction: "Ladies, here are the Beauties." The wild pair, assuming this to be directed to themselves, flew into a violent rage, asked her what she meant—that they came to see the palace and paintings, not to be shown themselves.

They were in the best society. About Christmas in the same year, it was not surprising that each should have a distinguished admirer. James, Duke of Hamilton, a wild roué Scotch nobleman, "equally damaged in his fortune and person," says the bitter Horace, met her at a masquerade, and fell deliberately in love with Elizabeth, the younger. Lord Coventry, "a gay young lord of the patriot breed," was the professed admirer of the other. Every one watched the progress of the business eagerly. The malign Lord Chesterfield was inclined to think it would end doubtfully for the honor of the lady. She and her mother played a bold and skilful game. They appeared everywhere with the noble suitor. When he had to move the address in the House of Lords, the brilliant Irish girl sat beside him, and thus caused him to be agitated by the two passions of fear and love. Her mother told Lord Granville afterwards that "the poor girl" was near fainting with agitation. The duke vaguely proposed marriage some time in the spring. Lord Chesterfield presently gave a magnificent assembly, at which every person of quality was present, who were to be amused with the spectacle of the duke's frantic courtship. He sat at one end of the room, and played faro and carried on disorderly flirtation with the young beauty who was at the other end. Three hundred pounds was on each card; so in a very short time by these tactics he was a loser of nearly a thousand pounds. The Hon. Horace Walpole was among the company, taking sarcastic notes. "I own," he said "I was so little a professor in love that I thought all this parade looked ill for the poor girl, and could not conceive if he was so much engaged with his mistress as to disregard such sums, why he played at all."

Two nights afterwards, the strange denouement came about. Her mother and sister were away at Bedford House, and the duke found himself alone with the famous belle. A sudden ardor—whether of wine or affection—seized on him, and he insisted on having the ceremony performed at once, and on the spot. A parson was promptly sent for, but, on arriving, refused to officiate without the important essentials of a license or a ring, neither of which had been thought of. The duke swore, and talked of calling in the archbishop. Finally, the parson's scruples gave way before his impatience; the license was overlooked, and the lack of the traditional gold ring was happily supplied by the ring of a bed-curtain! The ardent duke was at length lawfully married, at midnight, in Mayfair Chapel. This adventure threw all London into an uproar. The Scotch were furious; "the women mad that so much beauty has had its effect" (thus the bitter Horace); and, better than all, it had a stimulating effect on the admirers of her sister, for Lord Coventry at once gave out that he intended marrying the sister; and within three weeks, on the 5th of March, 1752, she was, according to the suitable phrase, "led to the hymeneal altar." This rise in their fortunes brought about a perfect furore, both of curiosity and enthusiasm. The public, who had crowded before to see them as "the Gunnings," with the true instinct of a mob, became frantic to see them again in their new and higher station. We see in the old music-books a Lady Coventry's minuet. When the duchess was presented at court, the noble persons at St. James's actually climbed up on tables and chairs to have a good stare, like a mere vulgar crowd. When they came out to their chairs to go to parties, they found immense crowds gathered. There was a rush to take places at the theatres if it became known they were going. The critics, however, were not unanimous. The Duchess of Somerset thought her "too tall to be genteel, and her face out of proportion to her height." Her dress, too, was thought rather to savor of the ballet than of an English lady of quality. To the Duchess, Lady Di Egerton and Mrs. Selwyn appeared quite as pretty and a good deal more modest.

In a few weeks their lords took them down to their respective castles, and "one hears no more about them," save the simple fact, which amounted to a good deal, that when the dutchess put up one night at a Yorkshire inn, no less than seven hundred people sat up all night round it to see her get into her post-chaise in the morning! She was always good-natured, and gave Tate Wilkinson benefits at his theatre.

When the season came round again, there were no signs of a re-action. But a new beauty had appeared in the horizon, and comparisons began to be made. The world was talking of Lady Caroline Petersham. Mrs. Greuville, writing to her husband, tells him, as a little bit of gossip, that the "Morocco ambassador"—whose standard of beauty, however, would have been directed by barbarie canons—actually preferred Lady Caroline to Lady Coventry. Both were now being taken over to another metropolis, to confound our hereditary enemies—or allies?—in their own capital. The Gunning went with a vast prestige. A lucky shoemaker of Worcester was making her a pair of shoes, and actually "turned" two guineas and a half, in pennies, for showing them! Still the old gaucherie was not softened down; rather it became more conspicuous by their high position; and the ill-natured public indemnified itself for its insane freaks of admiration by circulating all manner of what are called "spropositos." "I can't say," even Mr. Walpole must admit, "her genius is equal to her beauty." It would be unreasonable to expect such a combination.

Looking at the brilliant mezzotint which once hung in the print-shops, we can gather a faint notion of those wonderful charms which once so dazzled the London liege. Something very bright, very spiritual, very dazzling; but what all agree was the greater charm, is, of course, lost. This was the extraordinary play of expression, which comes from wild spirits, and which may still be seen in many Irish girls. Mrs. Delany saw her often, and noted this special attraction. "She had a thousand dimples and prettinesses in her cheeks, her eyes a little drooping at the corners, but fine for all that; she has a thousand airs, but with a sort of humor that diverts me." There was a good dash of the hoyden about her, with some of the polite sauciness which is more or less the titular belle's prerogative. The pretty elegy, in which the Reverend Mr. Mason bewailed her loss, touches very happily on these charms, and, with the aid of her picture, sets her before us—

Whene'er with soft serenity she smiled,
Or caught the orient blush of quick surprise,
How sweetly mutable, how brightly wild,
The liquid lustre darted from her eyes!
Each look, each motion, waked a new-born grace
That o'er her form a transient glory cast,
Some lovelier wonder soon usurped the place,
Chased by a charm still lovelier than the last.

Mr. Mason's lines are greatly relished at Cambridge. They were got by heart and adapted to the charms of university sempstresses and bed-makers.

This was the figure that the Parisians now saw at all their leading fetes; but, as might be expected, the French refused to confess their admiration, or, at least, would not allow themselves to be dazzled. It is natural, indeed, that when a beauty or singer comes with heraldings and flourishes, their patents should be looked into jealously. Lady Caroline Petersham they dismissed contemptuously, not crediting that she had ever been handsome. Lady Coventry was admitted to be passable. But there was a native belle in the field, one Madame Brionne, to whose charms even the English abroad testified; and French beauty, fortified with the graces of French wit and training, and refused by the associations of the most elegant court, was scarcely fair competition. The Roscommon girl, as her friend Walpole remarked, "was under piteous disadvantages." For she was "very silly, ignorant of the world," and could not speak a word of French; and was not to be redeemed as to any of these failings by her husband, who was the best illustration in the world of what the French call "bete." He is described as being "sillied in a wise way, ignorant, ill-bred, and speaking very little French himself—just enough to show how ill-bred he is." He was, in fact, a sort of titled fox-hunting squire. He was, besides, openly jealous—a fatal unpardonable sottise with the French—and almost childish in his treatment of her. He would not tolerate any rouge or powder upon her cheeks, adornments then so fashionable, and which was indeed an excusable stretch of conjugal tyranny. At a large dinner-party at Sir John Bland's, he fancied he perceived the presence of this forbidden cosmetic on her cheek, and instantly rose, chased her round the table, caught her, and with a napkin actually "scrubbed it off by force"—it may be imagined to the intense amusement and surprise of the persons of quality then assembled. He then sat down in a pet, and told her publicly that since she had deceived him and broken her promise he would take her back to England.

It does not appear that she was presented at the court of the gallant monarch who then ruled France; at least that scrupulous courtier, Dangeau, who registered every presentation, makes no mention of her. The French, however, were very anxious they should stay for the grand fetes at St. Cloud that evening, but her lord said he was obliged to return, as he said he would not like to miss a musical meeting at Worcester! There were some fireworks at Madame Pompadour's, to which she was invited, but she excused herself on the ground of her music master coming at that hour. The Duc de Luxemburg, the pink of French quality, when they were leaving some party, came to tell him that he had called up Milady Coventry's coach, upon which my lord "Vous avez fort bein fait." The comble to these joint betises was when the Maréchal de Lowendahl admired an English fan of the Lady Coventry's, who upon that presented it to him. But next morning came a letter, asking it back, and saying that it had been presented by her lord before marriage, and that parting with it would cause "an irreparable breach." An old one was sent instead. On this, the beautiful stranger went round telling her wrongs to everybody, saying, it is "so odd my lord should treat her in this way, when she know he would die for her, and he had been so kind as to marry her without a shilling." It may be imagined what the polite but amazed Frenchman thought of these confidences. It must be recollected she was eighteen.

They returned to London. The year after Mrs. Delany saw her at a party—a party where the duke of Portland wore a "coat of dark mouse-colored velvet,'—and a vest of "Isabella velvet"—and described her as "looking in high beauty." In the November of the following year, one Sunday afternoon, a ducal friend brought the famous countess from church to visit Mrs. Delany: "To feast me." And a feast indeed she was. Her dress was "a black silk sack, made for a large hoop, which she wore without any, and it trailed a yard on the ground." She also wore "a cobwebbed lace handkerchief, a pink satin long cloak, lined with ermine mixed with squirrel skins." That wonderful face was adorned with "a French cap that just covered the top of her head—of blonde—and stood in the form of a butterfly with wings not quite extended." The whole was completed by lappets tied under the chin with pink and green ribbons; a head-dress, in short, which charmed the Dean of Down's Lady. Still she was struck by "a sort of silly look at times about her mouth;" and in the portraits there are traces about the features of a little weakness.

After all, she seems to have had a sort of unsophisticated good nature, which all the extravagant worship she was paid did not impair. She was not a "hollow" beauty, and had friends as well as admirers. One of the prettiest stories about her, is her behaviour to the young Irish hoyden (a belle also, whom fickle London was already beginning to talk of) who had naively asked to have her pointed out to her.

A grand masquerade had been given at Somerset House, at which was a little Irish beauty—a Miss Allen, an unsophisticated "lively sort of a fairy," says Mrs. Delany. She went up to Lady Coventry, and looking at her very earnestly, said, "I have indeed heard a great deal of this lady's beauty, but it far surpasses all I have heard. "What!" said the other Irish belle, "did you never see me before?" The young girl's naivete amused every body. A gentleman then took her about, showed her everything, got her a good seat at supper—everyone, to the astonishment of the young girl, bowing and making way for them. At the end of the night he turned out to be the Duke of York. The story has quite a Cinderella air.

Horace Walpole testifies to this good humor under certainly trying circumstances. "If she was not," he says, "the best humoured creature in the world, I should have made her angry." It was a great supper at Lord Hertford's and the beauty was asked to take some more wine. She answered in a very vulgar accent, "if she drank more she should be muckibus! "Lord," said Lady Mary Coke, "what is that?" "Oh," said Mr. Walpole, "it is only Irish for sentiment." Lady Mary Coke, we may be sure, would not be slack to point attention to the old phrase.

Her short race was but for eight years, and yet, to the last, London training seems to have had little effect on the old wild nature. In one sense this is a good testimony to her disposition. Even the year before her death, Mr. Jenkinson filled in a corner of one of his letters with a story about her, which was then amusing all London—"a silly action, he calls it. Walking in the Park, the mob had been disrespectful, incited by her airs. It came to the ears of the king (that good-natured king to whom she had said, that of all sights in the world "she longed to see a coronation,") and on the following Sunday evening he sent her a guard, to attend her as she walked. A discreet person would have declined the questionable honor, but the saucy countess exulted in her escort, and made a triumphant progress with "two servants in front carrying their halberds, and twelve soldiers following behind, and the whole guard held ready close by to turn out at a moment's notice." Thus attended, the gay countess continued her promenade from eight until ten o'clock, the mob also forming part of the procession, and not restrained by the military force from uttering some plain truths—so plain, indeed, that "Fielding's men" had to take up a few. As an illustration of that "silliness in the mouth," which Mrs. Delany remarked, this is worth a whole essay.

So her short butterfly life passed. We have glimpses of her down at Crome, the family seat, with a house full of company, and "Gilly Williams," one of the Selwyn set, (whose letters should be more known,) and "old Sandys;" while the earl good-naturedly held a faro bank every night, which "we have as yet," writes Gilly, "plundered considerably." There was a certain captain there who is mentioned as "studying a pretty attitude for the countess." She was then "in high spirits and great beauty." Poor countess!

But in August, 1760—the great Tristram year, when Mr. Sterne was in London—she fell sick. That bourgeois husband of hers was not altogether so foolish in his generation when he chased her round the Paris dining-room and rubbed the paint off her cheeks with a napkin; for she had since had her own way, and used to daub her cheeks profusely with white-lead. To this abominable custom—one of the sacrifices which Moloch fashion then demanded—she is said to have fallen a victim. She was living down at her own place, and a Doctor Wall, who attended on her, wrote to Mr. Selwyn an account of her sickness, making, as she said, "no excuse for being minute, because I believed that it would be most agreeable to you that it should be so." For the profound wit was of her admirers. She was very ill indeed, having an oppression on her chest, with a sort of spasmodic rheumatism. She was very weak, and the bourgeois husband was away. The marvellous charms began to pass away, and the discovery of this fatal change brought on, perhaps, her real malady. It is painful to read how it affected her. She never was without a pocket-glass in her hand, and when this sad truth-teller betrayed to her the ravages of disease, she seems to have lost all hope and spirit, took to her bed permanently, allowed no light in the room but "the lamp of a teakettle," and actually took things in through the curtains without suffering them to be withdrawn. This recals another death-bed scene—that of the charming Mrs. Oldfield, Pope's Narcissa:

O lions in woolen! 'twould a saint provoke.'
Were the last words that Narcissa spoke.
No; let a charming chintz and Brussels lace
Wrap my cold limbs and shade my lifeless face;
One would not sure be frightful when one's dead—
And, Betty, give this cheek a little red.

Unfortunately, a letter for Lord Coventry was brought in to her, the handwriting of which she recognized as that of her sister. She opened it without scruple, and read in it a touching lament over her own piteous case; the duchess bewailing her hard fate in not being able ever to see her again, and plainly considering her case as hopeless.

The effect on the wretched beauty was almost fatal. The doctor rushed to the room, and found her almost dying. Through the rest of the day and night she passed from one fainting fit to another, Her attendants thought she had not an hour to live, and hurried expresses were sent for Lord Coventry, who was to arrive the next night.

On the 1st of October she died. That Walpole really felt her death—as much, indeed, as that water-color Voltaire could feel the loss of any living thing—is evident from his letters. "The charming countess is dead at last," he wrote, five days after her demise. The Reverend Mr. Mason tuned his genteel lyre to some desponding chords for the occasion,

Yes, Coventry is dead! Attend the strain,
Daughters of Albion: ye that, light as air,
So oft have tripped in her fantastic train,
With hearts as gay and faces half as fair,
For she was fair beyond you brightest bloom,
This Envy owns, since now her bloom is fled.

Lord Bolingbroke, known to his wild friends as "Bully" had affected a sort of tendresse for the Countess; and it is said that when news was brought to Newmarket of her death, he acted a burst of well got up emotion, and left the room, says spiteful Horace, to hide not his crying but his not crying. But "the mob," as the same authority usually styled the broad, bold citizen element of the British people, held by her to the last, and ten thousand people witnessed her funeral.

Old Mr. Gunning, who had risen with his daughter's fame, and had got into good society, was seen by Lord March, two or three years afterwards, at a grand masquerade. He wore "a running footman's habit, with Lady Coventry's picture hung at his button-hole, like a cross of St. Louis." This is the last appearance of John Gunning, Esquire of Roscommon. By that time, no doubt, the rest of the world had forgotten her.—London Society.

The lion roams over the earth; the eagle sweeps through the heavens; and man, the king of these kings, should in soul and spirit have his path on the earth and in the heavens at once.

FOUR-O'CLOCKS.

BY DENNAR STEWART.

"UNCLE WILL, why do you have these scarecrow four-o'clocks in your pretty garden? They spoil it completely. Now confess, dear Uncle, that they're commonplace weeds, and let me pull them up."

No, Nellie, let them be as an old bachelor's odd fancy, and I will answer your first question, if you'll have patience with a tiresome story.

I was a happy boy in many respects—happy in a home of affluence, loving friends, robust health, and very happy in having a little girl, but three years younger than myself, for my cousin Nellie. I was the youngest of five sons. We had no sister to pet and caress, no sister to sweeten and soften our rough boyish sports; and this we thought a real affliction, except in those occasional visits of Cousin Nellie's. My father's only brother was a prominent lawyer in a Southern city. He had but one child, an idolized daughter, left motherless in her infancy—the Nellie Atwood for whom you are named.

The fervid summers of her native State were too fierce and exhausting for her delicate frame. So through her early years the hot months were passed with us in "gathering northern roses," as Uncle Frank said.

That those pleasant summer months were so short was the one great sorrow of my boyhood, and I devoutly wished that Uncle Frank would remove to South America, or some other tropical region, so that Nellie's once-a-year visit might last from January through December.

She was a strange little thing as a child—a rare compound of opposites. Fun and feeling, sympathy and mischief, pride and humility, were most harmoniously blended in her nature. This Protean versatility of character was in after life her greatest charm. You felt that she combined the leading traits of many styles of women, and was perfect in one and all. As your father once happily expressed it: "Which Nellie do we see to-day?"

Her eyes indicated this peculiarity of her being, with their thousand varying expressions. They reminded one of a mountain brook—now gliding in brightness over shining pebbles, gently caressing the flower-lined margin; then, overhung by drooping willows, which mirrored themselves in fathomless depths of sadness; here leaping over rocky banks, a cloud of shimmering rainbows, and, anon, dark, silent as the storm-clouds above.

But I must hasten: An old man becomes garrulous and prosy when telling of the "lang syne," and it is no easy task to compress a long life into the tale of an idle hour.

So, I will say nothing of our childish adventures—our fallings-out and makings-up, our merry rides and pleasant walks, our robbing of orchards and pilfering of hens' nests—always in company. But one thing of that happy time I must mention—our flower-bed. Nellie's fondness for flowers amounted to enthusiasm, and with our old-fashioned rows of larkspurs, hollyhocks and double pinks she was delighted. They were all new to her, but her special favorite was the "four-o'clock." She was so astonished at its periodical opening and shutting, and indulged in such delicious fancies concerning the mystery! I see her now, all attention to my somewhat apocryphal explanation of the phenomenon! But she—honest little soul—received my mythical story with undoubting faith, and ever after cherished a love and reverence for the blossom, like that of the devoted Catholic for the symbolic Passion-flower. So, morning and evening, I never failed in gathering a dew-dropped bouquet for Nellie. Such droll little things as they were—stemless, leafless, without a sprig of green—a solid bunch of "dear, sleepy little four-o'clocks," as Nellie called them.

CHAPTER II.

Nellie and I had not met for years. She had "finished," and I had "gone through college." We were fast becoming strangers. True, we exchanged occasional letters during this educational period—very formal, very polite they were, but with nothing of Nellie or Will in their dry husks; and thus they grew very "occasional" indeed.

The time for my long-anticipated visit at Uncle Frank's had arrived, and I was in the parlor awaiting my cousin, for uncle was absent. In a moment she came, and instantly opened my eyes to the immense difference between a young lady of seventeen and the child of twelve with whom I parted.

In past years I thought myself an obliging fellow in caressing Miss Nellie, and bestowing any amount of "petting" upon her. Thinking pleasantly to resume this agreeable custom, I essayed to greet her with a cousinly salute, and was rewarded by an attempt on her part to box my ears.

"Not kiss me, Nellie!" I exclaimed, with well-feigned surprise. "Don't you know your cousin Will from a stranger?"

The jetty curls danced defiance, and the pouting young lady replied to my gentle reproach: "Indeed, sir! Do you know my age?"

"About seventeen, I think; and what then?"

"Young ladies do not kiss young gentlemen here. Do they up North? No, sir; you'd write it to your old 'ehum,' and then have a laugh over me for a goosey or a romp."

"Which are you, Miss Nellie?"

"I am neither; and no longer a child, but a pattern demure young lady."

Having achieved this speech, "the young lady" attempted to compose her mirthful, mischievous features into a prim, precise formality; but she was too lovely for this, and finally ended with a roguish, ringing laugh.

I am no metaphysician, and so have never satisfied myself why the relation of cousinship should be Cupid's special field of conquest. Why, in spite of our laws, and in face of the constant teaching that cousins should feel like brothers and sisters, do they feel so differently? I have been told that where these relatives are reared and educated in the same neighborhood they are as members of one family, and think of no closer bond. This may be true; but with me this fraternal relation of cousinhood, unlike other earthly things, performed far more than it promised.

A stranger might not have deemed Nellie strikingly handsome, even at the fascinating age of seventeen. But to her daily friends, the varying expression of her flexible mouth—the glorious dark eyes, reflecting every light and shadow of her soul—the changing color which came and went with each passing thought and feeling—the perfect fairy-like figure, now stilled in the repose of calm reflection, now electrified and animated by exuberant vivacity, were beautiful beyond expression.

What a happy visit that was! A period which comes to my memory now like a breath from "the Beautiful Isle!" For a month Nellie and I were almost always together. Sometimes we wandered to the river, and passed delightful hours in the little sail-boat, watching the white-winged seafowl as they pursued and seized their prey. Or turning seafowl ourselves for the nonce, we engaged in fishing with the zeal of Isaak Walton himself. Again, dreamily we talked through sunny hours, as our little bark flew over the waves, tossing up clouds of glittering rainbows.

At other times, Nellie mounted her Arabian pony, and with me for attendant, explored the neighboring country, cantering along through shaded lanes, and revelling in the discovery of by-paths and hidden nooks.

She was a most excellent rider, as are most Southern ladies, and nothing could be more graceful than her lithe figure when giving the rein to Selim—she seemed to fly with exuberant joyousness. She wore a close-fitting habit, the most coquettish little beaver with a floating feather, while beneath shone a bright oval face, framed in flying curls, and instinct with pleasure and merriment. I shall not have to tell you, little lady, riding out with Charlie Sanders so often as you do, that I was very careful my cousin should suffer no injury in dismounting after these rides. In my assiduity, I did not relinquish the bewitching little hand until I was quite sure she could stand firmly upon the ground. The little gipsy did not thank me for my solicitude, save by a toss of the head, a pout of the lips, or a threatened application of her riding whip, with, "Really, sir, you'd better not do that again. Do you think I'm a baby, Mr. Impertinence?"

A month had passed, and with its ending "a change came o'er the spirit of my dream," for through the remainder of my stay I had a rival. His name was Edward Colton, a young gentleman of extensive property, assured manners, and not unfavorable appearance. He had just passed a year or two on the continent, and embraced the earliest opportunity for renewing his acquaintance with Nellie. By the same steame came Miss Fannie Winslow, a friend of us all. She returned from a visit to an aunt at the North, where I had formed her acquaintance, which, through our mutual affection for Nellie, had ripened into a firm friendship. But I soon perceived that regard for my cousin would prove no binding tie between Mr. Colton and myself. He cordially hated me, and as Nellie liked him very much, I entertained for him no special affection.

I was, however, too sagacious to indulge in criticism of the gentleman, though Miss Nellie often tried to provoke my strictures. "Of all the gentlemen of my acquaintance," she would astutely remark, "I think Mr. Colton the handsomest. Don't you, Cousin Will?"

"Really, I have not met your entire gentlemen acquaintance, Nellie?"

"But does he not surpass those you have seen?"

"Certainly, in many respects. To what particular excellences do you allude?"

"There, you are just laughing at him now. You gentlemen never can judge each other justly, but are envious and censorious as possible."

When Mr. Colton called I always strolled away, considerately leaving them together, which kind proceeding, from all I could discover, was far from being very agreeable to the young lady. Somewhat instinctively versed in "lovely woman" and her "ways," I entered into no contest with Colton, jealous as I was, but invariably yielded him the ground with an air of generous indifference. I think I lost nothing by so doing.

I was quite willing to attend amiable Fannie Winslow whenever Nellie or Colton suggested, and was her usual escort in our various excursions. Neither did Nellie's gay raillery on my devotion to her sweet friend in the least annoy me. Fannie and I had a secret of our own. We had more mutual friends than Nellie, but peculiar circumstances required strict secresy concerning her betrothal to my friend and classmate. So I was bound over to keep the peace.

We were walking in the garden one afternoon, Colton with Nellie, Fannie and I. 'Twas a beautiful spot, filled with choice plants and rare flowers, and laid out with exquisite taste. I was much surprised in finding my old friends, the four-o'clocks, snugly ensconced in a pleasant corner, looking quite out of keeping with their elegant companions.

"Why, Nellie," I called, "how are these homely flowers here? Is it for the heightened effect of contrast?"

"You must ask Uncle Bob," she answered. "One has to indulge his Ethiop taste sometimes, he's such a good old soul; but don't make me account for the barbarous whim."

The next day I found the old gardener. "Uncle Bob," I said, "why, in the name of beauty, are those four-o'clocks in the garden?"

"Them be Missus Nellie's, Massa Will. She used to set heaps by 'em, but 'pears like she'd done forgot 'em, and nebber looks at her fabrit posy. Dese yer ladies is mighty quare," and he scratched his wooly pate reflectively.

This interview with Bob helped me wonderfully in deciding on a speedy conversation with a "mighty quare lady;" for my visit was prolonged far beyond its first limits, and the coming week I must turn northward.

It was a lovely evening. We were watching a gorgeous sunset from the western verandah. What a glorious shroud was cloud-woven in that brilliant sky, for the dying Day! We silently gazed until it was buried out of sight—until the mourning star-eyed Twilight approached. I left Nellie a moment, entered the garden, and returning, offered her a bouquet of four-o'clocks, quite like its ancient predecessors in those summer days of childhood.

"For auld lang syne, Nellie," I said.

With her own peculiar grace she accepted it, pressed it lightly to her lips, and then said musingly:

"O Cousin Will, those four-o'clock days were very happy. What a pity they closed so early, and are all folded away!"

There were tears in her voice (borrowing a beautiful French expression) as she spoke.

"But that was in the early morning, Nellie. You remember, they only seemed to fade and fold away, and after a brief repose greeted the morning sun, bright and beautiful as ever. So the four-o'clock days must return. They've only been nooning, and it's high time that they open again. Won't they look up now, little Four-o'clock!" and I kissed the sweet lips, and drew the curly head to my bosom.

I could hear her throbbing heart—could see, in the soft twilight, the beautiful blushes playing on her face, and I knew that those down-cast eyes were wells of tenderness. But she had not spoken, when little Jake came to say that Mr. Colton was in the parlor, wanting Miss Nellie.

"Come, Cousin Will, I'm not going alone."

The call was very dull. Vivacious little Nell was so silent and thoughtful that Mr. Colton feared she was threatened with severe illness, and ought to repair to the seashore at once. Nellie heaved a sigh of relief as the door closed after him, and then relapsed into profound silence, apparently engaged in the brilliant contrast presented by a bracelet which she was rapidly turning on her wrist. It was one of her own quaint devices—a diamond clasp attached to a jet bracelet, with quite dazzling effect.

"Of what are you thinking, Nellie?"

"Oh, nothing, only how beautiful black and bright look together. Do you see?" and she raised the dazzling little arm.

"Let me take the bracelet."

She gave it me, and I turned it around for a good light—she looking intently all the while. Then, suddenly encircling one of her eyes with the ornament, I looked down into them: "Yes, Nellie, black and bright are witchingly beautiful."

For an instant she did not perceive the implied compliment. Then, laughing merrily:

"O Cousin Will, do excuse my slowness. I'm so unused to delicate flattery, that I really could not "take" without studying over it. But it's really a delightful turn, and you are quite accomplished in elegant repartee. Didn't you forget yourself, and imagine me Miss Fannie?"

"By no means, little Nell. And now as I go in three days, let us stop this nonsense about Fannie, and speak more seriously."

I cannot repeat the particulars of that sacred interview, even to my pet niece. Suffice, that its conclusion found Nellie and I happy lovers; and ere the good night was said, Uncle Frank had sanctioned our betrothal, and promised me that in a twelvemonth I might claim my bride.

CHAPTER III.

The year seemed a long one, in spite of the pressing business which crowded each day. I felt, as did our first parents, toiling just outside of Eden, where every breeze bore to them the breath of its first flowers, and songs of its birds. Nellie's letters took the place of these. Once a week came the little white messenger with precious words from her warm, true heart.

Fannie was again with her aunt in New York, and I saw her frequently. She was to return South with me, as Nellie's bridesmaid.

Our home was quite ready. Only three weeks till I should go for its mistress. For a fortnight past, Nellie's letters had failed me; yet Fannie had just heard from a friend who spoke of her perfect health and increasing loveliness. At first I blamed Uncle Sam, after a fashion that would send me to Fort Lafayette in these days. but finally concluded that the dear little witch was but trying me with one of her artless pranks.

I was called from the city on business which detained me for several days. On my return I found several letters upon my desk. I looked for Nellie's delicate superscription, and found it on a small package, which I opened at once. There was my picture, a number of my letters, and a cool, brief note, requesting me to reciprocate the act, and consider our acquaintance terminated.

For a time I was stunned, and sat, I know not how long, in blank unconsciousness. Rousing from the trance, a note from Fannie caught my eye. It was very short, stating that a letter from home, but just arrived, explained Nellie's late silence. That she was just on the point of departure, that if possible she might arrive in time to prevent sad consequences of a misunderstanding caused by Colton. He had convinced Nellie by some means that I was trifling with her, and about to marry Fannie. Fannie wished me to come with all possible haste.

Within fifteen minutes I was on that sad journey. The days were ages. I saw Nellie at the marriage altar with Colton—heard her pronounce those binding vows—and saw and heard nothing else in that wretched time.

At last I was there, whirling rapidly through the familiar streets in the early morning. I went first to Mrs. Winslow's, but Fannie was not at home. She was at Mr. Atwood's. I could ask nothing more of the servant, and ordered the carriage to my uncle's, where I called for Fannie. It seemed a lifetime ere she came.

"Fannie, has she married Colton?" I hurriedly asked.

"No," she replied faintly.

"Can't you satisfy her? Will she marry him?"

"Mr. Atwood, she will never marry," was the solemn reply.

I looked into her face for an instant—the dread truth was there. Then she went from the room, and I was alone with my great sorrow.

After some hours she came again, and related the sad story. She arrived on the yesterday morning, and learned that Nellie and Mr. Colton were to be married in the evening. Going directly to Nellie's room, she found her pale and sad, but with a proud, high bearing towards her supposed rival.

Briefly and gently she explained my constancy, and her own engagement to my friend.

"But Will's letters requesting a release," said Nellie.

"Show them to me, darling, with some of Colton's writing. I suspect they were forged by him and a bribed clerk in the post office."

Investigation verified her surmise, and Nellie's face brightened with a happiness almost celestial. But the sudden ransition was to o great for her delicate frame. Smiling through tears, as Fannie told her I would speedily come, she suddenly pressed her hand to her heart with an expression of intense pain. The physician was instantly summoned, and in an hour she was quite easy. During the momentary absence of her father, she asked Fannie to take from her Bible some withered flowers and bring them to her. Pressing them to her lips, she clasped them firmly, and turning to her friend: "Fannie dear, these must never be taken from me—never."

After a little she spoke again. "Father, Fannie, how dark it is growing! Give Cousin Will my good night kiss, and tell him that he'll find little Four-o'clock bright in the morning." And she fell asleep.

I went with Fannie to my darling's chamber. Lying so still, in the pure white dress, was my cousin Nellie. The flush had faded from the olive cheek, the beautiful eyes were closed. In these only was she changed. The rich curls clustered like a blessing on the calm brow, and a smile lingered upon her lips, as though she were but lain "down to pleasant dreams." The dear little hands held in loving embrace the faded four-o'clocks, which I had gathered a twelvemonth ago. And they went down with my little blossom into God's garden, where I long to rest beside her, till the morning cometh.

And now my niece knows why I treasure these "scarecrow flowers." Fortunate, too, that my story is ended, for there is Charlie at the garden gate. Does he want me, Nellie?

A RENOWNED clergyman lately preached rather a long sermon from the text: "Thou art weighed in the balance and found wanting." After the congregation had listened about an hour, some began to get weary and went out; others soon followed, greatly to the annoyance of the minister. Another person started, whereupon the parson stopped in his sermon, and said: "That is right, gentlemen; as fast as you are weighed, pass out!" He continued his sermon at some length after that, but no one disturbed him by leaving.

CAN A MAN MARRY HIMSELF?—The Bishop of Carlisle is credited with a joke. It is said that a young clergyman not far from Penrith, being on the eve of marriage, and not wishing to trouble any of his brethren, wrote to the Bishop, inquiring, as he had already published the bans from his own pulpit, could he marry himself? His lordship made no long appeal to laws ecclesiastical, but at once capped the query with another: "Could you bury yourself?"

If a man has not either great men or great objects before him, his powers degenerate as the magnet's do when it has lain a long time without being turned toward the right corners of the world.

ABOUT EARTHQUAKES.

THOSE mild yearnings of terrestrial bowels which are felt periodically in California can hardly be called earthquakes, though the term admits of no degree of comparison. The demonstration which engulfs a city, or breaks the china on the kitchen dresser, has but one word to describe it. There is no doubt that Californian earthquakes are miserably deficient in sincerity and other positive qualities. They may be confounded with the rumbling of distant wheels, or a passing gust of wind, and are not felt outside the walls of our dwellings—which latter are not in themselves types of perfect security. People are very apt to think little of the force that shakes the walls of their tenements who are familiar with the daily spectacle of two-story dwellings propelled quietly through the thoroughfares of their city. Your true earthquake, on the contrary, is apt to upset all preconceived theories of stability, attacks people on the street, grips the ground under their feet with a firm hand, and overthrows with them such time-honored figures of rhetoric as "the sure and firm set earth," terra firma—and the like.

It may be, however, that even such equivocal demonstrations as are felt on this coast, are sufficient to satisfy some people. The theory of gravitation was probably made as patent to Newton by the fall of the pippin as if he had been "bonnetted" by a boulder. But when we have finished our evening paper and the reporters' account of the latest San Francisco earthquake, it may be instructive to turn back to the description of another, which unfortunately left few intelligent survivors to record it. The earthquake at Lisbon on the 1st November, 1755, was of such a character.

The weather for some days previous to the fatal event had been clear and very warm for the season, and the morning of the 1st of November itself was ushered in with a brilliant sun and a cloudless sky. A few minutes after nine o'clock, a rumbling noise was heard like distant thunder, which gradually increased until it excelled the loudest roar of cannon; and then occurred the first shock. It shook the city to its foundations, and overwhelmed the inhabitants with consternation. The houses waved to and fro with such violence that the upper stories immediately fell, and crushed their occupants and the passengers in the streets to death. The motion of the earth was so vehement that it was impossible to stand upright, and the effects of so unexpected and frightful a concussion were rendered doubly terrific by a thick gloom which overspread the light of day. Thousands rushed into the streets to escape being buried in the ruins of their dwellings, and made their way over heaps of rubbish to the great square in front of St. Paul's church, to be out of the reach of falling stones.

The great church of St. Paul's itself had fallen, and involved an immense multitude in its destruction. The 1st of November was the festival of All Saints, and from an early hour the churches had been crowded with devotees and ecclesiastics. Most of these, in the act of religious worship, were at once killed or miserably mangled. Such of their congregations as escaped, including many dignitaries of the church in their episcopal and purple garments, rushed to the side of the river as to a place of comparative safety. Priests in their sacerdotal vestments, ladies half dressed or with tattered clothes, and an immense concourse of people of all ranks and ages, were here assembled, supplicatng Heaven upon their knees and with agonizing shouts repeating their Miseracordia meu Dios. In the midst of their anguish and their devotions, the second great shock came on, nearly as violent as the first, completing the work of destruction. The general consternation was at its height, and the shrieks and cries of Miseracordia resounded from one end of the town to the other. The church on the top of St. Catharine's Hill, after rocking to and fro, fell with a tremendous crash, and killed great numbers who had sought protection on that eminence. But the most terrible consequence of the second shock fell on those at the water's side. On a sudden, the river, which at that part is four miles broad, was observed to heave and swell in a most unaccountable manner, since no wind was stirring at the time. In an instant there appeared at some small distance a large body of water rising like a mountain, which came on foaming and roaring, rushing towards the shore with fearful impetuosity. The crowd attempted to retire before it, but the motion of the water was too quick to permit escape in so dense a throng. The volume of water burst upon them, and sucked back into its tremendous vortex, amid shrieks and wailings, the defenceless multitude. A magnificent quay that had been recently built of rough marble at a vast expense, was at this moment entirely swallowed up with all the people on it who had crowded there for refuge. Numberless boats and small vessels, likewise, which were anchored near it, and were full of persons who had thrown themselves into them with the idea that the place of greatest safety was on the water, were all swept away, leaving no trace behind.

In the meantime, the ships in the river were tumbled and tossed about as in a storm; some broke their cables and were carried to the other side of the Tagus; others were whirled round with incredible swiftness; several large boats were turned keel upwards; and all this terrible commotion occurred without any wind, which rendered it the more astounding. According to the account of a shipmaster who encountered the concussion and survived its dangers, the whole city of Lisbon, as surveyed from the river, was waving backwards and forwards like the sea when the wind first begins to rise; that the agitation of the earth was so great, even under the river, that it threw up his large anchor from the mooring, and carried it to the surface of the water; and that immediately the river rose near twenty feet, and as instantly subsided. Upon this event he saw the quay with the whole concourse of people upon it sink down, and at the same time every one of the boats and vessels near it was drawn into the cavity, which instantly closed upon them, so that not the least sign of a wreck was ever seen afterwards. It is worthy of remark, that this noble quay was the only place in Lisbon that was entirely swallowed up, the destruction in other parts only amounting to demolition.

After all the devastations and horrors of the two preceding shocks, the measure of misfortune might seem at its full. But a third shock was still in store to complete the misery of the wretched population. It was somewhat less violent than the two former, though the water rushed in again and retired with the same rapidity. Such was the impetuosity with which the river was moved, that some vessels were cast upon dry ground that had ridden in seven fathoms of water. This alternate rising and sweeping back of the waters was repeated several times, committing on each occurrence extensive injury and destruction. At this period it was generally believed that the city of Lisbon was doomed to be entirely swept from the face of the earth.

But the earthquake had now completed its ravages, and gave place to a raging element not less inexorable and desolating. In a hundred places at once the flames burst forth with such fury that the whole city appeared in a blaze. The commencement of the conflagration was owing not so much to the discharge of subterranean fires, which issued from fissures in the earth, as to other circumstances which rendered it inevitable. As is usual in Catholic countries on days of high festival, every altar in every church and chapel was illuminated with wax tapers and lamps, and these falling with the curtains and timber work during the convulsion, soon gave a beginning to the fire. The neighboring buildings caught the flames already kindled by kitchen and other fires in private dwellings, and spread them throughout the city. The destruction of life and property during the conflagration was almost equal to that caused by the earthquake, since it was six days before it was finally arrested and extinguished. The total loss of life in these several disasters is estimated variously at from 30,000 to 60,000 souls.

To enumerate and treat in detail all the great shakes of history would require more time and space than the limits of a newspaper article afford. But the earthquake at Messina claims attention as a representative one, and cannot very well be dismissed in a paragraph. This city, situated between Mount Etna and the Charybdis, and at no great distance from the volcanoes of Lipari and Stromboli, must have been in all ages liable to suffer by earthquakes. It escaped tolerably well however from the earthquake of 1693, which destroyed a fourth part of the cities of Sicily, and also from the other convulsions to which that portion of the earth was subject until the year 1783. The autumn of the preceding year was unusually cold and rainy. Fahrenheit's thermometer was often as low as 56 degrees. The succeeding winter was dry; and the mercury never fell under 55 degrees: and what is uncommon in that season, storms were now and then observed to rise from the west. The pilots in the channel observed that the tides no longer rose at their usual periods, and the gulf of Charybdis raged with extraordinary fury. On the 5th of February, 1783, the air was heavy and calm; the sky obscured with thick clouds, and the atmosphere seemingly all in a flame. About half-past twelve at noon, the earth began to shake with a dreadful noise. The shocks continually increased, and became at length so violent as to open the ground, and to overturn, in two or three minutes, a considerable part of the buildings. A long white cloud appeared to the north-west; and soon after another, very dark, in the same quarter of the heavens. The latter in a moment spread over the whole horizon, and deluged the city with rain and hail, accompanied with dreadful claps of thunder. The inhabitants fled in the utmost terror to the fields and the ships in the harbor. From mid-day till five in the afternoon the earthquakes continued almost without interruption. The shocks then became somewhat less frequent. The cries of the dying; the shrieks of those who were half buried under the ruins; the wild terror with which others, who were still able, attempted to make their escape; the despair of fathers, mothers, and husbands, bereft of those who were dearest to them; these formed altogether a scene of horror, such as can but seldom occur in the history of the calamities of the human race. Amid that awful scene, instances of the most heroic courage and the most generous affection were displayed. Mothers, regardless of their own safety, rushed into every danger to snatch their children from death. Conjugal and filial affection prompted deeds not less desperate and heroic. But no sooner did the earthquake cease than the poor wretches who had escaped began to feel the influence of very different passions. When they returned to visit the ruins, to seek out the situation of their fallen dwellings, to inquire into the state of their families, to procure food and collect some remains of their former fortunes—such as found their circumstances the most wretched suddenly became animated with rage, which nothing but wild despair could inspire. The distinction of ranks and the order of society were disregarded, and property eagerly violated. Murder, rapine, and lawless robbery, reigned among the smoking ruins.

The succeeding day scarcely alleviated the distress of this dreadful night: the few wretches who still survived, found themselves destitute of every necessity. At length order was in some degree re-established; and in two days after every person was supplied at least with some small portion of the necessaries for subsistence. But none as yet thought of returning to take up their abode among the ruins. The common people fixed their residence on the plain of Porto Salvo, near the town of Salleo: the nobles, magistrates, and merchants, on another plain, on the other side of the stream Porto do Legno; and the soldiers at Terra Nuevo. Some violent shocks, which were again felt on the 13th of February and the 28th of March, almost completed the destruction of the city. The corn magazines, however, escaped without damage; and the public ovens and the aqueducts were but little injured. From these facts it may perhaps be inferred that, had not the houses of Messina been, in general, hastily built at the first, and afterwards carelessly repaired, fewer of them would have been overthrown by the earthquake.

This earthquake was not of a momentary duration, like that by which Lisbon was destroyed, and many others. For more than sixty days from the 5th of February to the beginning of April, Messina continued to be shaken, and at that time felt more than two hundred shocks; and even after that period the alarm was again and again renewed. The chief damage which the buildings within the city suffered was the fall of the dome of the Church of Purgatory. Only the walls were left standing; and even these had suffered considerably. One half of the steeple of the cathedral was beaten to the ground. The magazines of Porto Franco were likewise very much shattered. The fort of San Salvador, being built on an artificial foundation, the side next to the sea there fell down; but on the other side, where it is founded on a rock, it stood unmoved by all the shocks of the earthquake.

Sir William Hamilton, who traveled into Calabria immediately after the earthquake, arrived at this ill-fated spot on the 16th of May, and his observations we shall here transcribe. He found that all the beautiful front of the Palazzetta, which extended in very lofty uniform buildings, in the shape of a crescent, had been in some parts totally ruined, in others less; and there were cracks in the earth of the quay, a part of which had sunk above a foot below the level of the sea. The howlings of the dogs in the streets of Messina, a little before the earthquake were so loud and terrific, that orders were sent to kill them; and it is said that during the earthquake fire had been seen to issue from the cracks of the quay; but our author is persuaded that this, as in other cases, was a vapor charged with electric fire, or a kind of inflammable air. Here also he was informed, that the shock of the 5th of February had been from the bottom upwards; but the subsequent ones generally horizontal or verticose. A remarkable circumstance was observed at Messina, and through the whole coast of Calabria, which had been most affected by the earthquake, viz., that a small fish called cicirelli, resembling the English white-bait, but larger, which usually lie at the bottom of the sea, buried in the sand, had, after the commencement to the time this account was written, continued to be taken near the surface, and that in such abundance as to be common food for the poorest sort of people: whereas before the earthquake this fish was rare, and reckoned among the greatest delicacies. Fish of all kinds were also taken in greater abundance on these coasts after the commencement of the earthquake than before; which Sir William supposes to have been occasioned either by the volcanic matter having heated the bottom of the sea, or that the continual tremor of the earth had forced them out of their retreats.

The disastrous year of this earthquake was scarcely completed, the chasms which it had opened in the ground were still yawning, and the poor inhabitants of the adjacent country still trembled with terror, when the elements again renewed their fury to ravage this miserable land. On Tuesday the 6th January, 1784, about sunrise, the wind began to blow softly from the north east. The sea gradually swelled, rose beyond its bed with rapid impetuosity, overflowed the quay of Messina, and lashed with its billows the ruins of the Palazzetta. It loosened and displaced many of the stones of the mole, spread over the whole street, and attacked the pedestals of the statues, which had been spared by the earthquake and still stood firm among the ruins. The same furious wind which swelled the sea in so extraordinary a manner, ravaged the whole coast from Messina all the way to Syracuse.

The accounts of eye-witnesses—if this term can be applied to people in situations which tax the entire senses—possess a peculiar interest. The author of Walsh's Travels, who enjoyed an earthquake experience at Zante in the year 1820, gives the following idea how it feels:

"When the servant led me to my room, he left a large brass lamp lighted on a ponderous carved table on the opposite side to that on which I slept. My bed, as is usual in this island, was without a canopy, and open above. As soon as I got into it, I lay for some time gazing on the ceiling, with many pleasing ideas of persons and things floating on my mind; even the grotesque figures were a source of amusement to me; and I remember falling into a delightful sleep while I was yet making out fancied resemblances to many persons I was acquainted with.

"The next sensation I recollect was one indescribably tremendous. The lamp was still burning, but the whole room was in motion. The figures on the ceiling seemed to be animated, and were changing places; presently they were detached from above, and, with large fragments of the cornice, fell upon me and about the room. An indefinable melancholy humming sound seemed to issue from the earth and run along the outside of the house, with a sense of vibration that communicated an intolerable nervous feeling; and I experienced a fluctuating motion, which threw me from side to side, as if I were still on board the frigate, and overtaken by a storm. The house now seemed rent asunder with a violent crash. A large portion of the wall fell in, split into splinters the oak table, extinguished the lamp, and left me in total darkness; while at the same instant the thick walls opened about me, and the blue sky, with a bright star, became for a moment visible through one of the chasms. I now threw off my bedclothes and attempted to escape from the tottering house; but the ruins of the wall and ceiling had so choked up the passage that I could not open the door, and I again ran back to my bed, and instinctively pulled over my face the thick coverlid, to protect it from the falling fragments.

"Up to this period I had not the most distant conception of the cause of this commotion. The whole had passed in a few seconds, yet such was the effect of each circumstance that they left on my mind as distinct an impression as if the succession of my ideas had been slow and regular. Still I could assign no reason for it but that the house was going to fall, till an incident occurred which caused the truth to flash at once on my mind. There stood in the square opposite the Palazzo a tall, slender steeple of a Greek church, containing a ring of bells, which I had remarked in the day; these now began to jangle with a wild, unearthly sound, as if some powerful hand had seized the edifice below, and was ringing the bells by shaking the steeple. Then it was that I had the first distinct conception of my situation.

"I found that the earthquake we had talked so lightly of was actually come. I felt that I was in the midst of one of those awful visitations which destroy thousands in a moment—where the superintending hand of God seems for a season to withdraw itself, and the frame of the earth is suffered to tumble into ruins by its own convulsions. I cannot describe my sensations when I thus saw and felt around me the wreck of nature, and that with a deep and firm conviction on my mind that to me that moment was the end of the world. I had before looked death in the face in many ways, and had reason more than once to familiarize me to his appearance, but this was nothing like the ordinary thoughts or apprehensions of dying in the common way; the sensations were as different as an earthquake and a fever.

"But this horrible convulsion ceased in a moment, as suddenly as it began, and a dead and solemn silence ensued. This was soon broken by the sound of lamentations, which came from below; and I afterwards found it to proceed from the inhabitants of an adjoining house, which had been shaken down, and crushed to death some, and half buried others who were trying to escape, in the ruins. Presently I saw a light through the crevice of the door of my chamber, and heard the sound of voices outside. It proceeded from the servants, who came to look for me among the ruins. As they could not enter by the usual door-way, which was choked up, they proceeded round to another; but when they saw the room filled with the wrecks of the wall and the ceiling, some of which were lying on the bed, one of them said, 'Sacramento! eccolo schiaccato!'—there he is, crushed to death; and proceeded to remove the rubbish, and lift the bed clothes. I was lying unhurt, buried in thought; but the dust caused me to sneeze, and relieved the apprehensions of the good people.

"I immediately rose and dressed myself, and proceeded with them about the Palazzo, to see the damage it had sustained. The massive outside walls were all separated from each other, and from the partition walls, and left chasms between, through which the light appeared. Providentially, the room in which I slept had the bed against a partition wall, and nothing fell on me but pieces of the ceiling and cornice; had it been on the other side, next the main wall, I could not have escaped, for it was entirely covered with masses of masonry which had smashed and buried under them every thing on which they fell. I had repined that I had not been able to escape by the door when I attempted, but to this circumstance also I now found I was indebted, under Providence, for my preservation. A wing of the house had fallen into the court yard, through which I had intended to make my way; and no doubt, had I done so at the moment I tried, would have buried me under it.

"It was now past four in the morning, and we proceeded with intense anxiety to the government house to see if any of our friends, whom we had left so well and cheerful a few hours before, had escaped. The weather had totally changed. The sky seemed to partake in the convulsions of the earth. It blew a storm, driving the dark clouds along with vast rapidity. The streets were full of people, hurrying in different directions, but all in profound silence as if under some awful impression, and crowding into the churches, which were everywhere lighted up, and full of people. The priests were in their vestments singing solemn dirges, and the congregations on their faces, prostrated in the profoundest reverence. We found our friends all assembled, with Lord and Lady Strangford in the dining-hall of the palace. To this room they had run in their night dresses, as to a place of some security, being a ground floor detached from the edifice, and having no building over it. Here we sat till it was light, telling our several escapes; and then I went out into the town to see the state in which it was left. Nearly the whole of the 4,000 houses of which it consisted were split open in different places, and many from the foundation to the roof. About forty were lying prostrate, and obstructing the passage of the streets. The front walls of many were separated from the sides, and hanging over the way, seeming ready to fall every moment upon the passenger. This tendency of the walls to fall out saved many lives; but there was another circumstance to which their safety was attributed by the Zantiotes themselves. The night had been the vigil of their great patron saint, Dionysius, and almost the whole population were watching in the streets or churches, and so out of their houses when the shock came on. The churches were of immense strength, and though all shaken and shattered, none of them fell; which the pious people universally attributed to the interference of the saint whose rites they were celebrating. Not more than forty dead bodies were found in the ruins. It appears, by the concurrent testimony of several, that the whole duration of the earth's motion was not longer than fifty seconds or a minute; yet the time was marked by the passing sensations of different people, so that brief space appeared to be hours."

The earthquakes which in the present century desolated the principal cities of Peru, and the still later one that laid Manila in ruins, are too fresh in the minds of all to need more than a passing mention. We hope that the fulfillment of the Jesuit father as to the ultimate destruction of this city by one of these terrible visitors, it will not remain for a future number of the CALIFORNIAN to chronicle.

THINKING OF THE SOLDIERS.

FRANK MOORE lately published a collection of battle-rhymes, entitled Loyal Lyrics. He now publishes a companion volume to it, called Rebel Rhymes and Rhapsodies. The following verses from it are tender and thoughtful enough to have been written at the North:

"We were sitting around the table,
Just a night or two ago,
In the little cosy parlor,
With the lamplight burning low,
And the window-blinds half opened,
For the summer air to come,
And the painted curtains moving
Like a busy pendulum.

"O! the cushions on the sofa,
And the pictures on the wall,
And the gathering of comforts,
In the old familiar hall;
And the wagging of the pointer,
Lounging idly by the door,
And the flitting of the shadows
From the ceiling to the floor.

"O! they wakened in my spirit,
Like the beautiful in art,
Such a busy, busy thinking—
Such a dreaminess of heart,
That I sat among the shadows,
With my spirit all astray;
Thinking only—thinking only
Of the soldiers far away;

"Of the tents beneath the moonlight,
Of the stirring tattoo's sound,
Of the soldier in his blanket,
In his blanket on the ground;
Of the icy winter coming,
Of the cold bleak winds that blow,
And the soldier in his blanket,
In his blanket on the snow.

"Of the blight upon the heather,
And the frost upon the hill,
And the whistling, whistling ever,
And the never, never still;
Of the little leaflets falling,
With the sweetest, saddest sound—
And the soldier—oh! the soldier,
In his blanket on the ground.

"Thus I lingered in my dreaming,
In my dreaming far away,
Till the spirit's picture-painting
Seemed as vivid as the day;
And the moonlight faded softly
From the window opened wide,
And the faithful, faithful pointer
Nestled closer by my side.

"And I knew that 'neath the starlight,
Though the chilly frosts may fall,
That the soldier will be dreaming,
Dreaming often of us all.
So I gave my spirit's painting
Just the breathing of a sound,
For the dreaming, dreaming soldier,
In his slumber on the ground.

DRESS.—We are all more or less desirous, on some ground or other, to win the respect of our fellow creatures; and the ways of winning it are infinitely diversified. To obtain influence and position, the majority of mankind will labor an entire life, and continue to toil, in some particular trade or profession, long after their actual necessities are supplied. The merchant still speculates in the mart, the seaman still ploughs the deep, the gold-hunter still digs the mine, and the scholar still collects additional lore by the midnight lamp. With this object in view, men exert their best energies in their several modes; but there is one mode which, in addition to all others, is adopted, with rare exceptions, by the whole human race; namely, an attention to personal appearance, or an endeavor to produce favorable impressions by the fashion, or propriety, or becomingness, or neatness, or splendor of their habiliments. The effect of dress is indeed of unquestionable importance. It typifies a man's position in society; it indicates his taste. A perfectly suitable dress is a passport almost everywhere. Wealth or worth ill attired is usually ill-received. The man who dresses in a style below his place and circumstances must expect to meet many a mortifying rebuff. Some philosophers and men of genius have been great slovens, and have affected to consider attention to personal appearance as effeminate or foolish. This mistake is less common than it used to be, and most of our literati now dress like gentlemen. A person dressed with propriety may save himself from the ridicule and slights and humiliations to which ill-dressed merit is hourly exposed. Amongst strangers, dress is the only criterion of a man's title to consideration.

REMINISCENCES OF JOHN PHŒNIX.

THE Round Table is publishing a series of "Reminiscences of John Phœnix," evidently written by Lewis Gaylord Clark long editor of the Knickerbocker, which we here reproduce. Anything about Phœnix is interesting to the people among whom he so long lived. His memory will long be green in this State; he said and did some very funny things. Every one remembers how he was standing with a friend at a bar one summer day, when a baker's wagon drove by. Out rushed Phœnix, bareheaded. "Hallo, driver! stop! stop, I say!"

The driver stopped, and asked what he wanted.

"I want an eagle—a baked eagle!" said John.

"Baked eagle!" cried the driver, scarcely knowing whether to take it in jest or in earnest, "I havn't got any. Are you crazy?"

"Not got any!" replied Phœnix. "Then why do you not take your sign down?" and he pointed to "EAGLE BAKERY" conspicuously painted on the outside of the wagon.

Had the driver handed him a gold eagle, he might have turned the laugh for a moment; but John would have won it back eventually by treating the crowd with the driver's money. We intend soon to publish a series of anecdotal papers on this favorite humorist, written by a friend who knew him from boyhood. In the meanwhile, these from the Round Table:

I

PERHAPS there are thousands of readers with whom the name of "John Phœnix" is a familiar word, who have enjoyed his inimitable humor and pleasant wit, and yet who have no knowledge whatever of Captain George H. Derby, of the Topographical Corps of Engineers of the United States Army. Before recording any of our "Memories," therefore, of "Phœnix" and "Squibbob," (two noms de plume which he was wont to assume,) we will devote a brief paragraph or two to a sketch of his professional career, which lies before us in a MS. record from the U. S. Adjutant-General's office at Washington, kindly furnished us by E. D. Townsend, Assistant Adjutant-General.

Mr. Derby graduated at West Point in June, 1846. He was the seventh in a class of sixty, and George B. McClellan, his class-mate and life-long friend, and god-father to the fatherless boy who bears his name, was only three in advance of him. It may be remarked, in this connection, that Captain Derby was a lineal descendant from E. H. Derby, of Salem, Mass., who fitted out many armed ships during the war of the Revolution, and was the pioneer in opening the trade from Salem to India, China and the Baltic. The captain himself was born in Norfolk county, Mass., and entered West Point from the Old Bay State. Owing to his excellence as a topographer, he was transferred, in 1847, to the corps of Topographical Engineers. We first find him in the survey of the lakes of Michigan, in command of the Light-house District; next at San Francisco, in command of a corps employed in turning San Diego River into False Bay; subsequently, on the staff of Gen. Wool, in San Francisco and Benicia. In 1855–6, he was in charge of three military roads from Astoria to Salem, in Oregon Territory, from Fort Vancouver to Fort Steilacom, Washington Territory, and from Fort Vancouver to the Dalles, W. T. Numerous other professional duties he performed, office and field, in California and Oregon, until we find him upon the staff of Gen. Scott, in Mexico, engaged in field duty. He served on artillery duty under Col. Johnston. He surveyed the lines at Vera Cruz, under Col. Bankhead, and was most favorably mentioned in that officer's report to the department. He was honored by being present at the conference of superior officers, with Major-Gen. Scott, the evening before the battle of Cerro Gordo, at which battle, the next day, he was severely wounded. In 1847, he was breveted to the post of first lieutenant for his gallant and meritorious conduct on this occasion. He subsequently rose to the rank of captain. In the discharge of his duty, he exposed himself to the blight of a sun-stroke, which first affected his sight, causing for a time total blindness, and afterwards led to a softening of the brain which terminated his life.

It is a common thing with some people to assume that a humorist, a master of the burlesque and abounding with natural wit, is disqualified thereby for the serious and severe duties of a military or other exhausting profession, requiring the exercise of a high order of intellect. It is with a view to disprove the correctness of this absurd assumption that we have given the above short, but we trust not uninteresting record of Captain Derby's professional career. How many examples of the rarest solid powers might be cited in this connection, both abroad and at home! It will not be contended, we presume, that "Uncle Abraham" Lincoln makes any the worse President for his love of illustrating a sensible remark or decision by an amusing anecdote. Captain Derby was wont to say (quoting Sidney Smith) that "an inch of laugh was worth an ell of moan, in any state of the market." Yet Captain Derby excelled in pathetic description, as we shall have occasion to show hereafter. It is not to be denied, however, that Captain Derby's love of fun and good-natured, harmless practical jokes did sometimes detract from his proficiency in study while at West Point; otherwise he would have been third in his graduate-class at the Military Academy, and next to General McClellan. He was an admirable draughtsman; and it was universally conceded by his friends that, felicitous and graphic as were his amusing pen-pictures, the limnings of his pencil, for broad humor and instantaneous effect, surpassed them all. A friend and class-mate of his at West Point informs us that, whenever he was called to the black-board, the whole class were watching his drawings with eager anticipation for certain characteristic touches which converted the demonstration into the most amusing of representations. On one occasion, the professor of drawing requested his idea of an extemporized military pump for the supply of water to an army from a suddenly discovered spring, on their march through a dry and thirsty land, like portions of Mexico. Pecksniff, the architect, it will be remembered, taught his pupil to regard the drawing of a pump as "chaste practice." Phœnix made it so, and when he retired from the blackboard the class were thrown into ecstasies of laughter by the resemblance which the pump was made to bear to the drawing-master; and all by a few rapid touches, which left the model of the machine intact, but added accessories which made the portrait unmistakable.

Of some fifty other original drawings or caricatures of Captain Derby's which we have had the pleasure to examine, let us mention two, which show his peculiar characteristics and the whimsical vagaries of his imagination. Everybody has heard of the young man who was bitten by a rattlesnake near Springfield, Mass., a most lugubrious history in verse:

> "On Springfield's mounting there did dwell
> A likely youth, and known full well:
> Leftenant Carter's ondly son,
> A sprightly youth, nigh twenty-one.
>
> "He went on-to the mounting high,
> A rattle-snake he did espy;
> And all at once he then did feel
> That p'isou critter bite his heel."

This absurd poem, which is doubtless familiar to the reader, contains some dozen verses, each one of which was embodied in a pen-and-ink sketch by Captain Derby. The whole series was a study; and the illustration of one stanza especially, which describes the sufferer hurrying home with the snake in his hand, limp, scaly, and slimy, as if alive,

> "Crying all the way, all as he went,
> Oh! cruel, cruel sarpient!"

was inimitable.

The second of the two drawings to which we have referred was a series of four sketches, representing a "Child born with Mechanical Instincts." The first drawing represents him, at the age of two years, as having found a screw-driver, which he at once puts to use with his little chubby hands, by twisting out screws from the windows, door-hinges, etc. The second describes him gazing with "round-eyed wonder" at a screw-head in his little abdominal periphery, which he discovers as he is undressing for bed at night, and to which he is about to apply his driver. The third depicts him as having succeeded in his experiment; he has unscrewed himself, his "bottom" has come off in two sections, and he is sitting down upon them, wrapt in meditation, when his grandmother comes in, her long nose "spectacle-bestrid," and horror breathing in her face, raises the mechanical prodigy up, restores the sections to their places, and in the next sketch the little boy, a mere baby-child, is himself again.

The first time we ever met Captain Derby was at the office of a magazine of which we had been for more than a score of years the sole editor. He had long been an occasional personal correspondent, and his letters were always charming and characteristic. Sometimes the address itself would be most amusingly illustrated. We remember, in calling for our letters at the post-office one morning, that all the clerks about the window were laughing ready to split their sides at one of the letters which they handed to us. It was from "John Phœnix," then, if we remember rightly, in California. He had taken the postage-stamp, a fine, dignified head of Washington, and appended to it, not a spiritual body, but a most natural body, in the shape of an English country farmer not over-anxious as to his dress and appearance, but evidently a good-natured, "hale fellow well met;" for General Washington, in his person, had the solemn, rigid lines of his mouth turned up at the corners with an inexpressible smirk, which, contrasted with an expression that represented his real character, was almost equal to some of Hogarth's transmutations. This is no exaggeration, as Mr. Taylor, our deputy-postmaster, will tell you. Washington stood, with this ineffable smirk upon his face, with the point of his sword stuck in the ground, upon which his good right hand rested. He had on a pair of English leather breeches, with high gaiters, a "cut-away" sporting coat, and a round-crowned fragment of a hat; all of which added to the ludicrousness of the sketch, which was rendered perfectly natural by being depicted in the same pale-red color of the original postage-stamp, and so neatly and carefully joined together and made a perfect whole that it would have been impossible even for an expert to find out where the original began or the imitation ended.

It was the same with the portrait of "Squibob," which forms the frontispiece to "Phenixiana," which set the country on a broad grin, "from the far Pacific to the rocky ramparts of the Bay of Fundy." Captain Derby rubbed out the top, or head, of his own photograph, and placed over the collar of his military coat a head, which for cuteness, espiegleness (if such a word is admissible), and inimitable ugliness, it is impossible to describe. As the showmen say, "It must be seen to be appreciated."

The first time we had the pleasure to meet Captain Derby was at the publication office of the magazine with which we were so long connected, then over the book-store of the Messrs. Appleton & Company, in Broadway. Coming in one morning, Mr. H——, the publisher, said:

"Mr. C——, this gentleman has been waiting some time to see you. Mr. Ferguson, this is Mr. C——."

"My name is Ferguson," said Captain Derby; "don't you remember meeting me about seven years ago at the Astor House, where we dined together, and what a pleasant time we had?"

Now, what could we say? If there is one thing in the world which is more infinitely perplexing and annoying than another, it is to forget the acquaintance of a friend, of whom you must make an enemy by not remembering him when he presents himself to you with open arms. So we said:

"Certainly, Mr. Ferguson, that was not a time to be forgotten; and how have you been since, and where, Mr. Ferguson?"

"Mostly in Mobile," he answered, "for the last two or three years"—and in a moment we were engaged in a multifarious chat.

Meantime, we had caught the eye and decided expression of Mr. H——, our publisher, who was evidently enjoying what Mr. Fenimore Cooper has called a "furtive laugh," which he could not at all conceal. In a moment we saw we had been undergoing a sell.

"There has been quite enough of this," said our Mr. Ferguson," who must have observed the incredulity which had "got hold upon" us; "my name is George H. Derby, sometimes otherwise known as 'John Phœnix,' your old and familiar correspondent, and very much at your service."

II.

The great beauty of the humor of "John Phœnix" was that there was not a particle of ill-nature about it. He was not one of those sour, discontented, satirical, practical jokers, so naturally and justly tabooed in society. Good nature and good fellowship he cherished, and beyond these, save in the way of harmless mirth, he never swerved. It was not in him. We have mentioned how he joked us some deal in introducing himself to us as a Mr. Ferguson whom he had met before. But a funnier, and perhaps a more perplexing thing, was what he did to a clerical missionary from the Mission Dolores, a forlorn establishment not far from San Francisco. The aforesaid missionary was a lean "Yank," as our rebellious rebel brethren would term him; very poor and very pious, but one among the most inquisitive of his tribe. He was introduced by Mr. Phœnix to his wife, an accomplished and attractive lady, to whom the missionary was anxious, of course, to make himself acceptable. After the usual changes were rung upon the usual meterological topics, the growth and wickedness of San Francisco, the learned prelate suddenly asked:

"Captain Derby, what was the name of your good lady before you married her?"

Without moving a muscle, and looking him steadily in the eye, John Phœnix replied:

"Her name, sir, was Coon (which it was, by the by, being that of an opulent and well-known family in St. Louis); you must have heard of her father?"

"Not that I am aware of," answered the missionary.

"You have forgotten it, probably, but he was well known; Zip Coon, 'old Zip Coon,' they used to call him. He was a United States Senator for several years, and was very popular, everybody who knew him always speaking of him as a clever fellow."

"Oh, yes," responded the simple-minded prelate, "I do now remember having heard of him; there were some exceedingly complimentary elegiac lines written upon him after his death."

Not a smile, says our informant, who witnessed this scene and heard this conversation, mantled the face of John Phœnix during the whole of it.

His power of face, in fact, was something wonderful, as is sufficiently attested by the following authentic anecdote: He was sitting on one occasion in the guests' lolling-room of the New York Hotel, fronting on Broadway, when a little beggar girl came in, and, with the keen discernment of little people in general, noticed his child-loving, benevolent countenance, and approached him, asking alms. She was very young, innocent-looking, and had none of the juvenile whine and persistency of most young mendicants whom one meets in the streets and in the halls of our public hotels. Phœnix at once assumed a mournful expression of face, and began to talk, as it were, confidentially and very affectionately to her. He told her that his father was long since dead, and that he—was now left entirely alone in the world; that he was then but a little boy, with nobody to look to; and often and often he had not known where to get a piece of bread, or where he was to sleep at night. The little girl's blue eyes began to moisten; the lolling guests, most of whom knew Captain Derby, gathered around; when what was their surprise to see the poor, sympathetic beggar child go close up to him, and in a quiet, confidential way take out of the little side-pocket of her soiled and tattered frock all the money which she had gathered during the day, and place it in his hand. This tribute to Mr. Derby's power of countenance and manner, and the exquisitely beautiful evidence of the effect of it in the act of the little girl, struck every person present with a kindred admiration. It is needless to add that the tender-hearted and generous little donor of her hard day's earnings had not only her small yet great benefaction restored, but went away with great possessions, educed from the sympathetic pockets of the by-standers.

> "Having early lost his mother, > Without sister, without brother,"

Some one (we think it was Sydney Smith) once said that "No man ought to pretend to hock who was not certain that his grandfather had seen it in a green bottle!" John Phœnix once upon a time improved upon this idea somewhat, as we think. Before leaving West Point he entertained at dinner half a dozen of his friends and fellow-graduates, among whom was Gen. McClellan, from whom the subjoined account of a most amazing incident of the occasion is derived: Good hock, in the wine list of a well-appointed dinner, was a thing not to be intermitted; but Phœnix was disappointed in not receiving it; but he made amends. In the wine-cooler at his side he had a bottle of pale sherry, and at the side of each friend's plate a pair of green spectacles. When the hock in its course was to be served, he said:

"Gentlemen, put on your glasses, and we'll try a glass of Metternich hock, with everything in keeping."

Each guest admitted that the wine looked like hock, as they saw it, and it required a very little stretch of the imagination to make them think that it tasted like hock. "In fact," says our informant, "the illusion was complete."

Happening to be in Boston—we believe he was temporarily stationed there at the time in an official capacity—he chanced to be walking through Washington street when his attention was arrested by a sign which he did not exactly understand, but which his inquiring mind was desirous of investigating. The sign read "Call and Tuttle." Phœnix went into the store, a fine establishment, with all the appointments of an elegant resort of the haut ton, and said:

"I have called to tuttle; I have never tuttled, but I should like to. How much is it?"

"Mr. Tuttle is out," said a dapper clerk, "but he will be in in a few moments."

"I can't wait," said Phœnix, "but when he comes in say to him that to-morrow at ten o'clock I will call and tuttle."

While Captain Derby was paying his addresses to the fair and accomplished lady whom he afterward made his wife, he never paid her a compliment, although he had abundant reason to do so. The nearest approach to a compliment which he ever made was one morning when he said to her:

"M——, for an ugly woman, you look better this morning than I ever saw you look before!"

On another occasion, during his "sparking" days, he said to her, with the most imperturbable immobility of countenance:

"Miss C——, do you dip?"

Naturally vexed, she replied:

"I think I know what you mean, and I feel that you pay me a very poor compliment and less respect by the insinuation implied in the question."

"Oh, not at all," replied Mr. Phœnix; I thought you was more than usually excited; I knew you did not drink, and I have been told that dipping produces great exhilaration of spirits."

Dipping, it may be necessary to explain to the uninitiated, is a custom not unusual in portions of the South and Southwest. It consists in taking a linen swab, tied upon the end of a stick, dipping it in yellow Scotch snuff, and chewing it.

NOTICE.

The publication of "THE CALIFORNIAN" takes place on Saturday mornings, and copies may be obtained in the City at all News-stands, and of our News-agents through the country. It will also be served by carriers on the morning of publication.

 Correspondents will address all communications, business and otherwise, to C. H. WEBB, Office of "THE CALIFORNIAN," 728 Montgomery street, San Francisco.

THE CALIFORNIAN.

SAN FRANCISCO, SATURDAY, MAY 28, 1864.

OUR PAPER.

THIS is the first number of the CALIFORNIAN. Little has been said about it through advertisements and no prospectus has been published, not from motives of economy, but simply because the proprietor thought that the best advertisement and prospectus of a paper that can be published is the paper itself. Such we now offer.

NATHANIEL HAWTHORNE.

THE readers of "Our Old Home" will remember the playful but effective manner in which the author closes that volume—destined to be the latest, as it is the ripest of his works. Read in the light of the telegram that flashed the announcement of his death last week, how much graver suggestion is involved in this fanciful climax to his description of the public dinner tendered him by his English friends, when he was called upon to speak:

> Seizing this handful of straw with a death grip, and bidding my three friends bury me honorably, I got upon my legs to save both countries or perish in the attempt. The tables roared and thundered at me, and suddenly were silent again. But as I have never happened to stand in a position of greater dignity and peril, I deem it a stratagem of sage policy here to close these sketches, leaving myself still erect in so heroic an attitude.

In this attitude Mr. Hawthorne stands before the public to-day. But the moment of peril is past; the little speech, so playfully evaded, has been made, and the tables of both continents have roared and thundered their appreciation. The reserve and shyness which constituted a chief charm of his genius have been put far enough back to disclose the delicately ripened fancies they shielded. Nothing can be easier now than to trace back to the Twice Told Tales that peculiar flavor which delighted us in the Scarlet Letter, the Marble Faun, and Our Old Home; but how widely different now the reputation of the author!

His earliest literary essays were characterized by that style which has since won him the merited distinction of being the most skillful and elegant master of English composition on our side of the Atlantic. But this super-excellence was fatal to his immediate popularity; his originality, made up equally of weird introspection and quiet perception, opposed to and weakening each other, was not distinct enough to attract attention; his perceptive powers lost much of their force by this apperceptive habit of questioning their veracity, and were concealed often by the rippling flow of his periods, or lost in his exquisite harmony of diction. These waifs, since collected and republished in the Twice Told Tales, consequently did not meet a reception commensurate with their merits or the power they shadowed forth. The circumstances that determine the growth of an author's popularity are not always clear. The subtle insight shown in Wakefield and The Minister's Black Veil is the very same that enchants us in the Scarlet Letter; the English is as charming; but something has been added. The author himself was conscious of some lack of the popular element, and has thus pleasantly alluded to it in his preface to the Twice Told Tales:

> At all events there can be no harm in the author remarking that he rather wonders how the Twice Told Tales should have gained what vogue they did, rather than that it was so little and so gradual. They had the pale tint of flowers that blossomed in too retired a shade—the coolness of a meditative habit which diffuses itself through the feeling and observation of every sketch. Instead of passion, there is sentiment; and, even in what purport to be pictures of actual life, we have allegory not always so warmly dressed in its habiliments of flesh and blood as to be taken into the reader's mind without a shiver. Whether from lack of power or an unconquerable reserve, the author's touches have often an effect of tameness; the merriest man can hardly continue to laugh at his broadest humor; the tenderest woman, one would suppose, would hardly shed warm tears at his deepest pathos. The book, if you would see anything in it, requires to be read in the clear, brown twilight atmosphere in which it was written; if opened in the sunshine it is apt to look exceedingly like a volume of blank pages.

Wonderfully clear as is this insight and criticism of his own style, it is pleasantly contradicted in one point by a passage which oddly occurs in the same criticism, and it is unequaled for its quiet pathos. The author "had no incitement to literary effort in a reasonable prospect of reputation or profit; nothing but the pleasure itself of composition—an enjoyment not at all amiss in its way, and perhaps essential to the merits of the work in hand, but which in the long run will hardly keep the chill out of a writer's heart or the numbness from his fingers. To this total lack of sympathy, at the age when his mind would naturally have been most effervescent, the public owe it (and it is certainly an effect not to be regretted on either part) that the author can show nothing for the thought and industry of that portion of his life, save the forty sketches, or thereabouts, included in these volumes."

A comparison between Hawthorne and Irving would be difficult, yet it is almost as difficult to refrain from the impulse. All that Irving has done to preserve the legends and history of the Dutch settlers of New York, Hawthorne has achieved in his New England stories and traditions. Yet how widely different is their treatment; how distinct and marked their flavor! Knickerbocker's History of New York is a mirth-provoking satire; the legends overflow with the exuberant health, humor and poetry of their fanciful chronicler. They are fictitious, but they are charming; and we are little inclined to quarrel with the accuracy of events that we know, and the chronicler knew, were unheroic and unimportant. There was, however, too much of serious complexion in the Puritan character; too much of actual bloodshed, superstition and suffering in New England history to give Mr. Hawthorne's stories this pleasant peculiarity. His shy, self-examining and concentrative genius; his taste for the mysterious and marvellous; his intuitive insight into the workings of the human heart, and, above all, the slight shadow of skepticism which darkened his clearest moral perceptions, peculiarly fitted him for this work. Nowhere so much as by contrast with Washington Irving does this latter failing of Mr. Hawthorne's genius appear so prominent. Yet it was an essential ingredient of his originality. It was this morbid quality that lent a surprising charm to his best stories, and sometimes even marred the promptings of his judgment, His taste for the marvellous sometimes led him beyond the limits of good taste and even of humanity. The discovery of a man's death by the spectacle of a fly walking over the exposed pupil of his eye, has genius—but of a diabolic quality.

But it was only as a story-teller and in the domain of pure fiction that our author betrayed this morbid tendency. His pictures of actual life and scenery were natural and healthy, and drawn with scrupulous fidelity. The Marble Faun exhibits a most incongruous mingling of these qualities. We have Roman landscapes possessing a photographic accuracy of outline and detail; we can almost feel the warm sunshine of an Italian sky—the mise en scene is altogether perfect, but the dramatis personæ are out of the range of probability, and the incidents are purely impossible. Still we can almost forgive the exasperating goodness of "Hilda;" we can put up with the unaccountable lunacy of the hero, for the exquisite atmosphere that surrounds them. We can, if we like, go deeper and admire the consummate skill and faithful zeal with which a classic fable is modernized and brought into harmony with every-day occurrences; but we need not accept it as anything but a fable, in spite of the mysterious hintings of the author, or the proffered explanation at its close, which turns out (as he intended it) to be no explanation at all. By a somewhat singular coincidence, Dr. Holmes, a few years later, with much humbler and less pretentious material, constructed an equally ingenious myth in Elsie Venner. The rattlesnake-maiden and the animal-man have in some respects a strong family likeness. Of the two creations, however, we prefer that of Dr. Holmes, though the least sensational, as the most natural and consistent.

Many of his late works exhibit this incongruous element. But with what delight and reverence do we hail at last Our Old Home—the maturest and healthiest product of his intellect. The "old hysterical mock-disease" is not yet quite cured, but it is thoroughly under control, and imparts a refined langor, a gentlemanly paleness, a delicacy and sensibility to impressions, which we would not now care to lose. Our author is a little skeptical—a little cynical—but no more than a traveler and cosmopolitan may be. He is on English ground too, where we are willing he should indulge his morbid fancies if he has any, and where, if the brusqueness and vulgarity of John Bull sting him into sarcasm, we shall not regret it. With what infinite genius has he painted the portrait of an old enemy. How thoughtfully reverent has he been of the England of our romance, which he seldom saw; how keenly satirical of the England of reality which was continually obtruded upon him. Whether loitering under the arches of a Cathedral, or a shy, reserved spectator of the festivities of Greenwich Park; whether meditating upon the wretchedness of work-house children, or looking about the table at a civic banquet, we have the same sharp, decisive outlines, the same delicate lights and shadows, the same wonderful charm of atmosphere and distance which distinguishes this incomparable description of an English summer day:

> As far as your actual experience is concerned, the English summer day has positively no beginning and no end. When you awake, at any reasonable hour, the sun is already shining through the curtains; you live through unnumbered hours of Sabbath quietude with a calm variety of incident softly etched upon their tranquil lapse; and at length you become conscious that it is bedtime again, while there is still enough daylight in the sky to make the pages of your book distinctly legible. Night, if there be any such season, hangs down a transparent veil, through which the bygone day beholds its successor; or not quite true of the latitude of London, it may be soberly affirmed of the more northern parts of the island, that To-morrow is born before Yesterday is dead. They exist together in the golden twilight, where the decrepit old day dimly discerns the face of the ominous infant; and you, though a mere mortal, may simultaneously touch them both with one finger of recollection and another of prophecy.

When his satire found expression this elegance of diction served to feather the arrows that penetrated the external coats of the "bulbous" Englishman, who did not receive the attack any the more kindly from being blackguarded in purer English than he was in the habit of using. Hawthorne, has been accused of luke-warmness and insincerity towards his country in her present struggle. Whatever might have been the doubts and morbid fancies that ended in his espousing a weak and dangerous policy, we must place to his credit the sound berating he gave our old enemy, when he stands erect before us to-day.

We began this article with a quotation from the last paragraph of the last volume he had published. We close it with another, the first paragraph in his earliest work. It conveys a simple yet significant lesson: "The author of 'Twice Told Tales' has a claim to one distinction which, as none of his literary brethren will care about disputing it with him, he need not be afraid to mention. He was for a good many years the obscurest man of letters in America."

"FREEDOM OF THE PRESS."

A PHRASE much used is pretty certain to become abused. When freedom of the press was first claimed as one of the bulwarks of civil and religious liberty, the phrase was understood to mean the right of public journals to discuss all public questions, fairly, freely and fearlessly—nothing more. Of late years, however, it seems to be construed in a wide and a widely different sense. Latitude to discuss is interpreted into license to abuse. The prerogative of the press is now so liberally translated as to make public journals a medium for wreaking private revenges, transforming them into mere vehicles for villification. The editor loads his go-cart with epithets snatched like brickbats from the vocabulary of the irate, and dumps them at the door of whoever happens to incur his dislike or provoke his spite. He hesitates not a moment in attacking private character, and fancies he has a right to print anything in his paper he chooses, running the risk of nothing worse than a libel suit. True of the press our whole American country through, this is especially true of the press of this city. If any doubt the accuracy of our statement we refer them to the record. The local Press has left some very coarse files as legacies to posterity.

Freedom of speech is a parallel prerogative to that of the press. But it will be noticed that in its exercise a deal of judgment and discretion is evinced. People hesitate about saying that to others in the public streets which would expose them to the risk of being kicked or killed with a public if not a coroner's verdict, returned in the matter: Served them right. It will be noticed that a man pretty generally weighs well the size of another, estimates his probable tonnage, and glances with a curious and mathematical eye at the style of boot he wears before stalking up and calling him a liar or accusing him of theft. But a different construction seems to be put upon the crime of saying abusive things in print from that which is attached to the offence of saying them personally. Why this is it is difficult to determine, since that spoken of or to a man reaches the ears of but few, while a single paragraph to his discredit in print is scattered "wide as waters be," prejudices people in his disfavor whom he has never seen and does not know, but with whom at some time he may be brought in contact in social or business relations, and stands on record as an accusation against him with those who will never read his defence—if he is foolish enough to attempt one.

The difference in degradation between the editor who makes his journal the medium of gratifying personal or political hate and the one who, with the proof sheets of his next dirty issue in one hand, a big club in the other, and a large bull-dog following at his heels, perambulates the city to blackmail citizens into buying themselves out of the filth with which he will otherwise spatter them and their families, is only of degrees—degrees of longitude, mark you, and not of latitude. Indeed, we are not sure that a comparison between the two does not turn in favor of him who openly adopts this means of getting bread rather than of those journalists who are able to support themselves decently and respectably, if inclined, by keeping within the legitimate bounds of their profession. We mean no harm to anybody by the comparison, which, like the boy's whistling, "did itself." We simply wish to inculcate the idea that courtesy should obtain in print as well as in speech, and that the power which the editor's profession places in his hands should be used with gentleness and discretion.

OUR ARMIES AND THE PROSPECTS.

LOYAL men have occasion to congratulate themselves on the aspect which affairs in the field have assumed. The old do-nothing policy has become a thing of the past, and the sweep of our armies onward is like the march of fate—firm and irresistible. The day of bombastic proclamations and show and sound, to the exclusion of sense and straightforward blows from the shoulder, in the conduct of our military operations, is done, and we hope forever. Performance has taken the place of promise. In Virginia and at the West, since the inauguration of this new era, the career of our arms has been one of almost uninterrupted triumph. The Army of the Potomac has redeemed itself from the shame cast upon it by the imbecility or incapacity of former commanders, and proved by its marches and its battles that in each man it possesses the stuff of which soldiers should be made. There are battles yet to be fought before Richmond, but the issue can scarcely be doubted. Admitting Napoleon's favorite apophthegm that Providence is always on the side of that army which has the heaviest artillery, and setting aside the elements of truth and justice and the political principles which are involved in this, the most stupendous struggle that ever saturated with blood God's footstool, elements and principles which cannot fail eventually to triumph—to doubt this would be impiety; still, even those most chronically inclined to despondency should find in that Napoleonic maxim alone an absoluto assurance of certain victory. For we have the preponderance of numbers and the advantage in everything which goes to make an army effective, in arms, in all equipments, and in rations.

Another assurance of success is found in the fact that we have learned not to underrate our enemies, a mistake which was certainly committed early in the war. It has come to be understood that a triumphant march over the country to be conquered is not in the programme, but that each step of ground must be won and retained by hard fighting. Our army in Virginia is at this moment opposed to veterans, men seasoned in the smoke of nearly all the battles of the war, and who have proved that they are made of fighting stuff. To deny this would be to rob our own army of its laurels in conquering them, and to tacitly reproach it for not having before this put the rebellion down. In the late series of successes we have proven that Northern blood is as bright and brave as any that ever tingled to finger tips when taunt and insult spoke, or swelled the veins when the trumpet shrilled.

It would be trite to say that our rejoicings should be tempered with sorrow because half the continent is a Rama; and to point to the terrible background which shadows our victorious battlefields might savor of a stage trick. It is scarcely worth while to be mealy-mouthed about the matter at this stage in the game.

War is a terrible alternative at best, but there are things in life more to be dreaded, and shame is at any time worse than death. A vindication of the principle of free government is worth all the blood that it can possibly cost, and that this vindication is near at hand, we predict. For unless all human indications fail, the end of the present year will see the rebellion crushed and our flag floating over every inch of territory claimed by the general government.

OF WHAT SEX, ZOYARA?

FOUR thousand people went to see the opening of the Hippotheatron, and four thousand people that night were badly puzzled. It was not over the word "Hippotheatron" that they tripped and tumbled, formidable as that seemed at the outset. There are few words in this world—ideas, either, for that matter—which cannot be mastered by persistent application; so people had gradually come to know what Hippotheatron meant—though they thought it rather a queer way of spelling Circus. The word had come to be so well understood that horses no longer shied when they saw it displayed in big letters on huge posters all about town, neither did children stretch out their little hands wistfully toward it and request their parents to buy them some. The Provost Marshal had discovered that there was nothing insurrectionary in the placards; the police had become satisfied that no old burglar under a new name had arrived in town, and the whole city had settled down into that happiness which is ever the reward of virtue and only disturbable by earthquakes.

But the opening night changed all that. A question arose as to Zoyara's sex. The question is not new with the people of this coast; for months it bewildered the multitudes beyond the mountains. It is part of the Circus—we beg Mr. Wilson's pardon; we should have said HIPPOTHEATRON—and always travels with the show. Eastern people are smart—right smart—they pride themselves on knowing cheese from chalk; and if they could not tell at first glance a man from a woman, it is little marvel that our people, who live so far from sunrise, became involved in a personal, or rather a personal-pronoun discussion, of He, She, or It. In short, it is no wonder that a question of gender was engendered in a city where a very few years ago nothing resembling a woman was to be seen.

We have called the question of Zoyara's sex a grave one. Possibly there be those who regard it as wholly unimportant, and consider the game of the discussion scarcely worth the candle. A little reflection, however, should convince the most disputative mind that it really does make a great difference, so far as an individual's destinies in life are concerned, whether that individual is a man or woman. Had Cæsar been a Julia instead of a Julius, his career and the fate of Rome would have been materially modified; or, had Cleopatra been of the square-shouldered sex, instead of sloping off at Actium she would probably have stuck by Antony like a man, and so have changed all subsequent pages of history. We repeat that there are few more important questions in life than ones of sex.

Regarding this problem of Zoyara's sex, the daily papers did not come to the enlightenment of the public with that alacrity which they usually display. The morning papers dodged it—skipping gingerly over the point at issue, and pronouncing no opinion at all. The evening press, having more time to reflect it over, arrived at a positive conclusion in the matter, and expressed it with their usual boldness. A critic who on ordinary occasions is rather reticent of praise, became quite gushing in this instance. In the course of a notice of the opening of the Circus, (Mr. Wilson must again pardon us—we mean Hippothcatron) which attained the remarkable length of ten lines—two-and-a-half being the usual allotted space—the "dashing riding of Ella Zoyara" was spoken of; the rider was called the fair rider; and the unusual phrase in those modest columns, "Ella's gentle limbs," caused the lady readers of the paper to blush. At the close of the paragraph the Zoyara was again called "Ella;" and, throughout, an infatuation was displayed which caused prudent people to shake their heads and wonder where it would all end.

With that benevolent intent which is ever the characteristic of the well-cultivated mind, we rush to the rescue. Allow us to step into the ring and rescue our friend from the toils of an emphatically false woman—the public from its bewilderment.

She is not a woman; she is a man. The grammar of the declaration may be doubtful, but the fact we know. The Zoyara was imported from Europe by Nixon, the same enterprising manager who established the Cremorne Gardens in New York, brought Carlotta Patti before the public as a prima donna, and persuaded over "the beautiful Cubas"—whom everybody puffs. Nixon told the writer the whole history of his affair with the Zoyara—how he woed and how he won the fair but false creature—and it ran somewhat thus:

His circus pined, and it became evident to his experienced eyes that nothing but an extraordinary female rider could save it from financial destruction. He put on his best clothes and went to Europe after one. He found lots of female riders scattered over that continent, but none of them exactly reached the standard he had laid out in his own exigeut mind. While loafiug through Paris, looking like many another man for a woman, and finding her not, he suddenly stumbled into an equestrian exhibition. There he found Zoyara, who filled the bill exactly, with the trifling exception of not being a woman. But great minds can surmount all small difficulties like this. He approached Zoyara in an artful manner, concealing his dishonorable intentions, and after much persuasion, effected his nefarious design. Zoyara listened and finally consented to fly with the Manager in disguise. The scheme was so artfully carried out that all endeavors even on the part of the circus rider's old companions to trace his whereabouts proved vain. It was given out that he had gone to play au engagement in Kamschatka, and they pictured him as eating tallow candles for his noonday lunch, and actually doing bear-back riding for the entertainment of the eccentric but appreciative population of that hyperborean portion of the world. All this while he was promenading Paris, or lounging about Baden-Baden with Nixon, dressed in woman's guise. They went together into ball rooms, and the fair and beautiful stranger leaniug on Nixon's arm was the sensation of the moment. Advances were made to Zoyara from titled men and men of letters. To the credit of his sex be it said that he resisted all temptations, and never even the breath of scandal attached to his skirts.

We omitted to mention that Zoyara was not the performer's name. To find a name which should fulfill all the conditions of attractiveness taxed Nixon's energies almost as severely as anything else, but he finally lighted upon that of Ella Zoyara in a moment of inspiration.

It had now been proven by experiment that the Zoyara could pass for a woman, and the manager brought his victim over to this country. His success was wonderful. People had never seen such woman riding before—neither had they ever before seen a face so feminine with an attachment of limb and shoulder so extraordinarily masculine. It could be said to the new Star, slightly parodying Macbeth's words to the Witches: You should be man, and yet your face forbids! People flocked to the Circus—there were no Hippothcatrons in those days—in crowds, and Nixon's fortune was made. It is true that a few suspected, and that many doubted. One man iu the pit, standing near the ring, boldly asserted that he heard the Zoyara make a remark about boots such as no woman could possibly have made. But all this only increased the excitement, and made the entertainmeut draw. People were anxious to solve the secret, if there were any, and so sat up all night reading anatomy, and went to the show provided with huge double-barreled lorgnettes—only to come away more puzzled than ever. It was a clear case of "Can't tell unless you bet, and then you are just as like to lose your money as not."

But success in life is always alloyed with some unpleasant amalgam. Nixon had a wife and she didn't like the long and secret conferences her husband had with the Zoyara. And she protested against it very loudly. The husband attempted to pacify by talking of professional business, but she didn't see it! So matters went on, until one day the indignant wife packed her trunks to leave her husband's house, and a vision of divorce loomed up in the managerial family. Then he had but one resource left. He promised to explain, premising by saying that the explanation involved the relation of a secret which would ruin him financially were it publicly known. The wife pledged secrecy, and bent her willing ear to hear the explanation. These the words which her husband whispered her:

"She is a man!"

To the manager's surprise the explanation was not received exactly as he had anticipated. His wife was more furious than ever. "Attempt to impose on me with a cock-and-bull story like that!" she cried. "Don't you think I know a man from a woman when I see one?"

The unfortunate man left the house; there was no room for him there that day. He had feared to tell the secret, even to his wife, and now, when told, she refused to believe it. It proved more difficult, in this instance, to persuade the wife of his bosom that Zoyara was a man than it had been to make all the rest of the world believe that Bayard was a woman. But the human mind in its worst estate is fertile in expedients, and the indignant wife was at last convinced. How, can best be learned by addressing a note to the parties immediately interested. In the meanwhile every one can go and see the great original Zoyara, at Mr. Wilson's Hippotheatron, and that gentleman will allow them to arrive at any conclusion they choose respecting the sex of his performer. The only point upon which he is at all tenacious is insisting that they pay their money before going in, saying to the thousands who flock to his place, as the celebrated Wax Showman did to the audience who thronged the doors of his exhibition: "You would not expect me to permit you to go in without paying, you know, but as many of you as choose can [illegible]y without going in; and what can be fairer than that?"

THINGS.

SAN FRANCISCO, May 28, 1864.

THERE has been a pleasant interregnum of several weeks in a life which from its earliest date—some consider trowsers the beginning of a boy's life, but is not the cradle an aunty-date?—has been one of unceasing toil and unremitting deprivations.

I never could find the time to study that happier boys could and did. For while my youthful companions in the old stone schoolhouse were throwing pellets of paper at each other, and laying up for themselves the seeds of future consumption and the foundations of most wretched English educations, drinking in erroneous notions of geography and most eccentric ideas of history (both ancient and modern) from the withered lips of an old maid that the school had accepted as its mistress—only a stone schoolhouse could have been guilty of such wretched bad taste—I, alas! was often compelled to stay away from school.

My parents did not know it, and I never told them, for they were anxious that I should acquire the rude rudiments of an education, and it would have grieved them to know that circumstances over which they had no control prevented my constant attendance at school; that I couldn't always go.

Perhaps they would have attempted to persuade me that I could, and an argument with parents is never pleasant—especially if there is no bark on it, and you are wearing summer trowsers.

I pride myself that to this day neither my father nor my mother know the number of times I was out, in those schoolboy days, industriously gathering nuts or painfully and slowly dragging my wearied limbs up trees where there happened to be bird's nests—all for the sake of the eggs.

A good share of those pleasant but guilty hours was devoted to the support of my younger brother. He used to stand on my shoulder and pick the peaches and rich clusters of grapes which grew beyond our reach unless we adopted some such plan.

You will observe that though he was but a lad, I was a ladder.

I had a kindly care, too, for his future life, and not infrequently would endeavor, by judicious but severe chastisement, to correct the faults which showed themselves even so early in his character. This is a way that elder brothers have. I remember that he was not disposed to yield to the judgment of those older than himself, and often violently objected when I, who was fully three years his senior, divided the grapes.

He said I took more than my share, and used to pout and cry about it, and then I felt it my duty to whip him. Perhaps this his the reason that he does not cherish any great affection for me at the present day, and never offers to lend me any money in my distresses.

By the way, it is a rather singular fact that younger brothers never entertain any very great affection for their older ones. I never felt at all gushing towards mine. It is true that they sometimes asked me to go fishing with them, but then they never took me any further than the garden, and my part of the fishing consisted wholly in digging worms or catching grasshoppers for them to bait their hooks with. Looking back at all the nagging and bully-ragging which they put me through, and which I, in turn, inflicted on those of the family younger than me, I comprehend fully what nations mean when they talk of the "balance of power."

It would be wicked and wrong to say that I ever hated my elder brothers, but I hope it is not unchristian to confess that there has never been a time from the "bib" epoch to the present, when I had not much rather kiss my Cousin Fannio than either of them. * * *

I have unintentionally been betrayed into a digression. I commenced to say, at the commencement of this article, that after an interregnum of a few weeks in an existence which has mainly been one of toil, and woe, and weariness, I am compelled to forsake the calm and quiet of domestic life, put aside the garments of a gentleman, and once more resume that pen which in my hand is mightier than the swords—i. e., two such swords as the Japanese wear.

The only thing which consoles me for the loss of my quiet dignity is the thought that I am writing for a new paper.

In the green spring and youth of my existence, I once fancied that I should like to have a paper of my own. To my mind it stood as the symbolical vine and fig tree of one's own, under whose shadow one could sit—perhaps lie—with none to molest or make afraid.

But this paper has been started under my own eye, and all my aspirations to own one have undergone a material modification. I had rather undertake to board and lodge a pair of Siamese elephants, or Siamese twins.

I have seen the editor of this paper ask one man to subscribe, who said he would, and afterwards explained that he thought he was asked to write for it.

I have seen the editor of this paper ask another man for a subscription, and receive instead a deal of advice about starting the paper and its conduct, which showed that the man knew nothing at all of what he was talking about.

I have seen the editor gazing in despair at forty-eight yawning empty columns which had to be filled, but which, like Pharaoh's lean kine, or a Pharaoh bank, swallowed all that was given them and then seemed no fuller than before.

I have seen the most amazing perplexities occur regarding type and paper, the most astounding questions arise of how shall this be done and where shall this be put—all asked of an unfortunate victim to his ambition, who did not know anything about it.

But I have also seen a number of good, generous fellows, rally around the enterprise, giving their aid to it the moment it was asked, with a heartiness and a will that spoke volumes—subscribing to the new paper without saying anything about "having to give so much to the church"—asking no questions. And others have given encouragement by works and by words, so that I do not know but what I may eventually forget all the unpleasant things that attend establishing a paper, and some day carry out my favorite and long-cherished plan of starting The Ishmaelite.

Having surreptitiously glanced over the proof sheets of the CALIFORNIAN, I cannot refrain from giving my opinion regarding the paper and its contents. Throughout, in its whole style, it is so plain that I do not see why it was not called The Plaindealer, the more especially as that name would have contributed to its circulation and popularity on the Plains. At first I did not like the plain heading under which this series of papers is to be bonneted; it is so different from the fancy cap I wore in another weekly journal, which I well nigh ruined—but now I am quite used to it and like it better. The eye very soon wearies of fancy type.

The head of the paper is unlike anything I ever saw before, and probably bears about as little resemblance to any other head on earth as it does to mine. It is called secretary hand; but I am confident that no secretary ever wrote such a hand unless indeed he was very drunk.

The motto, I see, is taken from Job. This perhaps will lead people to infer that the work is done at a job-printing office, a conclusion which would be erroneous since THE CALIFORNIAN has an office of its own.

The name of the paper does not strike one at first, but a conviction of its appropriateness grows apace. It is in accordance with the whole style of the paper, plain. Fancy names should go with fancy type, and both, in my opinion, should go to the "old Nick." "THE CALIFORNIAN" sounds plain, practical, and expressive. It is comprehensive, and commits the paper to no particular of field literature, politics, or religion, leaving, on the contrary, a free field open to it for the discussion of all. Moreover, it possesses this one great advantage—there is no other paper of its name in the whole world. It can never be confounded with any Courier or Herald or Palladium published in Asia, Africa, or America. People, in short, will never mistake it for the London Times. And I can think of no name that would have been better to call it unless it were The Bungtown Banner or the Battle-Axe of Freedom, and that would only have done for a paper published at Bungtown.

I like the form of the paper; it is convenient to handle and can be read like a tract. The wide columns are pleasant to read from, and their length does not appal one at first meeting. The small pages, too, give advertisers an advantage, as everything in them can be taken in at one sweep of the eye.

So far as the matter of the paper is concerned, La Comtesse Diane I have read in the French. It is a capital story, and, though it is French, no one need have any fear about the moral. The hero does nothing worse than falling in love with his godmother—and this brings him to the mad-house. Had he been guilty of falling in love with his grandmother, tho Good Gracious—this mild form of oath is in vogue with young ladies—only knows where he would have gone to or what would have become of him. The translation is faithful and sprightly, preserving the spirit of the original.

"Neighborhoods I have Moved from" is a charming sketch, and "The Ballad of the Emeu" is exquisitely funny. I do think it is one of the best things of the kind extant. To say it was written in this city is to tell the world who wrote it.

"Four-o'clocks" is a rather pretty story, gracefully written, which will probably please the multitude. The authoress has contributed to the Atlantic and to Harper's, which is all that I know to her disfavor. I cannot say that the story exactly meets my idea, for I do not take kindly to sentimentality, even in its subdued forms, and I am wroth that the story does not go on to tell us that Uncle Frank muttoned that villain, Colton. "The Light in the Window" is also written by Dennar Stewart, and I think it excellent verse.

"About Earthquakes" is mostly a compilation, evincing considerable talent and a wonderful deal of industry.

The extracts are tolerably good, considering that the editor had very few exchanges at hand, and, amid the hurry and bustle of getting out the paper, very little time to read and select. As for editorials, they are always stupid—this is a rule of all newspapers.

If any one should ask me, outside, what I thought the best thing in the new paper, I should say "Things," but under the present circumstances modesty overpowers me, and I say nothing. * * *

You cannot expect one who has been a professional lotus-eater so long to know much about what is going on in the world, but they tell me that the principal events of late have been the opening of Maguire's Academy of Music and Wilson's Hippotheatron—the day of theatres and circuses is past.

It is due to Mr. Maguire to say that he has got one of the nicest little theatres that there is on this or any other continent. The auditorium is capitally arranged, the seats being so graded in rows that those in the back part of the house can see quite as well as those in front—if not better. The upholstery reminds me of the tapestry and things in a number of ducal palaces which I visited a great, great many years ago. The private boxes suggest first-class cottages, built of Milwaukee brick, containing gas, speaking tubes, hot and cold water, all the modern improvements, and only five minutes walk from the Market street railroad depot. The drop-curtain is less gorgeous than the one at the old Opera House, and has fewer legs on it; but this is a defect that can be remedied with time and a judicious selection of impossible models assisted by a very wild brush.

The only drawback to the new theatre is the smallness of the stage, which rather unfits it for the production of any big thing—Mazeppa, for instance—though it is admirably adapted to minstrel purposes, to which use we believe Mr. Maguire intends to put it when the repairs of the old house are completed.

The Hippotheatron has been the excitement of the day, and is the favorite lounging-place at night. Some people go there seven times a week, wildly impelled, perhaps, by a desire to penetrate Zoyara's sex.

Two nights in succession I went to the show, hoping that while Zoyara was performing, some one would remark that it was a beautiful scene, affording me the opportunity to reply—Yes, epicene! But no one did, and I have cut the place since.

Circuses were never my favorite amusement. Even as a boy I used to sympathize with the Clown instead of laughing at him. He tries so hard to amuse the crowd of fools that fill the pit and dress circle, wears his motley so cheerfully and gracefully, but generally fails so signally. People refuse to be amused. They call his jokes old, and purse up their mouths and look grim when he is trying to be at his funniest—and all for their sakes.

What would become of society if all who consented to wear the motley occasionally were treated like the poor clown? Sit down in eternal criticism upon the conversation—you may call the main share of it jokes—of people we meet in parlors, and conviviality, I apprehend, would fly out of the window. For it surely is not pleasant to attempt to amuse those who will not be amused, but insist on meeting all your efforts in that direction as though you were trying to pick their pockets, when the worst intention latent in your mind is to pick their mouth of a smile or two.

It was remarked of the Clown, the other evening, that his jokes were far-fetched. So they were—all the way from New York.

Zoyara played the woman as well, nearly, as if he'd been a born soprano. He gave one an excellent idea of the lovely ways of that sex popularly but erroneously called "divine," in temper and spirit, as well as in grace and gesture. When a few of the audience hissed him for beating the knees of his horse—of which they thought there was no kneed—he smiled at them spitefully and curtsied to them sarcastically, and this he kept up at intervals through the whole performance. It was a weak revenge, but the very one that a woman would adopt, and, womanlike, he refused to be appeased for that one slight by all the applause that was subsequently shown him.

Tell a woman she isn't pretty, and make her think you mean it, and see if she does not turn the honey of your happiness into vinegar for a month with her constant nagging.

Zoyara did a capital imitation of feminine character once when he tripped in jumping over a banner. The man who held it did as well as could be expected; few men standing on a rickety, one-legged stool, could have held a strip of fluttering calico—the hardest thing in the world to hold—better; but Zoyara got in a pet—a pet in petticoats is apt to get in a pet—and scolded the poor fellow petulently. More than that, she turned him away and got another man.

Did one ever know a woman to trip, and not lay the blame on some one else?

There was a deal else done at the Circus the night I saw it. A woman, for instance, jumped through a hoop. That was no great feat, though, for I've seen a woman jump through a whole pyramid of hoops—and look much better after she'd done so.

A man stood on his head on a bottle and fired off a couple of pistols, immediatey after which he began to revolve like a gyroscope—from which I infer that the pistols he held in his hands were revolvers.

So much vaulting was done that one might almost characterize the whole performance as a Public Vault. The term would be rather appropriate, too, from the fact that so many people came there to deposit their coin. * * *

It grieves me not to be able to say more this week, for I have an indistinct idea that I could not wreak a better revenge on the editor, for whom I have long entertained a bitter personal and political animosity, than by filling the first number of his new paper with precisely the same nonsense with which I have already contrived to fill the better part of a page. And besides there were a number of other things which were uppermost in my mind to say—but regrets are useless.

As the young man in the mad-house says in the first chapter of La Comtesse Diane, more of these memoirs, my friend, next week. Until then, and perhaps for a brief period of time longer, I remain INIGO.

FINDING A SENSIBLE TONGUE IN TREES.

FITZ HUGH LUDLOW, in the Fremont organ lately established in New York, the New Nation—which McArone says must be miscege-nation—writes the following charming article, christening it:

THE SPRING OPENINGS—BY WAY OF COMPARISON.

THE toilette-hour of the trees is drawing near, and that of womankind is here already. We wish we could hope for such tasteful selection of Spring styles by the ladies as we always admire in the trees!

We are not talking of New York trees—unfortunates who live too fast, lose their own hair early, and take to a wig of measuring-worms—Eves, thrust out of their June Paradise naked, not because they listened to one but to a thousand serpents. No! the beeches of the grand old Northern forest; the maples of the sugar-bush; the elms on New England meadows; the cottonwoods by Western rivers; the magnolias of the Florida lagoon; the oaks everywhere. Already the trailing arbutus begins to push itself through the thinner crusts of Winter on many a secluded hillside of the North; in a few days more its fragrance will fill Nature's inmost sanctuaries like incense rising to the sun from an altar of snow, and its virgin tints will be lovely as the cheek of a beautiful baby. Over all the floor of the sandy Southern pine-lands, the exquisite Houstonia is spreading her white-starred mantle, while the gorgeous wild jasmine vine leaps from oak to magnolia through every Floridian forest, a torch-bearing Ariel who lights Spring's festive coming to the branches with globes of golden fire. How the buds of the maple swell toward their sumptuous birth; how red-dotted grow the woods ere the young leaves appear! Earth teems at every pore with the voluptuous juices of life; she will not leave the weeping elm and willow to barren widowhood; her poorest stone she will wrap in a gala cloak of new green moss; she has such riches in her treasury that there shall be no beggar child in any of her shady streets; sure such a millionaire as she might spend foolishly if any had the right!

But she will not do it! The maple will wear no magnolias in her coiffure, though she be rich in sugar; the hickory will not crown himself with tulips, though he has made many a fortune in barrel hoops.

Luxury will be everywhere in Nature's wardrobe, but never for the sake of its costliness. Nature is sometimes called "mute creation"—but if she does not speak, oh! how she thinks! She has meditated deeply on constitutional fitnesses, studied her own features, and suited her costume to them, until the wood wanderer comes back from Nature's spring opening to Madame Feu-Follet's with a sense of pain and anti-climax, which reaches deeper than the Æsthetic.

Competition in expenditure is death to competition in taste. The woman who buys an ugly Cashmere because it costs ten times as much as a handsome Paisley, may not know it, but she is taking a reverse step toward barbarism; she is turning her back on God and Beauty to worship the golden calf. The parallel runs further. Every telegram from the battlefield is a Moses coming down from the Mount of Vision; in the blood of every dying soldier are written tables of a new law; if we sham, or are in any way thoughtless at this day, we sin right in the smoke and trembling of the nation's Sinai. To-day crimes of taste and faults of prodigality are elevated by the risen standard of national earnestness into sins against good morals. If the worst results of an irredeemable currency are not to be realized in great financial disaster, they may visit themselves quite as deplorably upon our social fabric, by making expense rather than art the measure of good living. Without preaching an Easter sermon, let us say that this is peculiarly the season to guard against such a calamity.

Understand, we do not counsel a national assumption of mourning robes. Without the "inky cloak," we may carry within us that "which passeth show." Moreover, the farthest seeing of our people behold that presage in the times which makes them feel more like Easter singers than Lent mourners, and talk rather of the resurrection than the death pangs of the Republic. Nature herself shines with her warmest sun, and sings through her sweetest birds over the very field where crossed bayonets are clashing out the divine sparks of human progress. But happiness is not frivolity, nor is there any elegance in mere expenditure.

We would rejoice to see all women beautiful and dressed beautifully. The great purpose of woman on the earth is beauty. Beauty is her end as much as man's is use. Let this be understood in its largest sense. The term beauty is constantly misapplied. The highest artistic perceptions discover beauty in a thousand places where it is not generally acknowledged; in one of a hundred where it is lauded to the skies. The winning, the attractive quality of nature; the impulse that works by love—this is beauty, and belongs to woman in the highest sense. Man's role on the world's stage is mostly the impulse of sheer force: his hard attritions and collisions leave him in body and soul too often seamed and scarred. We will grant the highest ground demanded by independent thinkers of the womanly sex. Women, so far as our voice goes, may minister at any altar of human progress. They may teach, carve, paint, talk from the stand, or preach from the pulpit, but let them bear their womanhood up to the level of their duty, and make us honor them, because we love them first. Throw wide open every temple to the priestesses—but let them come crowned with flowers, and neatly cinctured—not in our stiff habiliments and carrying a coach-whip. They were born that the world might not forget beauty in its scramble for advantage.

Homeliness among women is as unnecessary as crime. Who has not seen the ugliest ducks among his flock of little-girl acquaintances grow up royal swans under the happy jugglery of a good mother's training? Juvenal says:

"Maxima reverentia pueris debetur."

He is mistaken. The greatest reverence is due to little girls. To be sure that boyish Chrysostom whose mouth is gilt by molasses candy, may hereafter retaliate your snubbing by defeating you at the polls; but his little sister, now with her hair in stiff blue-ribboned cues, and half dead with mauvaise honte, a few years hence will preside over a canvass of a far more interesting election, when you may be glad to give all your votes for Congress in exchange for a majority in her heart. The only obstacle to universal beauty among women lies in the field of discipline. Nature seldom gives us a beautiful girl-baby ready made; and when she does, in nine cases out of ten, bad discipline rears the first-class bud into a spoiled and third-rate blossom. Usually, Nature puts into our hands a mere given amount of raw material—a certain weight of albumen, phosphorized oils and salts—and says: "Mould it! the more scientifieally the better." The little girl is simply set up in the clay—the good sculptor may make a Hebe of her—the bad one will make a scullery maid. All the jewels you ean haug on the latter will not make her the less a menial in the natural order of soeiety; and the well-disciplined woman will be ravishiug iu a milkmaid's gown. The bones of the baby-girl are partly gelatinous; that is to help you in giving her shapely limbs and a straight spine; her faee comes to you off the rudest kind of lathe; she depends on you to infuse into her that health and loving spirit which informs a snub nose with aquiline fire or Grecian grace, and gradually shapes the rudimentary aperture of an infant's mouth into the loveliest twin bows of Cupid.

In spite of bad early discipline, there are few grown women who may not make themselves lovely by studying their possibilities. But how few of our women dare to begin such an investigation! We accept the Parisian fashions, but the graee to wear them wisely seems untranslatable. We bow down to suecessive dynasties of color; to-day humbling ourselves under the tyrauny of universal mauve, to-morrow becoming the slaves of café au lait. No expenditure of funds enables us to make a picture of our dress upon the baekground of either eolor; yet the poorest grisette in Paris so well understands artistie keeping, that with a fashiouably colored bonnet-bow she will create all the impression of beiug iu the mode.

A great many of our eountrywomen are pretty; at the age of twenty, native good looks are perhaps commoner with us than among any people in the world. Yet Beauty itself cannot afford to transgress the laws of Art, and the Veuus de Medici might dress herself iuto a fright. We never atteud a party, an artist's reception, any public assembling of our best people, without seeing a dozen natural beauties absolutely thrown away, their best features hidden, their worst exaggerated, their whole artistic effect neutralized by some easily avoidable mistake of the barber or the dressing maid. At the present moment it is easy to fiud a pretty woman obeying two of the great canons of good taste; indeed, she opens herself to the charge of slovenliness if she be not "bien gantée" and "bien chaussée;" but how few, eomparatively, of our beauties in society deserve the praise of "bien coiffée" also! It is indisputable that certain women look well in powdered hair; but is that any reason why the meal-bag should be opened on every head which can afford to pay the miller? Dressed á la Marie Antoinette, the hair of a lady whose stature is medium, whose face is a broad oval, and whose eyes are large, gives her the queenly look of a tower-crowned Cybele. The effect of the same style upon a little womau is to make her seem laboring under a capillary mouutain; on a very tall one, to render her gigantic and appalling; on a lady with narrow lids, to create the effect of one looking through the slits of a domino; on a lady of lofty forehead, to pile her whole faeial material as out of a bushel basket of curled hair on the top of her eyebrows; while the elliptical or long-oval face cannot stand the trial without becoming a miracle of meagreness.

This matter of coiffure is but one of the many cases iu whieh a servile conventionality obstructs the progress of true sumptuary art. Another great defect of our dressing system is ignorance or negligenee of color effects. The uniforiu cut of clothes is still another. The adoption of certain masculine styles was a movement in the liberal direction, but the lack of selective taste in its lady wearers makes it more odious than adherence to the old traditions. To a eertain extent epiceue dress is piquant aud bewitching. A pretty little toe-capped walking-boot or a eavalier hat imparts the most charming soupcon of soubrette sauciness to a woman whose physique and temperament are consonant with suеh modes. But why should the masculinity of the large and forcible woman be aggravated by the assumption of a paletot with buttons like a watehman's, or the eomfortable steadiness of a domestic woman tending to embonpoint be burlesqued by a vast expanse of starched masculine shirt-bosom?

We have spaee only to indicate the direction of our thoughts on the threshold of the spring opening. If we have been preaching, we at least pay the penalty of other sermonizers in knowing how few of the ladies about to throw their roll of greenbacks on the table of Fashion's Rouge-et-noir will give our homily a personal applieation. Still, as long as wo find so muеh material for artistic beauty among our countrywomen, and cling to the helief that beauty is a matter not only of universal possibility, but of ohligation, we shall continue, from time to time, the expression of our views in the field of Social Æsthetics.

THE BEST MEN OF THE SENATE.—Tho Cincinnati Commercial has a correspondent at Washington who thus classifies tho United States Senate. He premises by saying that he has only ventured to bring in the verdict after three months' daily attendance in the Senatorial jury-box (better known as the Reporters' Gallery), and he gives those of the general public who disagree with him the privilege of appealing to a higher court:

The best lawyer—Mr. Collamer, of Vermont.
The best scholar—Mr. Sumner, of Massachusetts.
The best general debater and practical legislator—Mr. Fessendon, of Maine.
The "keenest" debater—Mr. Trumbull, of Illinois.
The most pleasant speaker to listen to—Mr. Doolittle, of Wisconsin.
The best financier—Mr. Sherman, of Ohio.
The richest man—Mr. Sprague, of Rhode Island.
A very sensible old man—Mr. Wade, of Ohio.
The greatest bore that ever lived—Mr. Davis, of Kentucky.
The Knight of the Sorrowful Nigger—Mr. Lane, of Kansas.
The most violent Copperhead—Mr. Powell, of Kentucky.
The most eloquent Copperhead—Mr. Carlisle, of Virginia.
The most bibulous man in Congress—Mr. Richardson, of Illinois.
The best looking man, when sober—Mr. Saulsbury, of Delawaro.
The man who has least to say—Mr. Hendricks, of Indiana.
The man who made a faux pas in issuing a "strictly private" circular, which soon became public property—Mr. Pomeroy, of Kansas.
The man who comes nearest to boing nobody—Mr. Riddle, of Delawaro.

THE dinner table of the ancient Egyptians was sometimes covered with a linen cloth imitating palm leaves, sometimes left uncovered. Plates and knives, but not forks, were in common use. In plaee of the latter were short-handled spoons of gold, silver, ivory, tortoise shell, or alabaster. The dining table was circular; ornamented rolls of wheaten bread were placed before each guest, and supplies of the same were heaped in gay-looking baskets on the sideboard. They had also glasses, decanters and goblets.

THE NEW RELIGIOUS MOVEMENT.

The Saturday Review discovers that a remarkable revolution has long been going on in England, and discusses this modification of religious belief in the very fair and forcible article which we annex. The maliciously inclined will perhaps remark that an Englishmen never did much reverence to the letters which begin the names of the plaees of reward and punishment and it is quite possible that now they incline to drop the idea as well as the initials:

Things seem to be going on quietly with us, and there is no appearauce of any change which shall disturb the serenity of men of business or interfere with the pursuit of wealth. To that extent we may be said to live in stagnant times. But all who look in the least degree below the smooth surface have beeu for a long time aware that a speculative revolution of some magnitude is going on, which may or may not have what are called practical results, but which is sufficiently important to seeure for our age a place of considerable dignity in the mind of future historians. For some time past a change has been taking place in the community which is wholly unlike anything that has ever happened before since the introduction of Christianity, and its impulse seems at present to be still very far from exhaustion, and is likely, as it goes on, to develop symptoms still more singular. There has been a good deal of inexplicable reticence about this remarkable movemeut of thought. Of course it has been noticed, in sermons, in speeches, in articles; but it has received apparently far less attention than its importance would seem to justify. Those who concurred in the movement have been a good deal under the influence of that strange fear of social perseeution which presses so heavily upon the minds of educated Euglishmen. Perfectly eonscious that their views were something totally different from the views in which they were brought up, still, to save trouble and bother, they have struggled, with a eurious unanimity, to force their new views into the old clothing of the phrascology of the system from which they were breaking away. On the other hand, those who dislike the movement, as a rule, refuse to discuss it, except in the form of an anathema; and anathemas are a species of composition which the average Euglishmau ean neither bring himself to listeu to nor to read. There seems to be a rooted notion, among well meaning religious people, that it is a sort of profanity to diseuss tenets, in which you do not believe, in an impartial frame of mind. They cannot take an excursion into an intellectual country which they do not know, without losing their nerves or their temper altogether. They canuot watch the workings of other intellectual machines upon the raw material of theology, or analyze the particular spceulative combinatiou which they turn out, without an uneasy feeling that they are tampering with their owu faith, and eommitting an act of disloyalty to the religious eommunity to which they belong. The result of this timidity is an enormous amouut of ignorance and a great deal of eonsequent bad language. Such persons have uot a conception of what is passing anywhere over the wide domain of religious thought that lies outside the little inclosure in which they live. In reference to differences of belief, they are Chinamen. They are living in the Celestial Empire, and every one else is a harbarian. But, like the Chinamen, they will not see that there are differences in barbarism. They cannot be brought to understand that there are varieties of tint and intensity in the vice of heterodoxy, and that a particular heretic, however abominable he may be, may yet be less abominable than some other heretic. Among other evils, this mistake has an uuhappy tendeney to justify itself. Calling people infidels is not nearly so good for their souls as some excellent persons appear to imagine. On the eontrary, it has an irritating tendency, which culminates in the retort, expressed or felt, "Well, then. I am an infidel—what then?" The sooner, therefore, that this unwillingness to discuss the phenomeua of what may be called doctrinal metereology is laid aside the better. If Admiral Fitzroy and his scientific predecessors had thought it wrong to discuss anything but fine weather, he might even now have been under the impression that every breeze of wind was a typhoon; and in that case his advice would not have been of much use to mariners.

This habit, so unfortunately prevalent, of ignoring distances in theology, and drawing the religious picture of the day with about as much regard for perspeetive as is displayed upon a willow-patteru plate, is peculiarly misplaced just now; for there never was a time when the gradations of opinion were so numerous, or the masses of really united thinkers so few. And the prevailing tone of divergence from the traditional standards is not one of disbelief. There is nothiug masculine enough in the mental fibre of the present generation for pure disbelief. It is incapable of the hard trenchant atheism of the last century. Its peculiarity is rather a dreamy sentimental delight in the vague. In the fifth and sixth centuries, Christianity suffered a good deal from the passion for precise definitions, which was the form into which all the earnest religion of the time moulded itself. In this nineteenth eentury the teudency is diametrically the reverse. There is a positive passion for indistinctness. The ideal of a religious belief in the present day is an indefinite proposition doubtfully entertained. The model of a popular preacher is the man who can surround muddy expositions of doctrine with tender thoughts and beautiful imaginings. Of course, the sharp-edged formularies of an age that loved definitions require a good deal of abrasion before they can suit a generation of a temper so different. But it is not in the nature of minds of this cast definitively to object to any formularies. Such a view would involve an expression of opinion far too decided. They only scruple at them. They admit the Creed to bo a defensible statement of a possible hypothesis, and they do not deny that the Articles, or some of them, are plausible propositions in which it is quite conceivable that some truth may exist. And they would possibly go on to observe that loving natures would discover great human thoughts in both of them. But their difficulties arise from the fact, which they freely recognize, that loving natures which happen to turn their attention in an opposite direction may also discover great human thoughts in propositions diametrically the reverse. It is absurd to fling the terms "atheist" and "infidel" and "helievers in a different God" at thinkers of this type. They are merely making sentimental efforts to eonstruct a creed out of gushing phrases; and if they ean induee a considerable number of persons to accept this substitute for definite convictions, they may be doing a very pereeptible public service. For, after all, if you ean once prevail upon yourself to believe in them, gushing phrases are perfectly safe from refutation; and if you are armed with a sufficient quantity of them you may look down with contempt at the assaults of science or the ravages of criticism.

It cannot be denied that there is a good deal, philosophically, to be said for this hazy frame of mind. Definitions which profess to convey supernatural facts to finite intelligences, and present them with perfectly clean outlines, can only do so at the cost, it is obvious, of a certaiu amount of distortion. But though the new school of faith may commend itself to persons of a philosophical turn of mind, who like to rest in their belief, and therefore to have a belief yielding and elastic enough at the edges to break the force of the objections which secular science is apt to amuse itself in levelling at all beliefs, it does not follow that it will permanently succeed in maintaining itself. All forms of religious teaching have two ordeals to go through, so different in their character that none have as yet contrived to pass through both with equal success. If they are to be accepted when they are first introduced, they must, at least in this age and climate, satisfy the matured intellects of educated men. But if they are to last more than one or two generations, they must be capable of being taught easily to children and to rude converts. These are two conflicting requirements which it is hard to satisfy simultaneously. The very simplicity and definiteness which are essential for the purpose of the teacher are a stumbling-block to the minds of educated and grown-up men. The Evangelical teaching, for instance, has never made much way with the higher class of intellects. But it has stood its ground, because it has always been popular with children, (such of them, at least, as take to any religion at all,) with women, and with half-educated men. The plumpness and almost juridical precision of its statements make it eminently suitable for minds that are too blunt for subtle distinctions, and both too ignorant and too impatient to be satisfied with half-truths. The new doctrine seems likely exactly to reverse this destiny. It spreads like wildfire among the highly-educated class which furnishes the leading men of the Universities and the lay professions, but it will be a hard matter to teach it to less cultivated minds. As it is, it makes no way among women, and does not penetrate even scantily into the strata of society that are usually ranked as the middle class. It is obvious that you cannot teach that which you eannot state distinctly. Nor, if you could, would those who are taught listen. The taste for the vague is purely artificial. Human nature instinctively yearns for the precise. Unless the new doctrine can cast itself into some shape that minds of all ealibres can apprehend, it is probably destiued to a very ephemeral existence. There is one coutingeney, indeed, which will help it to perpetuate, if not itself, at least its consequences. If it succeeds in ousting the older forms of Anglican belief which have hitherto monopolized the field, it may meet with a fate which has hefallen very refined and sublimated schools of philosophy before now. It may become a mere cloak for the negation of all belief, and for the practical resnlts which inevitably follow. The kind of teaching which is captivating many clever men at the Universities and in London will address itself in vain to average minds; and if it should ever come to pass that nothing else is offered to the mass of mankind, the moral eonsequences will be deplorable. It is a fallacy to rely too much on the moral eharacter of those who are the foremost innovators. Their moral habits were formed, not by the belief they have adopted, but by the belief whieh they have left. The marks of transience and instability which are traceable in this movement, and its inapplicability to the mass of human kind, tend to encourage the idea that it is rather a passing stage in the development of some much larger change than a permanent resting-place in the history of religious thought.

DIETING.—Dieting is usually considered to mean the same thing as a kind of starvation. The idea which the educated physician attaches to the term is a judicious regulation of the quantity and quality of the food, according to the circumstances of each case. A healthy man may diet himself in order to keep well; an invalid may diet with a view to the recovery of his health; yet the things eaten by the two will widely differ in their nature, bulk, and mode of preparation. A vast multitude are suffering hourly by the horrors of dyspepsia; no two are precisely alike in all points, since there is an endless variety of combinations as to age, sex, occupation, temperament, etc. Yet dyspepsia is always brought on by over and irregular eating; it could be banished from the world in a generation if the children were educated to eat moderately, regularly, and slowly; the parents who do this will do their offspring a higher good than by leaving them large fortunes, which, in three cases out of four, foster idleness, gluttony, and every evil thing. As the rich can get anything to eat or drink when they want it, they, with indulged children, bring on dyspepsia by eating irregularly and without an appetite. The poor—those who have to work for a living—induce the horrible disease by eating too rapidly and at unseasonable hours; mainly by eating heartily at supper, and going to bed within an hour or two afterwards. In the hey-day of youth and manly vigor there may not for a while be noticed any special ill effect from such a practiee—in truth it is at first inappreciable, but it is cumulative, and impossible not to manifest itself in due time.

ECHO MEN.—There is no greater bore than a human echo that repeats, assentingly, whatever one suggests or asserts. It is a nuisance always to be coincided with. A man of sense ikes to argue his points and prove his positions. The whetstone of opposition sharpens his wits; but if met with a continual affirmative iteration of his own words, his game is blocked, and he is, so to speak, dumbfoundered. On the contrary, a sententious "No, I don't think so," puts a man on his mettle. If wrong, he has a chance of being set right; if right, of enjoying a honest triumph. To be in company with one who has no opinion but your opinion is as bad as being caged with a macaw. If you ask an individnal in the habit of agreeing with everybody the reason of his complaisance, he may tell you, perhaps, that he hates controversy. Hates controversy! He might as well say he hates truth; for disputation is the erucible in which the gold of truth is separated from the alloy of error. How many things were taken for granted in former ages that modern argument has shown to be mere fallacies. The grand object of a man of mind is to acquire knowledge; but he can learn nothing from those who are always ready to pin their faith on his sleeve without taking the trouble to think for themselves. We detest the suavity that is too polite to doubt, and the indifference that is too phlegmatic to argue.

FASHIONS IN SAN FRANCISCO—PAST AND PRESENT.

TWELVE years ago fashion in San Francisco was simply a memory of the past—a memory which its fair-and-far-between votaries had brought with them from many distant lands. To the black-eyed senoritas who walked slip-shod in satiu slippers through the sandy streets, it was a memory of Spain transplanted to Mexico with the Conquest, a memory of high-backed combs and black lace mantillas—of silk rebosos, full and flonnced short skirts and high-heeled slippers, and all the coquetry of fans. To the dames and damsels from the Old Pike State, Indiana and Illinois, it was a memory of what they had worn at the last quilting party, or husking frolic at which they assisted before they started on that long picnic across the plains. Perhaps a lovely pink calico, a scarlet merino, or a figured black silk, carefully packed away even now perhaps in the old hair trunk or walnut chest in which it made the journey. To the women from the Eastern States it was a memory not very unlike the reality which one sees daily on Montgomery street, only as there were not so many women there as now, the variety was not so great. Hoops had not then made their appearanco, and consequently there was less redundancy of skirt. Dresses were shorter and narrower, with flowing sleeves and inevitable flounces. It is a fortunate circumstance for California that hoops were not in fasbion before the hnilding of the Panama Railroad; if they had been it would have interfered seriously with the emigration of the fair sex to these shores. Imagine the miscries of half a dozen women in hoops in a small boat on the Chagres River! or the ludicrous appearance of a stout woman thus arrayed crossing the Isthmus on a very small donkey! The door to California was like the entrance to the Infernal Regions, and over it might well have been written—"She who enters here leaves hoops hehind." Those were the days of Chinese crape shawls, with their elaborate embroidery of wonderful heasts and birds and fruits and flowers. Every woman in California had at least two—a red one, and u whitc one—and every man in California hought at least one to send homc to his wife or sweetheart. We laugh at them now, hut in those days we thought them magnificent. In those days the houses were too small and the streets too narrow for much display—women were obliged to wear thick boots, or run the risk of losing them in the deep sand of summer, or the hlack mud of winter, and to protect them from the hroken bottles, the empty tin cans, fragments of crockery and rusty iron and dilapidated hoots and pots, and east-off clothing, which cumbered the streets, to say nothing of the huge weird rats that darted to and fro and played at hide and seek among the ruhbish and the soiled socks—a rag-picker might have gathered a hushel of them on any Sunday morning in the streets of San Francisco.

It was no uncommon sight to see a woman, elegantly dressed, walking down Montgomery street dragging a tin can hy the fringe of her crape shawl.

In every country, fashion is governed hy something more than caprice. Climate has more to do with it than nny other cause. It changes with the wenther, and as the weather is proverhially fickle, we call fashion fickle, and so it is, to a certain exteut, for the length of a skirt or the height of a honnet do not depend upon the weather. In all trifling dctails we confess her fickleness, hut in all her great laws she is governed hy climate. In the early days of California, women were compelled to relinquish those delicate fabrics of Southern looms—their gossamer muslins, graceful hareges, and all those flexible transparencies which float with such a fascinating grace around the female form, for heavy satins, and gorgeous hrocades, and close clinging merino, or run the risk of having their skirts hlown over their heads hy tremendous gusts of wind. Thin dresses were dismissed with a sigh of regret, and the delicate creatures, shivering in the summer winds, wrapped their fair forms in rich velvets nnd costly furs, and silks and satins, and so was instituted that taste for extravagant dross and lavish expenditure so characteristic of Californians, and which threatens now to become a great and crying evil. To have written an article then on the Fashions in San Francisco, would have heen simply nn absurdity, and considered an excelleut joke. Now, San Francisco has become a great capital, and is as much the metropolis of the Pacific as New York is of the Atlantic. From the frozen North to the Tropics, it stands aloue, without a rival. The tawny-hued Mexican who comes from Mazatlan to cool himself in the invigorating breezes of San Francisco, meets here the Oregonian who comes to escape the snows and rains of his northern home. The Sandwich Islands pay tribute to it, and the royal family of Kamehameha do their shopping in Montgomery street. Washington Territory and Oregon send hither their young ladies for the finishing touches of an elegant education—for the accomplishments, for the opera, the theatres, the halls and parties, and the benefits of fashionable society; above all, for the shopping, for the modistes nnd mantillamakers—Mesdames Laurent, and Verdier, Robinson, Quinn and Tarhox are names familiar as household words to them. From Mazatlan, San Diego and Los Angeles come the graceful Senoritas, who saunter through the streets, looking ill at ease in American hoots and nnaccustomed bonnets. They pause to look at the transparent orgnndies in Austin's windows, the bordered robes of printed lawns at Costerhause's, the black lace mantillas at Davidson's and Scellier's, and the wondrous magnificence which everywhere surrounds them.

But Washoe sends us the richest tributaries. The gold and silver streams of that enchanted land flow as surely into San Francisco as its rivers flow to the sea. Rich men all the world over may be divided into two classes—those who know how to spend money and those who do not. To acquire the art of spending money properly requires some considerahle practice, and thus it is, perhaps, that the nouveau riche In his first attempts generally succeeds in purchasing himself only discomfort and dyspepsia. Very frequently we meet a man who having dropped into a fortune suddenly, either hy a "lucky strike" after long years of unprofitable mining or a fortunate investment in stocks, nrrives by intuition nt the art of spending it—sensihly. Oftener, nnfortunately, we find men and families, who think that the end of wealth—and often it proves its end indeed—and the sum of human happiness, consist in buying everything, exhausting all the springs of pleasure at one draught, and making as much display as possible. In too many instnnces, no sooner does the successful miner from the up country find himself possessed of countless "feet," which dividends do pay, than he feels an irresistihle desire to "splurge" a little "at the Bay," to see the sights and to spend his money. He snceeeds in doing all this—especially the latter. If a married man, he sometimes—oftener not—takes his wifo with him. He puts up at a fashionable hotel, selecting Montgomery street as a location, if possible; smokes costly cigars; drinks champagne cocktails; picks his teeth before the door, and criticizes the passers-hy—especially the women. Of all places of amusement he gives the New Idea the preference; thinks Jennie Joliejambe an angel, und swears hy Menken, but votes the opera a bore. Finally, he purchases, or employs some friend to purchase for him, u pair of fast horses at n fahulous cost, which he names after his favorite Generals. So we have McClellan and McDowel harnessed together, or Pope and Pagan. He wraps himself in a light linen duster, sticks a slouched drah beaver on his head and a huge cigar in his mouth, and whirls away on the Point Lohos pike to show his new team, to drink more cocktails, to smoke more cigars, to look at the sea lions, and to dream of bliss! This is his idea of happiness. His wife, who was probably content in the poorer days of the family to work honestly, dress decently, aad live respectably, has her idea also. She, too, likes the theatre and appreciates negro minstrels; hut she likes shopping a great deal better. To her every dry goods shop is a separate Eden, in which she may gather just as many apples as she pleases, without counting the cost like our less fortunate Mother Eve, and mantuamakers and milliaers are the high-priestesses of the temple where she worships. Tucker is in her eyes the King of the Geaii—she helievcs him the richest monarch ou the globe; she looks at his silver and his gold, his "gems of price and jewels rare," and she thinks that therc are no more of the same sort left iu the world. She gazes upon him with n mysterious awe; when ho speaks to her she feels flattered, and when he waits upon her she is overwhelmed with his condescension. When she enters Austin's enchanted palace she is spell-bound—she feels as if she would like to stay there forever. Her eyes gloat upon the rich show of the lustrous moires; they linger lovingly amid the voluptuous folds of the costly velvets; they are hewildered by tho web-like texture of the delicate laces. She can scarce believe in her own identity. She asks herself, "Can it bo possible that all these heautiful things are mine?" She stretches out her hand aad seizes them. She goes to Madame Verdier; she chooscs the bonnet which has the greatest height of hrim and the greatest quantity of flowers and feathers on top of it, aud which costs the greatest amouut of money. She pays a thousand dollars for a set of sables, and as much more for a Cashmere shawl. She pins her linen collar in the morning with a diamond cross, and goes out shopping in a pair of diamond ear-rings which cost her husband a foot of his Gould and Curry—and this is her idea of happiness.

Every one misses here those charming white morning dresses which make our women so beautiful through the loag summer months at home—those fairy-like fabrics of silk and cotton aad linen which envelop them liko a nehulous vapor, veiling hut not obscuring their charms. Fortunately for the fair fashionables of San Fraacisco, the summer climate of Paris is usually cool, and French taste has invented a substitute which, if it has not the lightness and flexihility of nansook and jaconet, produces very nearly the same effect with a much greater degree of durahility and comfort. It is what we used to call Marseilles—they call it piqué now. It is a thick corded material which our fathers used to wear for vests. It can be had in all colors, und figured or plain. The favorite shades are huff aud light blue, and pearl gray and whitè—sometimes with little chintz patterns, but more frequently with medallion and scroll patterns. Nothing can be prettier for a young lady than a plain white robe of this materiul, the corsage tight, and the skirt gored, very long and full behind, and very scantily plaited in front. It may be trimmed with worsted braid of any color, and in any design according to the taste of the wearer. Trimmed with black they are very stylish; blue is also very youthful and becoming to most complexions. If one finds the tightly-fitting body too stiff, the skirt mny he worn with a habit shirt, puffed in front, and a short Spanish jacket or bolero surmounting it. These little jackets, although several years old in Paris, have only made their appearance here quite recently. It is a very convenient as well as a stylish fashion, for they can he worn with skirts of any color. They are very handsome in hlack velvet with hugle trimming. When made of white merino and trimmed with hlack lace or gimp or jet, they are very pretty for the Opera, or for demi-toilette. When the material is heavy and dark, the sleeves should he slashed to show the white sleeve underneath. Postillion jackets with very long tails are much worn. In Paris they wear them as long as the swallow tails of a gentleman's dress coat, and very much the same shape. Anything so exaggerated has not yet reached us, hut even here they are rapidly running into frightful extremities. There is a very pretty style of jacket n good deal in vogue amoug tho fashionables, which differs somewhat from the postillion jacket; instead of terminating in two points at the waist, it descends below it four or five inches, forming u vest—which latter may he of a different color from the dress, but must match the trimming.

There seems to be no limit to the length of dresses behind, they grow longer and longer. They should be short enough in froat to permit the wearers to walk without heing obliged to hold them up. There is nothing more ungraceful than to see a lady lifting up her dress very high in front, while it is trailing in the dust half a yard behind her. Flounces and ruches have almost entirely disappeared, and in their stead, flat trimmings in great variety have made their appearance. They consist of gimps, luces, passementerie velvet ribbons and worsted braids. For rich moires and expensive silks, passcmenterio in all shapes is used; sometimes it assumes the style of epaulettes, intermixed with hugles; sometimes it assumes the shape of leaves nnd stars, and bouquets and garlands of flowers, in ull shapes—it is beautiful and expensive. It is arranged like epaulettes upon tho shoulders, and forms a very pretty pendant for the upper part of the sleeve, while a similar ornament adorns the cuff. Plaids are very popular, hoth for dresses and for trimmings; they are very effective when arranged with bias bands upon the skirts. The most fashionable plaid is a combination of blue und green, which the French call the triumph of fashion over prejudice. Black velvet is much used for the garniture of heavy dresses, poplins, merinos and heavy silks; it is cut in the shape of lozenges, pyramids, palm leaves und points, edged with jet trimming, and arranged in the middle of each breadth, ubout six inches above the edge of the skirt. The simplest and most economical trimming is the worsted braid, which used to be confined to the binding of silks; it can be used in all manner of woolen dresses—plaid admits of washing. The materials most generally in vogue for street dresses are velours de laine, (which looks at a distance like rich reps silk), alpacas in every color, poplins, which are always elegant and useful, and dark silks—hlack being the favorite color with gentlemea. We never yet saw a man who had not a penchant for hlack silk dresses and dumplings. But street dresses, to be really elegant, should always he accompanied hy a wrapping of the same shade, either a basquine demi-adjuste, or a casaque, or a rotonde or mantle. It does not matter so much for the shape, so the harmony of color is preserved. Ladies do not sufficiently consider this simple rule. The whole effect of a toilette which would otherwise he elegant is sometimes destroyed hy the injudicious choice of a cravat or an ill-matched pair of gloves. The eye of taste is constantly shocked hy the sight of such incongruities of color as a pale bluo dress surrounded hy a dark bluo cloak, and vice versa. Two shades of the same color should never be worn together; if one cannot find an exact match, it is better to seek out its greatest opposite, that the most striking contrast may be produced. For home dresses calicoes huve udvanced in favor; the high prices at which they are held having made them fashionable. But silks in every variety of style uad coloring will always be the favorite material here. It is neither too hot nor too cold, too thick nor too thin, it does not require to be washed, and is always ready; hesides, it is expensive, and ladies always appreciate their dresses in proportion to their cost.

There is nothing new in the way of cloaks aad mantles—only varieties of the same old shapes. Short hasquines seem to he the favorite style. They are nsually trimmed with passementerie on the seams, which define the back, terminating in rich tassels or fringe just helow the waist. Similar trimmings adorn the shoulders and the lower part of the sleeves. Scarlet cloaks are much affected by young ladies for the opera and even for the promenade. Short plaid cloaks with chenille fringe are very stylish, not having as yet become so common as they are in the East. They have the advantage of heing serviccable, and can he worn for traveling even when out of fashion. Bonnets are decidedly smaller, assuming a Marie Stuart shape, though only to a modified extent. They are closely fitting at the ears, and modestly depressed in front. The ambitious trimmings which had advanced to the highest point of the brim, and seemed to look with disdain upon the flowers under it, have fallen back, changed their base, and seem barely able to cling to the extremest verge of the crown. Beautiful straw bonnets, looking fresh and clean, and blossoming all over with purple violets and pansies, and lilacs and roses, and blue corn flowers and wheat and oats. Black ribbon is the favorite material for strings and curtains and the surroundings of the flowers. Black lace harbes are also much used in the place of ribbon. There is nothing prettier for this climate than black lace bonnets relieved of their blackness by gay flowers. They can be worn during the whole year; can he constantly renewed, and are as everlasting and as ever elegant as time-honored Leghorns, willow-puttern China, and Cashmere shawls.

THE LIGHT AT THE WINDOW.

There's a hattered, shattered, tumble-down house,
Just over across the street,
With every elapboard so loose that a mouse
Could knock them off with his feet.
'T is low and small, and dingy and brown,
And never knew whitewash or paint;
Its thriftless garden, with fences down,
Of negligence maketh complaint.
And yet 't is not utterly drear and lorn,
For in noontime hright, or rosente morn,
A visitor glad, of the sunbeam born,
Enters in at the little window.

I watched to-night, as the darkness fell,
That house like a spectre lone—
Its bleak, gaunt frame, in the shadowy spell
Unto frightful likeness grown.
The wild winds growl, and night comes apace,
With storm-clouds gathering on high;
The house looms up, with its haggard face
Threat'ning the wierd-like, angry sky:
When lo! to a love-cot its walls transform,
For sweetly smiling through blackness and storm,
Cheerfully glowing, and ruddily warm,
Shines a light from the little window.

And many tenements human, I ween,
May be found in every street,
Squalidly wretched, and abjectly mean,
Whom no man careth to greet;
Sin-stained, woe-hestamped, vilest of vile,
Yet not hy their God forsaken,
For a heating heart is theirs the while,
A casement where light is taken.
It may he a dust-covered spider's lair,
And Demon with Angel may wrestle there;
Yet with brotherly deed and loving prayer,
Let your light shine in at the window.

Give us the Sun gives—like him persevere,
With a boon for every day;
For a time will come, he it far or near,
That heralds the answering ray.
Some Sorrow's night, or Temptation's storm,
Shall he gilded with its beaming.
The hut a heavenly mansion form,
Each pane with radiance streaming.
You may he sleeping the long, dreamless sleep,
For still one sows where another will reap;
Yet when you 're crossing the Death-river deep,
There will be a light in the window!

DENNAR STEWART.

WHILE the CALIFORNIAN was in a very embryotic state—not even its name decided upon—the Income Tax man stepped into the office and asked the proprietor what his income was. The visit was either encouraging, or "on the contrairy, quite the reverse," as Mrs. Gamp says. For he either thought that the fact of a man's proposing to start the paper argued that he was possessed of a large income, and could afford to lose a portion of it, or else that the paper would pay from the moment it was projected. Taking the omen in its more favorable interpretation, here is the CALIFORNIAN. To use a new and original expression, we launch it on the waters. Like the old woman's indigo: if good, it will either sink or swim—we don't know which.

WE COMMENCE with our first number the publication of a brilliant romance, translated from the French of Mario Uchard especially for these columns. Uchard is not very generally known to American readers, and we take p'easure in introducing his last and best work—The Countess Diana. It is written in the form of letters to a friend, and the narrator in closing the first one promises to give more of his memoirs to-morrow. Had he said next week, one would have thought he intended them for original publication in the CALIFORNIAN.

"A POOR CRIPPLE" will rejoice to know that if he takes a lemon, cuts off a piece, then nicks it so as to let in the toe with the corn, ties this on at night so that it cannot move, takes a blunt knife the next morning and cuts off his toe, the corn will instantly disappear, and "A Poor Cripple" will be made happy for life.

BUSINESS MATTERS GENERALLY.

MERCANTILE interests for the past twelve months, until recently, have been unusually prosperous—profits fair, and everything denoting prosperity, so far as this city is concerned, and in fact the State at large. Importing merchants and jobbers, foreseeing the natural results of a prolonged civil war, ordered largely of foreign merchandise, which has been rapidly pressed forward; stocks have accumulated in warehouse in anticipation of enhanced duties, and thus dealers have been fully stocked before those duties were actually imposed. The results looked for in this respect have mainly been realized, except in the case of importers of Spirits. These parties have been followed up with unusual rigor; step by step increased taxes and excise have been exacted of them, and fifty per cent. "additional" required, until at least a further impost of forty cents on all Foreign Spirits imported prior to the 7th of March, 1864, is now levied, even where duties have been paid and the Spirits sold to the dealer. So that at this writing every holder of stocks in store, for sale, be he a merchant, dealer, hotel-keeper, or agent, must pay an internal revenue tax of forty cents per gallon. This will operate very severely upon some parties, but, in view of the cause, all should submit with a good grace.

The Dry Goods and Clothing businesses have been profitable. Dealers imported largely from the East, and before they were required to make payment the price of gold advanced so as to insure them large returns. So also of the Leather, Saddlery and Harness departments. A few dealers realized handsomely at first by the rise in gold.

The Boot and Shoe interest has not been as profitable, though dealers have done well. Prices with us have not advanced in proportion to the rise in values at the East; still, the regular trade is more than usually healthy, not having to contend with the brisk auction competition of previous seasons.

The dealers in and importers of metals have done well—stocks of leading staples having largely advanced in hand.

Hardware merchants have been prosperous; it has at times been almost impossible for them to keep up their assortments. Not unfrequently they have been obliged to import via the Isthmus, at great expense, in order to satisfy pressing demands of consumers. Almost the only exception to this has been the one article of Nails, which were in excessive supply; but when the premium on gold advanced to about 80 per cent., dealers were enabled to close out stocks that were extremely burdensome without loss.

Importers of Coffee, Teas and Rice have not realized any large returns commensurate with the importance of these articles as leading staples, owing to excessive importations and the high rates of duty demanded. Prices have not as yet advanced sufficiently, nor in proportion to the increase of duties. Time, however, will perhaps regulate this. Sugars have not been paid as they should have, for reasons somewhat inexplicable. Spices have advanced, and where sales have been effected profits were remunerative, but the demand has not been large.

Foreign Fruits—Raisins and the like—have been in too great supply, importations being too far in excess of trade requirements to be profitable. Sales cannot be forced even at liberal concessions from the low nominal rates ruling. Dried Apples, Case Goods, Preserves, and everything else in that line are in lessened demand, or perhaps we should say as above, that late importations have been greatly in excess of present wants.

The Orange trade with the Society Islands has increased within the past five years from small proportions and great profits to the extent of fifteen entire cargoes the present season, and a business that apparently must result in loss either to the importers or to the combination of fruit dealers who have sought to control the market. The Oregon Apple trade having been extended far into May, and our own fruits and berries having matured and ripened earlier than usual, the Fruit trade generally has suffered in consequence, at least so far as to cause diminished prices as compared with previous seasons. Yet perhaps no more than our increased products should lead us to expect.

Candles are one of the few exceptional leading staple articles, the prices of which have scarcely varied a cent in a twelve month. Stocks are, however, at this writing, diminishing, and a change may perhaps be looked for.

Importers and dealers in Tobacco and Cigars have for the most part realized fair profits, while speculators have been badly bitten, operating on extreme high prices.

The trade in Eastern Meat Provisions has generally been greatly restricted and but moderately profitable. Butter and Lard have been imported liberally, via the Isthmus, with remunerative results.

Coal Oils and Petroleum have been largely imported, and the consumption is constantly increasing, yet the importation has not been particularly profitable, though some few local dealers and operators have made money by discreet purchases.

As regards our Producing interests, the growing, or rather the not growing crops of Grain, promise unfavorable results, and will in the aggregate be largely deficient as compared with the yield of the past three years. Still it is believed that the surplus of the old crop, and the harvest soon to be gathered, will be sufficient to keep rates so far in check as not to permit famine prices.

The Wool clip of the present season will be less than that of the year previous. It is gratifying, however, to note a continued active demand both for the supply of our own local woolen factories and also for shipment to Atlantic cities. Our latest advices from the East are encouraging to wool-growers, and if Congress will protect the California wool-grower by adding a few cents additional tax to low grades of foreign wool, (now largely imported from abroad,) the wool-producing interest of this coast will soon loom up into magnificent proportions.

The Wine interests of California promise abundantly. The Grape crop of the State looks well, and the reports from all sections are favorable. The only fear at present expressed by dealers is in regard to the difficulty of procuring a sufficiency of pipes and other casks in which to convey the product to market. There is also much difficulty in getting proper freight accommodations for the conveyance of the empty casks to Los Angeles and the lower coast ports, in season, as the casks, being large and bulky, cannot be freighted without other cargo for ballast. The consumption of Native Wines is fast displacing that of the imported, and is seriously interfering with the free importation of malt liquors from England. California Wines—which are uniformly cheap in price—coupled with the immense home product of Lager Beer—will in future, doubtless, greatly restrict importations of English Ale and Porter.

Our Manufacturing and Mechanical interests are generally prosperous. None more so, however, than those of our Woolen Factories, and particularly the Mission Woolen Mills Company, lately incorporated, and of which Albert Miller is President, and Donald McLennan Acting Agent and Superintendent. The Pioneer Woolen Mills are said to be in a prosperous condition, and about to enlarge greatly their manufacturing capacity. The San Francisco and Pacific Sugar Refineries are doing both a large and profitable business under the supervision of George Gordon, W. T. Coleman & Co. being the business agents. The new German Sugar Refinery has been delayed in its completion by the necessity of sending to New York to duplicate some of its machinery damaged on its way out. It is, however, expected to be in working order during the coming fall. Dow's Distillery is in full working order, and has been a source of large profits to its proprietors. The new Distillery at Black Point is not yet completed, but the proprietors expect to fire up ere long.

FINANCIAL AFFAIRS.

AFTER a period of some stringency in the money market, a gleam of relaxation and ease can be discovered. The pressure was mainly occasioned by the sudden withdrawal of large sums of money from the merchants for the payment of import duties, by the prospect of an unusually short crop of cereals throughout the State, and by the break-down in the stock market. The merchants have been gathering in their resources from the interior—the productive efficiency of the country is thought to be rather more promising, and the mining-share market has rallied materially.

Capital is now more abundant, and though bankers still discriminate—with severity in some instances—a more cheerful feeling can be noted among borrowers. The wants of the latter class are less pressing, and with good business paper or unexceptionable stock collaterals, discounts are readily obtained at current rates.

Upon real estate there is no difficulty in borrowing at 1¼ to 1½ per cent. per month. This description of security is in fact fought for as a desirable investment, and ample funds are readily met with for the purpose at the lowest rates of interest known to the market. During the current month a large amount of foreign capital has been added to our available means, a portion of which has been inserted in dividend-paying and other leading mining stocks.

A number of prominent citizens of Virginia City have inaugurated a movement to change the present metallic currency of the Territory to that of Legal Tender Notes, and a mass meeting is to be held there this evening to take final action on the subject. Some of the Virginia papers favor the proposition, but warn the people to ponder the matter carefully and well before committing themselves to a policy so radical and perhaps ruinous. It is said that human nature is ever given to change, and in their proneness to adopt new ideas and plans, men are constantly falling into errors, experiencing reverses and misfortunes, and yet learning no lesson of wisdom. They lose sight of the fact that elsewhere the financial system they seek to introduce, threatens to overthrow and convert every material interest in the land. One earnest glance backwards to the condition of our Eastern brethren a few years since would, we think, do more to correct the false teaching of paper-money enthusiasts than all that can be said or written against the consummation of such a scheme on this coast. It is much easier to plunge into difficulty than to find the way out. We trust the people of Virginia City will not rashly adopt a policy that would probably soon end in embarrassment and confusion to every commercial, financial and industrial interest in the Territory.

The business of the Stock and Exchange Board and the Pacific Board of Brokers will not exceed $200,000 for the current month. For the past week, however, an improvement has taken place, and transactions in the general market continue to increase. The recent collapse in almost all stocks is capable of at least a partial solution. The receipts of Bullion from productive mines were not falling off; on the contrary, they have steadily increased since January last, but a sudden and unlooked-for withdrawal of funds on the part of Bankers and those who held these stocks as collateral security, precipitated them on the market, and prices were forced to give way. In addition to this the proposed tax of 5 per cent. by the Government on the entire proceeds of mines and mining claims awakened still further apprehension, and holders of mining stocks who were not pressed for money felt inclined to sell them at current rates, hoping to avail themselves of the probable decline, and to re-purchase at lower prices. The bear influence has also been effectually at work, and short sellers have operated freely, many of whom turned their transactions to profitable account. Speculative shares, of less positive intrinsic value than those alluded to above, strongly sympathized with the downward movement, and with scarce an exception declined to lower figures than have been reached for six months past

During the past ten days a turning point seems to have been found, and nearly all leading stocks, together with some fancy shares, are in more active request at enhanced rates. Unproductive claims are, however, viewed with much less favor than formerly, and it is difficult now to inspire the faith and belief once felt in their prospective value without substantial evidence of merit. Burdensome assessments have been willingly paid for a long time under the hope that in the end gratifying results would surely follow. But in most instances thus far this has proven a delusion, and without new and startling developments in some of these mines their market value is not likely to improve.

During the week five feet of Gould and Curry have been sold at from $3,900 to $4,000. This is an advance of $250 per foot since the 1st instant. Ophir rose to $1,215 and then declined to $1,100. Early the current month this stock was freely offered at $1,000. Savage fell to $1,800 some time since, but is now in demand at about $1,900. Uncle Sam has grown into favor again, and very large sales are reported this week at from $700 to $725. This company, it is said, is quietly perfecting its title without regard to vexatious and protracted litigation, and a number of adverse interests have been compromised recently. The Belcher mine has again resumed the shipment of Bullion, and the stock has advanced this week from $825 to $1,000 per foot. Potosi shares are still inactive, but are not pressed for sale. This mine is reported to be yielding a large quantity of pay ore. Challar has been active this week—declining from $660 to $630, and about sixty feet were sold. This company are vigorously at work hoisting and reducing some fifty tons of ore daily. Quite a revival has taken place in North American stock, owing to a final consummation of the proposed compromise with the Uncle Sam Company. A meeting is to be held to-day to ratify this arrangement.

A BELLIGERENT correspondence has been passing between a couple of editors in Virginia City. It is none of our business, but we should regret if any hostile meeting occurred. Why should one editor desire to give another out for even a single "insertion," in the cold ground, as "leaded matter?" Bullets are not arguments, and blood never washed a stain out from any character. Duels at best are but the fooling and foolish relics of the exploded custom of a barbarous age, and the sooner the duel is permitted to lapse into desuetude, the better.

DRAMATIC MENTION.

We have little space this week for dramatic mention, and can only briefly indicate what is going on at the different houses.

The events in the theatrical world of late have been the opening of Magnire's new theatre, and of Wilson's Hippotheatron. The new theatre has verified the old saying about a new broom, and the Hippotheatron has been well filled nightly—people going to this latter place for the sake of the fresh air with which the tent favors them.

On Monday Maguire's Opera House is re-opened with the Enchantress, Miss Caroline Richings making her first appearance as "Stella;" her father, Peter Richings, playing "Ramir." They are supported by the dramatic company; and Acosta and Wiethoff, with an entire corps de ballet, are engaged to lighten up the legitimate drama. An extra force of musicians is also advertised to be in attendance.

Wilson's Hippotheatron offers its quadrupedal and epicene attractions nightly, and this afternoon there is a performance for the benefit of families. The parent that does not take his children to see the hippotheatron occasionally could be convicted of a wilful neglect of family duties before any intelligent jury. The young idea could learn how to spell polysyllables there, if nothing more.

The Metropolitan has not been doing as good a business of late as the character of the company warrants, and we hope to see an improvement the coming week. This afternoon, the Knight of Arva is played, Harry Courtaine and Mrs. Emily Jordan taking the principal parts; the performance to conclude with the Happy Man.

To-night, something is offered which should draw out a full house. The famous sack of flour, which has been the rounds of Austin, Gold Hill, Virginia, Sacramento and other interior cities, coining money for the Sanitary Fund in each, is to be sold at auction. The selling is to be preceded by Love and Champagne—Allen taking the part of Dick Dashall. At the conclusion of the two-act play, Mr. Courtaine will recite Drake's Address to the American Flag, and then commences the auction. Here is an opportunity for people to show their patriotism, as a large portion of the receipts of the house, and the proceeds of the flour go to the Sanitary Fund for the relief of the brave boys who are fighting for us.

A LETTER in a late Richmond paper says that Stuart, in a recent raid, captured a Federal supply train containing, among other things, an immense quantity of delicacies in cans. This reminds us of a story told of one of the native East Indian generals during the Sepoy war—a story, however, altogether too good to be true. It was said that his followers took from the English a lot of hermetically sealed provisions in tin cans, and not having seen anything of the kind before, he mistook them for canister-shot, and fired nothing from his guns for three days but fresh lobsters, pickled salmon and other delicacies, supplying the British camp, which he was trying to starve into surrender, with an incessant shower of the freshest English provisions. When they reached their mark, however, they were scarcely in proper condition for consumption. Beauregard will have to bombard Butler with such things a long while before he brings him to terms, for the latter is fond of lobster.

AN ABBREVIATION not to be found in the books is to be found, if a Scottish exchange may be relied in, on a tombstone in Dunkirk. The mourners intended to put an old aunt to sleep with the customary phrase "let her rest in peace," but the space on the stone gave out at the close of the word "her." The ready witted sculptor, however, inserted the initials of the rest of the sentence, and now the dear old lady sleeps beneath the laconic, but slightly inelegant epitaph, "Let her r. i. p."

A WRITER on "Improvements in the Art of War" thinks that the perfection to which fire-arms are so rapidly attaining will contribute materially to the peace of the world. It is undoubtedly true that as the chances of men being killed in battle become multiplied, fewer people will be anxious to take them. And then the makers of rifles and fieldpieces may be called piece-makers in a double sense, and the blessing pronounced upon peacemakers will be doubly theirs.

THE Alta quotes,

> Dust thou art, to dust returned,
> Was not written of the soul.

giving credit for the lines to a "Mr Mackay." We had been under the impression that the couplet occurred in a little poem called "The Psalm of Life," lately written by one Mr. Longfellow—a poet of some reputation, and rapidly growing into favor—but we may be wrong. There are but few copies of the poem before the public as yet, and memory is apt to be treacherous.

THE CHRISTIAN COMMISSION.

Some think our appeal
Is sectarian zeal,
When we give of our creed a rehearsal,
For we leave in the cold
All the LIBERAL fold,
And the CATHOLIC and UNIVERSAL.

THE Alta on Wednesday morning informed us that Grant had succeeded in "cutting off a portion of Lee's rear." So we may conclude that at least some share of the "seat of war" is in our possession. Will Grant remove it from Virginia?

NEW BOOKS RECEIVED.—A. Roman & Co. send us the following new books. They come too late for notice in this number, but will receive attention next week:

Mainstone's Housekeeping, by Eliza Metcyard ("Silverpen.") Third edition. Loring.

The Life and Adventures, Songs, Services and Speeches of Private Miles O'Reilly, (47th Regiment New York Volunteers) with Comic Illustrations by Mullen. Carleton.

A Woman's Ransom, by Frederick William Robinson, author of Grandmother's Money, Under the Spell, Wildflower, Slaves of the Ring, The House of Elmore, etc. Burnham.

Red Tape and Pigeon-hole Generals, as seen from the ranks during a Campaign in the Army of the Potomac, by a Citizen-Soldier. Carleton

My Cave Life in Vicksburg, with Letters of Trial and Travel, by a Lady. Appleton.

The Laws and Principles of Whist stated and explained, and its Principles illustrated. By Cavendish. Appleton.

Annis Warleigh's Fortunes. A Novel by Holme Lee. The Harpers

AN ASTRAL CRITICISM.

Under the heading "Spanish Made Easy," the Round Table thus criticises La Gaviota, a Spanish novel translated by J. Leander Starr and published in New York:

Mr. J. Leander Starr professes to be an accomplished linguist. In that capacity he conducts, or did conduct, a species of polyglot magazine, devoted to the diffusion of tongues. It is supposed that he is familiar with the French, the German, the Italian, the Spanish, the Turkish, the Armenian, the Egyptian, the African, the Chinese, the Hindoo, the Japanese, the Hawaiin, the Kamschatkan, the original Aboriginal, the Schleswig-Holstein, and other dialects, including, perhaps, that spoken in the Confederate States of America. Of course, with such a repertoire, he can hardly be ignorant of the dead—and dying—languages likewise. The only speech, in fact, with which Mr. Starr seems to be unfamiliar is the English; unless, indeed, his familiarity has bred the proverbial contempt.

These brief remarks are suggested to us by a neat volume lately published by John Bradburn, and entitled La Gaviota. The title page unblushingly declares that the work is a translation from the Spanish, by the gentleman to whom, as a linguist, we have already paid our attentions. The contents of the book give its title page the lie direct, in the most heartless and uncourteous manner. It is not a translation. In the first place, the story itself, if it may be called a story, is totally unworthy of translation. Like all other Spanish works of light literature, it is diffuse, verbose, digressive, and generally uninteresting. Spanish serenades are not infrequently sweet and passionate, but Spanish novels are unmitigated bores. An extended analysis of the plot of La Gaviota would be simply a tax upon the patience of the reader, more difficult to endure than the present taxation imposed by our Governmental friends. There are, however, one or two cleverly drawn characters, and many curiously characteristic anecdotes and proverbs from Old Spain. The authoress—whose nom-de-plume is Fernan Cabellero—is, we are informed in Mr. Starr's preface, the widow of two husbands, and her maiden name was Cecelia de Faber—a cognomen almost as polyglot as her translator's magazine.

"We have it on the authority of the Edinburgh Review," says the preface, "that the novels of this gifted authoress were 'published at the expense of the Queen.' * * * La Gaviota is perhaps the finest story in the volumes." A little farther on he confesses that it is somewhat prolix. The reader will not deny it, though Mr. Starr flatters himself that "in translating, it is easy to avoid this prolixity," and adds, "This has been attended to in the present translation." We beg leave to differ. Whole pages are filled with the most unimportant and trifling details, as if one should say of his hero, "He then sat down upon a chair, drawn up to a table, to eat with a fork, carried by his hand from a plate of food to his mouth, in order to satisfy the hunger that he felt in his stomach." This is quite in the style of Mr. Starr's translation, except that it is a little purer English.

To show that the above criticism is not hypercritical, we submit the following brief excerpt: "They made up for him a bed with fresh straw, and a good large mattress filled with wool. Grandma Maria took out of a large chest a pair of sheets, if not very fine, at least very white. She then added a warm woolen counterpane." In a wedding scene, when the hero—a German adventurer—is married, all the stanzas sung by the company are given. Let these serve as a specimen either of Spanish improvisation or of Mr. J. Leander Starr's talent for the translation of rhyme:

"She to the church, and sacrifices bold
Herself surrenders, and I am consoled;
My lips with kisses delicately hushed,
Press the green grass which her small feet have pressed."

And another:

"Thou the calabash hast given me;
Or rather, I my conge see;
Great good this conge does meeting,
The tomatoes I have eaten!
In thy family, at which I dine,
Admitted once, revenged am I?"

Is it the Spaniards who are afflicted with idiocy, or is it Mr. J. Leander Starr?

And not alone is the supposed poetry of the work incomprehensible. What shall we make of this:

He would much more agreeably consort with those who seek the good, with the same satisfaction and purity that the artless young damsel feels in gathering violets. His physiognomy, his grace, the freedom with which he muffled himself in his Spanish cloak, his insensibility to cold and to the general disquietude around him, established decidedly that he was Spanish.

The "general disquietude" refers to sea-sickness, whence we infer that the natives of sunny Spain are born with sea-legs. The name of the gentleman is catalogued as "Don Carlos, Duke of Almansa (or Almanza), Marquis de Guadalmonte, de Val-de-Flores, and de Loca Fiel; Comte de Santa Clara, de Encinasala, et de Laza; Chevalier of the Golden Fleece, and Grand Cross of Charles III.; Gentleman of the Chamber of his Majesty; Grandee of Spain, of First Class, etc., etc., etc." It would surely require much erudition on the part of Don Carlos to enable him to "read his title clear," and, if he carried all these multitudinous appellations in his memory, it is not strange that he had no time for the sea-sickness which disturbed his common fellow-travellers. Let us give the authoress credit for one observation, which, though sweeping, is not without a certain foundation of veracity. It is on page 191, and reads: "Every Spanish book bears the seal of a coarse stupidity."

"La Gaviota" is a nickname bestowed upon the heroine by a mischievous boy. It signifies in English a sea-gull. This heroine is a sort of Becky Sharp, who marries a German doctor, goes upon the stage at the instigation of the titled gentleman beforementioned, and becomes unfaithful to her husband through the blandishments of a young person connected with the bull-fighting interest. This person, notwithstanding his magnificent appearance and ability to quote Latin, is not refined, and naturally bullies "La Gaviota." The German doctor goes to America and dies. The bull-fighter is killed in the arena; and as for the heroine, "she very imprudently marries a barber" who paid court to her in the beginning of the book.

It is not impossible that this novel, if it had been decently rendered into our language, might have attained some notoriety among the lovers of high-seasoned literature of the sensation school: but as it is, we predict for it the obscurity it deserves. Among other fantastic tricks which Mr. Starr has seen fit to play with the unhappy translation, is the insertion of a dedication "to the Hon. George Opdyke, ex-Mayor of the city of New York." The reasons set forth for inscribing that highly respectable name to "this translation of the best novel in the Spanish language," are somewhat obscure. It is not that Mr. Opdyke has ever visited Spain; it is not that he is acquainted with the sweet dialect of Old Castile; it is not that he is in any way connected with literature, native or foreign; but because of his "urbanity of character," and his "firm integrity as a gentleman, a merchant;" because his "career has been marked by the most devoted patriotism;" and because Mr. J. Leander Starr hopes that at some future distant day Mr. Opdyke may receive that tribute "which honored the memory of the immortal Pitt:

'Non sibi, sed pro patria vixit."

For these reasons is the ex-Mayor chosen by this Leander for his hero. He should only have added that the offering was appropriate, inasmuch as Mr. Opdyke had undoubtedly washed his hands with Castile soap, and if ill with an acute disease might probably apply a blister plaster of Spanish flies, or cool his thirst with the juice of a Seville orange; these would assuredly be equally cogent reasons why Mr. Starr should dedicate to him the worst translation in the English language.

TRIPPING UP TUPPER.

Martin Farquhar Tupper has so few friends in this country, or indeed in his own, that few will lament when the Saturday Review—the very Guy Livingstone of journals—lays its iron hand on him after the following fashion: It is apropos of his last volume of verse—we always have to take him for better or for verse—and the following extract from one of his poems is manipulated:

From the vext bowels of my soul
Lava currents roar and roll,
Bursting out in torrent wide
Through my crater's ragged side,
Rushing on from field to field,
Till all with boiling stone is sealed,
And my hot thoughts, in language pent,
Stand their own granite monument.

Tho above terrible lines were the first that presented themselves to our view when we opened Mr. Tupper's new volume at random to see what sort of spiritual refreshment he had provided for his admirers. Without stopping to inquire why he does not make some attempt to control his hot thoughts, if they really have the blighting properties attributed to them, or whether it is not a little hard that a world that has purchased one hundred and nine editions of the Proverbial Philosophy should have its fields laid waste in order that he should erect a monument to himself, we accept the outburst as a declaration of his present condition, and a statement of his views respectiug the mission of a popular poet. We have no objection whatever to consider Mr. Tupper in the light of a volcano. Indeed, it is from some such point of view that we are constrained to regard him. He can never be anything more to us than a curious instance of nature's willfulness, which we may be able partially to explain, but must always wonder at, and which is produced by forces and governed by laws altogether beyond our control even in the slightest degree. In the case of any other poet we might not unreasonably hope to reach one here and there among his readers, and possibly even to influence them to some small extent. But it would be just as reasonable to expect a review of Mount Vesuvius to protect the vineyard on the monntain side from an eruption as to dream of any remark of ours on Mr. Tupper gaining access to the Tupperian world. It is not, therefore, exactly as a book or a contribution to literature that one of his productions is to be noticed, but rather as a phenomenon with which we have nothing to do, but which may be sufficiently interesting, from a scientific point of view, to make it worth our while to announce its appearance and describe its general aspect, just as Our Own Correspondent at Naples would do in the case of a new crater breaking out.

After a little more criticism, in which it ironically thanks Mr. Tupper for not doing the dreadful things that he might, it continues:

The trick is, however, an old one of his, if we remember rightly. Even before him the ingenious Mr. Richardson employed something of the same sort, and it still obtains with caravans, wax-work shows, and exhibitions of that nature. It consists, in fact, of making large and loud declarations outside the booth about what is to be seen inside, and leaving all the rest to human simplicity. Outside the giant is represented of magnificent proportions, and with guardsmen in full uniform in vain attempting to shake hands with him; and the mermaid is a charming young person with golden locks and a silvery green tail. The real giant inside proves to be a long, rickety gentleman in a dressing gown, and the "mermaid" a combination of a stuffed monkey and a Finnan-haddock. Thus it is with Mr. Tupper's performances. He describes the poet's mission and the poet's might in language that would almost terrify us did we not recognize the well-known voice and perceive the familiar features peeping out through the disguise. But when he comes to exercise that mission himself, and to put ont his might, all he does is to twaddle tamely about selfishness, cheerfulness, duty, self-reliance, and the like; the same, to use the words of our friend Mrs. Gamp, not being expected from the outside picter, where he is painted quite contrairy in a livin state, and many sizes larger, and performing beautiful upon the arp.

Arraigning a Judge.—A young boy of sixteen years of age was brought before the Police Court, Paris, charged with stealing and begging in the public streets. He was a bright, fine-looking boy, but very poorly clad, and when brought before the Judge, he fell upon his knees and begged him not to put him in prison; that his mother was sick and starving, and that alone had driven him to steal; that he could not find work, and if he was imprisoned the disgrace would kill his poor mother. The judge seemed somewhat moved by the boy's story, but he nevertheless, after hearing the evidence, condemned him to six weeks' imprisonment. As the boy was being led away, a poor woman, pale, covered with rags, and her hair in disorder, forced her way through the crowd, and tottering up to the boy, passed one arm around him, and then turning to the judge, pushed back her long black hair and exclaimed: "Do you not recognize me? Thirteen years have passed since you deserted me, leaving me alone with my child and my shame; but I have not forgotten you, and this boy whom you have just condemned is your son?" You may imagine the effect this announcement produced on the bystanders. The judge, in a loud voice, ordered the woman to be carried from the court, and then left it himself; but he joined the poor creature in the street, and carried her and her boy off in a carriage.

A NEW YORK FIRE AS SEEN BY A "LUNNUNER."

In an old number of All the Year Round we find the following spirited description of a fire in New York. With very slight changes, it would do for the picture of a fire in our own Bay City—especially after we get the fire telegraph a-clicking:

A gleam of red, just a blush in the sky, eastward—William street way—among the warehouses; and presently the telegraph begins to work. For every fire station has its telegraph, and every street has its line of wires, like metallic washing lines. Jig-jig, tat-tat, goes the indicator: "Fire in William street, No. 3, Messrs. Hardcastle & Co."

Presently the enormous bell, slung for the purpose in a wooden shed in the City Park, just at the end of Broadway, begins to swing and roll backward.

In dash the volunteers in their red shirts and helmets—from oyster cellars and half-finished clam soup, from newly begun games of billiards, from the theatre, from Boucicault, from Booth, from the mad drollery of the Christy Minstrels, from stiff quadrille partics, from gin-slings, from bar-rooms, from sulphurous pistol galleries, from studios, from dissecting rooms, from half-shuttered shops, from conversazioni and lectures—from everywhere—north, south, east and west—breathless, hot, eager, daring, shonting, mad.

Open fly the folding-doors, out glides the new engine—the special pride of the company—the engine whose excellence many lives have been lost to maintain; "a regular high-bred little stepper" as ever smith's hammer forged. It shines like a new set of cutlery, and is as light as a "spider wagon" or a trotting gig. It is not the great Juggernaut car of our Sun and Phœnix offices—the enormous house on wheels, made as if purposely cumbrous and eternal—but is a mere light musical snuff-box of steel rods and brass supports, with axes and coils of leather, brass-socketed tubing fastened beneath, and all ready for instant and alert use.

Now the supernumeraries—the haulers and draggers, who lend a hand at the ropes—pour in from the neighboring dram shops or low dancing-rooms, where they remain waiting to earn some dimes by such casualties. A shout—a tiger!

"Hei! hei!! hei!!! hei!!!!" (crescendo), and out at lightning speed dashes the engine, in the direction of the red gleam, now widening and sending up the fan-like radiance of a volcano.

Perhaps it is a steam fire-engine. These are entire successes, and will soon be universal among a people quick to grasp onward at all that is new, if it be but better than the old. Then the fires are lighted, and breathing out ardent smoke, and spitting out trails of fiery cinders, off it dashes.

Now, a roar and crackle, as the quick-tongued flames leap out red and eager, or lick the black blistered beams—now, hot belches of smoke from shivering windows—now, snaps and smashes of red-hot beams, as the floors fall in—now, down burning stairs, like frightened martyrs running from the stake, rush poor women and children in white trailing night-gowns—now the mob, like a great exultant many-headed monster, shouts with delight and sympathy—now, race up the fire engines, the men defying each other in rivalry, as they plant the ladders and fire-escapes. The fire-trumpets roar out stentorian orders—the red shirts fall into line—rock, rock go the steel bars that force up the water—up leap the men with the hooks and axes—crash, crash, lop, chop go the axes at the partitions, where the fire smoulders. Now spirt up in fluid arches the blue-white jets of water, that hiss and splash and blacken ont the spasms of fire; and as every new engine dashes up, the thousands of upturned faces turn to some new shade of reflected crimson, and the half-broken beams give way at the thunder of their cheers.

The fire lowers, and is all but subdued, though still every now and then a floor gives way with an earthquake crash, and into the still lurid dark air rises a storm of sparks like a hurricane of fire-flies. But suddenly there is a crowding together and whispering of helmeted heads. Brave Seth Johnson is missing; all the hook-men and ax-men are back but he; all the pumpers are there, and all the loafers are there. He alone is missing.

"Caleb Fisher saw him last," shouts the Captain to the eager red faces; "he was then breaking a third floor back window with his ax. He thinks he is under the last wall that fell." Is there a lad there who will not risk his life for Seth? No! or he would be no American, I dare swear.

Hei! hei!! hei!!! hei!!!!

Up they tear through choking smoke, sparks and still dangerous fire, over bridges of half-burnt beams, half-brittle charcoal. They reach the tomb of smoking bricks, they dig as if the life of each were depending on it—hooks, axes, bleeding hands, everything but teeth.

Hei! hei!! hei!!! hei!!!!

Click-shock go the shovels, chick-chick the pick-axes. A shout, a scream of "Seth!"

He is there, pale and silent, with heaving chest; his breast-bone smashed in, a cold dew oozing from his forehead. Now they bear him to the roaring multitude, their eyes aching and watering with the suffocating gusts of smoke. They lay him pale, in his red shirt, amid the hushed, voiceless men in the bruised and scorched helmets. The grave doctor breaks through the crowd. He stoops and feels Seth's pulse. All eyes turn to him. He shakes his head, and makes no other answer. Then the young men take off their helmets and bear home Seth, and some weep because of his betrothed, and the young men think of her.

A Remarkable Incident.—The following is related in a letter from a gentleman at Toulouse, dated April 20, 1768, to his friend at Galway, Ireland:—"The most remarkable occurrence here is the extraordinary case of a criminal under sentence of death, and who was to have been broken on the wheel the second current. The day before he was to have been executed he fell into a profound sleep, and has lived since then without any nourishment whatever. Several means have been used to awake him, even blisters, but to no purpose; he breathes easy and freely, and his limbs, especially from the middle upwards, are perfectly pliable. About four days ago he woke, and continued so for an hour, or somewhat better; he walked a few steps, and the physician ordered him some slight nourishment; but before it could be got ready he relapsed, and continues in the same state of insensibility. The physicians call it a cataleptic ailment, incurred through fear and horror of the execution he was to undergo, which, however, is only deferred till he recovers the sense of feeling."

You may as well become a conductor of other men's lightning, if you can give out no sparks of your own.

REDINGTON & CO.'S ESSENCE OF Jamaica Ginger!

This valuable compound, which is now regarded as one of the most popular remedies in the domestic practice for various complaints of the digestive organs, such as Dyspepsia, Nausea, etc., is prepared solely from the WHITE JAMAICA GINGER, which is the best of all the varieties in use. In the preparation of

REDINGTON & CO.'S

ESSENCE OF JAMAICA GINGER,

Great care is taken to have none but select Root, and to manufacture it in air-tight vessels, thus preventing the evaporation of its delicate essential oil, and preserving the true aroma of the Ginger. It thereby contains in its concentrated form all the valuable properties of the Jamaica Ginger, and is guaranteed to be free from any impurities whatever.

It is a grateful stimulant and carminative, giving warmth and tone to the stomach equal to Brandy, without any of its injurious effects.

It will cure Nausea, caused by riding in railroad cars, or from sea-sickness, or other causes.

Miners and others who are exposed to the heat of the Sun often whilst working in cold water, should never be without

REDINGTON & CO.'s

ESSENCE OF JAMAICA GINGER,

As by taking it as a tonic two or three times a day, it is almost a sure preventive to Chills and Fever; and to those who are farming the rich bottom lands of California it is likewise invaluable as a tonic, and should invariably be taken in the early morning before going to the fields, at the mid-day lunch, and before leaving off work at night.

Ask for REDINGTON & CO.'S ESSENCE OF JAMAICA GINGER, and take no other, if you would always have a Pure and Reliable article.

An excellent external application for Gout, Rheumatism, Neuralgia, &c.

REDINGTON & CO., Proprietors,
416 and 418 Front street,
my28 San Francisco.

RAREY'S CONDITION POWDERS.

THE MOST POWERFUL AND BENEFICIAL AGENT known on the Stomach, Blood, Lungs and Bowels of HORSES, MULES, CATTLE, AND STOCK of all descriptions.

GREAT BENEFIT TO HARD-WORKING HORSES.

All diseased Stock SPEEDILY and CERTAINLY CURED; healthy Stock will be brought into the very HIGHEST STATE of PERFECTION by giving them a SPOONFULL, weekly.

NO LIVERY STABLE SHOULD BE WITHOUT

RAREY'S
CELEBRATED CONDITION POWDERS!

All FARMERS and RANCHMEN should use constantly

RAREY'S
CELEBRATED CONDITION POWDERS!

TEAMSTERS and STAGE COMPANIES everywhere should keep constantly on hand and freely use

RAREY'S
CELEBRATED CONDITION POWDERS!

They are equal to a Life Insurance on all Stock, as will be fully appreciated on trial by all True Economists.

REDINGTON & CO., Sole Agents,
my28 416 and 418 Front Street, San Francisco.

STOP THAT COUGHING.

Some of you can't and we pity you. You have tried every remedy but the ONE destined by its intrinsic merit to supercede all similar preparations. It is not surprising you should be reluctant to try something else after the many experiments you have made of the trashy compounds foisted on the public as a certain cure; but

NEWELL'S PULMONARY SYRUP.

It is really the best remedy ever compounded, for the cure of coughs, colds, sore throat, asthma, whooping cough, bronchitis, and consumption. Thousands of people in California have been already benefitted by the surprising curative powers of

NEWELL'S PULMONARY SYRUP,

And with one accord give it their unqualified approbation. We now address ourselves to all who are unacquainted with this, the greatest panacea of the age, for the healing of all diseases of the throat and lungs, assuring you that

NEWELL'S PULMONARY SYRUP

Has cured thousands, and it will cure you if you try it.

This invaluable medicine is pleasant to the taste; soothing, healing and strengthening in its effects; entirely free from all poisonous or deleterious drugs, and perfectly harmless under all circumstances. Among others it is indorsed by the following gentlemen, all of them well-known in San Francisco as respectable citizens: E. S. WOOLEY, grocer, 358 Stockton street; H. P. HUBBARD, merchant, Sansome street near Clay; Capt. DAVID VAN PELT; JAMES PRATT, at Harrison & Co., printers, Clay street, and hundreds of other residents in San Francisco.

REDINGTON & CO., Sole Agents, 416 and 418 Front street, San Francisco, and for sale by all Druggists. my28

MASON & HAMLIN'S Cabinet Organs,

FOR FAMILIES, CHURCHES, SUNDAY AND DAY SCHOOLS, LODGES, ETC.

ADAPTED TO SACRED AND SECULAR, CHURCH AND PARLOR MUSIC.

ONE TO TWELVE STOPS—$85 to $500 EACH.

These instruments, introduced about a year since, are a very great improvement upon all instruments of the melodeon or harmonium kind. Supplying a long-felt want, they have been received with the greatest favor by the musical profession and the public, have already been widely introduced, and the demand for them is still rapidly increasing, and must continue to increase as their merits become known. They are to private houses, smaller churches, Sunday schools, etc., what the large pipe organs are to the large churches, and, in addition to this, are admirably adapted to the performance of secular as well as sacred music.

Their most prominent points of superiority are: Pure, Rich Quality of Tone, Surprising Volume or Power, Quickness of Action, giving Rapidity of Utterance, and Capacity for Expression entirely superior to anything before accomplished in this class of instruments.

A large portion of the most eminent musicians in the country (more than two hundred) have given their written testimony to the great superiority of these instruments to melodeons, harmoniums, and and all others of this class. Among those who have given their opinion of their merits are such well-known musicians as Lowell, Mason, Thomas Hastings, Wm. B. Bradbury, Geo. F. Root, etc.,: the most eminent organists, such as Cutler of Trinity Church, N. Y.; Zundel, of Rev. Henry Ward Beecher's Church; such celebrated pianists as Gottschalk, William Mason Mills, Sanderson, Strakosch, etc.

Illustrated Catalogues, with full particulars, free to any address,

A. KOHLER, Music Dealer, 422 Sansome St.

WHAT IS A CABINET ORGAN?

A NEW REED INSTRUMENT,

Made by

MASON & HAMLIN,

The famous Melodeon Manufacturers.

ASK

GOTTSCHALK,

MASON,

STRAKOSCH.

Or any other eminent Musician.

They know what it is, having publicly acknowledged it to be the best instrument of the kind in the World.

Send for an Illustrated Catalogue,

To

A. KOHLER,
Music Dealer,
my28 San Francisco.

WHEELER & WILSONS Family Sewing Machines.

OFFICE:

CORNER MONTGOMERY AND SACRAMENTO STREETS.

J. H. HAYDEN, Agent.

A full assortment of the best quality of MACHINE SILK and THREAD, for the TRADE, constantly on hand. my28

FORTY-FOUR FIRST PREMIUMS IN 1863!

THERE IS BUT ONE
FIRST
PREMIUM SEWING MACHINE.

The GROVER & BAKER SEWING MACHINE has been awarded Twenty-three First Premiums at State Fairs, and Twenty-one at City and County Fairs, in 1863, making Forty-four in all.

R. G. BROWN, Agent.
my28 329 Montgomery Street.

A. ROMAN & CO., BOOKSELLERS,

PUBLISHERS, IMPORTERS, Nos. 417 and 418 Montgomery street, desire to invite the special attention of the BOOK TRADE on the Pacific Coast to their superb and complete assortment of STANDARD AND MISCELLANEOUS BOOKS, embracing works in every department of Literature; also Medical, Military, Scientific, Theological and School Books of every description. Constantly in receipt of all the late publications by every steamer. Special inducements offered to LIBRARIES. All orders will be promptly filled, and upon the most reasonable terms—wholesale and retail.

A. ROMAN & CO.,
my28 San Francisco.

"KUSTEL'S PROCESSES OF SILVER AND GOLD EXTRACTION."

—The January number of the "American Journal of Science and Arts," conducted by Professors Silliman and Dana—probably the best Scientific authority in our country—says of this valuable work: "The book is written and arranged with care by one who evidently understands his subject; and from our examination of it, we should think it to be well adapted for the purpose for which it has been prepared."

Price—post paid—Cloth, $6; Sheep, $7.

A. ROMAN & Co.,
Booksellers, Importers and Publishers,
417 and 419 Montgomery street,
my28 San Francisco.

LAWRENCE & HOUSEWORTH, OPTICIANS,

IMPORTERS OF OPTICAL, MATHEMATICAL AND PHILOSOPHICAL INSTRUMENTS,

STEREOSCOPIC GOODS,

PHOTOGRAPHIC ALBUMS,

CARTES DE VISITE,

AND

JOSEPH RODGERS & SON'S

SUPERIOR CUTLERY,

No. 637 CLAY STREET,

SAN FRANCISCO,

(ESTABLISHED IN 1851,)

HAVE FOR SALE THE LARGEST STOCK ON THE PACIFIC COAST, consisting in part as follows:

720 dozen SPECTACLES, in Gold, Silver, Steel and Plated Frames.
305 dozen EYE GLASSES, in Gold, Silver, Steel, Horn, Shell and Rubber Frames.
150 dozen WIRE GAUZE GOGGLES.
300 dozen SPECTACLE GLASSES and BRAZILIAN PEBBLES.
350 dozen SPECTACLE and EYE GLASS CASES.

395	Opera and Marine Glasses.	20,500	Card Photographs,
75	Telescope and Spy Glasses,		Photographic Albums,
178	dozen Magnifying Glasses,	600	Album Pictures—in oil colors,
80	doz. Pocket Compasses,	50	doz. Union Card Frames,
325	Hand Stereoscopes,		Joseph Rodgers & Son's CUTLERY,
74	Revolving Stereoscopes	100	doz. Table Knives,
1025	doz. Stereoscopic Views	260	doz. Pocket Knives,
	Drawing Instruments in German Silver and Brass,	120	doz. Razors,
		50	doz. Razor Strops,
	Boxwood and Ivory Scales,	130	doz. Scissors,
	Microscopes in every Style,		SCISSORS, in Cases,
125	Magnetic Machines for Medical purposes,	100	doz. Gyroscope Tops,
		169	doz. Thermometers,
	Aneroid Barometers,	25	doz. Hydrometers,
			Galvanic Batteries.

☞COUNTRY TRADERS will consult their own interest by examining our Stock and Prices before purchasing elsewhere.

 ORDERS FROM THE COUNTRY promptly executed.

☞CATALOGUES sent to any address FREE.

Address

LAWRENCE & HOUSEWORTH,
OPTICIANS,
637 CLAY STREET,
my28 SAN FRANCISCO.

PACIFIC INSURANCE COMPANY.

436 CALIFORNIA STREET,

SAN FRANCISCO.

Insure against loss or damage by fire, on Buildings, Merchandise, Wares, and other Personal Property.

CAPITAL STOCK - - - - - - - - - $750,000

The largest sum at present to be taken on any one risk is $30,000. All Losses payable in United States Gold Coin.

The Personal Liability of Stockholders, under the Law of this State, recognized.

The following List of Directors is a sufficient guarantee of the stability and responsibility of the Company:

Louis McLean,	Lloyd Tevis,
W. C. Ralston,	H. F. Teschemacher,
Frederick Billings,	Geo. H Howard,
H. Carlton, Jr.,	A.B. Forbes,
Wm. M. Lent,	A. L. Tubbs,
J. G. Kittle,	Jonathan Hunt,
J. B. Thomas,	J. B. Newton,
J. G. Bray,	John O. Earl,
Asa T. Lawton,	S. J. Hensley,
J. Whitney, Jr.,	John Wightman,
Edward Martin,	L. Sachs,
L. B. Benchly,	Jas. DeFremery,
A. Seligman,	J. G. Kellogg,
Wm. Sherman,	G. W. Beaver,
Wm. Alvord,	Elie Lazard,
Charles Mayne,	William Sharon,
Erwin Davis,	Adam Grant,
P. L. Wenver,	Alpheus Bull,
Samuel C. Bigelow,	A. G. Stiles,
Herman Michels,	M. P. Jones,
H. L. Dodge,	D. Stern,
H. L. Goldstein,	S. M. Wilson,
H. Haussmann,	D. J. Oliver,
Morton Cheesman,	Jabez Howes,
H. M. Nowhall,	F. W. Brooks,
W. Norris,	I. Lohman, Sacramento.
Edgar Mills, Sacramento.	T. R Anthony, Stockton.
C. T. Wheeler, Sacramento.	D. W. C. Rice, Marysville.
J. H Jewett, Marysville.	W. S. Ladd, Portland (O.)
J. C. Ainsworth, Portland (O.)

J. HUNT, President.
A. J. RALSTON, Secretary. my28

BOYS! BOYS! BOYS!

NOW IS THE TIME!

H. M. LOCKWOOD & CO.,

New No. 624) CLAY STREET, (Old No. 176

Have received a Large Stock of

GENTS' AND BOYS' CLOTHING

—AND—

FURNISHING GOODS,

Which they are selling

AT VERY LOW PRICES.

Every Garment warranted. All are invited to call and examine our goods.

H. M. LOCKWOOD & CO.,
my28 624 Clay street, San Francisco.

GREAT TRIUMPH!!

STEINWAY & SONS

Were awarded the FIRST PRIZE MEDAL at the late great INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITION AT LONDON, over the two hundred and sixty-nine Pianos entered for competition from all parts of the world.

The Special Correspondent of the New York Times says: "Messrs. Steinway & Sons' indorsement by the Jurors is emphatic, and stronger and more to the point than that of any European maker."

A constant supply of the above superior instruments can be found at the Agent's,

M. GRAY, 613 Clay street.

PIANO TUNING done by a first-class Workman, from Steinway & Son's Factory, New York. my28

CARPETS, OIL CLOTHS,

UPHOLSTERY GOODS,

PAPER HANGINGS.

THE LARGEST

—AND—

BEST ASSORTED STOCK IN THE STATE,

And everything to be found in a well-conducted

Carpet Warehouse,

For Sale at the Lowest Rates.

WM. M. HIXON'S

CARPET WAREHOUSE,

NOS. 606 AND 608 CLAY STREET.

One Door above Montgomery street. my28

FEET! FEET! FEET!

Listen all ye that deal in feet and are barefooted:

GOOD TIMES COME AT LAST!

No Assessments to Pay, but Dividends Secured at Once!

FOR SIXTY DAYS

We will dispose of our IMMENSE STOCK

AT UNPRECEDENTED LOW PRICES.

We have in store and arriving, upwards of

$150,000 WORTH

OF

BOOTS, SHOES AND GAITERS,

Which we are determined to give the public, and all our customers, for cash,

25 PER CENT. BELOW NEW YORK COST.

5,000 PAIRS LADIES' BUTTON, LACE AND CONGRESS GAITERS,

Suitable for House Shoes, Regardless of any Cost,

ON ACCOUNT OF HIGH PREMIUM ON GOLD.

We solicit a call to convince, then send along your friends, to the largest RETAIL SHOE STORE in the State.

HOLCOMBE BROTHERS,

PIONEER SHOE STORE,

Corner Washington and Kearny streets.

my28

REMOVAL.

J. K. PRIOR,

Importer and Dealer in

GAS FIXTURES AND PLUMBING MATERIALS,

Has removed to 730 MONTGOMERY STREET, near Jackson, opposite Metropolitan Theatre. Just received, an extensive assortment of plain and ornamental Gas Fixtures, of entire new patterns. Being constantly in receipt of new goods by every steamer, the attention of the public is invited.

FOR SALE:

IRON PIPE, | LEAD PIPE,
SHEET LEAD, | SHEET ZINC,

As low as any importing house in the State. my28

DINNER SETS.—We have just received,

ex Giscours, several extremely fine

FRENCH CHINA DINNER SETS,

WITH TEA SET, COMPLETE.

A SUPERIOR ARTICLE to anything ever offered in this market.

Connoisseurs will find great pleasure in examining our stock of VERY RARE CHINA, and

ELEGANT GLASS SETS,

FRENCH BRONZE STATUARY,

Comprising some very fine pieces.

PARIAN STATUARY, ELEGANT VASES, ETC., ETC.

HAYNES & LAWTON,

516 and 518 Sansome street, corner Merchant,
my23 San Francisco.

SQUARZA'S PUNCH.—First Premium,

Sacramento, 1862.

First Premium at San Francisco District Fair, 1863.

First Special Premium, Sacramento, 1863.

Wholesale and Retail.

my28 44 Leidesdorff street, San Francisco.

W. P. HARRISON & CO.,

PRINTERS,

ENGRAVERS AND ELECTROTYPERS,

PRINTERS' WAREHOUSE,

417 Clay Street. my28

EDWARD BOSQUI & CO.,

517

CLAY STREET, SAN FRANCISCO.

BOOKBINDERS, PAPER-RULERS, AND

ACCOUNT-BOOK MANUFACTURERS.

Blanks of all kinds printed and ruled to any desired pattern. my28

MISCELLANEOUS.

HOME.—If there is a word that fills the heart with joy, it is "home." Home is an old word, yet it has invincible power than can never lessen or wear out. There is no other word in language that clusters so many pleasing affections, and that so powerfully excites our feelings. We are bound to it by ties of early affection, by years of childhood, by a father's and brother's friendship, by a mother's and sister's love. Home, murmur but its name, and what happy recollections shoot through the heart, and our brain is wild with emotion. Our spirits, however depressed by sorrow or affliction—however much we have been stunned by the rough change of life, sometimes turns to the memories of "home, sweet home."

WE should always rest satisfied with doing well, and let others talk of us as they please; for they can do us no injury, although they may think they have found a flaw in our proceedings, and are determined to rise on our downfall, or profit on our injury.

GUY LIVINGSTON LAWRENCE, whose adventures in this country as a Secesh volunteer were so unfortunate, announces a new novel entitled "Maurice Dering; or, The Quadilateral."

AN OPTICAL ILLUSION.—A chandler having had some candles stolen, a person bid him be of good cheer, "for in a short time," said he, "they will all come to light."

FORTRESSES and bulwarks are not half so secure as a kind, cheerful woman's little mental domain, with no other protection than its ring-fence of evergreens.

A SERVANT GIRL, hearing the lady of the house ask her husband to bring "Domhey and Son" with him when he came home to dinner, laid two extra plates on the table for the supposed visitors.

IF you dream that you are with an angel, and wake up, to find yourself with your wife, happy are you if you think your dream realized.

THE CALIFORNIAN.

A PAPER FOR THE TIMES.

Devoted to Live Topics,

AND THE

BEST INTERESTS OF CALIFORNIA.

MAKES ITS FIRST APPEARANCE TO-DAY,

And will be published

EVERY SATURDAY MORNING,

—AT—

728 MONTGOMERY STREET.

Nothing will be spared that will enable THE CALIFORNIAN to appeal to the Public for support, not only as the

BEST JOURNAL ON THE PACIFIC COAST,

But also as being

THE EQUAL OF ANY ON THIS CONTINENT!

Imperial paper, of a quality and weight never before brought to this market, is ordered from the East

EXPRESSLY FOR THE CALIFORNIAN,

And will arrive here as soon as it can be brought by Isthmus transportation.

THE BEST TALENT OF THE STATE

Is employed upon the CALIFORNIAN, and arrangements have been made with contributors abroad for

EASTERN AND FOREIGN CORRESPONDENCE.

THE TERMS OF THE CALIFORNIAN are $5 per year by mail to subscribers, invariably in advance; 50 cents per month, served by carriers.

All communications and correspondence must be addressed to

C. H. WEBB,
Editor and Proprietor CALIFORNIAN,
728 Montgomery street.

AUSTIN & SCHMITT, Importers and Dealers in

FRENCH, ENGLISH AND DOMESTIC DRY GOODS,

Offer for sale the best assortment of the above goods to be found in the city, consisting in part of

SILKS,
SHAWLS,
MANTILLAS,
LACES,
DRESS GOODS,

Of every description. Best quality of

MOURNING GOODS,
HOSIERY,
EMBROIDERIES,

Together with a complete assortment of

HOUSEKEEPING GOODS.

247 Montgomery street,
Between Sacramento and California streets.

OCCIDENTAL HOTEL—Corner Montgomery and Bush streets, San Francisco.

This House possesses all the requirements of a FIRST CLASS HOTEL, its spacious READING ROOM, with large MINERAL CABINET and extensive COLLECTION OF SPECIMENS from the different Mining Regions of the Pacific Coast—BRANCH TELEGRAPH OFFICE connecting with Lines throughout the country—and NEWS STAND—all contributing to make it the Headquarters and Home for the Californian business man and tourist.

The TABLE of this House shall not be excelled by any.

BOARD, THREE DOLLARS PER DAY.

LEWIS LELAND & CO.,
my28 Proprietors.

MAGUIRE'S OPERA HOUSE.

T. MAGUIRE - - - - - - - PROPRIETOR.
C. L. GRAVES - - - - - - STAGE MANAGER.
W. STEVENSON - - - - - - TREASURER.

GRAND RE-OPENING

OF THIS BEAUTIFUL

TEMPLE OF THE DRAMA!

WHICH HAS BEEN ENTIRELY RENOVATED AND RE-EMBELLISHED

—FOR THE—

Operatic Season!

ON MONDAY - - - - - - May 29th,

And every night during the week, Balfe's Magnificent Operatic Romance of

THE ENCHANTRESS!

First appearance of

MISS CAROLINE RICHINGS,

As "Stella;" and

MR. PETER RICHINGS,

As "Ramir;" assisted by

Messrs. FRANK MAYO,
C. R. THORN,
WM. O'NEIL,
W. BARRY,
D. C. ANDERSON,
W. STEVENSON,
H. CLIFTON,

And the Dramatic Company. In order to give effect to the Gorgeous Ballet, MLLE. C. ACOSTA and MONS H. WIETHOFF, together with an entire Corps de Ballet, have been engaged.

ALSO—An Enlarged Orchestra and an auxiliary force of nearly ONE HUNDRED PERSONS. my28

METROPOLITAN THEATRE.

MANAGERS - - - - - B. C. MARSH, J. H. ALLEN.

AFTERNOON PERFORMANCE TO-DAY,

COMMENCING AT 2 O'CLOCK:

THE KNIGHT OF ARVA!

HARRY COURTAINE - - - AS - - - - CONOR
MRS. EMILY JORDAN - - AS THE - - PRINCESS

To conclude with

THE HAPPY MAN!

Pat Murphy - - - - - - - - G. W. Marsh
Koket - - - - - - - - - - Jenny Arnot

AT NIGHT:

LOVE AND CHAMPAGNE!

Mr. Allen - - - as - - - - Dick Dashall

(See Bills.)

After which,

DRAKE'S "ADDRESS TO THE AMERICAN FLAG!"

BY MR. COURTAINE.

To conclude with the sale of the famous

SACK OF FLOUR!

From Austin, Virginia City, Gold Hill, etc., etc.

☞ The proceeds being for the Sanitary Fund

PRICES—$1 00, 50 cents, and 25 cents.

WILSON & ZOYARA'S

Great Circus!

THIS MAMMOTH NEW HIPPOTHEATRON IS NOW OPEN!

On Jackson street, adjoining International Hotel.

THE NEW AND SPLENDID COMPANY, brought by Mr. Wilson from New York and Havana at immense cost, have a world-wide reputation, enabling the management to produce all the ELEGANT, SENSATIONAL, THRILLING, COMIC, and ENTERTAINING NOVELTIES OF THE DAY. At the head of the Equestrian Department is the world-renowned

ELLA ZOYARA,
MLLE. ELOUISE,

And a number of elegant and daring Riders, whilst

MESSRS. ROSS AND CARLO
Head the Acrobatic Corps;
MESSRS. DURAND AND PAINTER,
The Gymnastic;
MESSRS. AYMAR AND WILLIAMS,
The Comic Department.

The Ring is under the supervision of MR VINCENT; with TRAINED and PERFORMING HORSES, PONIES and MULES—being the most complete Company that has ever appeared in the city.

KIDD'S CELEBRATED BRASS BAND accompanies the entertainment.

PRICES OF ADMISSION:

Dress Circle	$1 00
Second Circle	50
Box Seats	1 50

Seats can be secured three days in advance. Box Office open from 10 to 4 o'clock. Doors open at 7 o'clock.

☞ On this and every Saturday afternoon, a GRAND PERFORMANCE FOR THE ACCOMMODATION OF FAMILIES. Doors open at 1 o'clock. my28

WM. SHEW'S

PHOTOGRAPHIC GALLERY!

☞ IS NOT REMOVED! ☜

As many persons have erroneously supposed, but remains at the same place where it has been all the time for the last eight years,

NO. 423 MONTGOMERY STREET,

And is the best place in the world to obtain a good likeness and a durable picture. my28

G. FORREST WALTER,

EXCELSIOR

PIONEER MERCHANT TAILOR

OF THE PACIFIC.

ESTABLISHED, 1849.

NO. 611 SACRAMENTO STREET,
Three doors above Montgomery,
my28 San Francisco.

SAN FRANCISCO AND SAN JOSE RAILROAD.

CHANGE OF TIME.

On and after MARCH 1st, 1864, Trains will leave the Depot on Brannan street, between Third and Fourth, for San Jose and Way Stations, as follows:

Leave San Francisco at 8 A. M. and 4:30 P. M.
Leave San Jose at 7:30 A. M. and 4 P M.

SUNDAYS.

On Sundays, Three Trains will be run, as follows:

Leave San Francisco at 8 1-2 and 10 1-2 A. M., and 4 1-2 P. M.
Leave San Jose at 8 A. M., and 4 and 7 P. M.

Passengers can reach the Depot by either the Third or Fourth street lines of city cars.

A. H. HOUSTON,
my28 General Superintendent.

MARKET STREET RAILROAD.

CHANGE OF TIME TABLE.

ON AND AFTER APRIL 1, 1864, Trains will start from the City and the Mission as follows:

Between the hours of 8:20 A. M. and 6 P. M., every 40 minutes, instead of, as heretofore, every 30 minutes, thus:

FROM THE MISSION.
9:40	10:20	11:00	11:40
FROM THE CITY.
10:00	10:40	11:20	12:00

And so on till 6 o'clock:

Before 9 A. M. and after 6 P. M., the running will be the same as before.

my28 F. McCOPPIN, Superintendent.

BILLIARD TABLES.

NOTICE.

Phelan & Collender have sold all their stock, and disposed of their business on this Coast to MATHEW E. HUGHES, who will in future have Billiard Tables with PHELAN'S PATENT IMPROVED COMBINATION CUSHIONS for sale in this market.

While returning thanks to the Public for the patronage bestowed upon them, Phelan & Collender desire to recommend Mr. HUGHES as their SUCCESSOR, to those desirous to provide themselves with Billiard Tables with Phelan's Unequalled Patent Cushions, which Mr. HUGHES will always be prepared to supply, as received direct from the undersigned, sole proprietors and manufacturers.

PHELAN & COLLENDER,
By GEORGE E. PHELAN, Attorney.

San Francisco, May 26, 1864.

Referring to the above, the undersigned takes pleasure in calling the attention of PRIVATE GENTLEMEN and SALOON-KEEPERS to his fine stock of BILLIARD TABLES and CUSHIONS. Just received, an assortment of the

NEW STANDARD AMERICAN BILLIARD TABLES, WITH PHELAN'S LATEST IMPROVED CUSHIONS.

These Tables have just been adopted by all the leading Professional as well as Amateur Players in the East—over Six Hundred having been sold to private families alone in the last nine months.

BILLIARD BALLS AND TRIMMINGS

Of all kinds on hand. Orders for Repairing of Tables, and everything in connection with the business, promptly attended to at the Office, 724 and 726 Montgomery street, opposite the Metropolitan Theatre.

my28 M. E. HUGHES, Sole Agent.

COMMERCIAL STEAM PRINTING HOUSE.

FRANCIS, VALENTINE & CO.,

517 CLAY and 514 COMMERCIAL STREETS.

Every description of BOOK, JOB and POSTER PRINTING done in the best style and at the lowest rates.

BOOK-BINDING and RULING done to order. my28

NO HOME SHOULD BE WITHOUT

ONE OF

MASON & HAMLIN'S

Cabinet Organs.

The cost is trifling, while its good effects in the education and right training of a family are beyond computation.

DO NOT DELAY, but send for an Illustrated Catalogue at once.

Address

A. KOHLER,
my28 Music Dealer, San Francisco.

J. R. MEAD & CO.,

HAVE OPENED WITH AN ☞ ENTIRE NEW STOCK ☜

—OF—

FINE CLOTHING!

—AND—

GENTS' FURNISHING GOODS!

Corner of Montgomery and Bush streets, San Francisco.
my28

R. H. McDONALD & CO.,

R. H. McDONALD. (J. C. SPENCER.

IMPORTING

Wholesale Druggists,

Corner of Sansome and Pine streets,

SAN FRANCISCO,

—AND—

J STREET, SACRAMENTO.

We respectfully beg leave to inform our customers and the public generally that we have opened a House in the city of San Francisco, where we will be pleased to see as many of our old friends and customers as can make it convenient to call upon us. We shall keep at both places a large and well selected stock of

DRUGS AND MEDICINES, SURGICAL INSTRUMENTS,
Dental Goods, Fancy Articles, Brushes and Combs,
SHOULDER AND BODY BRACES,
Ladies' Bandages and Supporters,
GUM ELASTIC STOCKINGS, TRUSSES,
Paints and Oils,
PATENT MEDICINES, HERBS AND EXTRACTS,
Brewers' and Soda Stocks,
CORKS (LARGE VARIETY), ASSAYERS' MATERIAL,
Burning Oils and Fluids,

Together with a large and complete assortment of all goods kept in a well supplied Wholesale Drug Store.

We respectfully solicit those dealing in our line to examine and price our stock before purchasing elsewhere.

R. H. McDONALD & CO.,
Sacramento and San Francisco.

R. H. McDONALD & CO.,

IMPORTING DRUGGISTS,

J STREET, SACRAMENTO,

AND

CORNER OF PINE AND SANSOME STREETS,

SAN FRANCISCO, CALIFORNIA.

IMPORTERS OF

DENTAL AND SURGICAL INSTRUMENTS, TEETH, GOLD FOIL.

VULCANITE MATERIAL.

Vulcanizers, Vulcanite Base, and Impression Gutta Percha. A large variety of VULCANITE TEETH, Scrapers and Packers; together with a large and complete assortment of all articles of the latest and most approved styles of Vulcanite Work.

DENTAL BOOKS.

We keep constantly on hand a supply of all the most approved Standard Works on DENTISTRY. Our efforts will be to keep a large and well selected stock of all Dental Material, where the Dental Profession may confidently rely upon having their orders filled in the best possible manner.

R. H. McDONALD & CO.,
Sacramento, 139 J street,
my28 San Francisco, cor. Pine and Sansome sts.

PACIFIC MAIL STEAMSHIP COMPANY.

The following Steamships will be dispatched in the month of JUNE, 1864:

June 3—ST. LOUIS, Wm. H. Hudson, Commander.
June 13—CONSTITUTION, J. T. Watkins, Commander.
June 23—GOLDEN AGE, Wm. F. Lapidge, Com'dr.

From Folsom-street Wharf, at nine o'clock A. M., punctually,

FOR PANAMA.

Passengers will be conveyed from Panama to Aspinwall by the PANAMA RAILROAD COMPANY, and from Aspinwall to New York by the ATLANTIC AND PACIFIC STEAMSHIP COMPANY.

A. B. FORBES, Agent P. M. S. Co.
my28 Cor. Sacramento and Leidesdorff sts.

JONES, WOOLL & SUTHERLAND,

Manufacturers for the Trade

OF

SQUARE, OVAL AND ARCH-TOP MIRRORS, WINDOW CORNICES, AND PIER TABLES,

Of any Size or Pattern.

PORTRAIT AND PICTURE FRAMES

Of all Styles.

IMPORTERS OF

Fine Engravings and Artists' Materials.

312 MONTGOMERY STREET.

FACTORY—Market street, between Seventh and Eighth, opposite Yerba Buena Park. my28

REMOVAL.

HASKELL & CO.

CANTON TEA STORE. | ESTABLISHED IN 1858.

Wholesale and Retail Dealers in

JAPAN AND CHINA TEAS, AND GROCERIES

515 Market street

And 15 Sutter street, three doors below Metropolitan Market, between Montgomery and Sansome streets.

It is the LARGEST STORE OF THE KIND in San Francisco. my28

NEW YORK AGENCY.—$15 PER DAY MADE EASY, by selling our great "Original and only genuine"

PRIZE AND STATIONERY PACKAGES.

Each one contains more real valuable articles than any half dozen packages ever sold. They contain

FINE STATIONERY,
PENS,
PENCILS,
ENVELOPES,

And a

GIFT OF JEWELRY IN EACH PACKAGE.

The whole worth several dollars if bought separate. Price, 50 cents. Wholesale rates to Agents low. Agents wanted in every town and camp on the Pacific coast. Send for our New Circular with inducements. Mailed free. Address J. B. WILLMAN & CO.,
my28 502 Montgomery st., San Francisco.

The California.

"SURELY THERE IS A VEIN FOR THE SILVER AND A PLACE FOR GOLD WHERE THEY FINE IT."

VOL. I.--NO. 2. SAN FRANCISCO, JUNE 4, 1864. TERMS { $5 A YEAR, BY MAIL, IN ADVANCE. 50 CENTS A MONTH, BY CARRIER

CONTENTS:

ORIGINAL ARTICLES:

Neighborhoods I have moved from.
Fire in the Eighth.
Daphne—a Commencement poem.
Through the Shadows—a poem.

THE COUNTESS DIANA—A Translation.

FROM OUR FRENCH FILES—Translations:

An Easter Egg worth having.
The very Ecstacy of Love.
A newer way of paying old Debts.
Taking Notes.
Speaking by the Card.
Removing a Difficulty.

SELECTED SKETCHES, STORIES and EXTRACTS:

Fair Wind—a poem.
How London came to have Opera.
The Spell of the Pen.
An Easter Carol.
The Poet's Liberty—Stanza.
Vampyres.
Bachelors.
Stories for good little Boys and Girls.
A Gambling Carnival.
A few Ghost Stories.
Jilting.
Fashion.
Love will find a Way.
A Love Song. } Poetry.
How long, O Lord! }
HAYTIEN HORRORS.

EDITORIALS:

One Word.
Howling as one of the Fine Arts.
How Panics are Made.
Our Reception by the Press.
Fashions, Feminine Encroachments
Financial affairs.
Editorial paragraphs.

BRIEF MENTION.

DRAMATIC MENTION.

MISCELLANEOUS PARAGRAPHS.

NEIGHBORHOODS I HAVE MOVED FROM.

BY A HYPOCHONDRIAC.

NUMBER TWO.

"A HOUSE with a fine garden and extensive shrubbery, in a genteel neighborhood," were, if I remember rightly, the general terms of an advertisement which once decided my choice of a dwelling. I should add that this occurred at an early stage of my household experience, when I placed a trustful reliance in advertisements. I have since learned that the most truthful people are apt to indulge a slight vein of exaggeration in describing their own possessions, as though the mere circumstance of going into print were an excuse for a certain kind of mendacity. But I did not fully awaken to this fact until a much later period, when, in answering an advertisement which described a highly advantageous tenement, I was referred to the house I then occupied, and from which a thousand inconveniences were impelling me to move.

The "fine garden" alluded to was not large, but contained several peculiarly-shaped flower beds. I was at first struck with the singular resemblance which they bore to the mutton chops that are usually brought on the table at hotels and restaurants—a resemblance the more striking from the sprigs of parsley which they produced freely. One plat in particular reminded me, not unpleasantly, of a peculiar cake, known to my boyhood as a bolivar. The owner of the property, however, who seemed to be a man of original æsthetic ideas, had banked up one of these beds with bright-colored sea-shells, so that in rainy weather it suggested an aquarium, and offered the elements of botanical and conchological study in pleasing juxtaposition. I have since thought that the fish geraniums which it also bore to a surprising extent were introduced originally from some such idea of consistency. But it was very pleasant, after dinner, to ramble up and down the gravelly paths, (whose occasional boulders reminded me of the dry bed of a somewhat circuitous mining stream,) smoking a cigar, or inhaling the rich aroma of fennel, or occasionally stopping to pluck one of the hollyhocks with which the garden abounded. The prolific qualities of this plant alarmed us greatly, for although, in the first transport of enthusiasm, my wife planted several different kinds of flower seeds, nothing ever came up but hollyhocks; and although, impelled by the same laudable impulse, I procured a copy of Downing's Landscape Gardening and a few gardening tools, and worked for several hours in the garden, my efforts were equally futile.

The extensive shrubbery consisted of several dwarfed trees. One was a very weak young weeping willow, so very limp and maudlin, and so evidently bent on establishing its reputation, that it had to be tied up against the house for support. The dampness of that portion of the house was usually attributed to the presence of this lachrymose shrub. Add to these a couple of highly objectionable trees, known, I think, by the name of Malva, which made an inordinate show of cheap blossoms that they were continually shedding, and one or two dwarf oaks, with scaly leaves and a generally spiteful exterior, and you have what was not inaptly termed by our Milesian handmaid "the scrubbery."

The gentility of our neighborhood suffered a blight from the unwholesome vicinity of McGinnis Court. This court was a kind of cul de sac that, on being penetrated, discovered a primitive people living in a state of barbarous freedom, and apparently spending the greater portion of their lives on their own door-steps. Many of those details of the toilette which a popular prejudice restricts to the dressing-room in other localities, were here performed in the open court, without fear and without reproach. Early in the week the court was hid in a choking, soapy mist, which arose from innumerable wash-tubs. This was followed in a day or two later by an extraordinary exhibition of wearing apparel of divers colors, fluttering on the lines like a display of bunting on ship-board, and whose flapping in the breeze was like irregular discharges of musketry. It was evident also that the court exercised a demoralizing influence over the whole neighborhood. A sanguine property-owner once put up a handsome dwelling on the corner of our street, and lived therein; but although he appeared frequently on his balcony, clad in a bright crimson dressing-gown, which made him look like a tropical bird of some rare and gorgeous species, he failed to woo any kindred dressing-gown to the vicinity, and only provoked opprobrious epithets from the gamins of the court. He moved away shortly after, and on going by the house one day, I noticed a bill of "Rooms to let, with board," posted conspicuously on the Corinthian columns of the porch. McGinnis Court had triumphed. An interchange of civilities at once took place between the court and the servant's area of the palatial mansion, and some of the young men boarders exchanged playful slang with the adolescent members of the court. From that moment we felt that our claims to gentility were forever abandoned.

Yet, we enjoyed intervals of unalloyed contentment. When the twilight toned down the hard outlines of the oaks, and made shadowy clumps and formless masses of other bushes, it was quite romantic to sit by the window and inhale the faint, sad odor of the fennel in the walks below. Perhaps this economical pleasure was much enhanced by a picture in my memory, whose faded colors the odor of this humble plant never failed to restore. So I often sat there of evenings and closed my eyes until the forms and benches of a country school-room came back to me, redolent with the incense of fennel covertly stowed away in my desk, and gazed again in silent rapture on the round, red cheeks and long black braids of that peerless creature whose glance had often caused my cheeks to glow over the preternatural collar, which at that period of my boyhood it was my pride and privilege to wear. As I fear I may be often thought hypercritical and censorious in these articles, I am willing to record this as one of the advantages of our new house, not mentioned in the advertisement or chargeable in the rent. May the present tenant, who is a stock-broker, and who impresses me with the idea of having always been called "Mr." from his cradle up, enjoy this advantage, and try sometimes to remember he was a boy!

We seldom borrow anything from Ireland now-a-days but bulls—and these we generally return at the first convenient opportunity. But the Irish bench has given us a lesson in the way of preventing duels, which, in the sudden revival of that damnable code in the full flush of a year somewhat paradoxically termed Anno Domini, we can well afford to borrow and pattern by. Two dandies were brought before a Dublin magistrate, charged with intent to fight a duel. The magistrate was opposed to any belligerent practices which went beyond a discriminate use of the time-honored shillelah, and, besides, had very serious doubts as to the really sanguinary inclinations of either of the proposed belligerents; so he dismissed them upon a promise "not to carry the matter further," adding: "Gentlemen, I let you off this time; but, upon my conscience, if you are brought again before me, I'm blest if I don't bind you both down to fight." Why not adopt such a punishment as that hinted at by the Hibernian judge all the world through? It is a pity that "affairs of honor" should multiply in an age when honor itself seems to be on the wane.

THROUGH THE SHADOWS.

I.

All in a dream i' the twilight, stars
Glimmering out in their glee,
I hear the low murmur of far-off
Ripples of tropic sea.

II.

Sorrowful sun, in the west, he
Is bleeding to death in the wave,
Staining and tinting with crimson
The corals that fashion his grave.

III.

Out through the mists and the vapors,
The cloudy wreaths and the rings,
The sunlight has flown like a butterfly
Brushing the gold from its wings.

IV.

A quiet is coming and folding
Our troubles away, and our woes
Are hushed in the cool, fragrant shadows,
Like bees in the heart of a rose.

V.

Come on little stars, all silver,
For the terrible sun has gone,
And forth from the castle of shadows east
The moon has set sail for the dawn.

VI.

Pale are the stars, for the morning
Is dawning fresh as the May—
So through the shadows we wander forth,
Seeking the perfect day.

JOSEPH REDIVIVUS.

Paris tells us of a celebrated painter, who was much annoyed in his morning walks by a Biblical painting, miserable in taste and execution, representing a hideous "Joseph" struggling to escape from the embraces of an abominably ugly "Potiphar's wife." So much annoyed was he by this libel in oil that he finally concluded to purchase the picture and reduce it to ashes. Stepping into the shop he demanded of the proprietor the price. "That work of art," replied the imperturbable curiosity dealer, "is valued at five hundred francs." The painter at first felt outraged by the coolness of the shopkeeper, but finally suppressed his indignation sufficiently to listen to the man's explanation. He said that the picture formerly belonged to M. Denon, Intendant of the Louvre under Louis Philippe; that it had fallen into the hands of an old lady, who, shocked by the primitive garb of Mrs. Potiphar, employed her nephew—a house painter—to operate upon the figures with his brush; that this nephew, one rainy day, sat himself down and gave Joseph a coat of paint, and Mrs. Potiphar outer garments, in accordance with the taste of the nineteenth century. The artist, struck by the simplicity of the narrative, examined the painting closely, and discovered the number 37, with a seal in red wax bearing the initials of Denon himself. He instantly made the shopkeeper an offer of 500 francs for the picture, and took a receipt guaranteeing to him its full possession under any and all circumstances, whether it proved valuable or valueless. Under the manipulations of the expert the additions of the house-painter disappeared, disclosing an admirable painting with the name of David in the corner, and every way worthy of that great master's reputation. And a noted connoisseur, to whose inspection the rescued painting was subjected, immediately offered to find a purchaser for it at 20,000 francs. So much for the efforts of the iconoclastic house-painter, who attempted to throw the light of other days into the shade by the touch of his vandal brush. So much for the appreciative artist who relieved the Biblical hero and heroine of the embarrassing coat and petticoat of paint with which the modesty of the former owner thought necessary to furnish them.

Keeping the Ball a-rolling.—A well known Irish lawyer having to defend a man accused of murder, it was very important for the defence to produce the ball with which the murder was said to have been committed. The lawyer held it in one hand, while in the other, as he was suffering from a sore throat that day, he had some lozenges, which every now and then he carried to his mouth. In the warmth of his pleadings he mistook the hand, and thinking to take a lozenge, put the ball into his mouth and swallowed it.

FAIR WIND.

SAILING, sailing, over the sea,
The ships skim by the harbor's mouth,
All canvas set and all pennants free,
And the wind is blowing toward the south.

Blowing, blowing, over the ships,
Curling the crests round the trenchant prow,
And bearing the sigh from our very lips
To lift the tress on some soldier's brow.

Some soldier who by the camp-fire waits
Under the stars of a frosty sky,
And marshals the ghosts of Sovereign States
To bear his Country grandly by:

Held aloft in their arms that way,
A glorious corpse, she passes on—
But his heart is beating her reveillé,
And the stars are struggling into dawn!

And there comes to him a wandering air
Filled with the mist of the salt sea foam,
And it brushes his brow and stirs his hair,
And breathes him the fragrances of home.

So blow, thou wild wind, over the sea,
Still blow freshly and still blow strong,
And bear on your wings to the brave and free
Some little strain of our Easter song.

[Round Table.

HOW LONDON CAME TO HAVE OPERA.

AN article in an English magazine on London Opera Directors furnishes us some very pleasant reading. As Rome was not built in a day, so it seems the English Italian Opera was not established in England for centuries, and did not find a firm foundation there until long after it had become a fixture and a fact in France. The throes which accompanied its birth were painful and shockingly expensive, and even after ushered into existence it was cursed with a protracted period of infancy, and crept for many long years before it gained sufficient vigor to walk. Monarchs who were in danger of losing their head did not much cultivate an ear for music, and until the Second Charles had found in his throne an easy chair, only faint and fragmentary notes from the lyric stage found their way to England by floating across the Channel.

There was no lack of amusements all that while in England it seems; but the opera was not. Shakspeare was the staple food, and it was long before the people had even a musical sandwich. Vauxhall, says our authority, with its thousand lights, velvet lawns, and shady avenues; York Buildings, with its smart vocalists and admiring crowds; the Folly on the Thames, offering its smoking rooms, elegant music hall, and ceaseless round of pleasure; Marybone Gardens, with its bowling green, bowers and lamps; the Duke's Theatre in Lincoln's Inn Fields, with its exciting comedies, brilliant concerts, and pleasant musical interludes; Drury Lane, with its Shakspearian attractions—all these places of fashionable resort were in their meridian glory when the Royal Italian Opera was but a struggling neophyte. Music, it is true, had not yet arrived at that degree of perfection which rendered it worthy of being discussed by patched and powdered Pretty Fellows, who confined their fastidious attention and artistic aspirations to sewing and knitting of garters, knotting of fringe, the artful disposition of China jars, and the nice conduct of a clouded cane. Young belles, spending their days lounging in India-houses, buying ivory fans and Japan cabinets, talking scandal and meditating fresh frolics, dreamt not of opera boxes, Crystal Palace opera concerts, or of packets of illuminated songs from the last new opera. As yet unknown to fame were big lorgnettes, black or white; unknown were snowy cravats, "bones," neat broughams, white and gold bournouses, and Covent Garden bouquets. Unfamiliar in the mouths of the amateurs was the language of the cognoscenti; strange in their ears would have sounded the notes of those wonderful instruments, the invention of the very names whereof demands talent of no ordinary nature. The opera was as yet a thing of the future; and Tatlers, Spectators, Commentators and Guardians had not yet the opportunity of exercising their cutting wit and biting sarcasm on basso, tenor, and chorus; coffee-house wits and Hell-fire Clubbists had no prima donna or ballerina to criticize or to adore.

In the time of the First Charles, London society, wanting opera, testified its longing by patronizing Shakspearian tragedies interspersed with tender melodies, and by applauding musical interludes of an exceedingly mild description. The singers, however, were deplorably bad; and there were no concerts or public places to give employment to even these vocalists. The companies at the theatres were small, and composed of inferior actors; and those who were foolish enough to depend upon their vocal abilities for a livelihood had little to rely on besides the royal household and chapel establishments, the liberality of the sovereign, and the patronage of the great. Nothing was known of the opera but the name, which the dramatists sometimes used.

Charles II., albeit he starved his singers, liked music, and once wrote a song himself. He had a slight knowledge of music, understood the notes, and could sing "a plump bass." Admiring everything French, he brought with him a taste for French music, and was quite pleased when Cambert—organist of the church of St. Honoré, in Paris, and the first French musician who tried to set operas—quitted France in a huff at being displaced from the management of the opera in favor of Lully, and came to London. His merry Majesty had his band of twenty-four violins in imitation of the band of King Louis, and he immediately installed Cambert at their head. The Frenchman made many efforts to persuade the English to like his operas, but at last he broke his heart at the indifference with which he and his works were treated, and died nine years after his arrival. Yet attempts at operatic music were now becoming greatly the fashion. Pepys, in 1667—the year Cambert died—"went with my Lord Brouncke to his house, there to hear some Italian music," with which the genial old gossip was "mightily pleased." The witty, dashing Tom Killigrew, King Charles's jester, who was present on that occasion, had already visited Rome eight or ten times for the sake of hearing good music, and was very anxious to bring forward Italian pieces.

When it was discovered that his newly-restored Majesty was fond of music, composers speedily started into being. Matthew Locke—most peevish of geniuses—brought out the Tempest in 1673 at the theatre which had been opened in Lincoln's Inn Fields two years before by the son and the widow of Sir William D'Avenant. The expensive decorations of scenery and dresses, the singing and dancing, and the fine music, made this piece extraordinarily popular. The public were delighted. Everybody ran to see the new work, and its success induced D'Avenant to produce other musical dramas by Locke. The directors of Drury Lane were alarmed at the repeated successes achieved at the Duke's Theatre, and employed a miserable writer of bad farces to parody Locke's pieces; but the Duke's Theatre continued to be thronged. Two years later, Purcell, most original of composers and irregular of bons vivants, then a lad of nineteen, composed a musical drama, which created a great excitement in private circles. D'Avenant, hearing of its merits, proposed to bring it forward in public, to which young Purcell joyfully agreed. It succeeded; and D'Avenant brought out several pieces by Purcell, which were all received with the utmost approbation by the public.

Musical dramas, not always of the liveliest nature became the rage, and the performers therein sought after celebrities. Moll Davis captivated King Charles by her bird-like notes; pleasant Miss Shore played to such good purpose on the harpsichord that she stole the heart of Colley Cibber, who enthusiastically threw his hand, heart, and seventy-five pounds a year at her feet. Miss Campion sang so enchantingly that the aged Duke of Devonshire took her off the stage.

THE OPERA IS BORN.

However, musical dramas are not operas, and the world of fashion wanted real opera. A great crisis invariably brings forth a great man. The man who undertook the task of supplying the fashionable world with grand opera was Thomas Clayton. He was a miserable pretender, though he was in King William's band; he was utterly devoid of genius, or even talent; but he had a great deal of tact, he was specious and plausible, and just the man to successfully impose on the credulous. He went to Italy, to improve himself by study, and having there heard the opera, thought what a fine thing it would be to have the credit of introducing it into England, and that it might be a money-making speculation. He by some means possessed himself of a bundle of songs and with these returned to London.

There were only two theatres open then—Drury Lane and Lincoln's Inn Fields. Sir John Vanbrugh, with the aid of a subscription of thirty thousand pounds, given by "persons of quality," was building the Queen's Theatre, but it was not finished. Clayton commenced his campaign by taking Drury Lane, and engaging the best company in London headed by the lovely Mrs. Tofts, and the "tawny Tuscan," Margarita de l'Epine, both prodigious favorites, and by Leveridge, a most popular singer. Then he produced his opera of Arsinoe, Queen of Cyprus. The pit and boxes were reserved for the subscribers; the rest of the house was open, as usual at the subscription music. The public were surprised, delighted with this new species of amusement; though the critics who wrote of the music call it "worthless, execrable, contemptible, miserable trash." Clayton had succeeded in inventing a novelty; and although his opera, both music and words were utter rubbish, yet it was the talk of the coffee-houses, India-houses, and drawing-rooms of London.

Sir John Vanbrugh did not meet with a very good success in his enterprise. On the opening of his new theatre, a grand and superb structure, in the spring of 1705, it was discovered that almost every qualification and convenience of a good theatre had been sacrificed to display a vast triumphal piece of architecture. Immense columns, gilded cornices, and an immoderately high roof did not compensate for the defect which caused nine words out of ten to be carried of. Theatre, pastoral, and managers failed, while Clayton was taking the town by storm. Sir John, tired or frightened, disposed of the entire establishment and the company returned to Lincoln's Inn Fields, grievously disappointed with the result of their speculation.

Clayton relinquished management in 1707, and went to York Buildings, His company, and that of the Queen's Theatre, united and went to the Haymarket, under the control of Owen McSwiney. Italian singers, in the meanwhile, hearing that there was an opportunity of pocketing some bright English guineas, and being attracted "by the report of the passion for opera," had come to England. Among these was Nicolini, a Neapolitan. A magnificent actor and a superb looking man, his voice was the admiration of all who heard him. Even Steele, so bitter against opera singers in general, dilates on the grace and propriety of the handsome Italian's action and gestures, which he declares did honor to the human figure. McSwiney immediately engaged him at a salary of eight hundred guineas for the season—a sum considered enormous at the time. He retired in 1712, when he returned to Italy, and, building for himself a splendid villa, named it, as a testimony of gratitude to the nation which had contributed the wealth amassed by him, the ENGLISH FOLLY.

On the arrival of the Italians, operas were performed partly in English and partly in Italian, which drew down great laughter and derision from the wits of the day.

When McSwiney withdrew from the management in 1710, there is every reason to suppose that he left the debts incurred during his theatrical reign unpaid; for the tradesmen who furnished dresses and other properties advertised a general meeting to concert measures for petitioning the Lord Chamberlain, or commencing lawsuits against the manager, who peremptorily refused payment, although the articles were in constant use. He perfectly understood the secret of pleasing the public, and of attracting crowded audiences, and was endowed with a certain degree of cleverness. His tact particularly fitted him for undertaking the management of a large operatic establishment. His first great success was the opera of Thomyris, put together and conducted by the newly-arrived "Swiss Count," John James Heidegger who, "by that production alone, was a gainer of five hundred pounds."

HEIDEGGER, THE UGLY.

Heidegger, who afterwards became manager, created an extraordinary sensation in the fashionable world on his arrival. His speciality consisted in being the "ugliest man of his time," his portrait in that capacity being engraved at least ten or twelve times. Lord Chesterfield wagered that it would be an impossibility to find a second human being so horribly unfavored by nature. Heidegger, who was as good-humored as he was hideous, or as anxious to make money as he was unscrupulous regarding the means by which he acquired it readily accepted the bet, and a search was instituted. After some time, a frightful old woman was discovered, and it was agreed that Heidegger had the day. Heidegger was about to triumph, when Chesterfield suddenly demanded that he should put on the old creature's bonnet. Thus equipped, Heidegger appeared so fearfully ugly (although he was robust, tall and well made) that, amid an explosion of laughter, Chesterfield was at once declared victor. On another occasion, one Jolly, a well known tailor, presenting him with his bill before a noble duke, his Grace, to gain time, declared with an oath at his ugly visage, "I will never pay you till you bring me an uglier fellow than yourself!" Jolly bowed, and, retiring, sent a message to Heidegger, saying that "his Grace wished to see him the next morning on particular business." Heidegger attended, when Jolly was there to meet him. The result was, as soon as the Fleming's visit was over, "Jolly received the cash." Having lost all his credit abroad, Heidegger had sought England as a harbor of refuge, and enlisted in the Guards for protection from his duns. Such was his boundless impudence, and such his insinuation, that he gained access in the most familiar manner to the society of the young "sprigs of fashion," by whom he was denominated the Swiss Count. Another very ridiculous story is told of him, which happened some years subsequently to this. The facetious Duke of Montague, projector of the bottle conjuring affair, had a mask made exactly like Heidegger's face, and a dress similar to that which he was to wear at a masquerade, in which he disguised a person of the same figure as Heidegger. The night the trick was to be played, the conspirators waited until Heidegger, on the arrival of the royal party, had given the band orders to perform "God save the King," and had retired. The moment he had quitted the orchestra, the mock Heidegger ordered the band to strike up "Over the Water to Charley." The assembly were aghast, and Heidegger ran back in horror, swearing that the band were drunk or mad, and ordered them furiously to recommence "God save the King." The instant he went away, the false Heidegger commanded "Over the Water to Charley" again. The king and his courtiers were delighted, and the affair went on till the band were kicked out of the orchestra, and Heidegger became nearly insane. The mock Heidegger then stepped forward and assured the king that he was the true Heidegger, and that the other was only the Devil in his likeness. The two Dromios were confronted, the false Heidegger having the advantage of being supported by the judges to whom the appeal was made. At last, the Duke of Montague, in pity to the poor man, who was now almost "stark mad with distraction and vexation," made the impostor unmask, and the joke was laughed off; not, however, till Heidegger had obtained a promise that the mask should be melted down in his presence, that there might be no further chance of being mistaken for the Devil. Pope introduced this individual into his Dunciad, thereby adding but little to his notoriety. Dr. Arbuthnot inscribed to him a poem called the Masquerade, "in which he seems more severe upon the Count's ugliness, which he could not help," says Dr. Burney, "than on his voluntary vices."

ENTER HANDEL.

Aaron Hill had just entered on his management when Handel arrived in England, on a special invitation from some nobleman who had heard his music in Hamburg. The great maestro was then twenty-seven, and had acquired a splendid reputation all over Europe. Hill immediately called on him, and asked him to write a piece for the Haymarket Theatre, to which Handel readily agreed. The manager then wrote a libretto, selecting the romantic history of Rinaldo and Armida, from Tasso's Jerusalem Delivered, which he gave to Giacomo Rossi, a poet of considerable merit, to translate into Italian. Rossi wrote as fast as he could, yet was quite unable to keep pace with Handel, who composed so rapidly that the music was completed in a fortnight.

Hill spared no expense in producing Rinaldo, which was brought out in the February of 1711. It was his object, he declared, "to give to two senses an equal pleasure," and among other innovations, he filled the garden of Armida with living birds, which created a great sensation, though they would persist in flying at the lights, and were denominated "sparrows" by Addison. He also had a real fountain. The opera was mounted elaborately, and was performed fifteen times in succession, a rare occurrence in those days. The cavatina in the first act, Cara sposa, was to be found upon all the harpsichords in the kingdom, as a model of pathetic grace; the march was adopted by the Life Guards, who played it every day upon parade for forty years, and was sung in the Beggar's Opera twenty years after it was composed. Walsh, the publisher, was said to have gained fifteen hundred pounds from the publication of Rinaldo, which caused Handel to write complainingly: "My Dear Sir—As it is only right that we should be upon an equal footing, you shall compose the next opera, and I will sell it."

Clayton, who was then at York Buildings, was in such a rage at the success of Rinaldo, that he wrote angrily to the Spectator. Steele also wrote against it; but the public would persist in going to the opera to hear the new work. At that time the house was not open on Wednesdays and Saturdays, the hour of performance being six o'clock. In 1712, on the contrary, the performance took place on those very evenings.

Heidegger became Aaron Hill's partner in 1711; but immediately after this, Hill had a dispute with the Lord Chamberlain, and threw up his operatic sceptre, which he never resumed. He died in 1749, in his sixty-fourth year. The management was taken in 1712 by McSwiney. In 1713, Teseo, by Handel, was performed, with new and costly decorations. McSwiney having vainly tried to obtain a subscription for six nights, gave out tickets for two nights only, throwing the boxes and pit into one. The house was full at each performance; but after the second night McSwiney disappeared, without paying the singers' salaries, and leaving the dresses and the scenes unpaid for. McSwiney ran away to Italy, where he stayed several years. On his return to England, he obtained a place in the Custom House, and was keeper of the King's Mews. He died in 1754, and left his fortune to his favorite, Mrs. Woffington.

On recovering from this confusion, the singers determined on going with the opera, dividing the profits. They placed themselves under the immediate superintendence of Heidegger. At first the public went very regularly; but the house grew thinner every night. The next season, in 1714, appeared the great star, Anastasia Robinson. During Leut the opera was performed on Thursday, in consequence of the Queen usually "having a withdrawing room and playing basset every Tuesday evening." The following season the hour of performance was altered to five o'clock, and there was an advertisement issued by the manager: "Whereas, by the frequent calling for the songs over again, the operas have been too tedious; therefore the singers are forbid to sing any song above once, and it is hoped nobody will call for 'em, or take it ill when not obeyed." The public grew more indifferent every day, and at last even the presence of the Priuee and Princess of Wales was not sufficient to fill the house. They tried dancing, they allowed servants to keep places in the boxes, but all their exertions and concessions were unavailing. In 1717–18 there were no operas performed; but Heidegger, who was very zealous in providing amusement for his patrons, organized masquerades, ridottos and balls, when there were invariably "some files of musquetiers at hand, for the preventing any disturbance which might happen by quarrels, etc."

In 1720, operas were resumed. In the May of this year, the opera of Numitor was announced. In order to induee people to attend, it was advertised that "those paying a guinea would be admitted on the stage." A footman's gallery is meutioned in the papers of this date, with the addition that its frequenters were so insolent and noisy that threats of shutting it were circulated. A company of French comedians then occupied the theatre in the Haymarket, to the ire of the native actors. Aaron Hill wrote to the younger Rich, September 9, 1791, speaking thus: "I suppose you know that the Duke of Montague and I have agreed that I am to have that house half the week, and the French vermin the other half." This agreement was carried out; and Aaron Hill announced himself manager and director of a new company, formed by ladies and gentlemen who had never appeared on any stage, with the aid of scenery quite novel and upon an improved plan. He opened with his own play of Henry II., in December, 1721.

HANDEL AS A MANAGER.

The opera was then going to ruin, and a subscription was entered into by the nobility, to the extent of fifty thousand pouuds, to establish a uew opera. Handel was appointed director, and the committee consisted of noblemen—dukes, earls, lords, generals. Handel was commissioned to form a company: he went to Dresden, where the Opera was conducted on a seale of the utmost magnificence, and brought back a seleet troupe of singers, with Signora Durastanti and Senesino at their head. Senesino became soon the great star of the opera. He was an exquisite singer, and had a magnificent figure and a princely deportment; but he was far from being the hero he looked. One evening, when he was singing in Julius Cæsar, part of the maehinery fell from the roof just as he had chanted forth the words, in Italian, "Cæsar does not know what fear is!" The poor hero was so frightened that "he trembled, lost his voiee, and fell crying." He never spared any energy in his acting, and sometimes threw an amount of force into his part which led him into the most ludierous situations. One night he was performing as Alexander, when, leading the way to attack the enemy's walls, he drove his sword through the scene, and carried off a pasteboard brick, with which he marehed onwards in triumph. Another night, when stepping into Armida's enchanted bark, he took a stride too long, "as he was more attentive to the accompaniment of the orchestra than to the breadth of the shore," when he fell prostrate, aud lay for some time in great pain, "with the end of a wave ruuning into his side." Another night, he insulted Mistress Anastasia Robinsou during the public rehearsal of an opera, and was eaned behind the scenes by Lord Peterborough, when he had to go down on his knees and beg pardon. He took a fancy during the performance of Theseus to drubbing the Minotaur soundly; and that the man who represented the monster might not object to being thrashed, the lordly singer always gave him a crown in compensation. Being anxious to have the worth of his money, Senesino invariably beat the Minotaur so heartily as to lose breath most seriously, which was often inconvenient, as a song of triumph had to be vocalized over the vanquished foe. Lord Bathurst, at the age of eighty-seven, used to sing this song, and with much humor imitated the eatches of breath with which Senesino interlarded it from his extraordinary exertions. Senesino, in short, was one of the most insolent, swaggering bullies that ever strutted their brief hour before the footlights.

With the exception of Senesino, who was perpetually tormenting him, Handel ruled his operatic troupe with case. Anastasia Robinson, his prima donna, was an exceedingly good singer, and a very amiable woman. But in an evil hour for himself he brought over the famous Cuzzoni. No sooner did that "little syren" appear than London fairly went out of its senses. She sang so exquisitely, she was so deliciously saucy, she was so regally superb in her ways, she was so incomprehensible, that lords and ladies, young and old, could talk of nothing else. Poor Handel, the haughty, the massive, the irascible, was forced to submit to her countless whims and extravagances. She would sing how, when, and where she chose. She would sing his music just as she pleased, and he might think himself only too much honored if she condescended to sing it at all. Handel one day seized her round the waist and threatened to fling her out of the window. "I know you are a devil," he cried, "but I am Beelzebub, the prince of devils!" She was ill-tempered, she was ugly and ill-made, with a short, squat figure, and a doughy, cross face, only redeemed by a fine complexion; she was silly and fantastical, but she was the reigning queen of the opera, and that was enough. Cuzzoni entered into a coalition with Senesino to torment Handel, for, from the commencement of opera, managers and singers have always been at war. Senesino, who had not the best of tempers, and was excessively arrogant and conceited, treated Handel abominably, and ungratefully, for the great composer had given him fiftcen hundred pounds for the season. The maestro threw back the insolence of Senesino with galling indifference, whieh added fuel to the fire of hatred, and the audacity of Cuzzoni with alternate threats and wheedling. The singers cared very little for the indignation which their conduct might create in the breast of Handel, for they felt sure of their popularity with the patrons of the opera, who disliked Handel's sturdy independence.

Hoping to subdue Cuzzoni, Handel engaged the lovely, sylph-like, Faustina Bordoni, who had a brilliant reputation and a beautiful voice. The unfortunate manager, however, found himself in a more uncomfortable position than ever when he had secured the services of Faustina. Not only did the two singers commence a dreadful war, and fling the whole establishment into confusion, but all musical aud fashionable London divided into two bitter factions. One night, the two prima donnas fought on the stage, with the fury of two demons. It would be difficult to say whether the most absurdities were committed by the cantatrici or by their partisans. When one prima donna opened her mouth to sing, the friends of the other would begin to hiss. Ladies of fashion headed the antagonistic parties. The Countess of Pembroke was general of the Cuzzoni forces, the Countess of Burlington aud Lady Delawarr led the Faustina battalions. The grace and beauty of the Venetian singer gained for her the favor of the beaux and wits, who were anxious to secure for her undisputed dominion, and did not spare the partisans of her rival. One critic or wit wrote this indignant epigram:

Old poets sing that beasts did dance,
Whenever Orpheus played;
So to Faustina's charming voice
Wise Pembroke's asses brayed.

In seven years the fifty thousand pounds subscribed for the Royal Academy of Music was squandered, together with the annual subscription. Despite the admirable works produced by Handel, despite his really magnificent company, and the brilliant appointments of the theatre, the speculatiou was a complete, a lamentable failure.

When it was discovered that the entire affair had collapsed the directors entered into an arrangement with Heidegger for opening the King's Theatre with Handel. The great composer went to Italy to engage new singers, but unfortunately did not make a very judicious selection. He was obliged to re-engage Senesino, who had quitted England in 1726 on aceount of his health. The feud between Senesino and Handel broke out afresh with intense acrimony. The aristocracy hated Handel, and were angry because he had raised the prices on oratorio nights. They therefore gave funds to organize an opposition at Lincoln's Inn Fields, sending for Porpora to direct it. The moment Senesino heard of this rival establishment he offered to join it. Cuzzoni, who returned to England in 1734, also joined Porpora's company, which was streugthened by several mutinous members of Handel's troupe.

Deserted by his best singers, Handel weut off again to Italy in seareh of others. He heard Carestini and Farinelli, and had the singular bad taste to give the former the preference. Not only was Carestini inferior to his great rival, but he was insolent and overbearing. Scarcely had he arrived in London before he commenced a warfare against the unlucky maestro. When Handel sent him the beautiful air, Verdi prati, in Alcina—afterwards constantly encored—he returned it, with an impertinent message, as being too trifling for him to sing. Handel weut in a towering rage to his lodgings, and, caring nothing for the likelihood of offending his leading vocalist, exclaimed, "You tog! don't I know better as yourseluf vaat is pest for you to sing? If you will not sing te soug vaat I give you I vill not pay you ein stiver." Carestini objected to Handel's aecompaniments on the harpsichord, whieh diverted the attention of the audience from the singer; he swore that if Handel did not discontinue his elaborate performance he would jump upon the instrumeut and thus stop the interruption. "Oh, oh!" cried Handel, "So you vill jump, vill you? Very vell, sare; be so kind as tell me de night ven you vill jump, and I vill advertise in de bill, and I sall get grate dale more money by your jumping den I sall get by your siuging."

Porpora had the good fortune to engage Farinelli, and the whole metropolis went into such a state of excitement about this truly great siuger, that the Nobility's Theatre was raised to the pinnacle of popularity. There never was a more extraordinary sensation created by any vocalist than by Farinelli. Presents of the utmost value were showered upon him—diamond kuee-buckles, diamond rings, bank notes enclosed in a rich gold case, gold snuff-boxes. All London ran crowding to hear him, and were either melted to tears or raised to enthusiasm by his voice. Even Senesino was obliged to admit that he was unapproachable as a singer. Soon after the arrival of Farinelli, however, Senesiuo left England, and returned to his native Tuscany.

After the expiration, in 1735, of Handel's contract with Heidegger, he removed to Covent Garden, Porpora going to the King's Theatre. George II. subscribed one thousand pounds towards the expenses of Handel's management, and it was the support of the king and the royal family that enabled him to hold his ground against the aristocracy and its Italian rival.

At last both Handel and Porpora failed, and in 1737 the latter quitted England. Handel joined Heidegger once more, in 1738, at the King's Theatre. In two years he wrote four operas. When he had produced Deidamia, he abandoned dramatic music, and entered on a new and higher phase of his career. During his unfortunate struggle against Porpora and the world of fashion, he had lost his health, he had lost all the money he had made during twenty years of labor, and he had to start anew, at the age of fifty-six, having nothing left but his glorious reputation.

THE SPELL OF THE PEN.

It is an indisputable fact that the grasp of a pen in one's hand generally transforms a sensible man into an idiot, as though it were a malicious enchanter's wand. Most writers feel this, and many readers see it. "Figaro," in the New York Leader, hits the common enemy to composition as follows:

I never did like writing much, any way, and latterly have come to look upon the pen, with its horrible black mouth and slit tongue, as a species of monster. I know not why it is, but the moment a man gets a pen in his hand, in nine cases out of ten, he ceases to be a man and becomes nothing but a writer. And a writer of what? What he thinks? "Nothing of the sort," as Mrs. Vernon says.

The pen is an implaeable enemy to thought, and literature little else than the art of saying nothing. When a man talks he is very apt to say something; when he writes—writing being, in its best estate a pompous and pedantie substitute for speech—he is so much occupied with what he calls his "style" (save the mark?) that he does marvels if he gives you the grim shadow of anything,

The multitude of his words remind you of nothing but the thought run to seed.

If he should catch himself writing what he felt, in good honest vernacular—instead of stupid old vermicular—he'd be frightened out of his senses. And so would his readers.

As I have already intimated, the moment a man takes his pen in his hand his wits appear to step out. Take an instance in point.

When Edgardus meets me coming out of a theatre and asks me what I think of the play or the players, I have no difficulty in telling him, and am apt to make myself understood. But when I undertake to write about the matter, I find that if I have an idea in my head the pen operates upon it like a stiletto and the ink like poison. As for the blank sheet before me, it is transformed at once into a winding sheet.

"'Twas ever thus from childhood's hour."

When as a school boy I used to begin my letters home with the stereotype phrase "I take my pen in hand," I remember well that was about all I did take in hand. The pen drove everything else away.

It may be a mere conceit, but I fancy things have got to be much worse since the invention of the metallic pen. As a poet once sang,

"There's not a particle o' heart a-ganging wi' it."

I wonder old Gillôt wasn't gillotined.

The quill-pen has at least something sympathetic about it. It was once a part and parcel of animated nature. The imagination needs but little spur to associate it with pleasant scenes and festive memories. In its history there is something absolutely pathetie. You extend your haud to it as to a friend. You almost fondle it.

But the metallic pen—bah! There is nothing poetic about it, and nothing pleasant. It is of the earth earthy. It suggests nothing but forges and forgery. You would as soon think of foudling a jack-knife. You take it up with reluctance and lay it dowu with delight. There is no sense in it, and very rarely any ink. When made of steel it is a nuisance, and when it isu't people steal it. I move that it be abolished.

AN EASTER CAROL.

Here is a jolly fellow at the East singing an Easter carol. He would not travel from Dan to Beersheba and cry "All is barren!"—not he. From "the blood-red blossom of war, with its heart of fire," he extracts double-distilled dews of consolation. It would be pleasant to believe with him that there are no dungeons in this universe where the bolts do not all fasten on the inside; but we apprehend that this is mainly true of those dungeons into which people shut themselves, and even these not unfrequently close with snap locks on the outside, making Genevra's fate theirs. In the majority of the eases where the dungeon bolts inside, is not the bolt placed beyond the prisoner's reach?

The festival of human hope dawns this year on the greatest resurreetion of eighteen centuries. To the human race only that rising which it commemorates is of wider importance than the rising upon whieh it falls. Though as yet the penumbra of the tomb obscures the radianee of that new body which the nation has put on—though our country still walks in the morning twilight and gets taken by all dim eyes for the gardener rather than the God—America is risen—risen indeed!

Truly, our coming forth from the sepulchre, to such eyes, may seem more like that of Lazarus than of the Lord. The eerements of death hang to us here and there; our feet are not free from all slavish swaddlings—but we stand upright, walk, and have our arms out. Over the face of a great people is the napkin of maniplied shame—but the dead feel no shame, and weighty mutterings grow behind the napkin. How many of us in this great city blushed when Buchanan smote freedom and Kansas with the sword we ourselves had forged for his doting grasp? Who that deserves the pressure of an honest man's hand but blushes now to think of his not blushing then? The great ideas of freedom and national manliness have, in spite of all obstaeles from enemies and false friends, been familiarizing themselves during the last three years with all American humanity. Who that knows our impregnability to such ideas before the war can doubt that we of New York, with many of the people of the country, needed just such trials of blood, fire and wasted treasure as have been given us, to make us know that the nation, no less than the man who serves the devil, must get its account audited at the bar of hell? If, unlike the Prototype of all that suffer and are crowned, we died for our transgressions—we are still like him in this—that we have descended into hell, that we are now preaching to all spirits in prison. And our message is this:

"There are no permanent shackles for humanity! No race need despair of its franchise. Rejoice, all people! For in the universe exists no dungeon where the bolts do not all fasten on the inside!"

We are in possession and partial practice of this truth ourselves.

We have stopped waiting for God to do away with our national basenesses "in his own good time." The respectable clergymen who formerly crossed every yawning chasm of our nation's hill upon the convenient bridge of predestination—have got glasses for a text which existed in too fine print in their pulpit Bibles, and are preaching: "Work out your own salvation with fear and trembling." Having lost all our long Southern paper and had our accruing specie payments confiscated in transitu, many of us have first afforded, and then loved, to be honest.

One good indieation in us is a progressive revolt against the method of ceasing to be mean by degrees. Yet how hard it was to teach us that the way to stop stealing from a man is not to pick his pocket of one cent less each time! If De Gasparin could call us "un grand peuple qui se relève," at the very first shaking of the charnel doors, how much truer sound his words now when the last stones are undergoing demolition!

There is a thread in our thoughts as there is a pulse in our hearts; he who can hold the one knows how to think, and he who can move the other knows how to feel.

A charitable untruth is perhaps more excusable than an uncharitable truth; but both should be avoided.

THE COUNTESS DIANA.

[TRANSLATED FROM THE FRENCH OF MARIO UCHARD.]

II.

I RESUME my recital, William. You remember that I left off yesterday where, riding through the forest, Diana so deeply affected me by speaking of my leaving her. We galloped along, animated by the race, and I did not think of discussing the sentiment which reigned in my breast. I was happy and proud to love.

"Dear godmother, I will obey you," I at length replied; "but my cousin Clarency can wait a month for me."

"Oh, there is no hurry," answered she. "Besides, this solitude will soon arouse your taste for travelling."

A short distance from the chateau, while riding through a little meadow where the ship-building timber of the domain was placed for the dock-yard, we found ourselves face to face with Count Hugh de Manfert, my guardian and cousin, in company with his steward, who inspected the workmen.

The Count was one of the legitimate descendants of those ancient Gauls whom the soldiers of Cæsar contemplated with terror. He was nearly six feet in height, and had a dark and severe face, thick beard and bushy hair, which was hardly grey, although he was fifty-five years old. Like all very tall men he stooped a little; but age had passed lightly over his dry and nervous constitution. Thanks to his great athletic force, he was equally famous and dreaded in the country.

Standing by the side of the road, he awaited our coming. Raising his hat to salute my godmother, and summoning me: "Who, then, André, has given you permission to ride Ralph?" said he, in a tone which wounded me.

"Do I need your permission, sir," replied I, "to ride a horse which belongs to me?"

"Oh, you are at liberty to break your neck when you are alone, but I prohibit you, once for all, from riding this animal when you accompany my wife."

"Sir," said my godmother, "it is I who prayed him——"

"My dear Diana," he interrupted, "I do not admit that a prayer, even from you, can authorize your godson to transgress my wishes! Holloa! Tony," cried he to one of the grooms who followed us, "if you ever again let the Baron take this horse without my order, you will have an affair to settle with me!"

"Sir," I replied, boldly, "you forget, I imagine, that I am of an age to act as I please without your permission."

"André!" exclaimed my godmother, alarmed at my audacity.

"What does this mean?" resumed the Count, advancing a step towards me.

But I met his look resolutely, and answered, trembling with anger: "It means, sir, that I am not at all disposed to recognize the guardianship of your hostlers, and that I will horsewhip your Tony if he tries to prevent me from disposing of horses which are mine, and which I have paid——"

"That will do! He is mad!" exclaimed my guardian.

At this word I felt myself turn pale. A shiver of terror seized me.

"Oh, be silent! be silent!" said my godmother to the Count, with a supplicating gesture.

"Par Dieu! my dear," answered he brutally, "he has a right to his madness—he inherits it!"

He had scarcely finished speaking when I felt myself seized with a dizziness. The voice—the terrible voice of the spectre which troubles my dreams—uttered its cry. A sorrowful clamor and mist suddenly arose, enveloping me. Out of it rose the spectre. Luckily, Ralph was a blooded horse. I drove my spurs into his sides and fled.

"O, sir, sir, this is unworthy of you!" said the Countess to her husband.

I heard almost at the same instant the crack of his whip, and the ground echoing beneath the tread of the horses galloping in pursuit of me; but I did not stop. The road was plain; I had the field; Ralph flew along.

"Andre! Andre!" cried my godmother afar off.

Her voice rose above the clamor. I turned round and saw her, breathless and dismayed. I was going to wait for her, when between us I saw the horrible sorceress who followed me. It was Madness, deformed and horrible, with hair dishevelled, her great out-spread bat-wings flapping in the air and shaking off their unclean dust. I saw her lean, livid, terrible face, with eyes as black as hell. It was a mad chase. Ralph understood me; he, too, was afraid, and he flew.

"Stop! stop!" cried the phantom, "thy mother died mad! thy grandfather died mad! You are mine!"

"Ha! ha! accursed; catch me if you can!" replied I, dashing into the depths of the forest. "No! madness is not hereditary! Fly, accursed, we will escape thee!"

The white birch trees and the grand old oaks flew in disorder on each side of our route, and all in dismay repeated the yells of the hideous demon, while the increasing clamor filled the profoundest depths of the forest. A wolf, terrified by the satanical uproar, ran across the road, hiding himself in the thickest of the brush.

"Andre! Andre!" cried my godmother. She was alone, the grooms far away, and each time that her sweet voice called me I saw the sorceress sink in the earth; but she soon rose up with rage, and continued her sinister pursuit. Diana's horse touched her with his dilated nostrils, and the implacable and disordered chase continued. The rocks trembled, the earth slipped under the feet of our horses, the dust of the road rose up in whirlwinds. The ballad of Leonore came to my mind, but the dead go slower. In a half hour we had gone four leagues, and we entered the Wild Boar's glade. I had formed a marvellous plan. At the top of the hill that I then climbed there was an abyss sufficient to give one the vertigo—a crevasse twenty feet in width, at the bottom of which roared the broken waves of the Semoy. I had only to leap the precipice at a bound—the sorceress would break her neck there. I dashed forward with lightning speed. I reached the plateaus. "Up! up! my valorous hunter!" I cried to Ralph. I approached the abyss. A cry from my godmother resounded, so painful, so plaintive, that it pierced my heart. I looked back. Her horse had fallen, and she lay gasping on the ground. I stopped. The phantom, terrified by this disaster, flew away over the barren land.

I ran towards Diana. Thinking her dead, I placed my hand upon her heart—it scarcely beat.

I knelt near her, and lifted her in my arms, pressing her pale face to my breast. No hope for succor—we were in a desert. The two grooms, however, had followed our track; I heard their hurried gallop, and soon saw them appear at the foot of the declivity. Aided by Tony, I carried her to a spring that trickled through the moss a few steps distant from us. I bathed her temples, and poured a few drops of water on her lips. I called her through my tears; she did not reply.

It seemed to me that the world was coming to an end; already great black clouds spread over the plain, and ascended from the horizon to the plateau, as if to hide us under an immense black veil. Her hand was inert and cold, and to warm it I pressed it to my heart and to my mouth; I would have given her my blood, my breath and my life. At last a feeble sigh escaped her lips, a rosy tint colored her cheek, two tears rolled from under her eyelids. Finding me at her feet, she thought that she was dreaming.

"It is I! It is I!" I exclaimed.

A pressure of her hand alone answered me.

Nevertheless I reassured myself: she had luckily fallen on the heather, and was not injured, but she felt an overpowering weariness, and had not the power to move.

At the entrance of the Wild Boar's glade is the abandoned cottage of a wood-cutter. We broke down two young birch trees to make a litter, piled the branches on it, and descended the hillside, carrying my poor godmother. Tony and Paddy walked slowly along; and I—I staid near her, holding her hand.

I hastily improvised a bed of dry leaves, on which we laid her; then I ordered Paddy to ride with all speed to the chateau and bring a carriage.

"But if the Count were to see Agaric, covered with foam, he would dismiss me!" said he.

"Take Ralph!" I exclaimed, "and kill him if necessary!"

Poor Ralph! But she was so pale, so broken—I trembled for her.

"Do you suffer much?" I said to her, my face bathed in tears, as soon as we were alone.

"No, it is nothing; I was very much frightened, that 's all; I am very much benumbed now, and my eyes close in spite of me."

"Go to sleep; I will stay near you."

"Thank you," said she.

And she fell asleep and slept like a child.

III.

I knew that such prostration was usually the effect of violent agitation; nevertheless, I could not help a feeling of mortal anguish in thinking that she might have been killed in that terrible pursuit; I accused myself of cowardice. Rather a hundred times that the phantom had stifled me than thus to have exposed so dear a life. Leaning over my godmother, it seemed to me that this sleep, so heavy, would become eternal, and I trembled at the idea of seeing her no more, of never more hearing the voice that charmed me. Alas! I should then be alone in the world.

Hurried away by these sad thoughts, I began to question my heart, and its replies threw me into a strange trouble. Until that day, I had lived near Diana, abandoning myself to the sweet protection that she extended me. I loved her because she smiled on my youth and my hopes; I invoked her in my dreams like some kind fairy who consoled my weariness, and a sort of devotion was mingled with my attachment; but at that hour, when I trembled lest I should lose her forever, I was astonished to discover in myself unknown tumults, and I contemplated in ecstacies this beautiful and affecting sister of my isolation. I pitied her that she could not love the brutal man to whom fate had bound her, and at the same time I was rejoiced to see him so unworthy of her. Jealousy, pity, joy and sorrow were disputing my soul, and I lost myself in contemplating her, in admiring her beauty without being embarrassed by meeting her look in return; and for the first time I dared to read my heart. I was as if dazzled in there finding—love.

When my guardian arrived at the end of two hours, I sprang up, confused at his aspect; I blushed. Luckily, he thought it it was from fear. At his voice my godmother awoke. I must do justice to the Count de Maufert; he was very much moved, and his first word was for Diana. She soon reassured him laughingly.

"I have not the slightest hurt," exclaimed she, "Nick gently deposited me on the heath."

"Truly? You are not hurt?" said he, in a voice almost tender.

"If you doubt it, I will walk—like Lazarus."

By an effort of her will she raised herself up, but she tottered. My guardian took her in his arms and placed her in the carriage, filled with cushions and pillows; then getting in after her, he went off without addressing a word to me. Lost in thought I returned with Tony. Half-way to the chateau we met the doctor, who had been called in. I approached, and I heard him say:

"Well! she is greatly agitated, that 's all. One day of rest, and there will be no more of it, I hope. At all events, Count, I will return to Manfert for a more ample examination."

"Come in with us," said the Count. 'Hallo, Tony! come and take the doctor's horse."

And they drove off; but my dear godmother smiled at me from afar.

Arrived at the chateau, I stayed in the park watching for the doctor; after a half-hour he came out. I ran towards him and questioned him. He dissipated my fears; Diana would be obliged to stay in bed for two days, simply for prudence. I breathed again and went to my room, for it was necessary to avoid the Count. I foresaw only too well a disagreeable scene with my guardian; I wished to prepare for it, perfectly decided to revolt against a tyranny too weighty for my twenty years, and under which I had only bowed for the last six months in order not to worry my godmother. Night surprised me in the midst of my reveries; I pretended to be suffering from headache so as not to appear at table, and had my dinner served in my room. Leaning on the battlements of my turret, I contemplated the flying tints of the setting sun and the great shadows that descended the mountains; towards Germany, the purple ridges and the haughty rocks cutting the lead-colored sky; at my feet, the valley filled with mysteries and the meandering of the Semoy, which murmured over the black flints; the background not to be overlooked, the forest of Ardennes, where sank the evening star, illuminating still, with its rays of flame, the dark foliage of the giant oaks.

Suddenly a voice too well known caused my fairy visions to vanish. My guardian was before me.

"We have much to talk of," said he to me.

Without replying, I presented him a seat and waited.

"It is not your fault," he went on, "that to-day my wife did not kill herself in consequence of your folly, and I suppose you do not think that I am in a humor to bear a second time with such revolts."

The time was badly chosen to make an appeal to my submission. I replied coldly—

"Would it not be more just to accuse yourself of an accident that I deplore? I did not know that a man in my condition, twenty years of age, is actually reduced to the solitude in which you pretend to hold me."

"Your condition," said he with irony; "where have you learned that your condition is that of another?"

"But, sir, if you are my guardian, still another point. I am twenty years of age; and I have lived long enough as a man not to be treated altogether as a school-boy."

He regarded me with an air of pity. "Allons—a truce to big words, my dear; you are sick, and I wish to be indulgent."

"Sick? I, sir?" interrupted I. "And of what sickness, I beg of you?"

"Well, well! that is the doctor's affair."

"Nevertheless, sir!—"

"Listen to me, I recommend you!" renewed he with a tone of authority. "I did not come here to discuss with you, but to dictate to you my wishes."

"It is useless, sir," replied I distinctly, "for hereafter I intend to live according to my own fancy. The law gives you the administration of my fortune, but I can dispose of the income which you are obliged to allow me, choose my own horses, and ride them when it pleases me. If you know your rights as guardian, I know my rights as ward."

To my great astonishment the Count was impassible.

"Look here, my dear, do not excite yourself" said he; "you will have another fit, and I promised to be tender with you. It is necessary, at all hazards, to render you reasonable—"

At this word I at last understood his irony.

"Do you try to make me believe that I am mad?"

"No, no," said he; "there is a cure, I hope—"

This response was perfidious, but I was prepared for it; it glanced off from, without affecting me. Besides, the demon Madness was swallowed up in the barren land, and I had nothing more to fear.

A WIFE IN NEED IS A FRIEND INDEED.—Some time since a banker of Madras, Sir John Dean Paul by name, was condemned to penal servitude for making a fraudulent failure. Immediately after sentence was passed on him, his wife sold all her personal property, and took passage for Australia, where she bought a handsome property in the environs of Sydney. She was going through the trouble of getting settlers in her new residence when her husband arrived on the transport which brought prisoners from India to Australia. Immediately availing herself of the privilege which the English law accords to the inhabitants of Sydney, she asked and obtained permission to take her husband as servant. It is useless to say that once in the house the servant became the master, and that since that moment Sir John is satisfied enough with the unexpected manner in which he is serving out his sentence.

DAPHNE.

A COMMENCEMENT POEM—CALIFORNIA COLLEGE, JUNE 1ST.

THOUGH the nine Muses serve hut to heguile
With antique vestments and a classic style,
Though tho hright red their faded cheeks display
Looks quite suspicious at this distant day;
Still we indulge our fond delusive dreams,
Still think the goddess everything she seems;
Though the same grammar that our children use
Told us Musa was simply "To a-muse!"

Though tho soft nothings that as hait we hronght
To catch the Muse, who was n't always caught,
Came hack too often, spite of our designs,
To haunt our verses with their empty lines;
Though old as Shakspeare is the trick we keep
Of calling "spirits from the vasty deep,"
'Tis hut the tuning of the violins
Ere the full-volumed orchestra hegins;
Theso strains of discord and portentous noise
Stop shuffling feet and check mischievous hoys,
Arrest attention for the next delight,
And, like most hitters, whet the appetite.

But shall I falter if the mystic Nine
Curl their straight noses o'er this pago of mine,
Curve their thin nostrils in a scoruful way
Till the nez Grecian turns up retroussé—
Till my last vision of the flying fair
Is the Grcek knot that graces her hack hair?

Perish tho fancy! Rather I invoke
Some Hamadryad from theso groves of oak:
Not thou, fair maiden, whose initials mark
More than thy name on yonder forest hark;
Not thou, poor nymph, who dwell'st in yonder shade
Transformed to laurel from a tender maid—
O woudrous Daphne! foremost he thy fame
Who changed thy nature rather than thy name;
Too timid virgin, whose sad lot was cast
To fly thy lover, yet he "treed" at last,
Till high Olympus, in too literal mood,
Turned into wood the form that ouce was wooed!

Unhappy maid that, all the seasou through,
Hath hut ono dress, and that one color, too!
Lost child of Fashion, in oblivion sunk,
Thy total wardrohe packed in that one trunk!
Though round thy form the growing laurel flings
Instead of hoops its slow concentric rings,
How strange thy fate, hy man and gods ahhorred,
To find a tree that yields hoth hed and hoard!

What sights, O Daphne, have thy hright eyes seen
From thy hay-window in the forest green?
In the old days when through thine aisles, far-spread,
The dry hrush crackled to the Indian's tread;
When the tall ferns their fronds elastic dipped
Where the coyote or the grey wolf tripped;
When, on yon plain, heyond this helt of trees,
The wild-oats wrestled with the strong sea-hreeze—
As yet untrampled hy the restless herds,
Unreaped, ungathered, save hy free-winged birds,
Or the grave raven that, hlack-coated, stood,
The feathered padre of that neighhorhood.

Hush! was it fancy, or the rustling breeze
Brought that low whisper from the distant trees?
Was it the pattering of the laurel leaves
To some weird music that the sense deceives?
Was it a shadow in the swaying copse,
Or the one figure that my fancy hopes?
Was it?—nay, is it? By my soul, 't is she—
Breaking her honds and now forever free!
And, like the seed the hroom-pod hursting flings
Far from its prison, to the ground she springs.

Kind friends, adieu! My duty is to yield
To that fair maid an unencumhered field;
I'm hut the prologue that has stopped too long
The formal prelude of the one real song.
If, as I fancy, sho has aught to say,
Pray, let her say it in her simple way,
In just such metre as her tastes design,
Or that may meet her with more grace than mine.

The sun had sunk, but the ocean
Gleamed with its crimson hars;
Red was the sky ahove me,
And dusky the face of Mars;
'Twas when the earth was shaken
And filled with rumor of wars—
Wheu the flag that is flying above you
Counted hut thirteen stars.

Close to my home in the forest,
Stretching heneath my shade,
A holy Father and convert
Their weary figures laid.
Beyond, at a little distance,
Their mule with its hell had strayed,
And they hoth seemed to lie and listen
To the tinkling that it made.

At last spoke the holy Father:
"Son, 'tis the twilight tide,
When Lucifer and the archangels
Their earthly powers divide;
Then 'tis said that the Future
By mortal eyes is espied—
So says the holy legend,
So says my faith hesido.

"Thine eyes are clearer than mine are,
Thy faith is pleasant to see;
To such hath the legend givon
The power of prophecy.
Turn thine eyes to the sunset—
Fairly tell unto me
All that thou there heholdest,
Whatever the vision be."

"O Father, over the waters
Wonderful phantoms glide;
High caravals with their canvas
Stretching from side to side!"
"Hush, my child, 'tis tho sea-gull
Spreading his pinions wide,
Or the swans that are slowly drifting
Down with the ocean tide!"

"Father, over the sand-hills
A moving cloud hangs down—
The smoke of a thousand chimneys
That rise from a steepled town!"
"Foolish child!—'tis the sea-fog
That blows o'er the marshes brown,
To rise in the morn like an angel
Clad in a stainless gown!

"Hast thou heheld no vision
Such as blessed Jacob's eye—
Ladders dropped from heaven,
That angels ascended hy?"
"Stranger than that, O Father,
Is the wire that stretches high,
By which man's whispers and wishes
O'er valleys and mountains fly!"

"Cease, my child! 'Tis the Devil
Tempteth thee now, I fear;
But, ere thou wakest, tell me
What thou heholdest near."
"Father, those learned cloisters,
Such as were once so dear
In thine own famed Salamanca,
Close to mine eyes appear!

"Lo! as I gaze there gather
Strangers from every clime,
And in their midst a poet
Rises to read his rhyme."
"'Twas but the hell of the mule, child,
That did impatiently chime,
If we would shorten our journey,
Bidding us hasten hetime!"

Then rose the Padre and convert,
Brushed from their garments the dew,
And the dark trunks of the forest
Closed as they slowly passed through.
While I, alone in the laurel,
All of the convert's dream knew;
Saw from my home in the laurel
All of his vision come trne!

FIRE IN THE EIGHTH.

FROM OUR FRENCH CONTRIBUTOR.

MONSIEUR THE EDITOR: You have last week one description of a fire in New York, very graph-graph—what you call that word?—very telegraphic indeed. I have assist at one of the very striking spectacles of your city—I mean an incendiary scene. I dispatch myself to recount to you the details and the emotions which arise in my bosom at the sight.

I was promenade Montgomery street with the lovely Therese—whom, in the language of one of your owu poets, "to know is to love"—and I flatter myself that we was much regard by the fashionables of your city, as much for the chic of my attire, which was fresh from the Rue Richelieu, as for the tout ensemble of our aspect. Therese wore a robe a quille blue changeant, her chapeau was bleu du ciel, avec perles in clusters. Her bottines (ah! Monsieur the Editor, why shall you not reform the boots of your women? Your journals boast themselves much on the progress of your civilization; but your women wear boots of brown paper, without substance and without shape. You are barbarians as to your female feet, Monsieur) were black, small, lovely, seductive, make appetite, with substantial soles, and mount to the ankle modestly. Altogether she was mise perfectly; and the young fly-gobblers stare most grossly at her; of which I, knowing her constancy, can afford to mock myself.

Presently we hear a cry—"O-o-o-a-o-oh!" Then come "A-a-a-a-ah!" Then "Ai-ai-ai-ai-ai!" We stop ourselves, and remain at the listening. Then a bell ring, one, two, three, quatre, five, six, sept, eight time. Somebody cry Fire, and one man say it is at the Mission. Therese seize herself of my arm and cry: "My God! we are lost!"

"Reassure thyself!" I reply; "we shall perish together." And, by way of precaution, I to her slip the arm round the waist, and plant myself in a firm attitude.

"Fire! fire!" shout a gamin, as he run past us. Therese palpitate; I feel it.

A monster in a red shirt, the face of him more red as the shirt, rush past and roar, "Come on, you beggare!"

The mustard mouuts me to the nose, and I say to him:

"Beggare yourself, polisson!"

Then to Therese:

"Angel, glory and danger call. I must leave thee. It shall never be said that where an American would go a Frenchman shall fear to follow. If I see thee never more, remember Eugene."

She scream and she sob. But a true man of heart knows to steel himself against such little thing. I plant a warm kiss on her forehead, and I launch myself.

"O-o-o-o-oh! a-a-a-a-ah!" The noisc come nearer and nearer, and now I sec a regiment of pompiers (pumpers I suppose you call them) roaring and racing down the street drawing a fire-engine. In the front of them there run a man with a trompette, who roar twice, five time, ten time as loud as the rest. When I see them the ardor seize me, and I roar too· I cry—"Vive la Republique! A bas les tyrans! En avant!"

I was cry these manly words when a gross brute strike me on the inside of the leg, and I fall. I lift myself toute suite and seek my outrager. He had fly, the villaine, but the pompiers were upon me, and the capitaine he put his trompette to my ear and roar—

"Bear a hand, old cock!"

I was going to say that I was neither coq ni poulet mais un ex-militaire, when I find myself surround by pompiers all running; and myself to save from being much run and crush to death, I seize the rope and run with the engine. It was tres agréable at first, and I shout bully for Five, but bientot I begin to much lose my breath, and I say: "Easy, mes amis, easy!"

"Get up and get!" growl one red-shirt in the behind of me.

"Shake her up, Johnny Crapeau!" say one other chemise rouge.

"Split him in the potato trap!" cry one other shirt red.

I reply that I have no trap for the pomme de terre.

"Shake that brake, or I will punch your head!" he cry.

Not much like this sans cérémonie way with one stranger, I say: "Which of you will fight yourself with me with a pistol?"

But at that moment the capitaine of the machine, a brutal fellow, strong as two giant, catch me by the collare, strike me several time on the head and the breast bone with his trompette infamé, and shout, "Go ahead or I will you paste in the bugle!"

Then I see by the law of the city if a man does not run with the machiue his life is forfeit to the Supervisors, so I say to myself: "Therese, souvenez Eugene," and on I go, ready to die.

The fire was very long, but by-and-bye we get there. We run on the railroad track, and on the sidewalk, which make the big doctor much mad, but it shorten the distance. The fire is one tavern, kept by Monsieur Pioche—a countryman of mine. They call it the Willows, and it burn like one dam. Monsieur Pioche he stand in the shooting-gallery and cry: "Sacré, do not let one feather roast of that rare bird, the Emeu."

The men in the red shirt reply that they will not, and the capitaine says, par example. And so the fire go.

The firemen work like old moustaches, but, by gar, the fire burn everything. It roast the ducks in the pond, and it burn the bill of theEmeu—which shall make an Emeute—n'est ce pas! (When Therese see that, she shall screw up her rosy lip and say: "What a fearful attempt!" I believe.)

The fire was out, and the man that did hve in the house was out—and he had not much chemise on his back, for everytbing was burn by the fire. I was much astonish that I was left alone with the engine. All the red-coats did disappear and should not come back. One big man, with a big hat and much big trompette, come to me and say:

"Play away, Five!"

I take my hat in my hand and say: "It is not play, Monsieur Scannell; it is work; aud the thing is what you call played out!"

He was much mad, and said I was one "big bilk."

Je ne comprends pas, Monsieur Editor, what he did mean by that. But my cheek got much red, and I told him he was one rascal to mind his own business.

The red-shirt return, and the capitaine say he have been with the pompiers to wet their whistle.

What for they not ask me? Do they think not that I have one whistle myself, which is often dry, parbleu!

I tell them then I think I shall cut my stick, and the capitaine shout, "Play away, boys."

I look to see if the fire was again break out in the rear, but, by gar, they was play upon me. My chapeau was wet as though it rain, and I have no parapluie. My collar was wilt, and my boots was full of wet.

I cry, "I will stay here no more; I will die; no one shall help me!" and then I cut my stick.

I ask Therese what I shall do, and she say, "Write to the paper." I write one little brochure, but the paper all say it will interfere with the election. After the election was over, they say it would interfere with Scannell. Therese told me write the CALIFORNIAN, for Auguste, the great artiste in omelette soufflées and pomme de terre pic, relate to her that it was the most indepeudent journal on the coast. Voila tout, Monsieur Editor. Pour vous toujours et partout.

EUGENE.

A PNEUMATIC underground tube for the transmission of the mails has been laid from the easteru station of the London and Northwestern Railroad Company to the district post-office in Eversholt street. Its length is 600 yards. On the 20th of February, 1863, the post-office authorities discontinued their street conveyance, and intrusted the company with the transmission of the mails. The service of that district has since been entirely performed by the company. Thirty trains per day (Sundays excepted) have been dispatched with perfect regularity, and upwards of 4,000 trains have been sent. The transmission occupies 70 seconds. It costs about $5 per day. The transmission is made by exhaustion of the air in the tube at one end, and at the same time admitting it at the other. It is proposed to carry passengers in the same way at the rate of 240 miles an hour.

Every country should be bounded north, south, east, and west, by Truth, Justice, Charity, and Peace.

THE POET'S LIBERTY.

Richard Lovelace, in that most exquisite of lyrics, his "Song to Althea from Prison," embodies the following beautiful sentiment:

Stone walls do not a prison make,
Nor iron bars a cage;
Mindes innocent and quiet take
That for an hermitage;
If I have freedome in my love,
And in my soule am free,
Angels alone that sore above
Enjoy such liberty.

VAMPYRES.

Speculatino on the use and misuse of words, an inquirer after truth may, without equivocation, reasonably doubt whether the word "supernatural" has any true meaning or real significance. If Mr. William Howitt should see—as he so often has seen—three-legged tables dance wild fandangoes; if he should hear—as he often has heard—soft music discoursed by harmoniums touched by invisible hands; if Mr. Home, defying gravitation, should aseend to the ceiling and flit about, as he so often has done, I do not kuow that anybody has more right to call these things supernatural, than I have to doubt the facts recorded. Made cognizant to human nature by that great resultant of law and forces which we agree to call simply Nature, how can any manifestation to human senses be justly called superuatural?

There must be a beginning to all discovery. Phenomena observed before the reason of them is made apparent always seem mysterious. The question, "how an apple, a gross, corporeal thing—a material entity, to adopt the language of science—gets into the middle of an apple dumpling," provokes no nine days' wonder now; but time was when the case puzzled a king. Solomon was a wise man, and so was Socrates, and so was Solon: would they not have eonsidered it a mysterious thing, had they seen messages sent by electric telegraph to places thousands of miles away? When Pizarro awoke the echoes of temples of the Incas by firing off his Spanish field-pieces, I wonder whether the Aztec priests did not regard the case as supernatural? Upon consideration, I think Mr. Howitt, Mr. Home, and every other gentleman who has had visional relations with the spirit world, who has touched that fringe of which Mr. Howitt somewhere speaks,—the peculiar fringe which, according to him, descends upon earth from some celestial upholsterer's shop up above,—will own, on consideration, that nothing has happened, or can happen, nothing which has been seen or can be seen, that has been heard or can be heard, that has been felt or can be felt, that has been smelt or can be smelt, should be justly called supernatural.

I am one of those who have come to the conclusion, that more harm comes of believing too little than of believing too much. For my part, I believe almost everything that is recorded by a man of good repute, provided that my own experience does not disprove it; and in a general way I believe everything that is recorded by a lady. It saves a world of trouble, this unlimited faith; it has the merit of being logical, moreover, having regard to the axiom long accepted by logicians, that it is wholly impossible to disprove a negation. After making this confession of faith, it will not seem wouderful in the least degree that I have been studying the manners and customs of spirits, hobgoblins, creatures of the elements, such as undines, sylphs, salamanders, gnomes, fairies, and the like; witches, wizards, sorcerers, necromancers of various countries and of various epochs; creatures, in short, that some people denominate—incorrectly, as I believe, and have sought to prove—"supernatural." Yes, I have been studying them all in many a recording page; from the mouldy aud worm-eaten tomes coeval with the discovery of printing, to the railway volumes with many-colored binding, reminding one of the particolored coat of Benjamin. Yes; the the things falsely called "supernatural," I have been studying them all; and not carefully in the least degree, those being so horrible, so dreadfully curious, so dangerous withal, concerning which some few explanatory words shall presently be written,—the wandering, blood-thirsty vampyres—Vroucolakas or Broucolakas of the Grecks.

Perhaps there never was yet an extraordinary revelation vouchsafed to the faithful, concerning which sceptics and scoffers—people of science, as they call themselves, those men of dwarfed and paralyzed minds, so beautifully portrayed by Mr. William Howitt—have not suggested some meau and groveling imputation, the acceptance of which would reduce the facts narrated to the category of merc superstitions, fostered mostly by churches and by priests. Accordingly, in respect of vampyres, I have seen the statement made, that the assumption of these creatures as realities is referable to a certain pretension that an individual dying under sacerdotal ban, and being interred, could not decay after the manner of honest corpses committed to earth. A pretension indeed! as if the learned Michael Raufft, who wrote a learned book, "De Masticatione Mortuorum in Tumulis," is not worthy of all evidence—as if the learued book of similar title, published by Philip Rehrius, could leave the matter in doubt. I grant that the recitals published by these learned authors do not abound with such deeds of active vampyredom as form the subject of popular traditiou in places where vampyredom is most rife: but they are conclusive as to the main basis of belief on which vampyredom rests; affirming the proposition, that divers human corpses have been known to retaiu a sort of spurious life, to move in their graves, to eat whatever came within the reach of their unhallowed arms, to be heard munching and masticating like swine,—whence the title of the book, "De Masticatione."

Ghosts, hobgoblins, and, to be short, all other beings which certain superficial thinkers eall supernatural, had been made matter of study long before tables began to speak, or even to turn. The learned Calmet gave much attention to pneumatology—vide his book in proof of it.* I think the following sentiments, enunciated in the preface to that book, will come commended to the appreciation of many; and I would humbly call the reader's attention to the highly important place the learned writer accords, in the science of the so-called supernatural, to the particular hobgoblins (if by their leave we may call them so) of which I shall have to treat.

It is always a matter of regret, writes Calmet in his preface, to have deceived one's self; and it is dangerous (speaking in a religious sense) to believe on insufficient grounds, to deny rashly, to remain in wilful ignorance, or to voluntarily continue wrapped in superstition or illusion. A good deal will have been achieved by an individual who has learned how to doubt wisely, in such way that he does not allow his judgment to range beyond his testimony. That which has most impressed me in the matter concerning which I treat is the recitals I have met with of vampyres, or "revenans" of Hungary and Moravia, of Poland, of the "Broucolaques" or "Vroucolakas," so called by the Greeks;—all oxcommunicated bodies which, it is said, are unable to decay.

The remark has been made by the Rev. H. Christmas, translator of Calmet's book, "Snr les Apparitions," that Calmet seems less disposed to believe in vampyredom than in any other manifestation of the so-called supernatural; that though he receives the attestations of almost every sort of apparition without cavil, yet the French divine—rather indirectly than directly—seems to throw some sort of doubt upon the history of vampyres. The reverend translator starts an hypothesis to account for this, which probably may be in some measure correct. He says that the records of vampyredom have especially belonged to people holding to the Greek or Eastern faith; for which reason a French divine would not be unlikely to cavil at the testimony handed down in relation to these beings.

Perhaps it may be here just as well, before proceeding further, to explain, for the benefit of all such readers who may require the information, what manner of being exactly a vroucolaka or vampyre is. Truly, the name is common enough; but the meaning of many names that I could mention is partly, or even wholly unknown, though they are in the mouths of most of us, and come trippingly enough on the tongue. Awhile ago, a very popular author, yielding to impulsiveness, wrote that he would wake the welkin; then presently, laughing at himself, he confessed total ignorance as to what the welkin exactly might be. A vampyre, then, is—well, what shall we say? Not a ghost, certainly; except we alter most of our existing notions of a ghost. The best definitiou I can give of a vampyre is, a living, mischievous, and murderous dead body. A living dead body! Well, the words are wild enough, contradictory, incomprehensible;—but so are vampyres.

Assuming as true the records about dead people moving in their tombs, eating therein, coming therefrom, with or without murderous intent, the learned Calmet devotes entire pages to a reasonable debate upon the case. He touches upon the mysteries of life and death, and sets forth the extreme difficulty of accounting for the phenomena of a corpse rising from the tomb without disturbing the earth, and of returning thereto without disturbing the earth; of the utter unmeauingness of a ghoul such as this taking pleasure in the molestation, even murder, of its once dearest friends. Lastly, he asks how it can be that a dead body, out of which the soul—the life—hath fled, can yet retain a second life. All this he asks, aud more; he throws doubt on the case, but nowhere expressly denies the existence of vampyres. I think he tries to make it seem, inferentially, that vampyredom is wholly an illusion, a fiction of the Greek Church; but he almost cuts the ground from under him by presenting certain records of living dead people, which come very nearly up to the mark of vampyredom. He quotes the German authors, Raufft and Rehrius (concerning whom mention has already been made), seemingly disposed to believe much they have related concerning the gluttony—the swinish munching—practised by certain evil-disposed corpses.

Raufft takes it for a certain conclusion, writes Carden, that certain corpses have been known to devour the grave-clothes and other things within their reach; nay, even their own flesh. He remarks, that in certain parts of Germany, in order to prevent this horrible habit of under-gro md feasting, grave-diggers are accustomed to put a good hard packing of earth under a suspected corpse's chin; that, moreover, to make security doubly sure, some grave-diggers place in the mouths of suspected corpses a little bit of silver, or else a stone, taking the further precaution to tie a handkerchief tight about the throat.

Certain of the milder, the least mysterious tales concerning dead-alive people, admit of a sort of half-explanation, by adopting the hypothesis of trance; as, for example, the following cases narrated by Calmet:

The Count de Salm, having been thought dead, was buried alive. As night approached, great cries were heard in the church of the abbey of Haute Seille; and the following morning, his grave having been opened, the corpse was found lying face downwards. Once upon a time, at Bar le Duc, a man having been interred, a sound was presently heard to come from the grave; being disinterred on the day following, he was found to have eaten the flesh of his arms. This man had drunk brandy to excess, and had been buried as dead. Raufft bears evidence concerning a woman of Bohemia, who, in 1345, had eaten, whilst in the grave, about one-half of her shroud.

More extraordinary, and trenching more nearly on the domains of pure vampyredom, is the following, narrated by William of Newbridge, an English author, who lived in the middle of the twelfth century, and quoted by Calmet. He states that in his time was seen, in the county of Buckingham, a man who appeared bodily, as when alive, three successive nights to his wife, and after that to his nearest relatives. They could only defend themselves by watching and making a great noise when they perceived him approaching. The creature even dared to show himself occasionally in the daytime; whereupon the Bishop of Lincoln assembled his council, who told him that similar things had often happened in England, and that the only known remedy against the evil was to catch the wanderiug body, and burn it. The Bishop could not at once fall in with this; he thought the remedy cruel. He adopted another plan, and it was this: Having written a schedule of absolution, he placed it on the body of the corpse; and from that time no more of him was seen or heard. This sort of apparition would appear incredible, wrote the author, if several instances had not occurred in his own lifetime, and if he did not know several persons who believed in them.

The latter argument is, I humbly think, irresistible. The same author—Newbridge—states that a man who had been interred at Berwick came out of his grave every night, and made a great disturbance in the neighborhood. He even boasted that he should not cease to disturb the living until they had reduced him to ashes. Thereupon the neighbors selected ten bold and vigorous young men, who took him out of the ground, cut his body to pieces, and burned it to ashes. But some one among the crowd having said that he could not burn until they had torn out his heart, his side was pierced with a stake. Through the opening thus made they extracted the heart, whereupon the body was consumed, and appeared no more.

It is a remarkable fact, and therefore worthy to be noted here, that amongst the pagan Romans the notion prevailed that dead bodies of certain persons were subject to be incited from their graves by sorcerers, except incremation had been performed, or decomposition had actually taken place. On this point study the following allusion of Lucan; the words are represented by him to have been spoken by an enchantress to an evoked spirit:

"Tali tua membra sepulchro
Talibus exuram Stygio cum carmine Sylvis
Ut nullos cantata Magos exaudiat umbra."

All this may have been, says Calmet; but that those who are really dead move their jaws, and amuse themselves by chewing whatever may be near them, is, again says he, a childish fancy—like what the ancient Romans said of their manducus, which was a grotesque figure of a man with an enormous mouth, full of big teeth; the jaws being moved by springs. The Roman frightened children with these manduci; hence the following allusion of Juvenal:

"Tandem que redit ad pulpita notum
Exodium, cum personæ pallentis hiatum
In gremio matris formidat rusticus infans."—Juv., Sat. iii, 174.

Some remains of the ancient custom may be seen in certain processions, wherein the figure of a serpent is carried, which ever and anon opens and shuts its jaws, between which cakes are thrown by lookers on.

Authors have reasoned a good deal on these events, writes my authority. (1) Some have believed them to be miraculous. (2) Others have looked upon them as simply the effect of a heated imagination, or a sort of prepossession. (3) Others, again, have believed that there was nothing in them but what was very simple and natural; these persons not being dead, but acting naturally upon other bodies. (4) Others have asserted that it was the work of the devil himself. Amongst these, some have advanced the opinion that there were certain benign demons, differing from those who are malevolent and hostile to mankind. But what greater evils can one have to fear from veritable demons and the most malignant spirits, than those which the ghouls of Hungary inflict on persons whose blood they suck, and thus cause to die? (5) Others say it is not the dead who eat their own flesh or clothes, but serpents, rats, moles, ferrets, or other voracious animals, or even striges—birds that devour animals and men, and suck their blood.... It is added, that these vampyres are known only to certain countries, as Hungary, Moravia, and Silesia, where plague, pestilence, hydrophobia, drunkenness, are most common! where the people, being badly fed, are subject to certain disorders, occasioned by climate and food. As to what some have asserted, that the dead have been heard to eat and chew like pigs in their graves, it is manifestly fabulous, writes my author. Such an idea can have its foundation only in ridiculous prepossessions.

From these remarks it would seem that Calmet is altogether sceptical about the narrations of dead-alive men aud women; but I do not know why he should be, since he does not venture to impugn the following still more extraordinary narration, communicated to him by a contemporary priest of his own church.

"A curé of the diocese of Constance," he states, "named Bayer, makes to me in writing the following relation. He states, that in 1728, he (Bayer) having been appointed to the cure of Rutheim, he was disturbed one morning by a spectre, who came in the form of a peasant, badly made, ill-dressed, and smelling abominably. He knocked at the door in an insolent manner, and, being admitted, entered the study. He then told the curé Bayer, that the Prince Bishop of Coustance had sent him (the hobgoblin) upon a certain business,.... but the statement was untrue. The hobgoblin then asked for something to eat; whereupon meat, bread, and wine were set before him. Taking up the meat with both hands, he devoured it, bones and all, saying, 'Observe how I eat both flesh and bone: do the same!' Then taking up the wine-cup, he swallowed the contents of it at a draught; asked for another, which, when supplied, he served the same. Rising then, he withdrew—never so much as saying 'Good-bye' to the curé. The servant who saw him to the door, having demanded his name,—'I was born at Rutsingen, and my name is George Ranlin,' he replied; but he spoke falsely. Then turning to the curé whilst going down stairs, the hobgoblin said in German, 'I'll show you who I am.'

"He passed all day in the village," Calmet's curé's letter of testimony goes on to state, "showing himself to everybody. Towards midnight he returned to the curé's door, crying out three times in a terrible voice, 'Monsieur Bayer! I will let you know who I am!' Day by day for three long years he returned towards 4 o'clock P. M., and every night remaining till day-dawn. He showed himself in different forms,—sometimes like a water-spaniel, sometimes like a lion or other terrible animal: sometimes as a man, but sometimes (and this must have been worst of all) in the guise of a pretty girl, sitting at the cure's bedside!—Thus testifies Monsieur Bayer.—Sometimes the hobgoblin made an uproar in the house like a cooper hooping a cask. The curé, desiring to have witnesses, often sent for the beadle and other chief people of the village to bear testimony. At last the curé had recourse to exorcising, but with no effect. Despairing almost of being delivered from these vexations, he provided himself at the end of the third year with a holy branch, on Palm Sunday; also with a sword sprinkled with holy water. The hobgoblin was now soon to have the worst of it. Appearing again [whether in the form of a man or dog, a lion or a young lady, informant does not state], the cure first dashed the holy water in the goblin's face, then smote the being with the blessed sword. He did this once or twice, and from that time was no more molested. This is attested by a Capuchin monk, witness of the greater part of these things, April 19th, 1749."

Cardan declines to guarantee the truth of all these circumstances; the judicious reader may make what induction he pleases from them. If they are true, here, says he, is a real ghost who eats, drinks, and speaks,—giving tokens of his presence for three whole years without any appearance of religion.

Sceptics may seek to throw discredit upon the narrations of vampyredom, by urging what I conceive to be the fact, that although vampyres have been seen by the thousand, have been known to leave their graves and wander about biting and blood-sucking their once dearest friends; nevertheless, no authentic information is available relative to the manner in which they leave their graves, or the way in which they go back to the same. No vampyre that I am aware of has ever been caught in the very act of coming ont of a grave, or going back again.

* "Dissertations sur les Apparitions des Anges, des Démons, et des Esprits; et sur les Revenans et Vampires de Hongrie, de Bohème, de Moravie, et de Silésie." Par le R. P. Dom. Angustin Calmet, Religeux Bénédictin, et Abbé de Senones en Lorraine. Paris, MDCCXLVI.

The omission is not of a sort to shake the belief of any reasonable man in the general truth of vampyredom, knowing well, as all of us do know, that thousands of occurrences take place from time to time under the very noses of people near, without their seeing what happens. I once explored the battle-field of Waterloo in companionship with a local guide, who, during that day of mortal strife, had been present in the amateur capacity of a suttler or canteen-bearer, ministering comforts to the wounded. Gazing from the summit of the huge mound whereon the Belgian lion stands — allegorical, in a certain sense, of Belgian bravery—I looked down on many a grave and many a trophied marble. Thick they were—thick those graves, those trophied marbles! and I bethought me how far more thickly strewn on the evening of the day of strife must have been the writhing wounded, the shattered and gory dead! I forthwith pictured to myself the serried squares, belching their volleys at the French columns, pressing on; and I sought to reproduce the scene of men stricken by lead or steel, and suddenly laid low. "They fell fast enough," said I; "it must have been an awful sight."

"Parbleu!" interposed my guide; "you may think it odd, but I did not see one man fall. They would come on, and then a volley, a bayonet or cavalry charge, a tremendous noise, fire, smoke, and all that; and when it was over, there they would lie, just like those sheep there, Monsieur; but, on my honor, not one fellow did I actually see go down."

Very well; Calmet did not record, and assuredly would not wish it to be understood, that revenans, as he calls them—or, to be plain, disreputable corpses whom earth rejects—can be numbered by the million. He perhaps refers to some scores; and if nobody has ever caught one of these flagrante delicto, in the very act of coming out of a grave, what does this prove? Nothing, to my mind, after what the guide told me at Waterloo.

The act of munching in a grave, or even coming out of a grave, violates social proprieties, truly, but nothing more. It is not every human mind, indeed, that is strong enough, or sufficiently well balanced, to look upon a horrible prodigy unmoved. If revenans, as Calmet denominates them, were more frequent than they are, then probably many spectators might be scared into fits or go mad outright; but if a disreputable corpse should get out of its coffin, and wander about murderously intent, wreaking vengeance all night, biting, blood-sucking, and going back to its grave before morning, it would be a very serious, a very dangerous matter. This is just what vampyres do, nevertheless.

In like manner as sceptical people—the men of paralyzed minds so beautifully described by Mr. Howitt, the paralysis having been induced by a too continuous study of what we falsely call the inductive sciences—find some absurd way of accounting for, or else denying altogether, the best attested facts of pneumatology; such as table-turning, table-dancing, spirit-rapping, spectral waiting, luminous hands, mystical accordeon playing, and other modern spiritual manifestations; so more than one writer has attempted to explain away the precise relations concerning dead-alive people of all varieties, from the masticatores of Raufft to the vroucolakes of the Greeks. Accordingly, it is argued, as already stated, that the milder—the least extraordinary—of these recitals are amply accounted for on the assumption of trance; and that the records of pure vampyredom, tales about dead-alive men arising from their tombs, stalking about, blood-sucking, and murdering, are based on a pretension of the Greek church, to the effect that Mother Earth refuses to accept and retain in her bosom corpses of persons who have come under orthodox excommunication. It has ever been accepted as a tenet of faith by the Eastern church, I believe, that no unorthodox corpse can possibly decay if buried in orthodox soil. There might be something in this view of the case, if records of dead-alive people were traceable only to authors of the pure Greek faith; but seeing that testimony from other quarters is forthcoming—considering that dead-alive people have been known to wander from their tombs in England as well as Germany—it seems to me that the hypothesis cited falls wholly to the ground. It must be conceded, however, that vampyredom has received what we may call its highest development in countries the people of which acknowledge the orthodox Greek church. Eastern European vampyres have always been more fierce, more murderously inclined, than corresponding beings of the west. Climate may have something to do with this; and perhaps temperament.

Even on matters of the most apparently transcendental kind it is possible to draw practical deductions. No harm can ever come of making security doubly sure. I am led to infer, then, that if a dead body, after a reasonable time of burial has elapsed, be still found soft and pliable; if it bleeds on puncture, and shows no sign of fulfilling the decree of "dust to dust," there is room for the worst suspicions. In such a case the unquiet and evil-disposed corpse can be laid by adopting one of two expedients. The first is, to cause the grave to be beaten with a hazel twig, the operator being a virgin of not less than twenty-five years old. The second expedient consists in digging the body up and burning it. My authorities leave me no room to doubt that the first and much simpler remedy is not equally effective with the second; nevertheless, for some inexplicable reason, the remedy of incremation is always practised in lands where vampyres do most abound.—St. James's Magazine.

Bachelors.—In the good old times it was considered unpatriotic in a citizen to remain a bachelor all his days. By the Spartan laws, those citizens who remained bachelors after middle age were excluded from all offices, civil and military. At certain feasts they were exposed to public derision, and led around the market place. Although, generally speaking, age was usually respected at Sparta, yet this feeling was not manifested towards old bachelors. "Why should I make way for you," said a Spartan youth to a gray-headed old bachelor, "who will never have a son to do me the same honor when I am old?" The Roman law pursued the same policy towards old bachelors. They had to pay extra and special taxes, and under Augustus a law was enacted by which old bachelors were made incapable of acquiring legacies and devises of real estate by will, except from their near relatives. In canon law old bachelors are enjoined to marry, or to profess chastity, or in earnest to become monks.

Madness, like epilepsy, gives more pain to the spectator than the performer; for it is only an earlier death, a longer dream, a day-walking instead of night-walking.

Blame not a man too harshly for throwing dirt; he shows by the very act that it is his natural weapon.

STORIES FOR GOOD LITTLE BOYS AND GIRLS.

On the principle probably that every family journal should have a department especially devoted to the young, a lively exchange gets up the following good little stories for good little people:

There was a good little boy, and his name was Johnny. He was a poor boy, but once he saw a dollar lying in his mother's workbox, and he picked it up and put it in his pocket, as he was afraid she might lose it or waste it in buying something to eat, and went and set himself up in the boot-blacking business. He was a very hard-working boy, and went on the good principle of never stealing anything he could not carry off. He saved his money, as good little boys ought to do, and when he was sent to the Penitentiary for taking a coat, he had a great deal of money laid away safe. All little boys should imitate the example of Johnny, so that when they come out of the Penitentiary they can have something to go on.

—

There was another good little boy named Timothy. He had been told that a penny saved was two pennies earned, and he always remembered it, and saved all his pennies. Once a vagabond old woman asked him to give her a penny, just because she happened to be poor and starving; but little Timothy had been taught better, and he said, in a winning way:

"No you don't, old gal. A penny saved is two pennies earned, and it is better to make two coppers out of one than to throw away one."

Timothy is now a very successful Government contractor, and has chartered to his country a great many vessels, belonging to other people which could not be used for any other purpose. If he can keep out of prison, he is sure of making a fortune very soon.

—

There was another little boy named Harry, who lived in Cincinnati. Cincinnati is a large city, and the streets are very slippery, because there is so much live lard running over them. Harry always had a great and good idea of doing well in the world, and becoming rich, and consequently respectable. So, when he was sixteen years old, he borrowed a dollar, and commenced business at a Fair grouud, with a jug of whisky and a tin cup. When this was sold out, he bought some more, and so went on increasing his stock and his money, until he was able to buy a corner-grocery. He is now a very rich man, and owns several large distilleries, which are manufacturing a great quantity of bald-face whiskey, and bringing happiness and comfort and wealth to a great many poor families that are fond of whiskey. When the man who had loaned him the dollar asked him to pay it back, because the man was poor, Harry very properly told him to do as he had done, to borrow a dollar of some other man, and commence business like Harry had; but as for paying him the dollar, he should do no such thing, as he had made it a rule to save all he got. The man thanked Harry for this valuable advice, and is now one of the most promising inmates of the Ohio Penitentiary.

—

There was a little girl, named Sarah Ann, who was a poor girl when she commenced business, and had nothing except what she could cabbage from the woman with whom she worked. But she was very industrious and saved all she got, and she now owns a large millinery establishment, where she employs a great many girls, and she has made a fortune by the vast deal of work she had out of them. She is very good to the girls, for she remembers that she herself was once poor; so she lets them work sixteen hours a day, and sometimes gives them something to eat. When they die, she buries them cheaply but decently.

—

There was an honest German lad, named Heinrich, who came to this country very poor, and worked in a brewery for five dollars a month and find himself. Think of the lowly situation of the lad, especially if he had tumbled into a beervat! But Heinrich studied hard, and soon invented a way of making beer very cheap, without using much hops or malt, which was a great blessing to the country, as a little cheap poison saved a great deal of valuable property. He now owns a brewery of his own, and has a splendid lager beer saloon, with a number of pretty waiter girls, who are very fascinating, and who bring him in a great deal of money. He also thinks of starting a graveyard of his own.

—

There was a little boy named Peter, who had been told that if he would take care of the pence the pounds would take care of themselves. So, when he hired out to a Dutch grocer, he took care of the pence which he found in the drawer, and let the pounds of sugar and coffee take care of themselves, while he got more pence by pitching coppers with the boys in the street. Before he was found out he had saved enough money to start a grocery of his own, and is now a prominent member of that wealthy and honorable body, the Corn Exchange. He boasts that he has never been in the State Prison but twice. As some people think it respectable to keep out of such a place, this is a great deal to say.

—

There was a little boy named Thomas, who had a brother named Jeremiah, and the delightful beverage called Tom and Jerry was named after them by their grateful fellow-citizens—which shows that they must have been highly respectable. Thomas saved up his pennies and bought oranges. When he had eaten the oranges he was wont to scatter the peel before the doors of surgeons, and the good surgeons kindly allowed him a commission for the people who slipped on the peel and broke their arms and legs. He saved the money which the worthy surgeons paid him, and became rich, and attained the age of forty-five years before he was hung.

—

There was a little boy named Samuel, who had been told that virtue was its own reward. He supported himself and his aged mother by picking up little things that other people seemed to have no use for. Once he found a fine gold watch. A foolish boy would have taken it to the owner, to get a reward; but Samuel knew that virtue is its own reward, and therefore rewarded himself for his virtue by keeping the watch. The owner might not have given him more than half the value of it. Samuel is still making money, and can go to jail whenever he chooses, and have an easy time.

—

There was a little boy named—but we need not tell you his name—who commenced life as an humble member of Congress and Brigadier-General. Of course, he was entirely uneducated; but, by making good use of his leisure hours, and reading Poor Richard's Almanac and the newspapers, he has attained a remarkable celebrity as a poor but honest author, and has written those pleasing narratives for good little children.

A GAMBLING CARNIVAL.

Under the above head, a writer in the Round Table narrates a descent into Wall street. We make the following extract, showing what he saw, and the conclusions at which he arrived:

The room was large, dusky, dirty and crowded. Plain wooden seats were arranged in a semicircle—precisely like the benches of a concert-saloon—around a place like a pulpit. In this stood an old gentleman with gray hair and whiskers, holding in one hand a ponderous mallet of rosewood, and in the other a bass drumstick. Behind him hung a small gong, and beside him sat a strange-looking, skeleton-like young man, with long hair and an account-book. The benches were full of men, all with their hats on, and all anxious of expression. Rather a good-looking set generally, but with hideous exceptions. A vast number of them bore unmistakable traces of a Hebraic origin. All these persons were vociferously talking at once, and the din of voices was insupportable. Several rose simultaneously in their places, pointing at each other vindictively, and shouting phrases that sounded to me like insult. I thought, for a time, that a free fight must inevitably result, till I found that they were merely trying to buy or sell stocks.

I cannot begin to repeat the mysterious formula they uttered. It was all Greek to me, and worse. The main object seemed to be an increase of the confusion already reigning, and when ten or fifteen persons, young and old, Jew and Gentile, got to the pitch of their voices, all yelling themselves purple in the face, the old gentleman in the pulpit added to the demoniac roar by beating sturdily upon his gong with the drumstick and upon the counter with the gavel, crying "Order! order, gentlemen!" as loud as any of them.

In the course of my varied studies of the human being under various excitements, I have penetrated to those unhallowed chambers devoted to the joyous but expensive games of faro and roulette. Likewise have I witnessed the playing of brag and poker upon the turbid bosom of the Mississippi; but nowhere have I seen card gamblers who would for a moment have tolerated the undignified, the insane, the graceless and avaricious confusion that characterized this meeting of the outside board of stock-brokers. Hitherto my idea of down-town business had been associated with some notions of heavy respectability and quiet importance; but such notions are shattered and scattered forever. I can only remember this scene as a type of Bedlamite financial debauchery, and flummery irretrievable. Instinctively I buttoned my pockets—a somewhat needless precaution, perhaps, but an inscrutable avarice permeated the atmosphere, and I had vague fears of losing the coat off my back, my hat, my boots, my senses, anything and everything that I might possess.

There were many boys present, of ages from fourteen to twenty. Some of these bought and sold heavily, exhausting their shrill treble voices to a degree of hoarseness quite painful. Most of the youngsters, however, contented themselves with taking notes of the fluctuation in price of the different stocks. Such were probably sent there by their employers for the purpose. I was told that they often acquired wonderful skill in judging the market thus, and came out strong as brokers on their own account ere long. One such, known as "Little Charley," was pointed out to me as knowing far more about stocks than his employers of the firm of G. B. & Co.

The noise soon wearied me. I do not see, for the life of me, how this sort of thing can be endured more than a year without fatal results. I would not pursue it for a longer period without some surety of gaining a larger fortune than the majority ever gain. I passed out then, only to find a still denser, noisier crowd surrounding the door-steps. Men were darting in for a moment, and returning with new quotations from the sale inside, which they vociferated stentorianally, offering to buy or sell to the throng below—unhappy wretches, who had not the key to those mysterious portals.

Trying to wedge my way through this dense mass of humanity, I was accosted by a young man of good-humored appearance, who asked me if it was "going hard or soft inside." Not quite comprehending the phrase, I said I rather thought it was. I sincerely hope that he sold no valuable stocks on the strength of that statement.

Crossing over to Delmouico's, close at hand, I found many of these gigantic gamblers refreshing themselves with strange and stimulating compounds. An acquaintance whom I met there told me that I could pick up thousands of dollars' worth of information, if I wished to operate, by simply listening about. I am not averse to thousands of dollars, so I acted upon his suggestion, and heard a stout man say, "Bubble and Squelch is fetching thirty-six, buyer ten." To which a thin man replied, "Don't see it, nohow. I've made a corner in Smashcar and Slingwheel." "I'm going to sell short on persimmon Valley," remarked another. At this I became bewildered and unhappy. I had the information, but saw nothing of the thousands of dollars, so I came away, determined to adhere for the present to my legitimate profession.

A correspondent of a Boston paper asserts that these scenes are mildly repeated among the ladies who live at the Fifth Avenue Hotel. It is not impossible, but I hardly like to think that the other sex is quite so lost. This correspondent, however, seriously gives the following as his experience among the ladies of that hotel:

> They were all talking stocks. A parcel of young brokers live in the house, and every evening they are sent over to the "coal hole" to execute the commissions of the ladies. I did not ask any of their husbands what they thought of this arrangement. A lady took me in tow, and we sailed down the drawing-room, looking and listening to what was done and said.
>
> "Jenny," said a very pretty woman to another, "you'd better buy some Mich'g'n Southern. It's sure to go up to 140."
>
> "Now, Lizzy," replied her friend, "it's no use for you to be bulling the market. I don't believe any such a thing."
>
> "Oh, you horrid bear, you," retorted Lizzy, "you've been selling short, you know you have!"
>
> So we passed along, hearing conversations of this sort from women who held stock lists in their hands, and eagerly inquired if their brokers had returned from the coal hole, and what they have done.

If this be true, what are we coming to? Are we about to turn into a nation of gamblers, and make a second Baden-Baden of New York? If both men and matrons indulge in this dangerous game of beggar-my-neighbor, the next generation will come honestly enough by a wholesale mania for throwing dice, and will undoubtedly erect statues to Fortune, fickle goddess, instead of to the heroes of the war. Perhaps, however, Secretary Chase may come in for a goodly monument.

NOTICE.

The publication of "The Californian" takes ploce on Saturday mornings, and copies may be obtained in the City at all News-stands, and of our News-agents through the country. It will also be served by carriers on the morning of publication.

* Correspondents will address all communications, business and otherwise, to C. H. WEBB, Office of "The Californian," 728 Montgomery street, San Froncisco.*

THE CALIFORNIAN.

SAN FRANCISCO, SATURDAY, JUNE 4, 1864.

ONE WORD.

In this its second number, the Californian has but one word to say to the public, so far as patronage is concerned. It wants patronage, of conrse, and has three reasons for asking it. It asks, in the first place, beeause it wants it; in the second, because it intends to deserve it; and lastly, because it means to get it. The objection is urged against the paper that it is not a daily. Cannot people understand that though it is published but once a week they can subscribe to it every day, which answers all reasonab'e purposes just as well?

HOW PANICS ARE MADE.

WITHOUT wading quite ankle deep in the waters of etymology, one may discover that the word Panic is derived from the name of that truly rural and jolly god and general who, according to the Greek mythology, put the army of the enemy to flight by frightening them—precisely as very many armies have been put to flight both before and since. Pan was surrounded by such a multitude of enemies that it seemed a foregone conclusiou that he and his men would inevtably be panned out; bnt the event proved different. Finding the lion's skin too small, he eked it out with the fox's, causing his men in the middle of the night to set up a yell and a howl, which, multiplied by the echoes of the valley, led the enemy to believe that a host was upon them and to fly in confusion, sacrificing arms and equipments, aud only too joyful to escape at that. So it will be seen that the word has a derivation admirably adapted to its present use as the sign of a groundless terror, the exponent of causeless and foolish alarm.

Panic is a phantom liable to arise in the commercial or financial world at any moment; and though but a phantom it is as much to be dreaded as though it came swelling with muscle and bristling in the reality of bone and sinew. If people could but be persuaded to boldly face and meet and grapple it, all power of mischief would be at an end, for then its nnsubstantiality would become at ouce apparent. But no—on its first appearance there is a wild commotion: Panic! Panic! is cried, and then it is save himself who can. In the mad rush which ensues all interests are trodden under foot, and as much distress and ruin result as though the sea had actnally licked up half the country's commerce or the earth opened to swallow the teeming warehouses nnder whose weight it groans. Yet all the while the wealth of the conntry is as great as ever; its resources are the same and as abundant—nothing has happened, nothing is changed. But the effect is parallel with that which would result from the actual occurrence of any phenomenal disaster like the ones mentioned. Let a fool cry "Fire" in a crowded house. and one puff of smoke from a burning paper curl in at the door, and as much harm is done and as many lives will be lost as though the building were in fact wrapped in flames. This illustrates the case precisely. In the commercial and financial world let a few lay their heads together, and whisper with wise looks that a panic is coming, and come it will unless stroug and sensible men throw themselves into the breach to prevent t. Pauic is a phantom which one or two can conjure up, but which not the whole community can lay uuless by concert and united action.

It is unfortunately the fact that instead of adopting means to allay a panic when one threatens, monied men, and those who have it in their power to calm down the agitation, take precisely the steps which tend to its aggravation. The moment that a tightness makes itself apparent in the money market and it becomes known that men want money, just at that momeut bankers and capitalists begin to call in their loans, securities are sacrificed, and baukrupts are ripened and shaken to the ground like berries. The ones who have it in their power to mend the disaster are the very ones who, in their selfishness or their mistaken prudence, precipitate it. They contract when they should expand; timely accommodation to their customers would, nine times in ten, carry all parties through; bnt the fact that their customers want money becomes, somewhat paradoxically, the exact reason that they are unwilling to lend it.

Suppose that a panic were to visit our mining-share market to-day; what would be the result? It would not alter the intrinsic value of any stock one farthing. Those miues which are paying dividends would pay as large dividends as ever, and be worth just as mnch per foot, let the market price go to what it might. Worthless stock would of course be worth nothing—precisely as it has been worth nothing all along. Values would in fact remain unehanged. Still, we venture to say that if even a moderate proportion of any of the leading stocks were thrown on the market on any one day, a panic would ensue as inevitably as fate. All the small, and some of the large holders would rush their stock at once upon the market, and the eonsequence would be that in less than twenty-four hours it would become impossible to sell a foot of it, even at a price at which it would pay an interest of 25 per eent. a month. And there would be a flurry and skurry on Montgomery street, similar to that which Wall street has witnessed in some of its unfortunate years.

We need not be particularly anxious for a panic hereaway; we can dispense with one for many a long day. What though the leading stocks may temporarily droop under the anxiety of timid holders to realize, or the efforts of speculative ones at depression, with a view to re-purchasing? The mines themselves will still turn out bullion. You can neither bull nor bear the ores which lie prone to the miner's pick awaiting reduction. The earth this year may fail to yield its usual crops, but gold and silver does not need to be watered; and she will give us this from her bountiful breast as abundantly as ever. Paper curreney at the East goes begging at five or six per cent. per annum—eapital here can be invested so as to pay from two to three per cent. per month with nearly as much certainty as the recurrence of those months and the rotations of the seasons. We have but to beckon for capital and it will eagerly flow hither for investment. Unexplored mines, as rich as any that have yet been developed, are waiting to be discovered, anxions to have the Open Sesame spoken at their doors. The mineral resources of this coast, so far from being exhausted, are as yet undreamed of; it would seem too much like an Arabian Night's story to even attempt to picture them. But there is a future in store when these things will be believed, when the prophecy of the one who passes now for an enthusiast will be fulfilled, and the mines of California and the adjacent Territorics will be turuing out money enough in one year to pay the national debt, which will have accrued upon our country at the termination of the war, twice over.

OUR RECEPTION BY THE PRESS.

OUR RECEPTION by the press of the city and State has been kind—uniformly kind. A reception more hearty and geuerous we could scarcely have wished—certainly could not have expected. Want of space—and modesty—prevent the reproduction of these flattering notices on this editorial page, but they will all be found in another part of the paper.

But there is one notice whfch we cannot consign to advertising columns—glorious as the Californian's advertising columns are. Pardon the apparent egotism if we give this oue notice a more prominent place. It is from a paper with which we were connected for a little more than a year, and which we left on perfectly good terms with proprietors, editors and all. This it is:

" * * * * * * * *

* * * * * * * *

* * * * * "—Evening Bulletin.

We are satisfied, perfectly satisfied. If the thought occasionally occnrs that friendly and familiar columns might have said more, it is speedily dissipated by the reflection that they could not possibly have said less. It may occur to others that the editors of the paper, in kindness to a former associate about trying an experiment in the field where they have achieved such eminent and distinguished success, might have whispered at least the customary phrases of encouragement, or said a kind word for us to our old readers. But, as before remarked, we are quite satisfied as it is. Experience has taught us that silence is the eloquence of the Bulletin's praise. The formula which interferes on all occasions to prevent an honest word of encouragement or recognition for anything or anybody, is: "It is the rule of the paper!" The public, as well as printers, think that in some cases a "turned rule" is not out of place, but the public are not allowed to dictate much in such matters—they are permitted to pay for the paper, and this is enough. But in saying that our good friend, the Bulletin, never spoke well of anything or any one, we are wrong—it suddenly occurs to us that it spoke well of Broderick, of Baker, and of Starr King. Not until after they were dead, it is true, and then, in the case of the latter, it endeavored before the earth had fairly closed over him to take back half it had said. As a general thing, however, it adopts the old maxim, De mortuis, etc., and speaks well of the dead. Perhaps if the Californian dies it will speak well of us—who knows? But the question arises whether it is worth while to die in order to earn the Bulletin's praise, and if it is not possible to live without it. We shall certainly try to! More—we shall learn a lesson, and endeavor in the conduct of our paper to be as generous in the recognition of what is good around us as we are unsparing in censure of all that merits condemnation. Eyes, in this world, should be opeu to catch and recognize other things than dirt.

The Politicians are counting up on their fingers candidates whom they call cyphers in the Baltimore Convention. They omit to mentiou that the principal cypher of all is a sigh for the nomination.

HOWLING AS ONE OF THE FINE ARTS.

IN PROPOSING to treat of howling as one of the fine arts we have no preliminary apologies to offer, no excuses to make. Only the captions few find fault with De Quincey for his famous Essay on Murder, and surely howling has quite as many claims to the distinction of being classed in the same category with music, painting and sculpture as ever murder had—more, if anything. For the texts are so numerous and so varied—it is possible to howl in so many different keys, slightly modulating them to suit circumstances, and by judicious howling the adept can achieve such wonderful successes in life—that without further preamble we shall at once assume the classification to be correct, and boldly proceed to grapple with our thesis.

The howler, like the poet, is born, not made—he has to be borne, for unfortunately he is one of those vague nuisances not always indictable uuder municipal law. He comes howling into the world, he goes howling through it, and howlingly out of it—and if he does not howl subsequently. it is only because a singular inattention to the "preservation of the unities" obtains in the realms of shadows. "No pent up Utica [or Syracuse] contracts his powers:" all fields are open to him, but politics is his favorite one. On the stump he is at home; rancorous debate is his element. Argument is unknown to him, and with Reason he has only a distant acquaintance—not sufficient to warrant her in recognizing him; and as he does not recognize her, the cut may be considered mutnal. Generally ignorant, he makes up for his lack of education by vituperation. Personalities are his forte—or, as he is generally occupied in throwing dirt, perhaps we should call them his earthworks. If by any of the unfortunate accidents of life he comes to edit a newspaper, he evinces on every page an unscrupulousness which is only equalled by his disregard of grammar and the decencies of the profession. The only euterprise he displays in that profession is shown in his dispensing with a proof-reader, and endeavoring to force people to buy a newspaper without news, simply for its one eternal howl. Previous to the present rebelliou, before he had the opportunity of prostituting patriotism by making of it a cock-horse upon which to ride into popularity, if engaged in a discussion he would wind up by saying something disrespectful of his oppouent's family—perhaps by calling one's sister names. This, in the aute-secession days, was his logic. But he has changed all that now. It is quite as easy to cry out to the respectable loyalist who goes quietly along in the path of duty, lending aid to his country's arms by works and by words, aud unostensibly dropping what dollars he can spare into the Sanitary Fund box—it is quite as easy to call this man "Secesh!" as it was of old to say something abusive about his family relations—and it pays better, if people can be made to believe it. In those good old Salem times, when witches were bound at the stake and Quakers were made to quake with a zeal which passed the aspen-like requirements of their peculiar faith, any quantity of losels made themselves reputations by accusing their grandmothers of practicing sorcery, and whispering in the ready car of a sensitive Puritan public that the tails of their grandfathers' coats were perceptibly widening and the brims of their beavers visibly broadening. In the present day a very similar practice is coming to be adopted by persons of doubtful positions and loyalty—with variations, it is true, but in this case we are not inclined to be thankful for the variations. The man detected in the act of stealing out from an area door or a basement window with spoons in his hand, and pursued, is very apt to pocket the spoons and join in the hue and cry, the wildest and maddest of all in the race, crying after men who have never made boast of their honesty, but whose honesty has never been suspected, "Stop thief!"

Why will men be noisy and fierce who have no other claim to distinction? Perhaps we have answered the question in asking it. Still, for all that, we hold to the idea that the assassination of a man does not entitle the assassin to travel on being a hero, any more than having been in the veterinary business makes one a veteran. Fields are now open to the ambitions mind—glorious fields. fields crimson with blood spilt in the vindication of a righteous cause; why do not people who evince on all occasions a reprehensible desire to achieve an unenviable and certainly inglorious notoriety by doing something or killing somebody—why do not these people seek those fields where so much good fighting is going on? Is it because the chances of getting a bullet planted in their backs are about equal to the opportunities they would have of lodging bullets in the breast-bones of others?

We are content to believe in the loyalty of our neighbors, and to assume patriotism of them until they prove by some act that they possess it not—always provided that they do not howl. Let a man once show an intention of cultivating Howling as the finest of the Fine Arts, of bringing it down, in fact, to the limits of an exact science and of making it the business and profession of his life, taking patriotism as his text, and that moment we suspect that he has none. Hollow bodies always emit the most sound. Strike the bed rock with a pick and it scarcely echoes, but the tin pans and pots in the miner's back kitchen keep up an eternal rattling even when no one is using them and only the wind stirs them—their own wind at that. The shell without a drop of salt water in it affects the roar and murmur of the sea. The full purse of gold is as silent as the quartz-vein whence it comes, but the pocket where only a few scattering pennies lie is for ever a-jingling. When it becomes necessary for every man in the community to sit on the curb-stone, turning a discordant barrel-organ and bearing on his breast a huge board whereon is written in large letters I AM HONEST, then we will throw aside a modest reserve and consciousness and out-howl the Howler par excellence of the coast, be he whom he may; until then, however, we shall preserve our patriotism and guard it as a man does his honor or a woman her virtue—something to be taken for granted and not to be questioned—something too sacred and holy to be shouted in the market place and made capital of. For, as a general thing, it is safe to believe that people talk most of that thing of which they possess least, precisely as business men conclude of the man who evinces an extravagant desire to make his credit stand good that he is on the verge of bankruptcy. In other words—

'T is not so plain as the old hill of Howth
A man has got his belly full of meat
Because he talks with victuals in his mouth!

FASHIONS—FEMININE ENCROACHMENTS—BONNETS AND HATS.

FASHION is a sovereign who, unmindful and disdainful of all salique laws, reigns over the undivided empire of the globe. In some remote and barbarous regions her sway s only a limited monarchy—as, for instance, the South Sea Islands, where a young woman's full dress is a bunch of flowers behind her ears; or among the Southern Indians, where an elaborate toilette consists of a feather apron, or a pair of ear-rings—but in all civilized countries she rules with the iron rod of an absolute despotism. The combined armies of all the monarchs in the world—including those of both Grant and Lee—could not enforce that obedience which she commands without a murmur. The Autocrat of all the Russias is everywhere denounced as a monster because he has prohibited the patriotic women of Poland from the use of one particular color, while Fashion makes us wear "everything by turns and nothing long," (except our dresses, which are longer than ever,) and we submit without a word. She is the veriest tyrant, forcing her subjects to do things which they do not like to do, and preventing them from doing those things which they would like to do. She is exacting and selfish, never satisfied but aggressive, appropriating from every nation that which suits her fancy as if it were hers by inheritance, robbing us of our fortunes and putting our lives in peril every day; and yet we never complain. What is worse than all, she is gradually undermining the reputation of her own sex. Women used to be thought unselfish, self-sacrificing, and strictly honest in all their dealings. They never broke the tenth commandment by coveting anything that was their neighbor's—they were content with their own. Look at them now: in the one little matter of masculine attire alone see how aggressive they have become, gradually absorbing article after article, until they have left the other sex but one garment which is exclusively their own, and even that is adopted by them when they ride on horseback; but it seems natural enough that when they hold the reins they should wear—the pantaloons!

Formerly, by a sort of tacit agreement, hats belonged exclusively to men, (so did high-topped boots, and overcoats, and vests and standing collars and cravats and short hair,) and a woman with a hat on would have attracted as much attention then as a man with a bonnet on would to-day. Men have faithfully adhered to their part of the compact, and left women's toilettes intact; but they have not been so honorable, and hats are now worn almost as much by women as by men. In fact, bonnets are now the exception and hats the rule. These latter are in such endless variety that it would be impossible to describe them all. It would be safe to say that no two are exactly alike. They are high and low, and great and small; they are black and white, and brown and grey. Being the crowning grace of a perfect toilette, too much care cannot be bestowed upon their selection. They should always be in harmony of style and color with the dress and figure of the wearer. Eminently coquettish, stylish and jaunty, they are becoming to all complexions—provided, always, that the face which looks from under them is a young face. There are very few women who understand how to adapt their style of dress to their particular age, and there are many who think that because a bright young girl happens to look well in a jaunty little hat, they too would be rendered charming by the same means. Imagine a short, stout, elderly woman, in a small Scotch cap, and a tall, thin spinster in a marine or sailor's hat, and you have before you two of the most familiar illustrations in Punch; and yet they are not altogether fancy sketches. We saw no later ago than yesterday two tall women elegantly dressed in flowing robes of moire antique and black lace shawls, the whole effect of their toilettes spoiled by the addition of ridiculous straw hats with broad brims and low crowns, which looked as if they belonged to their little girls, and had been put on through mistake by the mammas. If they had worn, instead, the small Scotch cap, with a tuft of feathers in front, or the tall-crowned Huguenot hat, with its long waving plume, it would have been in better taste. Hats are always admirable, even for very old women, for travelling, on account of their great comfort and convenience, but they should be of large size, and very plainly trimmed. We have seen several, intended for elderly ladies, which had in front a full bow of black ribbon, fastened with a jet pin.

Never has a fashion budded, blossomed and expanded so rapidly as the fashion of wearing hats in San Francisco. Less than a year ago the little round hat so much admired now was so much an object of curiosity that nobody could wear one on the street without being painfully aware of the attention which it attracted, and the observations (not always too polite) which it excited. But it must be remembered that San Francisco is but a young thing at best, and has come so suddenly into her inheritance that we ought not to expect too much of her; but she is large enough to behave herself better, and to know and understand that it is decidedly vulgar to be astonished at anything. In some things San Francisco reminds one of a boy who has out-grown his boyish clothes without having outgrown his boyish tastes, and who puts marbles and molasses candy in the pockets of his new pantaloons. A metropolis in size and magnificence, she is but the veriest of country villages in her gaping wonderment over a new fashion, or a new piece of scandal. It will be better by-and-by when it grows older. As we heard a Chinaman say a few days ago, "Just wait two, tree hundred years, Californy belly good country."

While here we have such a diversity of hats, in Paris they are wearing but one shape. A friend who resides there, and who is devoted to the fashions, writes that the small round brimless English hats, fitting closely to the head, are universally worn. It is true that they afford no protection from wind or sun, but they are very becoming, and so are all the fashion. Of course, there is no room inside of them for the hair, and accordingly it falls in large bows and loops upon the back of the neck and behind the ears. They are trimmed with immense rosettes of velvet in front, and tufts of feathers and flowers and aigrettes. The same correspondent informs us of the advent of plain skirts among the fashionables, very long and very full, and very much gored to render them as flat as possible around the waist. The greatest novelty in the cloak and mantle line is a long straight scarf of plaid silk or ribbon, plaited to a point in the middle of the waist behind, where it is fastened with a large bow of the same material, the wide flowing ends falling over the dress like a sash. The scarf is edged with a deep fall of Chantilly lace, or a wide full flounce of black silk box-plaited on to the plaid scarf, and pinked in well-defined scallops at the lower edge. Plaids are still extremely fashionable for dresses, for bonnets, for shawls, for cloaks—even for boots, blue and green are still the favorite colors. Bonnets are growing small by degrees, and beautifully less, consequently there is not as much room for trimming as there was formerly. A simpler taste seems gradually coming in. We shall hail its advent with delight.

AS AN instance of how difficult it is to do a kindness, and how testy the human mind is apt to become when it allows itself to be led away from the plain path of comprehensible and curt English, and seduced into trifling and dallying with Greek polysylables, we present the case of the HIPPOTHEATRON. An article in the CALIFORNIAN last week anent the HIPPOTHEATRON, mentioned the sex of Zoyara, casually. The author did not know that he was ruining a manager thereby, or blasting the prospects of any show extant. On the contrary, he thought he was doing the Hippotheatron a service, and giving that interrogation point—so far as sex is concerned—Zoyara, an excellent advertisement for nothing. The result is, that after the printers had broken a composing stick apiece in endeavoring to set the word, and the proof-reader had fractured his jaw in endeavoring to pronounce it, the manager got angry, declared his business was ruined, and took out his advertisement. So much for Hippotheatrons!

A NUMBER of Chinamen had an "affair of honor" in this city on Saturday evening last—and they had it all to themselves. A dispute occurring relative to money matters, they locked themselves in the room where they happened to be assembled, and went at the work of annihilating each other with a vigor and determination worthy of the cause. Huge knives and iron bars were the weapons used. One man was killed outright, and several others were badly wounded. John Chinaman seems to know how to settle little business and personal differences quite as well as white people.

WHAT we may term the whale of the season drifted ashore on the ocean beach on Saturday night last. The monster measures eighty-three feet in length and spans twenty feet across the flukes—but none of all these fect are in the market; the owner would not even part with a few to oblige a friend, and he has no assessments to pay. In striking that whale, some one has struck an oil ledge, which will pan out remarkably rich in the lower tunnel.

A COMPANY of Zouaves lately formed are drilled with brickbats in their knapsacks to accustom them to the weight they have to carry on their marches, but under no pretence whatever are they allowed to partake of liquors. This is decidedly better than the more common custom of drilling recruits with the bricks in their hats.

A LOUD HOWL is going up in some of the cow counties for Democrats to rally and unite to preserve the Democratic Party. Why so anxious to preserve it? It is already in a very pretty pickle.

When gentleness and violence play for woman's love, the mildest gamester is the readiest winner.

FINANCIAL AFFAIRS, STOCKS, ETC.

The money market has assumed a rather less cheerful tone, and in certain quarters there has been a little pressure this week. For legitimate business purposes no difficulty is met with in obtaining from Bankers the ordinary facilities at lower rates than were current last month. Unemployed Funds in the vaults of the banks are thought to be augmenting, and when the present panic in mining stocks has fully spent its force, into these channels will return a portion of this idle capital. Loans upon the very best shares known are at the moment not readily made, even at wide margins and at high rates of interest. It is not likely that this anomalous condition of things will continue. Regular dividend paying stocks, well and favorably known to the public, must and will possess an intrinsic value that no outside influence, however powerfully wrought, can long effect. There will come a reaction, and many eager buyers will then doubtless show their hand and receive from capitalists all the aid they may require. It is well known that large orders were in the market ten days since for one or two prominent stocks; but these parties hope to avail themselves of the recent decline before buying, and are giving aid and comfort to the present downward movement. This depression in first-class shares operates with telling effect upon stocks of less real value, and many of them have, during the last week, touched the lowest point reached for a year past. Some of these claims are very promising, and may obtain the same favor in the future that others now enjoy; and those who can wisely discriminate at this juncture, and not sacrifice stocks known to have merit, will profit in the end.

Telegraphic advices from Washington would lead to the belief that in lieu of the onerous tax of 5 per cent. on the entire yield of all mines and mining claims as at first proposed, one half of one per cent. will be engrafted in the bill before Congress. This is a gratifying announcement, and serves to relieve some apprehension felt in stock circles.

Receipts of Treasure this week from the interior have been large, and exceed $1,000,000.

Eastern Exchange for yesterday's steamer ruled at 68 and 72 premium on Gold—the highest rates yet attained in this market.

Since our last reference, 30 feet of Gould and Curry have been sold at the Stock and Exchange Board within the range of $3,400 and $2,825, closing at $3,050—buyer 30.

The regular monthly dividend of $125 per foot was declared yesterday. At the present market value of this stock this is equivalent to 4½ per cent. per month. We can learn of no unfavorable feature in the present appearance of this mine. On the contrary, trustworthy advices concur in saying that in all respects it never was so flattering.

Some 60 feet of Ophir have been sold, declining from $875 to about $825. Very considerable shipments of Bullion continue to be made from this mine; and it is said that in less than sixty days the company will resume the payment of dividends.

Chollar declined from $600 to $465, and then rallied to $520—buyer 30.

North American fell from $155 to $107½, and advanced to $120 and $125.

North Potosi declined from $81 to $68, and then rose to $85—buyer 30.

Lady Bryan fell from $28 to $20, and advanced to 23½—buyer 30, and closed at $26½.

Real Del Monte has steadily declined from $46 to about $32.

THE late attempt on the part of Washoe brokers to establish greenbacks as the currency of a country which has earned itself, by right of its mineral productions, the honorary title of "Silverland," proved, as might have been expected, a failure. When some of the less promising mines of the Comstock Ledge in sinking their profounder shafts or lowest tunnels, strike a vein of greenbacks several feet in thickness, it is quite possible that Washoe will consent to make paper money her currency, and the example will perhaps be followed by this whole coast. But, until then, we apprehend that our people are not to be separated from their first love, in the way of currency—or rather that currency to which they are wedded, for has not the metallic ring passed between them. Greenbacks will do admirably for those who like them, but they are not our style.

"A COMPLETE account of the late great prize fight" says that Heenan "went to grass" several times and King once. What a pity that both animals could not have been kept there as long as Nebuchadnezzar was! At the expiration of their grazing time they might have come back respectable beasts. The same "complete account," in explaining Heenan's losing the fight, scouts the idea that any drugging was practiced, but attributes it to the fact that "he is deficient in coolness, pertinacity, and freedom from the demoralizing effects of repeated blows." We are no longer at a loss to understand the bad characters of pugilists generally and all prize fighters. They are demoralized by the blows they get.

A YOUNG MAN lately, for a trifling wager, coiled himself between the ties of a railroad track and allowed the train to pass over him. He escaped with a trifling burn from a coal which dropped from the locomotive. The tender passed over him tenderly, and even the cow-catcher would not condescend to catch a calf.

A FEW GHOST STORIES.

Very few people believe in ghosts, but the great multitude like to hear about them. We have a few ghost stories at hand which are quite reliable—at least, as much so as any ghost stories. We do not personally vouch for their correctness, but they have the sanction of age, and have been told a great many times by a great many reliable nurses to any quantity of unreliable children. The first on the list will attract the popular sympathy, for we have to deal with sentiment, and the story has the taking title of

THE TRUE LOVER'S SPIRIT.

In the town of Bridport, some thirty years ago, a beautiful maiden, named Mary Meadows, was about to be married to James Mason, the son of her father's friend; and her heart being disengaged, she did not object to the union, in compliance with the wish of her friends. Just at this time she became acquainted with William Marstone; and from being frequently together, and from dispositions similar, a strong affection was quickly engendered, and they vowed never to be united in marriage except to each other. The father of William had latterly fallen into much misfortune through the roguery of an attorney who had been entrusted with the arrangement of a family lawsuit, and sold his client's interests to his opponent. The elder Marstone being ill, William was dispatched to London to repair the mischief, if possible, occasioned by the ill conduct of the lawyer. Before he set off he had an interview with Miss Meadows, and she promised, with weeping eyes, to be true to him under all circumstances of good or ill fortune. He set out early the next morning; and while he was endeavoring by every exertion to fulfil the commands of his father, Mary was importuned by James Mason and her father to conclude the marriage between them. The feeling which dictated her vow of fidelity to William had not flagged for one moment, and for more than a year had she regularly corresponded with him, when all at once her letters remained, one after the other, unanswered, as were also the letters of his family. Every inquiry was made, and yet no tidings could be gained of him: three years passed away in this manner, until, wearied with the repeated and most urgent importunities of James Mason and her family, she consented to be his, after avowing to him her affection for the lost William Marstone. At last, the day before the bridal day arrived; and with much grief and sorrow, Mary retired to her room for the last time she would do so as her own mistress, her heart full of the thoughts of those departed hours which she had spent in the company of her loved William. She mourned till the tears rained fast down her cheeks. She started, and almost screamed, as she saw between her and the bed the figure of her William, but pale and sorrowful. His eyes were immovably fixed upon hers, his right hand was raised up in a reproachful manner, his left was pressed upon his heart, and from beneath gushed streams of blood. At this horrible vision her senses for a moment failed her; but she recovered, and, lifting a candle from the table, began to move towards the figure. When she had come, as she thought, near enough to clasp him in her arms, it vanished from her sight entirely; she rushed to the door of the chamber, and, with a loud cry, alarmed the house and fell senseless on the stairs.

The preparation for the marriage was entirely done away, and poor Mary lingered for a few months insensible to all around her, when death put an end to her sufferings.

It was afterwards discovered that William Marstone had regularly answered her letters, which had been treacherously destroyed by James Mason. In one of them Marstone informed her he had retrieved nearly the whole of his father's property, but it would be necessary for him to take a voyage to the East Indies, to get papers and information of importance from a confederate of the villainous lawyer; and re-entreated her to cherish his remembrance till he returned, and repeated his vows of eternal fidelity. It appeared he had made his voyage with success, and had arrived in London, anxiously hastening to meet his beloved Mary. He was about to enter the stage coach that was to carry him to his love, when a letter was put in his hand by a stranger; he hastily broke the seal, and no sooner had he read the contents than he stabbed himself to the heart with a knife that lay upon the table before him; and, upon comparing the time, it must have been at the exact moment when his spirit was seen by Mary. It was afterwards proved that this anonymous letter was sent by James Mason, informing him that Mary, having heard of his expected return, in order to avoid him, intended to be married to another next day. This unexpected and cruel shock deprived William of his senses, and caused him, in a moment of desperation, to lay violent hands upon himself. Nor did Mason escape punishment—shunned and despised for his treachery to his friends, he removed to a distant part of the country, where, in a short time, miserable and distressed, he breathed his last in the common poor-house.

—

THE HAUNTED ROOM AT REDCASTLE.

The Earl referred to in the ensuing ghost narrative was the last of the Earls of Powis, of the family of Herbert. He succeeded his father in the title in 1749, and died in 1801.

The narrator of the story said she was a poor woman, who got her living by spinning hemp and line; that it was customary for the farmers and gentlemen of that neighborhood to grow a little hemp or line in the corner of their field, for their own home consumption, and as she had a good hand at spinning the materials, she used to go from house to house to enquire for work; that her method was, where they employed her, during her stay, to have meat and drink and lodging (if she had occasion to sleep with them) for her work, and what they pleased to give her besides. Among other places, she happened to call in one day at the Welsh Earl Powis's country seat, called Redcastle, to inquire for work, as she usually had done before. The noble family were at this time in London, and had left the steward and his wife, with other servants, as usual, to take care of their country residence in their absence. The steward's wife set her to work, and in the evening told her that she must stay all night with them, as they had more work for her to do next day. When bedtime arrived, two or three of the servants in company, with each a lighted candle in hand, conducted her to her lodging. They led her to a ground-floor room, with a boarded floor and two sash windows. The room was grandly furnished, and had a fine bed in one corner of it. They had made her a good fire, and had placed her a chair and table before it, and a large lighted candle upon the table. They told her that was her bedroom, and she might go to sleep when she pleased: they then wished her a good night, and withdrew altogether, pulling the door quickly after them, so as to hasp the spring-sneck in the brass lock that was upon it.

When they were gone, she gazed awhile at the fine furniture, under no small astonishment that they should put such a poor person as she in so grand a room and bed, with all the apparatus of fire, chair, table and candle. She was also surprised at the circumstance of the servants coming so many together, with each of them a candle; however, after gazing about some little time, she sat down and took out a small Welsh Bible out of her pocket, which she always carried about with her, and in which she usually read a chapter—chiefly in the New Testament—before she said her prayers and went to bed. While she was reading, she heard the room door open, and, turning her head, saw a gentleman enter in a gold-laced hat and waistcoat, and the rest of his dress corresponding therewith. He walked down by the sash window to the corner of the room, and then returned. When he came to the window (the bottom of which was nearly breast high) he rested his elbow on the sill, and the side of his face upon the palm of his hand, and stood in that leaning posture for some time, with his side partly towards her. She looked at him earnestly to see if she knew him, but though, from her frequent intercourse with them, she had a personal knowledge of all the present family, he appeared a stranger to her. She supposed, afterwards, that he stood in this manner to encourage her to speak; but as she did not, after some little time, he walked off, pulling the door after him as the servants had done before.

She began now to be much alarmed, concluding it to be an apparition, and that they had put her there on purpose. This was really the case. The room, it seems, had been disturbed for a long time, so that nobody could sleep peaceably in it, and as she passed for a very serious woman, the servants took it in their heads to put the Methodist and spirit together, to see what they would make of it. Startled at this thought, she rose from her chair, and knelt down by the bedside to say her prayers. While she was praying, he came in again, walked round the room, and came close behind her. She had it on her mind to speak, but when she attempted it she was so very much agitated that she could not utter a word. He walked out of the room again, pulling the door after him as before. She begged that God would strengthen her, and not suffer her to be tried beyond what she was able to bear; she recovered her spirits, and thought she felt more confidence and resolution, and determined if he came in again to speak to him, if possible. He presently came in again, walked round, and came behind her as before; she turned her head and said: "Pray, sir, who are you, and what do you want?"

He put up his finger, and said: "Take up the candle and follow me, and I will tell you."

She got up and took up the candle, and followed him out of the room. He led her through a long boarded passage, till they came to the door of another room, which he opened and went in; it was a small room, or what might be called a large closet. As the room was small, and she believed him to be a spirit, she stopped at the door; he turned and said: "Walk in; I will not hurt you;" so she walked in. He said: "Observe what I do."

She said "I will."

He stooped and tore up one of the boards of the floor, and there appeared under it a box with an iron handle in the lid. He said: "Do you see that box?"

"She said: "Yes, I do."

He then stepped to one side of the room and showed her a crevice in the wall, where, he said, a key was hid that would open it. He said: "This box and key must be taken out and sent to the Earl in London. Will you see it done?"

She said: "I will do my best to get it done."

He said: "Do, and I will trouble the house no more."

He then walked out of the room and left her.

She stepped to the room door and set up a shout. The steward and his wife, with the other servants, came to her immediately; all clung together, with a number of lights in their hands. It seems they had all been waiting to see the issue of the interview betwixt her and the apparition. They asked her what was the matter? She told them the foregoing circumstances, and showed them the box. The steward durst not meddle with it, but his wife had more courage, and, with the help of the other servants, tugged it out, and found the key. She said, by their lifting, it appeared to be pretty heavy, but that she did not see it opened, and therefore did not know what it contained—perhaps money, or writings of consequence to the family, or both. They took it away with them, and she then went to bed and slept peaceably till the morning.

As the narrator of this spiritual incident was a recipient of the Earl's bounty in consequence of the discovery of this box, the ghost element in the tale was widely credited. The story is at least as circumstantial as any legend of the outer world with which we are acquainted.

—

APPARITION IN INDIA, NARRATED BY DR. ASHBURN.

In the year 1814, says Dr. Ashburn—who was long a surgeon in India—I became acquainted with Col. Nathan Wilson, a man of strong intellectual powers, who had served many years in India under Sir Arthur Wellesley, afterwards Duke of Wellington. I was introduced to him by Sir Charles Forbes, at a shooting lodge at Strathdou, and there we had an opportunity of becoming intimate. I had from his own lips the narrative I am about to relate to you, and which I may preface by a few words touching the opinions of the narrator:

Col. Wilson made no secret of his atheism. In India, especially, as I have myself observed, the tendency of many minds, influenced by considering the great diversities of religious belief around them, is towards scepticism. Col. Wilson, fortified by the perusal of Volney, D'Helbach, Helvetius, Voltaire and others of similar stamp, rejected, as untenable, the doctrine of a future state of existence, and even received with some impatience any arguments on a subject as to which he seemed to think no one could any further enlighten him.

In the year 1811, being then in command of the 19th Regiment of Dragoons, stationed at Tellicherry, and delighting in French literature, he formed an intimacy with Monsieur Dubois, a Roman Catholic missionary priest, an ardent and zealous propagandist, and an accomplished man. Notwithstanding the great difference in their creeds, so earnest and yet liberal-minded was the Frenchman, so varied his store of information, and so agreeable and winning his manner, that the missionary and the soldier associated much together, and finally formed a strong attachment to each other. The former did not fail to avail himself of this intimacy by endeavoring to bring about the conversion of his friend. They conversed often and freely on religious subjects; but Col. Wilson's scepticism remained unshaken.

In July, 1811, the priest fell ill, much to the regret of the little circle at Tellicherry, where he was greatly beloved. At the same time, a mutiny having broken out at Vellore, Col. Wilson was summoned thither, and proceeding by forced marches, encamped on an extensive plain before the town.

The night was sultry; and Col. Wilson, arrayed as is common in that climate, in shirt and long light calico drawers with feet, sought repose on a couch within his tent; but in vain. Unable to sleep, his attention was suddenly attracted to the entrance of his tent; he saw the purdah raised and the priest Dubois present himself. The pale face and earnest demeanor of his friend, who stood silent and motionless, riveted his attention. He called him by name, but without reply; the purdah fell, and the figure disappeared.

The Colonel sprang up, and hastily donning his slippers, rushed from the tent. The appearance was still in sight, gliding through the camp, and making for the plain beyond. Col. Wilson hastened after it, and at so rapid a pace that when his brother officers, roused by the sentries, went in pursuit of him, it was with difficulty he was overtaken. The apparition having been seen by Col. Wilson only, his comrades concluded that it was the effect of slight delirium produced by fatigue. But when the surgeon of the regiment felt the Colonel's pulse, he declared that it beat steadily, without acceleration.

Col. Wilson felt assured that he had received an intimation of the death of his friend the missionary, who had repeatedly promised, in case he died first, to appear to him as a spirit. He requested his brother officers to note the time. They did so; and when subsequent letters from Tellicherry announced the decease of Dubois, it was found that he had died at the very hour when his likeness appeared to his friend.

—

FAIRIES.

There are lots of fairies in Wales, even now, and amongst other tales connected with the lore of Welsh fairies we find the following:

A young man had just quitted an adjacent farm-house early one fine summer's morning, when he heard a little bird singing in the most enchanting strain on a tree close by. Allured by the melody, he sat down under it until the music ceased, when he arose, supposing a few minutes only had elapsed, but his surprise may well be imagined when he saw the tree withered and barkless. Returning full of astonishment to the house, he found that changed too, and no one within but an old man whom he had never seen before. He asked him what he was doing there; upon which the old man abruptly inquired who was he that dared insult him in his own house? "In your own house! where's my father and mother," said he, "whom I left here a few minutes since, while I listened to the most charming music under yon tree, which, when I arose, was withered and leafless, and all things, too, seemed changed." "Under the tree!—music!—what is your name?" "John," said he. "Poor John!" cried out the old man; "I heard my grandfather, who was your father, often speak of you, and long did he bewail your absence; fruitless inquiries were made for you, but old Catti Madlen, of Brechra, said that you were under the power of fairies, and would not be released until the last sap of that sycamore tree was dried up. Embrace, embrace, my dear uncle, your nephew!" The old man was about to embrace him, but he suddenly crumbled into dust!

They have a lake in Wales, it seems, which beats Killarney: In ancient days, a door in a rock near this lake was found open upon a certain day every year—we think it was May-day; those who had the curiosity and resolution to enter, were conducted by a secret passage, which terminated in a small island in the centre of the lake; here the visitors were surprised with the prospect of a most enchanting garden, stored with choicest fruits and flowers, and inhabited by the Tylwyth Teg, or Fair Family, a kind of fairies, whose beauties could be equalled only by the courtesy and affability which they exhibited to those who pleased them: they gathered fruits and flowers for each of their guests, entertained them with the most exquisite music, disclosed to them many secrets of futurity, and invited them to stay as long as they should find their attention agreeable; but the island was secret, and nothing of the produce must be carried away. The whole of this scene was invisible to those who stood without the margin of the lake; only an indistinct mass was seen in the middle, and it was observed that no bird would fly over the water, and that a soft strain of music at times breathed with rapturous sweetness in the breeze of the morning.

It happened upon one of these annual visits that a sacrilegious wretch, when about to leave the garden, put a flower, with which he had been presented, in his pocket; but the theft boded him no good. As soon as he had touched unhallowed ground, the flower vanished and he lost his senses. Of this injury the fair family took no notice at the time; they dismissed their guests with their accustomed courtesy, and the door was closed as usual, but their resentment ran high; for though the Tylwyth Teg and their garden undoubtedly occupy the spot to this day, though the birds still keep at a respectful distance from the lake, and some strains of music are still heard at times, yet the door which led to the island was never re-opened.

Some time after this, an adventurous person attempted to draw off the water, in order to discover its contents, when a terrific form arose from the midst of the lake, commanding him to desist, or otherwise he would drown the country.

Wild cats at present infest the forests of Germany in such numbers that sportsmen in many districts complain that there is hardly a hare to be shot. This ferocious little member of the feline race has even committed considerable havoc among the young deer in some parts of the country. The consequence is that regular cat-hunts have been found necessary to thin their numbers.

JILTING.

De Quincey wrotc of murder as one of the fine arts, but we are unaware that any philosopher has ever treated of jilting as an abstract science. There are few words in the language more misunderstood. An English paper discourses so sensibly on the subject that we cannot forbear reprinting the entire article. It is apropos of a certain criminal trial recently concluded, but will answer as a text treatise on jilting for all time. Our authority says:

So long as there is love-making in the world, and engagements, and talk of weddings and young folks' happy prospects, so long will one shadow haunt these felicities, and experience have its moments of misgiving; so long will society have to report from time to time of sudden changes, broken promises, feelings outraged, and hopes blighted in their pride of bloom. Whenever happiness depends on the consent of two, one may fail; and whatever is possible to human weakness and error will certainly now and then be done. No circle, therefore, is ever long without its interesting case of jilting, whether arousing indignant sympathy or giving play to that refining casuistry which is a feature of our day. But to us it seems that the question, as a question, is particularly prominent just now, possibly from the discussions following a celebrated criminal trial, and also from the use made of it by a popular novelist, to stimulate the curiosity and interest of his readers. The term which we have been forced to adopt was probably devised when constancy was a more unquestioned virtue than it is with us—when people were not so much in the habit of analyzing their natures, and feelings were supposed to be under absolute moral control; and thus a certain act cannot be expressed summarily without giving it a vulgar name, and so committing the speaker to an adverse judgment. And yet jilting is rarely so simple a business but that something, and generally a great deal, may be said for it, and especially where the perpetrator is a lady. In fact, it is not only that the term itself is feminine, but we believe the act, in its proper typical significance, is feminine also—where, that is, it results from actual change of mind. Men commit breaches of faith quite as often as women, but when they do so, it is almost always from deliberate self-interest, not from any startling change in their feelings. Crosbie, who creditably represents the male jilt, is in a way constant to Lily. His affections were not the things that swerved or changed owners; they simply interfered with his prospects. This was the scrape he found himself in, and he thought he knew his way out of it. A real change of feeling, the act of breaking an engagement at the last, simply because the person with whom it was contracted has become distasteful and caprice turns love into loathing, is a woman's act, and this is the conduct that admits of two sides in social discussion. There are plenty of men ready to follow Crosbie's example, plenty of other men to take for granted, in their own minds or amongst men of the world, that there was nothing else to be done; but the tongue does not run on this theme; in fact, it is one of the things to be done—taken for granted—not talked of. But all the refinements of sentiment, all the subtleties of conflicting duties, all mazes of feeling may be found entangled and complicated in a case of lady-like jilting, where the rules of good breeding have been observed with discriminating delicacy, and an array of heart-rending scruples pleaded in extenuation. What, it is boldly asked, is a woman to do under such circumstances? and the reply is not so easy to find as the indignant side imagine.

Take the ordinary case. A young man and woman meet, are mutually attracted, go through a course of flirtation, ripening into courtship on his side, and resulting in eager, happy acceptance on hers. Amidst the gratulations of friends and the jubilation of the contracting parties, who enjoy the celebrity and glory of their position, the affair progresses, and the day nears which is to make him "the happiest of men." The lady, in the delicious excitement of her trousseau, suffers feeling to sleep, till suddenly she discovers a change in herself. Her William is no longer all-in-all to her; she wakes to his faults; finds him tiresome, vapid, finally intolerable. William is, in fact, just what he always was—his good and bad very much on the surface—his little awkwardnesses always patent to his friends, but a good honest fellow, with a heart only too much in the affair for the success of his hopes. It is she who sees him with different eyes—eyes which exaggerate every defect till life looks hideous under the prospect of his inseparable company. To people not in love, and alive to the irksomeness of uncongenial society, life-long companionship with anybody to whom they are not used is an alarming if not repulsive idea. Those who reason from what they know in themselves, not upon general principles, and who happen always to have felt constancy in the abstract something of a puzzle, sympathize with a hapless girl entangled in a horrible mesh of promises not in her power to perform. They think her recoil from William not unnatural, and begin to wonder that these things do not happen ofter. Thus, in every affair of this sort, where the lady has done nothing flagrant to aggravate her case, there will be strong differences of opinion, and there will be persons to constitute themselves respectively counsel for the prosecution and the defence. The simple people who think a promise binding and constancy a virtue, and a very easy virtue too, are on the lover's side. They realize what must be the supreme bitterness of that moment—made up of rage, grief, bewilderment, shame, blank void—when a man, having garnered up his hopes on some fair one, has his heart returned upon his hands; when, having believed himself first in her affections, he finds himself nothing—not only not beloved, but repugnant. No, they cannot forgive a woman who can inflict upon the man who loves her, and whom she has once loved, such complicated and humiliating torment. The lady's advocates assert, on the other hand, that constancy is not an affair of the will—that the fault lies with destiny, or with William himself, who does not stand the test of close intimacy. And then comes the question, what is a woman to do when she finds the prospect of a union with him unsupportable? True, she has promised; but is there not a more binding promise beyond, which she could not undertake without conscious falsehood and hypocrisy? Would it not be a greater wrong, even to him, to marry than to break away while there is yet time? The power to answer this question does not really influence our right of censure, but it is put as though the whole point turned upon it. In fact, nobody is in a condition to answer the Yes or the No except the lady herself and her closest intimates, for it hangs on something of which the outside world cannot be the judge, which yet has a right to be angry when it sees an honest attachment brought to grief. Only, if the lady can prove herself in the right in breaking her engagement, our blame ought to be of a severer sort than if the decision of conscience is that she ought to have gone through the thing at any cost to herself. It all depends on whether she ever cared for him in the way her words and actions gave him to understand she did. If she did, if there has been one spark of real love in the business, she should have swallowed her scruples, and all would have come right; and so she will discover when too late. There are some forms of caprice and change of mind we can pity. There is in the feminine organization a tendency to sudden misgivings and disgusts, the offspring of nerves rather than feeling, and akin to the spleen and vapors which in old times were such acknowledged sources of inconvenience and perplexity to mankind. What so natural as that should clash now and then with that other characteristic of seeing things, not with the eye of reason, but of imagination—that proneness to illusion without which perhaps it is impossible ever to be properly in love at all, and which sets off her lover in a glow of colors certainly not all his own? Is it strange that the veil should flutter aside now and then, that her constitutional fastidiousness should betray her into some vagaries? Nature and society conspire to make her look forward to marriage as her calling; but there is another side. Something never fairly considered before has to be sacrificed to bring about this consummation. It is no wonder if the prize, when fairly within reach should lost its prestige at odd moments; and, if the influence of the hour is allowed its way, it precipitates her into the act of jilting. She shows herself capricious and changeable; we can boldly pronounce her wrong, and at the same time unhappy in her error, for we know that habit, duty and the sense of the inevitable would soon have established her in the first favorable way of thinking.

But what if she has never cared for him? What if, from the first, her course has been one of simple selfishness, of which this is the natural denouement? What if all along her aim has been to make him wish to marry her, without concerning herself with results? What if the desire to attract has blinded her to the nature of her own feelings precisely at the time when they would have been her best guides? In most cases of the kind it is no want of charity to believe that this final act has been held in reserve, though perhaps only with a semi-consciousness, from the first. In this case she is quite right in having recourse to it; but she can only be right now at the cost of having been wrong all along—wrong in altogether a deeper, more pervading sense, than her weaker but sincerer sister in error. Both are selfish, both have failed to recognize a paramount claim upon them; but in one case it is an isolated act, in the other a course of action. We can only argue on simple cases. We know that in actual life they are complicated by a thousand intricacies, demanding the nicest casuistry. No woman is bound to marry a man simply because she has promised him, if he reveals qualities dangerous or incompatible with domestic comfort. The man who has it in him to cut her throat if thwarted, may fairly be broken with; though this is a judgment which has found not a few impugners in late discussions on the subject, as though some power of self-control were no essential and integral part of a man who pretends to a place in human society, and would attach other destinies to his own. Let us finally observe of the jilt proper and unmitigated that, whatever her profession of regret at giving pain, she would not be pleased—would even feel defrauded of her due—if her victim did not suffer a considerable intensity of disappointment, and if this did not extend over a long period, and affect his whole life. It is never pleasant to her to hear of his "getting over it," and marrying somebody prettier, richer, and more devoted than herself. The news gives her a sense of jealous ill-usage, which exhales in pique and disparagement.

And in this temper we see the essential difference between masculine and feminine heart-treacheries. The man who jilts most commonly does it for some substantial advantage, not often from simple vanity or whim. The lady probably wants feeling, but she has not necessarily been prompted by mere vulgar self-interest. She has thought only of herself, but that self need not be the outside self that dresses fine and fares sumptuously. The man has all along better known his own mind. Through all its changes he has had a consistent notion of doing the best for himself—a consideration to which the woman's craving for conquest has possibly blinded her. Hence the false lover's course has been a more comprehensible and reasonable affair than the flirt's, and his delinquency more reducible to a pecuniary standard, and appraisable by a jury. In one obvious respect, besides the deeper social injury, his sin is beyond comparison the greater, as being more gratuitous. He has had the power of selection, and time to deliberate; with the lady it is now or never, and she may be surprised and flattered into a consent immediately repented of. But, on the other hand, the man has one temptation to treachery in a far greater degree than comes to women. He is tried by change—change of place, of circumstances, of station in life—all bringing an army of opposing influences of which few people know the force till they are tried. Thus a man engages himself with many a vow of eternal fidelity, and emigrates to the colonies. It may require an exceptional constancy to keep his word at the antipodes, where life perhaps alternates between absolute solitude or, when he comes upon female society, an easy intimacy of intercourse to which our manners offer no parallel.

The officer at country quarters used to be the typical inconstant and breaker of hearts, the man "who loves and rides away." We are not sure that we may not now divide this evil fame with the curates, and for the same reason—the trial brought about by change. One consequence of admitting a different social class into the Church will be a countless number of breaches of promise. It is so already. A young man—and these ambitious young fellows are all in a hurry to begin life—engages himself to a pretty girl of his own class. Something puts it into his head to enter the Church, to which there are so many side entrances in these days. His fiancée, between pride in him and the prospect of personal advancement, is delighted. He scrambles into some miserable smattering of learning, and is ordained to a curacy. Here somebody asks him to dinner or to tea. For the first time in his life he finds himself in a drawing-room, and sees ladies in company array. Shy, awkward and loutish as he seems, his spirit is all agog; a new world opens to him; he perceives at once that he has thrown himself away. Nothing seems impossible to a man who has begun a career, and cast off something of his old slough; it is the season for the very intoxication of vanity. His first love is despised in his eyes; she is a hindrance and a stumbling-block; but for her he might make some great match. In this temper he can easily find some adviser to press on him the duty of not making a fool of himself, and the rest follows as a matter of course. But, independently of obvious temptations of this sort, and where there is no social advancement or novelty of scene to account for them, there has always been an especially clerical form of jilting. The fact is that honor and simple good faith—virtues of natural religion—are the real guardians of constancy; and where nature and conscience teach us our duties with sufficient clearness, men have no right whatever to turn their backs upon these counsellors, under the pretence of seeking a higher guidance. Revelation was given to supplement, not to supercede. But certainly the world has all along allowed to religious teachers a wide license in this particular. A man's usefulness, or a higher vocation, have been pleaded as justifications in cases where simple laymen would have met with hard measure, and have even gained him credit as evidence of self-denial. It was a very extreme case where mediæval saints left their wives to shut themselves up in monasteries; but all orders and sects have their instances where the tie, if not of marriage, yet of solemn betrothal, has been held light in comparison of more spiritual duties; and nobody has thought much of all the grief and desolation incident to the suffering and passive victims in these boasted sacrifices. This is the weak side of real enthusiasm, for we are not speaking solely of cases where it is used as a specious veil.

The treachery under discussion increases so much with the social standing of the actors, and with their opportunities for refinement, that our judgment must be guided by these considerations. In the uneducated classes, where there is little delicacy of manners, or nicety of discrimination—where, as it seems, one companion does very nearly as well as another, and a lost love can be replaced by another at the shortest notice—the grave sin of jilting must dwindle into a peccadillo. The less subtle the link that binds, the slighter the obligation. Of course, it is quite possible for our housemaid to be jilted in as crushing and blighting a sense as our daughter or sister, but experience teaches us that our sympathy may safely wait for facts before it overflows in the same measure. There are some loves, in all classes, of as low an organization as certain forms of animal life. Cut them in two, with however effectual a snap of the shears, and new tails and budding horns presently assure us of the vitality of the severed members; or, in other words, there will simply be two couples where before there was one. Nobody really jilts another, in any harsh sense of the word, who does not sin against the respectable public opinion of his class; but, on the other hand, that society must be in an elementary or demoralized condition where this rudest form of inconstancy is not regarded as a grave offence, not only to the individual sufferer, but to the circle in which it has been committed, as a breach of public duty, as inflicting a wound on that pure and simple good faith which is the foundation of all social credit and honor.

FASHION.

Fashion is tyrannical! The laws with which she governs the world are arbitrary, and most generally irrational. One need only turn over the fashion-plates of the last century, to be convinced of the truthfulness of these propositions. In them we find "style" as changeable as the clouds upon a summer's day; nor do these changes develop new beauties. Indeed, Fashion does not search for beauty, but merely for novelty: this is the talisman for which she struggles, for which she torments the human form divine, amplifying shoulders and diminishing waists. Says the poet:

They braced my aunt against a board
To make her straight and tall;
They laced her up, they starved her down,
To make her light and small.
They pinched her feet, they singed her hair,
They screwed it up with pins;
Oh! never mortal suffered more
In penance for her sins!

Such is the inquisition which the giddy goddess has established; such the means by which she attains her ends. For nearly every other species of idolatry the charitable man can find some toleration in his heart; in every other species the philosopher can detect some strange yet rational allurement, some glittering seduction calculated to induce devotion; but in the creed of Fashion—that hollowest of all hollow creeds—these do not exist. Her appeal is not to the nobler sensibilities, nor to any dormant principle of devotion; she works only on human vanity and the folly of the age; she feeds only upon the most insignificant of passions. Let any man ask himself why such and such "styles" are prevalent—such hats, and such coats, and he will find no response. The truth is, that even in this age of rationalities, we walk the streets dressed in more irrationality than is the clown of the sawdust ring in his cap and bells. It is the "style" to have a pair of buttons affixed to the waist of our coats! and why? In old times these buttons were so placed, because they acted as a support for the sword-belt which every gentleman wore girded about him. Yet why should we wear them now? Fashion decrees it, and we submit; not because there is any intrinsic beauty in that pair of buttons; not because they are useful or ornamental, but simply because they are "the style." And so on through the whole list of fashions we shall find no better logic, no truer reasoning.

Love will Find a Way.—A couple, not one hundred miles from Manchester, carried on their courtship in rather a novel manner. A young man had fallen in love with the daughter of his employer; but from certain ideas of wealth, a match was opposed by the father. The consequence was that the young man was forbidden to visit his employer's house. The old gentleman was in the habit of wearing a cloak, and the young couple made him the innocent bearer of their correspondence. The lady pinned a letter inside the lining of the old gentleman's cloak every day, and when the father went into the counting-house and threw off his cloak, the lover took out the lady's epistle, read it, and sent the reply back in the same manner. Love and ingenuity were finally successful.

HOW LONG, O LORD, HOW LONG?

The following stanzas, by Oliver Wendell Holmes, were among the autograph contributions to the Brooklyn Sanitary Fair:

Peace! Shall we ever hear that blissful sound,
And see the raging steeds of war unbound?
Our streams run blood, our fields are crimson mire,
Smoke hides the sun, the night is red with fire—
How long, O Lord, how long?

As one that sleeping moans, but knows not why,
Till at the last he wakes with sudden cry,
I, slumbering, wake to hear a nation's prayer
Piercing the death-chilled, sorrow-laden air—
How long, O Lord, how long?

Patience! The fire must burn the root of shame;
The tears of anguished souls must quench the flame;
God led His people to the promised shore
Through the long desert. We will ask no more.
How long, O Lord, how long?

FROM OUR FRENCH FILES.

THE French journals which reach us by the last steamer seem unusually full—sprightly as French journals usually are—of clever little stories and amusing gossip; so full that, assuming it to be no great harm to pirate in foreign waters we translate for the CALIFORNIAN's columns what strikes us as racy and good, confident our French friends will never miss it.

Louis Ulbach is one of the three mysterious courriéristes of the Indépendance Belge. He writes in that journal over the signature of "Phares," and his last courrier has a number of rather amusing mots. For instance (but first it will be necessary for the reader to know that in France at a fire it is customary for the bystanders to form a chain by joining hands, for the purpose of passing water and to prevent thieving)—he tells us that a thief having taken advantage of a fire to make himself a present of a watch, the Judge said to him at his trial, "You are doubly guilty; for you have stolen a watch, when you should have been making a chain!"

As the Judge condemned him to a chain, we suppose that in wearing it the thief atoned for his fault.

Ulbach also tells of a Mr. X——, a banker who was very hard on his customers in money matters, so much so that his name was proverbial through Paris. X—— was also fond of referring to the good old times, and never uttered three sentences without invoking the principles of '89. This caused one of his victims to remark: "Yes, he goes for the principles of 89—per cent."

—

AN EASTER EGG WORTH HAVING.

Another writer in the Grand Journal in his Chronique says: We have been shown the lady who received the largest Easter Egg of the year; our confrere Henri de Pène circulates the story. There was on that day a grand dinner at the lady's. While it was in progress a large cart, drawn by two powerful horses entered the yard of the hotel, containing not an egg, but an enormous globe—a veritable machine— of extravagant dimensions, and having the shape of a gigantic egg. This ovoid, painted blue and ornamented with ribbons and gilding, had the following inscription in letters of gold: Noli timare. People thronged from all quarters and surrounded this mysterious egg, asking questions of the carman, but he knew nothing. At last, encouraged by the inscription, which said do not be afraid, they opened the egg. It contained a horse, a magnificent English saddle animal, all ready caparisoned for mounting, which began to paw and neigh as soon as he got fairly out of his elegant oval prison. The connoisseurs who happened to be there all united in estimating the value of this horse at the lowest figure as 15,000 francs.

We know of nothing more gallant than this present, unless it be the one which the Archduke Maximilian made to his sister-in-law, the Empress of Austria. He offered her the Island of Lacroma situated in the Adriatic close by Ragusa, the same island whereon Richard Cœur de Léon was imprisoned on his return from Palestine. The Empress will spend some time at Lacroma for the benefit of her health.

And since we are speaking of presents let us call attention to a paragraph, singular, to say the least, which appeared recently in the Gazette de Vienne, worded as follows: "His Imperial, Royal and Apostolic Majesty, by a decree dated March 10th, deigned to grant to the Imperial Royal frotteur [the man who waxes the floor of the Court] the Cross of Merit to reward him for the good services he has rendered through many long years." The cross of merit to a frotteur! Is the 10th of March by any chance the 1st of April with the Austrians?

—

THE VERY ECSTASY OF LOVE.

If a Frenchman's love were as enduring as it generally is violent, the thing would be phenomenal. What would old Polonius have said to this story? A young man of family, enlisted as volunteer, and who had arrived at the rank of a non-commissioned officer in the French army, came from Africa to spend his furlough in Paris. He fell madly in love with a lady, (a little actress, the prettiest in the world, who, though young, has already acquired considerable notoriety,) and the young couple forgot in the sweetness of their honeymoon that the furlough of the young soldier had expired. One night it was necessary for the guards to go to the house of the enchantress and carry away the lover by main force, to make him join his regiment. He was immediately put in the cars, under an excellent escort; but, at one of the stations, opening the door and escaping from the guard, thanks to the darkness, he crosses on foot the forest of Senart, and after six hours' walk returns, worn out, muddy, and soaked through—the night was very stormy—to kiss once more the finger-tips of the beloved one. This accomplished, and comforted by his stirrup-kiss, he leaves her once more, this time of his own free will, and returns to his duty. "What is there about these women that makes one love them so?" asks the writer from whom we translate, and we fancy the shrug of his shoulder as he puts the question upon paper.

—

A NEWER WAY STILL OF PAYING OLD DEBTS.

In these warm days the coolness of the hero of the following histoirette is decidedly refreshing: L——, a painter of talent, and a good liver, has creditors—so many that he pays none of them. Amongst the most importunate was his tailor. One morning the first clerk of this latter creditor knocked at the door.

"I come, sir, to ask you for money," said the clerk politely, but with the decided tone of one who means to have what he asks for; "my employer has heard that you received some money yesterday, and——"

"Excuse me, sir," interrupted L——, with perfect equanimity, "but if you have made up your mind to preach to me, I must tell you beforehand that however eloquent your sermon may be, it will be impossible for me to pay your bill to-day."

"Is that your final reply, sir?"

"You have said it."

"In that case, I must tell you, with great regret, that I am ordered not to leave here until you have given me the money."

"As you please, sir; take a seat."

The clerk sat down, and L——, opening the door, calls out to the concierge: "I am at home to nobody, only I wish you would come in to-night and take the letters you find on my desk to their addresses.

Then he shut his door, put the key in his pocket, sat down to his desk, wrote a lot of letters which he sealed with black, and then scribbled all over a large sheet of paper headed in large letters:

"THIS IS MY WILL."

The clerk followed all his movements and laughed to himself with that knowing air which seems to say: That is not very smart!

When L—— had done writing, he opened a large closet, got on a chair, and unwound a long roll of list of all colors. Now the tailor's curiosity began to be aroused.

"What now?" he thought to himself. "Has he an idea of making me his prisoner, and compelling me to make list shoes?"

L——, arming himself with a hammer, began to fasten the doors and windows with a seriousness which resembled sadness. This accomplished, he took a large bronze cup, from which he improvised a chafing dish; he filled it with coal and lit it.

"This is a farce," thought the clerk to himself; but this time he did not laugh.

L—— goes back to his desk, arranges his papers, and writes these words, which he sticks on the wall:

"ACCUSE NOBODY OF OUR DEATH."

At that moment, the tailor, who began to sneeze, either from fear or incipient asphyxia, got up and said to L——, who was stretched out on an arm chair, his eyes already closed: "Excuse me, sir, I get 1,800 francs a year for collecting bills and not for getting suffocated;" and he turned towards the door.

"It is too late," said L——, placing himself before him and over-topping him with his great height, "our determination is irrevocable!"

"De grace, sir, I am suffocating, let me out—either through the door or through the window!" cried the tailor.

L——, who had all he could do to keep from laughing, at last turned the key in the lock, the door was opened, and the bill and the clerk went down stairs four steps at a time, and L—— has never seen nor heard of either of them since.

—

TAKING NOTES.

The other night, while Mario was singing, or rather trying to sing, the Barbier de Seville, one of his best friends was seen industriously writing away in his memorandum book.

"What is X—— about?"

"He is taking notes of Mario."

"That, perhaps, is why Mario has so few left," said a wag.

—

SPEAKING BY THE CARD.

Eugene Sue, in one of his romances, relates in this wise the interview of a priest with a commis voyageur—or travelling clerk—on the deck of a ship:

"Then you were present at the miserable end of this worthy bishop?"

"Alas, Sir Abbot, I was, like him, a prisoner to the savages."

The other—"What a pity, sir; he was such an estimable and generous prelate!"

The other—"And so sweet, so tender."

"I see that you fully appreciate him."

"Alas! Sir Abbot, I ate some of him."

—

REMOVING A DIFFICULTY.

The following pleasant story of life in the Marquesan Islands, very much like the above, we find in the Grand Journal. It purports to be told by a Catholic missionary who had long been resident there:

A native came to the missionary one day, accompanied by two wives, and announced an intention of having his union with them blessed by the Catholic priest.

"Two wives!" said the missionary, "but, my friend, our holy religion forbids polygamy."

The savage withdrew without breathing a word. Fifteen days after he returned, having only one wife on his arm, and reiterated his request.

"Have I not told you," said the missionary, "that there is an insurmountable obstacle?"

"But I have only one wife, my father."

"How is that?"

"I have eaten the other!"

HAYTIEN HORRORS.

WORSHIP OF THE GOD VEAUDOU—A YOUNG CHILD SACRIFICED AND EATEN BY NEGROES—EIGHT NEGROES CONCERNED IN THE CANNIBALISM.

OUR readers are probably aware that the prevalence of a terrible superstition among the negroes of Hayti has been unveiled by the discovery of the sacrifice of a child to one of their infernal deities. The mere fact of the crime has been told in the daily journals. In reproducing the particulars from the Gazette des Tribunaux, we do not design to pander to the popular appetite for horror, but simply to illustrate the depth and degradation to which superstition can conduct the ignorant, even in a community which claims to be civilized, in this nineteenth century.

The accused, eight in number, were named Jeanne Pellé, Floréal Appollon, Guerrier François, Congo Pelleé, Julieu Nicolas, Néride François, Roséide Sumera, Beya Protspere. A judgment in the matter was rendered last month. The following is the act of accusation; we translate it almost literally in order to preserve its local color, form and style:

"Towards the middle of December last, Congo, the accused, in order to have his miserable position changed, applied to the god Veaudou, who, according to his tale, ordered him a human sacrifice. The foolish and wicked Congo told it to his sister, the accused Jeanne Pellé, who also believes herself in communication with infernal spirits.

"Claircine, daughter of Miss Claire, scarcely seven or eight years old, living with Jeanne, her aunt, was the one picked out by her uncle and aunt to be sacrificed.

"On Tuesday, the 27th of December, Jeanne, who lives at Bizoton, got up at 2 in the morning and got ready to go down to town, bringing her innocent niece to Congo, with whom she arranged everything. The child was to be spirited away during her absence, which was to last a few hours only.

"Therefore, before going down to town, the perfidious Jeanne went to her sister Claire's house, to induce her also to go to Port-au-Prince, no doubt to facilitate the abduction of Claircine. The poor mother, suspecting nothing, said it was too early, and that she would not go to town before daylight; she went, however, with Jeanne to the latter's house after a few things which she had left there the day before. On the way she saw Claircine seated with Congo (the sheep and the wolf) before the latter's door. She determined to take Claircine home on her way back, and to have her sleep there. In the meanwhile she went to Jeanne's house, who delivered up to her the things in question; but on her return the child was not in front of the door any more.

"She called her, but Congo answered: 'Claircine is abed inside.'

"What reasons could the mother have to fear for her child? Was he not her uncle?

"Towards 6 in the morning, on going to hang in the sun some wet clothes, Claire again saw the child, who this time was warming herself by the fire Congo had lighted; she heard him tell Claircine to go to Julien's. Suspecting nothing, Claire went back home and left for Port-au-Prince, as she intended. So the unfortunate Claireine started to go to Julien's by order of her uncle, but soon came back to tell Congo that she had lost her way, as though the unhappy child foresaw already her miserable fate.

"But the ferocious Congo, who had premeditated his crime in concert with the worthy Jeanne, knew that the accused, Floréal Guerrier and Beya, were all together expecting their prey at the house of Julien. He then sets out with Claireine, takes her to Julien's, and gives her up to the monsters, who tie her limbs; thence the victim is transported alive to Floréal, where she remains (her limbs still tied) in a mysterious place, commonly called "Humfort" by the adepts of the sect of Veaudou. The wife of Floréal, the accused Nereine, coming back from the river in the evening, saw the child in that state at her husband's, who entrusted her then with the secret.

"Claircine remained shut up for four days. During that time Congo and Jeanne, to put justice off the track and prevent suspicion, pretended to look for the child who, they said, had lost her way when going to Julien's. What a combination! All Bizoton heard of the disappearance of Claircine. To quiet the mother the perfidious Jeanne pretended that she had consulted a papa, named Digo, and that he had given her to hope that Claireine, though taken by a spirit, might some day be restored to her parents.

"Thinking that they had, by this clumsy fraud, deceived the vigilance of all, relying especially on the influence of the magic art, the scoundrels decide to consummate the sacrifice. They are about to murder the little girl, who, among her assassins will see her uncle and her aunt.

"The accused, Floréal, Jeanne, etc., belong to the ridiculous sect of the Veaudou; vagabonds without profession, ignorant, and, above all, wicked; they believe that without merit, without work, the manna is to fall from heaven into their mouths; they are meanly jealous of the good fortune of others.

"The cannibals—for we must at last call them by their name—the cannibals are at work. On Wednesday, 30th December, at 10 at night, the accused, Jeanne, the dreadful woman, the evil-doer, goes to Floréal's, her accomplice, where she finds the accused, Congo, Guerrier, etc. The child was taken by Congo and carried to Jeanne's house, where the accused Roséide kept herself against a table; she had been invited to the ceremony.

"There an atrocious crime, entirely unprecedented in our customs—a crime which would make the wolves themselves step back with fear—a savage crime was perpetrated.

"Jeanne strangled the poor child with her hands, whilst Floréal pressed her ribs and Guerrier held her feet. The child died in fearful convulsions, and her body was stretched out on the floor.

"Jeanne handed a knife to Floréal, who cuts off with one blow the head of the deceased, and this same Floréal skins the yet warm body; then, like wild dogs fighting over a piece of rotten flesh, they quarrel for the biggest share. Jeanne, Floréal and the rest precipitate themselves on the remains of the poor deceased and devour them; after this infernal repast the abominable guests go with the head of the young girl all covered over with blood to the house of Floréal, where it is boiled with yams.

"Néreine ate some and was taken with vomiting; Roséide ate some also and had an indigestion.

"The head is placed on an altar; Jeanne takes a small bell, rings, and orders a procession around the head.

"The cannibals, intoxicated with blood, begin a mysterious song; the ceremony over, the skin and the entrails of Claircine are interred not far from Floréal's house.

"Her blood and her pulverized bones are gathered in earthen vases and carefuly preserved.

"After having dined thus, the joyful guests, their hands soiled with innocent blood—blood which God would not allow Abraham to shed on a holy altar—the guests gaily separated, appointing to meet again on King's day, when another young girl was to be sacrificed, Losama, who was found at Floréal's, and whom Néreine had stolen on the highway leading to Léogane."

The eight cannibals have owned to the facts that were alleged against them with a calm and composure which added to the horror of their crime. They appeared to have full faith in their abominable superstition.

The jury of Port-au-Prince have returned a verdict in the affirmative on all the points of accusation. The tribunal has in consequence sentenced to death the eight culprits, and ordered that their execution should take place on the square of the exterior cemetery.

THE NEW ATLANTIC TELEGRAPH CABLE.—The Atlantic Telegraph Company Directors have completed a contract with Glass, Elliot & Co., of London, England, to manufacture the improved cable, unanimously recommended by the Scientific Committee, and arrangements have been made to lay the same in the summer of 1865. The conductor of this consists of a copper strand of seven wires, (six laid around one) each wire gauging 0.144 of an inch, and the centre strand 0.144 of an inch, and weighing 300 lbs. per nautical mile, embedded, for solidity, in Chatterton's compound. The conductor of the old cable of 1858 consisted of six wires laid around one, being about half the gauge of the new one, and weighing only 107 lbs. to the nautical mile. The insulator of the new cable is to consist of gutta percha, in four layers, between each of which is to be a thin layer of Chatterton's compound, making the diameter of the core 0.464 of an inch, weighing 400 lbs. per nautical mile. The insulator of the old cable was formed of three layers and weighed 261 lbs. per nautical mile. The external protection of the new cable is in two parts: first, the core is surrounded with a padding of soft jute yarn, saturated with a preservative mixture; next this padding is the protective covering, which consists of ten solid wires of the gauge of 0.095 of an inch, drawn from homogeneous iron, each wire being surrounded separately with five strands of Manila yarn. The whole of the ten strands thus formed of the hemp and iron are to be laid spirally around the padded core. The external protection of the cable laid in 1858, it will be remembered, consisted of eighteen strands of charcoal iron wire (each strand composed of seven small wires) laid spirally round the core, which latter was previously padded with hemp saturated with tar mixture. Each strand was of No. 14 gauge, and entirely unprotected from the action of the sea-water. The weight of the new cable is to be 35¾ cwt. per mile, while that of the old one was 20 cwt. The breaking strain of the new cable is 7¾ tons; of the old cable, 3¼ tons. The strength of the new cable is to be equal to 4.64 times its own vertical weight in the deepest water, (2,400 fathoms,) while that of the old cable was only 2.05 times the strength requisite for the deepest water.

A COUNTRY PAPER, under the head of "Life in San Francisco," says: "No less than six distinct cases of stabbing occurred there lately in one week, one or two probably fatal." Most people would call this death in San Francisco.

A LOVE SONG.

COME from your long, long roving
On the sea so wild and rough;
Come to me, tender and loving,
And I shall be blest enough.

Of man though you be unforgiven,
Though saint be unable to shrive,
I'll pray till I weary all heaven,
If only you come back alive.

Where your sails have been unfurling,
What winds have blown on your brow,
I care not, I ask not, my darling,
So that you come to me now.

Sorrowful, sinful, and lonely—
Poor and despised though you be;
All are nothing, nothing, if only
You turn from the tempter to me.

AMERICAN NUPTIALS IN PARIS.

A private letter from a gentleman resident in Paris just received from Paris, furnishes the following items of news, or rather of noces, from which it will be seen that though Paris may be the city to which good Americans are transported after death, it certainly is not that blessed place in which there is neither marrying nor giving in marriage. It appears that a Confederate young lady has become a convert to decided union principles, and that a neat little question of international law is involved in even so simple a thing as a wedding. It will also be seen that a shipment of legs is going on to the South, which looks as though it is apprehended that there will soon be a need for them there:

Miss Mary Davis, a young and beautiful Californian, has just been married to George Bucknell, one of my old Latin Quarter friends. The bride is much admired here and also in Germany, where she received numerous offers of marriage—from princes all the way down to commoners; but like a true American girl she stuck to her first love. She is a granddaughter of Capt. Lount, of Napa Valley, and a step-daughter of Eugene Sullivan, Esq., of your city.

Another marriage has also just been celebrated here, which created no little sensation, from the fact of its having been the first ceremony of the kind performed here between citizens of the Confederate States, under the sanction of Mr. Slidell. The bridegroom was Dr. Thomas Pratt, of the Confederate army, (twice a prisoner of war,) and the fair bride a daughter of the famous Doctor Sims, of Alabama, (not Capt. Semmes, of the Alabama,) who has had such a brilliant professional success here. There were several army and navy officers of the C. S. A. present, and they as well as the bridegroom wore their Confederate uniforms. As a matter of course, Secessia came out strong. * * * * * Three hours after the ceremony the bridegroom bade adieu to the disconsolate bride, and sailed for the South in the hope of running the blockade into Texas and joining his regiment. He was accompanied by several Confederate officers. Among them was young Magruder, a nephew of the General, (whose family, by the way, is still in Paris,) and Dr. Derby, the young surgeon who amputated General Hood's leg at Chickamauga, and re-sected his elbow at Gettysburg. He carried with him artificial legs for Hood, Ewell, and several other officers in the Confederate army.

This marriage has created much discussion here, many persons insisting that it is illegal; arguing that as Mr. Slidell and the government which he represents have not been recognized by France he has no right nor power to legalize marriages on foreign soil. This is international law at all events. The religious ceremony was performed by the Rev. Dr. Forbes, of the English Church. Altogether it has attracted more attention than any marriage which has taken place here for a long time.

DRAMATIC MENTION.

Miss Richings made her début at Maguire's Opera House, on Monday night, in that strange musical olla podrida, The Enchantress. The house was well filled, and the débutante received that greeting which appreciative audiences, all the world over, accord to talent associated with taste. Perhaps the heartiest testimonial of appreciation which Miss Richings received on Monday night, more decided even than the clapping of hands which the enthusiasts in the dress circle and parquet venture, or the cat-calls in which the boys in the gallery indulge when pleased, was the one fact that the majority of the audience sat a piece through which began at 8 o'clock in the evening and did not close until half-past 12 the next morning. And here a word: does not Mr. Maguire, in this one respect, give us too much for our money? Is not the brevity of human life lost sight of to a guilty degree in such pieces as The Enchantress?

The piece was well put upon the stage—capitally. There was new scenery, and there were new costumes and new trap-doors, and everything that could go to ensure a success. The number of supernumeraries that were marshalled together to give pastoral or martial effect to the situations was positively overwhelming. Had the débutante not made such a decided success, all these accessories would have attracted critical attention, and furnished the daily papers something to write about; but as it was, interest mainly centered in Miss Richings. As a person she is pleasing, possessed of a dignified presence and magnificent hair and eyes. As an artist she is excellent; her voice is rich and under careful cultivation, though somewhat lacking in metallic quality. In her trills she reminds one of an aviary of canary birds in full twitter. As an actress Miss Richings has self-possession without forwardness, and a pleasant grace of manner which never lapses into affectation; she is easy and natural, and we would welcome her to these shores on this latter account if on no other. Her father, Peter Richings, a gentleman long known to the stage—and the acquaintance is mutual—played the part of "Rauir." (Apropos of Mr. Richings, if he can be made to play "Sir Peter Teazle" it will prove a card.) Mlle. Acosta and her masculine supporter, Wiethoff, danced, and, altogether, the entire performance went off merrily and well. The Enchantress has kept the boards ever since, and will be repeated nightly until further notice. This afternoon the Marble Heart is the attraction.

At the Metropolitan, last Saturday evening, the sale of the Sanitary flour did not go off so briskly as had been anticipated. And we know not why; for certainly there are enough dough-faces in town to ensure, one would think, a favorable reception for flour. Perhaps it was because such a perfect Fourth of July had been kept up over the sack in other and smaller towns, and San Francisco was loth to follow the lead. It is a mighty touchy town, for its size, this San Francisco of ours! Or it may be that purse-strings have already been tugged at so persistently by those who hold the purse-strings of the Sanitary Fund, that San Franciscans scarcely felt like coming down with the dough, even when the flour was offered them, especially in times when stocks are drooping and twenty dollar pieces are rapidly coming to look as large as cart-wheels. But be the reason what it may, certain it is that the sack of flour did not bring much more than a tenth of the sum that was predicted for it. (And, by the way, this is as good a place as any other in which to acknowledge the receipt of photographs of the flour and the gentleman whom we suppose to be the miller, from the artist, George H. Johnston.) A warrant for military services, donated by Strattman—the warrant was for services rendered by him as Major at the Camp of Instruction—calling for $62, was sold and re-sold several times for its par value in gold, the first buyer being W. B. Farwell. Each buyer donated it again for sale; no one would have dared to keep it if inclined; and so the thing went on until quite a neat little sum was raised from the proceeds.

The Outcasts, a dramatization from Miss Braddon's novel of that name, dramatized by poor Cranshaw, who gloomily found the dark portals of a suicide's grave, was produced at the Metropolitan on Monday night. So there was a sensation at both houses—for the Outcasts is to the full as sensational a piece as The Enchantress. We shall no more attempt to initiate the reader into the mysteries of the plot than we would attempt to explain to him a Chinese puzzle. And this for two reasons: In the first place, we would not deprive them of the pleasure they will have in attempting to unravel it; and in the second place, we could not explain it even if ever so much inclined—perhaps this latter reason ought to have been given first. Everybody in the course of the play kills somebody, and nobody is happy; and towards its conclusion a man is drowned. Those of the people who are not married want to be married, and those who are married evince a strange anxiety to get rid of their wives. So that in this one particular, at least, the play is very much like real life, and pointedly illustrates the truth of the old poet's lines—

> Marriage is a rabble rout;
> Those who are out would be in,
> And those who are in would fain be out.

The leading parts are taken by Allen and Courtaine, Mrs. Jordan playing the pretty daughter of one of the parties, that either kills or gets killed—we forget which—very prettily. The Outcasts is about as good a representative of the sensational drama as one could ask to witness. Those who desire to see it have but one chance more—this afternoon—when a performance will be given for ladies and children; thereafter the Outcasts will be cast out and the brand swept from society and the bills.

The Metropolitan had a New Idea on Wednesday night, and it filled the house.

To-night the benefit of Washington Hose Company No. 1 comes off at the Metropolitan, on which occasion Ghioni has been secured and will sing. Mrs. Judah, Frank Lawlor, Joe Murphy and Master Farron have volunteered their services; so that with the regular company too, a good performance may be expected. The Little Treasure, and the farce of Kiss Your Father—a farce indeed if one's uncle has a pretty daughter—constitute the bill. On Monday night, Mr. and Mrs. Irwin appear; and this closes our Metropolitan mention.

Paul Julien, the violinist, a protégé of Sontag's, and brought up by her, has arrived, and will soon give a concert. He is said to be an excellent violinist.

BRIEF MENTION.

Henry J. Raymond, of the New York Times, has written a History of the Administration of President Lincoln, including his Speeches, Addresses, Letters, Messages, and Proclamations, with a Preliminary Sketch of his Life. It is to be published by Derby & Miller.

A Defence of Green, the Malden Postmaster, is in press. It is understood that the plea rests on the private life of the person in question.

Artemus Ward contemplates accepting a proposition to go to England. His new book, giving an account of his travels and adventures in California, Nevada, Utah, etc., will soon be completed.

Simmons, the conjurer, who did not achieve a brilliant success in this city, is at the Broadway Theatre, in New York. He announces himself as the "Autocrat of the Realm of Music," and the "Basilcontbaumaturgist of the nineteenth century." His principal feat consists of producing blood-red writing on the arm.

It is said that the future Empress of Mexico has just turned author, and issued privately, Souvenirs de Voyage a bord de la Fantasie, and Un Hiver dans l'Isle de Madère."

At last accounts, Miss M. E. Braddon was engaged upon a new "sensation" novel, which was to appear early in May. Its title had not been made public.

Fitz Hugh Ludlow has in contemplation, it is said, a Life of the late Rev. Thomas Starr King.

The fourth series of Mrs. Jameson's Sacred and Legendary Art, which will be devoted to the history of Christ and his precursor, John the Baptist, as represented in Christian Art, has been completed by Lady Eastlake, the wife of the President of the Royal Academy. It will soon be published in two volumes, with numerous etchings and wood cuts.

Novelists abroad are having their attention turned to American habits by the prominence which American affairs have of late assumed in the world. The following occurs in a list of recent publications: Ein Urtheilsspruch Washingtons. Historischer Roman von Julius Backer. Zwei Bande. Jena: 1864. The subject is the conspiracy of Arnold and the adventures and capture of André, developed in a variety of incidents which are as ridiculous as they are false.

The lady or gentleman who writes under the nom de plume of "Holme Lee" will soon publish what would seem like a volume of miscellaneous writings, under the title of The Silver Age: Essaykins.

BUSINESS CHANGE.—A change has taken place in the importing and wholesale liquor house formerly known as H. Webster & Co., the interest of Mr. Webster having been purchased by the other partners, who continue the business under the name and style of Nudd, Stanley & Co. With the exception of Mr. Webster's retirement, the new firm is made up of the same members who constituted the old.

THE Pacific Insurance Company has levied an assessment calling in in the whole of the subscribed capital, $750,000. Forty per cent. has already been paid in. Of the new call thirty per cent is to be paid in on the 1st of June, and thirty per cent. on the 1st of July

ELECTRICITY AS A REMEDIAL AGENT.

When it was promulgated that disease could be entirely eradicated from the system without the use of poisonous drugs, the unthinking, or those who do not look deeply into cause and effect, scouted the assertion as chimerical, and adduced strong evidence of its utter impossibility. Long articles, replete with arguments, seemingly unanswerable, of the position that only through the digestive system could the blood be purged of the accumulation of the poisons which constitute disease. A great cry went up from the interested in the continued supremacy of the old system of one poison to cure another, that electricity, as a curative agent, had been tried and proved to be of but little if any value—thinking, poor souls, the world of science stood at the same point it occupied one hundred years ago. That were wrong, while those old fogies were content if they cured one in every five patients, there were those who were diving into the science of electricity, and finally it was discovered that the trouble was in the instruments used. From that time to the present improvements have rapidly advanced, until every disease in the catalogue of human ills have been either cured altogether or checked so as to enable the sufferer to seek those changes of climate which ultimately perform a perfect cure. Diseases hitherto considered incurable have been cured, and those diseases which took months, and even years, to cure by medical process, are now cured in a few weeks; and all by the Improved Instruments of Dr. J. H. Josselyn, Resident Physician at the Electropathic Institute, 645 Washington street, San Francisco. It is astonishing to see the number of patients and diversity of diseases that have been relieved by the electropathic system. From early morn till late at night his instrument is engaged imparting strength and health to all who have the good fortune to obtain his services.

The charges, too, are not as heavy as by the old system; besides there is no medicine to pay for, let alone the unpleasantness of swallowing the nauseous stuff. During the time the Institute has been in operation there has been more benefit to the human family derived from the system than from all other systems combined during the same period. Among the most troublesome diseases to which Californians have been exposed is Rheumatism. None have given the honorable practitioner more trouble to relieve, and none have pretended to cure (if we except known empirics) permanently. But this subtle disease gives way before the Electropathic System in a very short time, enabling the sufferer to go about his business without pain or the fear and dread of a relapse. And so with most other diseases considered incurable. We mention Rheumatism because of its abundance, but we could enumerate many other diseases fully as troublesome, and some far more fatal in their results.

Connected with this system are the renowned Electro-Magnetic Baths. Here let us caution the public against the numerous impostors in the bathing line. The pure magnetic bath is one of the most effective aids in the removal of disease from the system; but if given at the wrong time is likely to aggravate trouble, and cases have been known where the patient has been injured so badly as to require months to remove the injury. Persons in quest of this bath should be careful and not apply to a place where there is no physician to judge of the necessity of the remedy. In fact, the only place where they can be obtained, in all their purity, is at the Institute, where the Resident Physician will always be happy to examine and see that they are not unseasonably administered, and if not necessary, advise the requisite remedy.

To FEMALES, the Directors would say, Electropathy is particularly applicable to your delicate and fragile systems, and to the numerous troublesome and painful diseases to which you are liable; should you be irregular, a few treatments will restore the functions to the proper state without pain or inconvenience; should you be weak and enfeebled, either general or local, this system imparts strength and vitality, making the recipients feel buoyant and youthful where before they were languid and unable to enjoy the pleasures of life. One great blessing connected with Electropathy is, it purifies the system so thoroughly that it beautifies the complexion, making the coarse and freckled skin as pure and fair as possible, giving the patient a fresh and healthful look.

To the nervous the Directors would say, that you can be entirely removed from those dreadful feelings of evil forebodings, and your system strengthened so that nothing can disturb the current of your life. Several cases of insanity, arising from a disarrangement of the nervous system, have been permanently cured by this system. The Directors, in issuing this pamphlet, do it in the hope that it may be the means of awakening the public who have not studied into such things, to a sense of their duties, and if possible prevent those who have the care of a rising generation from poisoning their young charges with vile drugs, thereby entailing upon them troubles which, after life, may cause them to curse the origin. Also, that those in need of remedial agents may know where they can find them without resorting to taking the thousand-and-one poisonous nostrums that are continually being palmed off as sovereign panaceas for all the ills of humanity. Avoid them all—they are snares set to rob you, and do you bodily injury at the same time.

The Electropathic Institute was started amid the cry of interested charlatans, who used all the power their riches and the prejudices of the public gave them to prevent its success. It has risen to a position that is beyond their baffled malice, and will be honored in the scientific world when they are forgotten, or only remembered for their crimes and impositions. A thinking public are fast consigning them to that oblivion their works merit. Let them go, they will not be missed.

Persons seeking remedial assistance may wish to know something of the system by which diseases are so rapidly removed from the body. Electricity is a fluid of so subtle a nature, that it can only be studied by its results. We know by its action it forces everything of a foreign nature in the body from the centre to the surface, by its energy, while the vitality which it imparts fills up the vacuum, preventing thereby the subtle poisons from returning to the hitherto diseased parts—and here let it be understood, that the Bath should never be administered until the disease has been forced to the surface—except, perhaps, in cases of cold where fever has not set in. Its action upon mercurial disease is peculiar. The best authorities are of opinion that it liquifies the mercury—which, when in a liquid state, by its own specific gravity forces itself out of the body. This result has been arrived at by testing the water after an Electro-Magnetic Bath. After such tests have been found in the water, the patient is not troubled any more with those pains peculiar to the diseases. In all other cases it forces to the surface and is washed off by the bath. The whole system in its application is a luxury—there being no pain or inconvenience attending upon it; but the reverse is the case—being one continued pleasure all the time. Try it you that are suffering either from disease or the injudicious use of poisonous drugs, and you will be made to rejoice that you have had the courage to strike out from the beaten path.

Below are a few certificates from patients that have been cured at the Institute:

CERTIFICATES OF CURES.

San Francisco, April 18th, 1860.

This is to certify that I have been under the treatment of Dr. Josselyn, at the Electropathic Institute, and that he has cured me. My disease was mercurial, accompanied with chills. I applied to him on the 11th day of this month. I recommend all afflicted to employ him. He has cured me without medicine, by the use of his Electropathic Instrument. JOHN CALLAGHAN.

State of California, City and County of San Francisco—ss.

Subscribed and sworn to before me this eighteenth day of April, A. D. 1860. P. BARRY, Notary Public.

The undersigned takes this method of acknowledging publicly the benefits he received from the treatment applied to him at the Electropathic Institute while, suffering under a terrible infliction.

This is to certify that I have been under Electropathic treatment at the Electropathic Institute, 645 Washington street. When I applied to Dr. Josselyn I was cramped up with rheumatism, and also had the coast ague. So bad was I that, without relief. I don't think I could have lived more than one week. The Doctor, with his instrument relieved me the first treatment from all pain, and perfectly cured me of all disease in twenty treatments, without the use of medicines. I cordially recommend all afflicted to patronize the Institute, for it is truly a blessing to the afflicted, and the operation is very pleasant. I wish to publicly thank Dr. Josselyn for his care and sympathy. JOSEPH SEGER, of Bolinas Bay.

September 19, 1860.

State of California, City and County of San Francisco—ss.

Subscribed and sworn to before me this 19th day of September, A.D. 1860. P. BARRY, Notary Public.

Sacramento, October 19th, 1860.

DR. JOSSELYN—Dear and Honored Sir:—You requested me to let you know how I felt after being at home three weeks. Well, sir, I have now been here little over two weeks, and there is no return of that very unpleasant trouble. My sleep is sound, and there is no disturbance of the regular laws of nature. I feel as strong as I ever did before bad habits had weakened my system. Not only is the general debility entirely disappeared, but the local trouble is gone. I feel so strong that there is no fear of its return. Considering that you only took one month to cure a disorder of seven years' standing, I think your system almost miraculous. Accept my sincere thanks, and publish this, if you please. I have sworn to it, as you see.

C. BOWMAN.

State of California, County of Sacramento—ss.

Subscribed and sworn to before me this tenth day of October, A.D. 1860. CHAS. HART, Notary Public.

Hornitos, November 1st, 1860.

Well, Doctor, I am at home and have been to work in the water for several days, and there is no return of the Rheumatism, as I call it; and Mercurial pains, as you stated them to be. I feel as gay as a lark, no pain or bad feelings, no stiffness, but perfectly well, and all done by you in three weeks, without one drop of medicine. You had hard work to make me believe before you commenced, that you would cure me, but now I find it very easy to believe. Although my friends look rather incredulous, they cannot doubt my sober earnestness. Doctor, you have my thanks, and I will benefit you all I can, by spreading your fame up in these parts. Respectfully yours,

GEO. PERKINS, JR.

To J. M. Josselyn, M.D., Resident Physician, at the Electropathic Institute.

Nevada, November. 8th, 1860.

DEAR DOCTOR.—Pursuant to agreement, upon my arrival, I sit down to pen you a few lines in acknowledgment of the great service you have rendered me, in relieving me of that painful case of neuralgia and rheumatism. When I look back and see the gallons of medicine I have swallowed to no purpose, and then to think how soon you cured me, I am astonished. You were only twelve days performing a cure of the trouble for which I had taken medicine over six months. Dear Doctor, if you could see the wonder exhibited by my friends, who can hardly believe that a cure was performed without medicine; but here I have been cured, and I have not taken a drop of medicine from you nor from any one else while being treated by your splendid Instrument. I shall try to show my gratitude by sending every sick man I come across to you.

Yours, till death,
FRANCIS GARLAND,

To J. H. Josselyn, M. D., Resident Physician Electropathic Institute.

State of California, County of Nevada—ss.

Subscribed and sworn to before me this eighth day of November, A. D. 1860. F. SPAULDING, Notary Public.

Yreka, November 10th, 1860.

DR. JOSSELYN—Dear Sir: Your letter dated October 16th is before me. You wish to know how my bronchial troubles are. Now, Doctor, that looks a great deal like a joke. I once had such an affection, of several years' standing, but thanks to your natural mode of treating disease, it has gone to be numbered with the things of the past. Since my return I have not felt the slightest trouble from it. When you pronounced me well I did not expect to ever hear from it again. Any one who sits under treatment of that Improved Instrument of yours will have the same feelings. It imparts vitality to the system so rapidly that confidence is at once established. I have to thank you that you did not refuse to treat me because I could not pay you the whole of your reasonable charge; enclosed is the balance due you, and God bless you for the kind treatment I received at your hands.

Yours, ever grateful, WM. GARDNER.

State of California, County of Siskiyou—ss.

Subscribed and sworn to before me this tenth day of November, A. D. 1860.

B. F. WELLITS, Notary Public.

This is to certify that I, the undersigned, was troubled with dumb ague, accompanied with rheumatism, very badly. My disease was taken in Washoe. After having exhausted medicines without benefit I applied to Dr. Josselyn, at the Electropathic Institute, on the first day of November. After taking twenty treatments with his Improved Electropathic Instrument, I am perfectly cured, having been entirely relieved of all pain or inconvenience I feel as strong as I ever did when in the best of health. I cheerfully recommend all afflicted to his care, as being the best physician I ever became acquainted with. One great advantage, he uses no medicines, but cures by a process which is perfectly natural. The time occupied in my case was thirteen days. D. O. HARRA.

November 14th, 1860.

State of California, City and County of San Francisco—ss.

Personally appeared before me, D. O. Harra, and subscribed and sworn to the above certificate, on this 14th day of November, A. D. 1860. P. BARRY, Notary Public.

San Francisco, August 31, 1861.

To the Directors and Resident Physician of the Electropathic Institute: Sirs—You requested of me a certificate of the cure you performed in my case. Below I append it:

This is to certify that I was troubled with a swelling which commenced in my ankles, and gradually extended upward until it affected my whole body. I sought the best medical aid in New York and Boston, and they all pronounced it dropsy. Hoping to retrieve my health I visited California in February last. I consulted the Resident Physician at the Electropathic Institute, and now, after five months of treatment, and waiting to see its effects, I am pronounced well by competent judges. It did not take but three months of treatment to cure me, but I waited to see that it did not return. I feel perfectly assured, from what I saw while under treatment, that Electricity, as applied at this Institute, will cure any disease to which the human family is liable.

Now, gentlemen, you can make what use you please of this certificate. With my thanks to the Resident Physician for his kind attention, I subscribe myself,

Your thankful patient,
MRS. C. A. CARLTON.

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.

The advantages of electricity as a remedial agent are universally admitted by the medical and scientific world. It requires, however, experienced skill to apply this remedy efficiently, and this skill of application is possessed in an eminent degree by Dr. J. H. Josselyn, of the San Francisco Electropathic Institute. The Doctor is well known to us as a scientific gentleman, and an ardent devotee to his profession. He is no pretender, but has conferred incalculable benefit to those who were so fortunate as to seek relief at his hands. For those who desire speedy and permanent relief from the rheumatic pains so prevalent in this region, we can recommend no surer remedy than a visit to Dr. Josselyn, at his rooms in San Francisco, No. 645 Washington street.—Placerville Republican.

ARE YOU SICK?—We wish to say a word to those that are sick. We have in this city an institution known as the Electropathic Institute, situated at 645 Washington street. The establishment is under the care of Dr. J. H. Josselyn, a physician who has no superior in the city. He has been in charge of the Electropathic Institute for several years, and has been uniformly successful in his treatment of the numerous patients that have placed themselves under his charge. The electric treatment will cure many diseases that cannot be reached by any other mode. Dr. Josselyn gives his personal attention to all of his patients, and is always ready to give advice to those that may call upon him. His charges are very moderate; and we cannot do the sick a greater favor than to recommend them to call on him before placing themselves in charge of another.—San Francisco Daily Journal.

We call the attention of our readers to the advertisement of Dr. Josselyn's Electropathic Institute. Voluntarily and unsolicited, we make the following statement, proving its great beneficial effects, particularly in rheumatic cases. Some months since we were on an editorial trip, visiting the mountains. The stage upset and landed all the passengers including the writer, below in the valley, where the Deer Creek overflowed by receiving the additional material, extraneous to its usual contents. For some hours exposed in our wet clothes to night wind and weather, we soon felt the effects of the accident, in the mountains—pains in the back, hip, and legs; so much so that for weeks we hardly could walk. Treatments of all kinds were applied, but without avail, until our attention was called to the Electro-Galvanic Baths and appliances of the above Institute. Thank God, after two weeks, we have been fully restored, and enjoy now the free use of our limbs and body, as fully as previous to our involuntary bath in Deer Creek.—DR. H. BIEN, Ed. True Pacific Messenger.

ELECTROPATHY.—Electricity has long been classed among the most effective medical agents. It possesses great advantages over the system of therapeutics hitherto relied upon, as it reaches more certainly the seat of disease, especially in nervous or rheumatic complaints. The Electropathic Institute, No. 645 Washington street, under the charge of its able Resident Physician, Dr. J. H. Josselyn, has attained a well merited celebrity for the many cures which have resulted from the skilful application of this invaluable remedy.—Daily Morning Star.

☞ All letters answered with promptness and pleasure. Office open from 9 A. M. to 9 P. M. Advice gratis.

J. H. JOSSELYN, M. D.,
Resident Physician.

jn4

R. H. McDONALD & CO.,

R. H. McDONALD.) (J. C. SPENCER.

IMPORTING

Wholesale Druggists,

Corner of Sansome and Pine streets,

SAN FRANCISCO,

—AND—

J STREET, SACRAMENTO.

We respectfully beg leave to inform our customers and the public generally that we have opened a House in the city of San Francisco, where we will be pleased to see as many of our old friends and customers as can make it convenient to call upon us. We shall keep at both places a large and well selected stock of

DRUGS AND MEDICINES, SURGICAL INSTRUMENTS,

Dental Goods, Fancy Articles, Brushes and Combs,

SHOULDER AND BODY BRACES,

Ladies' Bandages and Supporters,

GUM ELASTIC STOCKINGS, TRUSSES,

Paints and Oils,

PATENT MEDICINES, HERBS AND EXTRACTS,

Brewers' and Soda Stocks,

CORKS (LARGE VARIETY), ASSAYERS' MATERIAL,

Burning Oils and Fluids,

Together with a large and complete assortment of all goods kept in a well supplied Wholesale Drug Store,

We respectfully solicit those dealing in our line to examine and price our stock before purchasing elsewhere.

R. H. McDONALD & CO.,
Sacramento and San Francisco.

R. H. McDONALD & CO.,

IMPORTING DRUGGISTS,

J STREET, SACRAMENTO,

AND

CORNER OF PINE AND SANSOME STREETS,

SAN FRANCISCO, CALIFORNIA.

IMPORTERS OF

DENTAL AND SURGICAL INSTRUMENTS,

TEETH, GOLD FOIL.

VULCANITE MATERIAL.

Vulcanizers, Vulcanite Base, and Impression Gutta Percha. A large variety of VULCANITE MATERIAL, Scrapers and Packers; together with a large and complete assortment of all articles of the latest and most approved styles of Vulcanite work.

DENTAL BOOKS.

We keep constantly on hand a supply of all the most approved Standard Works on DENTISTRY. Our efforts will be to keep a large and well selected stock of all Dental Material, where the Dental Profession may confidently rely upon having their orders filled in the best possible manner.

R. H. McDONALD & CO.,
Sacramento, 139 J street,
San Francisco, cor. Pine and Sansome sts.

my28

REMOVAL.

HASKELL & CO.,

CANTON TEA STORE. | ESTABLISHED IN 1858.

Wholesale and Retail Dealers in

JAPAN AND CHINA TEAS, AND GROCERIES,

515 Market street,

And 15 Sutter street, three doors below Metropolitan Market, between Montgomery and Sansome streets.

It is the LARGEST STORE OF THE KIND in San Francisco my28

NEW YORK AGENCY.—$15 PER DAY MADE EASY, by selling our great "Original and only genuine"

PRIZE AND STATIONERY PACKAGES.

Each one contains more real valuable articles than any half dozen packages ever sold. They contain

FINE STATIONERY,
PENS,
PENCILS,
ENVELOPES,
AND A
GIFT OF JEWELRY IN EACH PACKAGE.

The whole worth several dollars if bought separate. Price, 50 cents. Wholesale rates to Agents low. Agents wanted in every town and camp on the Pacific coast. Send for our New Circular with inducements. Mailed free.

Address J. B. WILLMAN & CO.,
my28 502 Montgomery street, San Francisco.

G. FORREST WALTER & CO.,

EXCELSIOR

PIONEER MERCHANT TAILOR

OF THE PACIFIC.

ESTABLISHED, 1849.

NO. 611 SACRAMENTO STREET,
Three doors above Montgomery,
my28 San Francisco.

OCCIDENTAL HOTEL—Corner Montgomery and Bush streets, San Francisco.

This House possesses all the requirements of a FIRST CLASS HOTEL, its spacious READING ROOM, with large MINERAL CABINET and extensive COLLECTION OF SPECIMENS from the different Mining Regions of the Pacific Coast—BRANCH TELEGRAPH OFFICE connecting with Lines throughout the country—and NEWS STAND—all contributing to make it the Headquarters and Home for the Californian business man and tourist.

The TABLE of this House shall not be excelled by any.

BOARD, THREE DOLLARS PER DAY.

LEWIS LELAND & CO.,
my28 Proprietors.

COMMERCIAL STEAM PRINTING HOUSE.

FRANCIS, VALENTINE & CO.,

517 CLAY and 514 COMMERCIAL STREETS.

Every description of BOOK, JOB and POSTER PRINTING done in the best style and at the lowest rates.

BOOK-BINDING and RULING done to order.

STERETT'S
STEAM
PRINTING HOUSE,
533
CLAY STREET.

W. P. HARRISON & CO.,

PRINTERS,

ENGRAVERS AND ELECTROTYPERS,

PRINTERS' WAREHOUSE,

417 Clay Street. my28

NO HOME SHOULD BE WITHOUT

ONE OF

MASON & HAMLIN'S

Cabinet Organs.

The cost is trifling, while its good effects in the education and good training of a family are beyond computation.

DO NOT DELAY, but send for an Illustrated Catalogue at once.

Address,
A. KOHLER,
my28 Music Dealer, San Francisco.

J. R. MEAD & CO.,

HAVE OPENED WITH

AN ENTIRE NEW STOCK

OF

FINE CLOTHING!

AND

GENTS' FURNISHING GOODS.

Corner of Montgomery and Bush streets, San Francisco.
my28

BILLIARD TABLES.

NOTICE!

Phelan & Collender have sold all their stock and disposed of their business on this Coast to MATHEW E. HUGHES, who will in future have Billiard Tables with PHELAN'S PATENT IMPROVED COMBINATION CUSHIONS for sale in this market.

While returning thanks to the Public for the patronage bestowed upon them, Phelan & Collender desire to recommend Mr. HUGHES as their SUCCESSOR, to those desirous to provide themselves with Billiard Tables with Phelan's Unequalled Patent Cushions, which Mr. HUGHES will always be prepared to supply, as received direct from the undersigned, sole proprietors and manufacturers.

PHELAN & COLLENDER,
By GEORGE E. PHELAN, Attorney.

San Francisco, May 26, 1864.

Referring to the above, the undersigned takes pleasure in calling the attention of PRIVATE GENTLEMEN and SALOON KEEPERS to his fine stock of BILLIARD TABLES and CUSHIONS. Just received, an assortment of the

NEW STANDARD AMERICAN BILLIARD TABLES WITH PHELAN'S LATEST IMPROVED CUSHIONS.

These Tables have just been adopted by all the leading Professional as well as Amateur Players in the East—over Six Hundred having been sold to private families alone in the last nine months.

BILLIARD BALLS AND TRIMMINGS

Of all kinds on hand. Orders for Repairing of Tables, and everything in connection with the business, promptly attended to, at the Office, 724 and 726 Montgomery street, opposite the Metropolitan Theatre.

my28 M. E. HUGHES, Sole Agent.

REDINGTON & CO.'S ESSENCE OF Jamaica Ginger!

This valuable compound, which is now regarded as one nf tbe most popular remedies in tbe domestic practice for various complaints of the digestive organs, such as Dyspepsia, Nausea, otc., is prepared solely from tho WHITE JAMAICA GINGER, which is tbo best of all the varieties in use. Iu the preparation of

REDINGTON & CO.'S

ESSENCE OF JAMAICA GINGER,

Great care is takeu to have none hut select Root, nnd to manufacturo it in air-tight vessels, thus preventing the evaporation of its delicate essential oil, and preserving tbe true aroma of the Ginger. It thereby contaius in its concentrated form all the valuable properties of tbe Jamaica Giuger, and is guaranteed to he free from any impurities whatever

It is a grateful stimulant and carminative, giving warmth and tone to the stomach equal to Brandy, without any of its injurious effects.

It will cure Nausea, caused hy riding in railroad cars, or from sea-sickness, or otber causes.

Miners and others wbo are exposed to the heat of the Sun ofteu whilst working in cold water, should never be without

REDINGTON & CO.'s

ESSENCE OF JAMAICA GINGER,

As hy taking it as a tonic two or three times a dny, it is almost a sure proventive to Chills and Fever ; and to those who are farming the rich bottom lands of California it is likewise iuvaluahle as a tonic, and should invariably ho taken in the early morning hefore going to the fields, at the mid-day lunch, and before leaving off work at night.

Ask for REDINGTON & CO.'S ESSENCE OF JAMAICA GINGER, and take no other, if you would always have a Puro aud Reliable article.

An excellent external application for Gout, Rheumatism, Neuralgia, &c.

REDINGTON & CO., Proprietors,
416 and 418 Front street,
my28 San Frnncisco.

RAREY'S CONDITION POWDERS.

THE MOST POWERFUL AND BENEFICIAL AGENT kuown on the Stomach, Blood, Lungs and Bowels of HORSES, MULES, CATTLE, AND STOCK of all descriptions.

GREAT BENEFIT TO HARD-WORKING HORSES.

All diseased Stock SPEEDILY and CERTAINLY CURED; healthy Stock will be brought into tho very HIGHEST STATE nf PERFECTION hy giving tbem a SPOONFULL, weekly.

NO LIVERY STABLE SHOULD BE WITHOUT

RAREY'S
CELEBRATED CONDITION POWDERS !

All FARMERS and RANCHMEN should use constantly

RAREY'S
CELEBRATED CONDITION POWDERS !

TEAMSTERS and STAGE COMPANIES everywhero should keep coustantly ou hand aud freely use

RAREY'S
CELEBRATED CONDITION POWDERS !

They aro equal to n Life Insnrauce on all Stock, as will ho fully appreciated on trial by all True Economists.

REDINGTON & CO., Solo Agents,
my28 416 aud 418 Frout Street, San Francisco.

STOP THAT COUGHING.

Some of you can't and we pity you. You havo tried every remedy hut the ONE destined by its intrinsic merit to supercede all similar preparations. It is uot surprising you should be reluctant to try somethiug else after the many experiments you have made of the trashy compounds foisted on tho public as a certain cure; but

NEWELL'S PULMONARY SYRUP.

It is really the best remedy ever compounded, for the cure of coughs, colds, soro throat, asthma, whooping cough, bronchitis, and consumption. Thousauds of people in California havn heen already henefitted hy the surprisiug curntive powers nf

NEWELL'S PULMONARY SYRUP,

And witb one accord give it their unqualified npprobation. We now address ourselves to all who are nnacquainted with this, tbe greatest panacea nf the age, for the healing nf all diseases nf tho throat nud lungs, assuring yon that

NEWELL'S PULMONARY SYRUP

Has cured thousands, and it will cure you if you try it.

This invaluable medicine is pleasant to thn tasto ; soothing, healing and strengthening in its effects; entirely free from all poisonous or deletorious drugs, and perfectly harmless uuder nll circumstances. Among others it is indorsed by thn following gentlemen, nll nf thom well-known in San Francisco as respectable citizens : E. S. WOOLEY, grocer, 358 Stockton street ; H. P. HUBBARD, merchnnt, Sansome street near Clny; Capt. DAVID VAN PELT ; JAMES PRATT, at Harrison & Co., printers, Clay street, and hundreds nf other residents in San Francisco.

REDINGTON & CO., Solo Agents, 416 and 418 Front street, San Francisco, and for sale hy all Druggists. my28

PACIFIC MAIL STEAMSHIP COMPANY.

The following Steamships will he dispatched in the month of JUNE, 1864 :

June 13—CONSTITUTION, J. T. Watkins, Commander.
June 23—GOLDEN AGE, W. F. Lapidge, Commander.

From Folsom-steet Wharf, at nine o'clock A. M., punctually,

FOR PANAMA.

Passengers will be conveyed from Panama to Aspinwall hy tbe PANAMA RAILROAD COMPANY, and from Aspinwall to New York by the ATLANTIC AND PACIFIC STEAMSHIP COMPANY.

A. B. FORBES, Agent P. M. S. Co.,
my28 Cor. Sacramento and Leidesdorff sts.

FORTY-FOUR FIRST PREMIUMS IN 1863!

THERE IS BUT ONE
FIRST
PREMIUM SEWING MACHINE.

The GROVER & BAKER SEWING MACHINE has heen awarded Tweuty-three First Premiums at State Fairs, and Tweuty-one at City and County Fairs, in 1863, makiug Forty-four in all.

R. G. BROWN, Agent.
my28 329 Montgomery Street.

WHEELER & WILSONS Family Sewing Machines.

OFFICE:

CORNER MONTGOMERY AND SACRAMENTO STREETS.

J. H. HAYDEN, Agent.

A full assortment of the best quality of MACHINE SILK and THREAD, for the TRADE, constantly on haud. my28

WHAT IS A CABINET ORGAN?

A NEW REED INSTRUMENT,

Made by

MASON & HAMLIN,

Tbe famous Melodeon Manufacturors.

ASK

GOTTSCHALK,

MASON,

STRAKOSCH.

Or any other ominent Musician.

They know what it is, having publicly acknowledged it to be the hest instrumont of the kind in the World.

Send for an Illustrated Catalogue,

To

A. KOHLER,
Music Dealor,
my28 San Francisco.

A. ROMAN & CO., BOOKSELLERS,

PUBLISHERS, IMPORTERS, Nos. 417 and 418 Montgomery street, desire to invite tbe special attention of the BOOK TRADE on the Pacific Coast to their superh and completo assortment of STANDARD AND MISCELLANEOUS BOOKS, embracing works in every department of Literatnre ; also Medical, Military, Scientific, Theological and School Books of every description. Constantly in receipt of all the late publications by every steamer. Special inducements offered to LIBRARIES. All orders will be promptly filled, and upon tbe most reasonable terms—wholesale and retail.

A. ROMAN & CO.,
my28 San Francisco.

"KUSTEL'S PROCESSES OF SILVER AND GOLD EXTRACTION."

—The January nnmber of the "American Journal of Science and Arts" conducted by Professors Silliman and Dana—probably the hest Scientific nuthority in our country—says of this valuable work : "The hook is written and arranged with from by one who evidently understands his subject ; and care, our examination of it, we should think it to ho well adapted Ior tbe purpose for which it has been prepared."

Price—post paid—Clotb, $6 ; Sheep, $7.

A. ROMAN & Co.,
Booksellers, Importers and Publishers,
417 and 419 Montgomery street,
my28 San Francisco.

JONES, WOOLL & SUTHERLAND,

Manufacturers for the Trade
OF
SQUARE, OVAL AND ARCH-TOP MIRRORS, WINDOW CORNICES, AND PIER TABLES,
Of any Size or Pattern.

PORTRAIT AND PICTURE FRAMES
Of all Styles.

IMPORTERS OF
Fine Engravings and Artists' Matorials.
312 MONTGOMERY STREET.

FACTORY—Market street, hetween Seventh and Eighth, opposito Yerbn Buenn Park. my28

LAWRENCE & HOUSEWORTH, OPTICIANS,

IMPORTERS OF OPTICAL, MATHEMATICAL AND PHILOSOPHICAL INSTRUMENTS,

STEREOSCOPIC GOODS,

PHOTOGRAPHIC ALBUMS,

CARTES DE VISITE,

AND

JOSEPH RODGERS & SON'S

SUPERIOR CUTLERY,

No. 637 CLAY STREET,

SAN FRANCISCO,

(ESTABLISHED IN 1851,)

HAVE FOR SALE THE LARGEST STOCK ON THE PACIFIC COAST, consisting in part as follows :

720 dozen SPECTACLES, in Gold, Silver, Steel and Plated Frames.
305 dozen EYE GLASSES, in Gold, Silver, Steel, Horn, Shell and Rubber Frames.
150 dozen WIRE GAUZE GOGGLES.
300 dozen SPECTACLE GLASSES and BRAZILIAN PEBBLES.
350 dozen SPECTACLE and EYE GLASS CASES.

395 Opera and Marine Glasses.	20,500 Card Photographs, Photographic Albums,
75 Telescope and Spy Glasses,	600 Album Pictures—in oil colors,
178 dozen Magnifying Glasses,	50 doz. Union Card Frames.
80 doz. Pocket Compasses,	Joseph Rodgers & Son's CUTLERY,
325 Hand Stereoscopes,	100 doz. Table Knives,
74 Revolving Stereoscopes	260 doz. Pocket Knives,
1025 doz. Stereoscopic Views	120 doz. Razors,
Drawing Instruments in German Silver and Brass,	50 doz. Razor Strops,
Boxwood and Ivory Scales,	130 doz. Scissors,
Microscopes in every Style,	SCISSORS, in Cases,
25 Maguetic Machines for Medical purposes,	100 doz. Gyroscope Tops,
Aneroid Barometers,	169 doz. Thermometers,
	25 doz. Hydrometers,
	Galvanic Batteries.

☞COUNTRY TRADERS will consult their own interest hy examining nur Stock and Prices hefore purchasing elsewhere.

 ORDERS FROM THE COUNTRY promptly executed.
☞CATALOGUES sent to nny address FREE.
Address

LAWRENCE & HOUSEWORTH,
OPTICIANS,
637 CLAY STREET,
my28 SAN FRANCISCO.

PACIFIC INSURANCE COMPANY.

436 CALIFORNIA STREET,
SAN FRANCISCO.

Insure against loss or damage hy fire, on Buildings, Merchandise, Wares, and other Personal Property.

CAPITAL STOCK - - - - - - - - $750,000

Tho largest sum at present to be taken on any one risk is $30,000. All Losses payable in United States Gold Coin.

Tho Personal Liability of Stockbolders, under the Law of this State, recognized.

The following List of Directors is a sufficient guarantee of the stability and responsility of the Company :

Louis McLean,	Lloyd Tevis,
W. C. Ralston,	H. F. Teschemacher,
Frederick Billings,	Geo. H Howard,
H. Carlton, Jr.,	A.B. Forbes,
Wm. M. Lent,	A. L. Tubbs,
J. G. Kittle,	Jonathan Hunt,
J. B. Thomas,	J. B. Newton,
J. G. Bray,	John O. Earl,
Asa T. Lawton,	S. J. Hensley,
J. Whitney, Jr.,	John Wightman,
Edward Martin,	L. Sachs,
L. B. Beuchly,	Jas. DeFremery,
A. Seligman,	J. G. Kellogg,
Wm. Sherman,	G. W. Beaver,
Wm. Alvord,	Elio Lazard,
Charles Mayne,	William Sharon,
Erwin Davis,	Adam Grant,
P. L. Weaver,	Alpheus Bull,
Samuel C. Bigelow,	A. G. Stiles,
Herman Michels,	M. P. Jones,
H. L Dodge,	D. Steru,
H. L. Goldstein,	S. M. Wilson,
H. Hanssmann,	D. J. Oliver,
Morton Cheesman,	Jabez Howes,
H. M. Newhall,	F. W. Brooks,
W. Norris,	I. Lohman, Sacramento.
Edgar Mills, Sacramento.	T. R. Anthony, Stockton.
C. T. Wheeler, Sacramento.	D. W. C. Rico, Marysville.
J. H Jewett, Marysville.	W. S. Ladd, Portland (O.)
J. C. Ainsworth, Portland (O.)

J. HUNT, President.
A. J. RALSTON, Secretary. my28

BOYS! BOYS! BOYS!

NOW IS THE TIME!

H. M. LOCKWOOD & CO.,
New No. 624) CLAY STREET, (Old No. 176
Have received a Large Stock of

GENTS' AND BOYS' CLOTHING
—AND—
FURNISHING GOODS,
Which they are selling
AT VERY LOW PRICES.

Every Garment warrantod. All are iuvited to call and examine our goods.

H. M. LOCKWOOD & CO.,
my28 624 Clay street, San Francisco.

GREAT TRIUMPH!!

STEINWAY & SONS

Were awarded the FIRST PRIZE MEDAL at the late great INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITION AT LONDON, over the two hundred and sixty-nine Pianos enternd for competition from all parts of the world.

The Special Correspondent of the New York Times says : "Messrs. Steinway & Sons' indorsement hy the Jurors is emphatic, and stronger and more to the point than that of any European maker."

A constaut supply of the above superior instruments can ho found at the Agent's,

M. GRAY, 613 Clay street.

PIANO TUNING done by a first-class Workmnn, from Steinway & Son's Factory, New York. my28

CARPETS, OIL CLOTHS,

UPHOLSTERY GOODS,

PAPER HANGINGS.

THE LARGEST
—AND—
BEST ASSORTED STOCK IN THE STATE,
And everything to he found in a well-conducted

Carpet Warehouse,

For Sale at the Lowest Rates.

WM. M. HIXON'S

CARPET WAREHOUSE,

NOS. 606 AND 608 CLAY STREET.
One Door above Montgomery street. my28

FEET! FEET! FEET!

Listen all ye that deal in feet and are hnrefooted :
GOOD TIMES COME AT LAST!
No Assessments to Pay, but Dividends Secured at Once!

FOR SIXTY DAYS
We will dispose of nur IMMENSE STOCK
AT UNPRECEDENTED LOW PRICES.

We have in store and nrriving, upwards of
$150,000 WORTH
OF
BOOTS, SHOES AND GAITERS,
Which we aro determined to give tbe public, nnd all our customers, for cash,
25 PER CENT. BELOW NEW YORK COST.

5,000 PAIRS LADIES' BUTTON, LACE AND CONGRESS GAITERS,
Suitable for House Sboes, Regardless of any Cost,
ON ACCOUNT OF HIGH PREMIUM ON GOLD.

We solicit n call to convince, then send along your friends, to the largest RETAIL SHOE STORE in the State.

HOLCOMBE BROTHERS,
PIONEER SHOE STORE,
Corner Washington and Kearny streets.
my28

WM. SHEW'S PHOTOGRAPHIC GALLERY!

☞IS NOT REMOVED !☜

As many persons have erroneously supposed, hut remains at the same place where it has heen all the time for tbe last eight years,

NO. 423 MONTGOMERY STREET,

And is the hest place in the world to obtain a good likeness and a durahle picture. my28

REMOVAL.

J. K. PRIOR,
Importer and Dealer in
GAS FIXTURES AND PLUMBING MATERIALS,

Has removed to 730 MONTGOMERY STREET, near Jackson, opposite Metropolitan Tbeatre. Just received, an extensive assortment of plain and ornamental Gas Fixtures, of entire new patterns. Being constantly in receipt of new goods hy every steamer, the attention of thn public is invited.

FOR SALE :

IRON PIPE,	LEAD PIPE,
SHEET LEAD,	SHEET ZINC,

As low as any importing house in tho State. my28

DINNER SETS.—We have just received,

ex Giscours, several extremely finn

FRENCH CHINA DINNER SETS,

WITH TEA SET, COMPLETE.

A SUPERIOR ARTICLE to anything ever offered in this market.

Connoisseurs will find great pleasure in examining nur stock of VERY RARE CHINA, and

ELEGANT GLASS SETS,

FRENCH BRONZE STATUARY,

Comprising some very fino pieces.

PARIAN STATUARY, ELEGANT VASES, ETC., ETC.

HAYNES & LAWTON,
516 and 518 Sansome street, corner Merchant,
my28 San Francisco.

SQUARZA'S PUNCH.—First Premium,

Sacramento, 1862.
First Premium at San Francisco District Fair, 1863.
First Special Premium, Sacramento, 1863.
Wholesnln and Retail.
my28 44 Loidesdorff street, San Francisco.

EDWARD BOSQUI & CO.,

517

CLAY STREET, SAN FRANCISCO.
BOOKBINDERS, PAPER-RULERS, AND
ACCOUNT-BOOK MANUFACTURERS.

Blanks of all kinds printed and ruled to any desired pattern. my28

"THE CALIFORNIAN."

WHAT THE PRESS SAYS OF IT.

By reading the annexed notices, the reader will see what the press of the city and State says of the first number of the CALIFORNIAN. We reprint all the notices that have yet reached us, the good and the bad—there is a mild-flavored joke in this, for they are all good—precisely as they appear in the originals. It is the more common custom to extract a line or two, and thus from a criticism which is perhaps on the whole uncomplimentary cull a sentence or two of passable praise. But we prefer to give these notices—especially the one with which the Bulletin favored us—in full, in their whole length and breadth.

It will be seen that the sprightly little Call speaks as critically as it does warmly; the Alta says something, and would have said more had not the smallness of the sheet whereon it is published cramped it for room. The Press says a good deal in a paragraph; the Echo devotes a third of a column, and speaks so warmly in praise that the reader can imagine us blushing—if imagination can go so far. The Franco-American sees the Echo, but it is impossible to go it any better. The weeklies, too, which might have been pardoned for considering the CALIFORNIAN as a "hated rival," and passing it by with a cold shrug of the shoulder, pat us encouragingly on the back—a little patronizingly, but it is meant in kindness. The Spirit of the Times is especially warm in its notice, and the Sunday Mercury did us a courtesy in the outset which it might very well have refused. The Monitor gave us a paragraph; and this exhausts, we believe, the city list.

From the interior, so far as heard from, we have received the same appreciative reception—a subdued egotism looks out in that word appreciative. Sacramento had something to say, and says it. The Star shines on us; the Bee doesn't betray the shadow even of a sting; the Union, never gushing, speaks with critical calmness, and its words all have weight from that very fact. It warns us against not permitting San Francisco to occupy too much space in our columns, and we promise not to fall into that fatal error. We also promise not to give too much space to Sacramento. Both these large and growing cities shall occupy about the same place in our columns that they do in the State at large. Marysville follows suit. The Express and Appeal both compliment the paper highly, and give their best wishes for its success. So far so good. The press having met us thus kindly, it only remains for the people to be equally appreciative in order to bring to the CALIFORNIAN that substantial success without which every paper, no matter what its merit may be, must be written down as a practical failure. Our agents in the interior towns write that it pleases. We have only to add that the subscription book is always open.

The following are the notices which appear in our city cotemporaries:

THE CALIFORNIAN.—We have carefully looked over the first number of this literary weekly, and can say unqualifiedly that we like it. To make use of a trite comparison, newspapers, like individuals, have a certain character, apparent in a degree at first sight, and becoming more positive in proportion as acquaintance increases. The CALIFORNIAN impresses us as would a refined, well-bred man of the world. The style is that of charming repose, easy address, and delicacy of perception. There are many original thoughts scattered throughout its columns; but the chief merit of the paper lies not so much in this as in the thoroughly graceful manner in which they are conveyed to the reader. If a really creditable weekly journal has been, as some suppose, a want in this community, there can be no reason to doubt that by the CALIFORNIAN it is supplied. If its success be equal to its deserving, the projector will soon find himself floating on the tide spoken of by Shakespeare; a tide which, alas! but rarely makes for journalists. Daily Morning Call, May 29th.

THE NEW WEEKLY REVIEW.—The weekly journal we have already announced made its appearance yesterday. The CALIFORNIAN (such is its title) contains an immense quantity of matter, selected with an exquisite taste, worthy of the distinguished literary man who has conceived this work, Mr. C. H. Webb.

This compilation will be sought after by those of our compatriots who wish to become familiar with English literature, and read at the same time writings varied, instructive, amusing and always worthy of attention.

The modesty of the editor equals his merit, and in order to give a proof of this we translate the lines in which he presents this journal to the public:

"This is the first number of the CALIFORNIAN. Little has been said about it through advertisements, no prospectus has been published, not from motives of economy, but simply because the proprietor thought that the best advertisement and prospectus of a paper that can be published is the paper itself. Such we now offer."

We wish the CALIFORNIAN every success. It is published in sixteen pages, printed in three wide columns. The price is 50 cents a month, and $5 a year. The office is No. 729 Montgomery Street, San Francisco.—Echo du Pacifique.

THE CALIFORNIAN.—A new candidate for public favor, in the shape of a Saturday literary sheet, made its appearance yesterday under the above title. It is a handsomely printed paper of sixteen pages, and the issue before us gives an earnest of the capacity of Mr. C. H. Webb to conduct such a journal with credit to himself and the literary progress of California. It will be found a welcome visitor in every house, and we wish it success. It is readable and interesting, and cannot fail making friends.—Daily Alta, May 29th.

THE CALIFORNIAN.—The first number of Mr. Charles H. Webb's new paper—the CALIFORNIAN—has been received. It contains sixteen pages, and forty-eight columns of reading matter. Its general appearance is similar to the New Nation and the Round Table; which means that the mechanical department is unsurpassed in elegance and neatness. Mr. Webb is very modest in his salutatory—only occupying five lines and a half, to tell the public about the CALIFORNIAN. He thinks, and very correctly too, that "the best advertisement and prospectus of a paper that can be published is the paper itself." We doubt not that the CALIFORNIAN will be liberally supported—it is certainly worthy of it in every respect. We bid it all hail and welcome.—Daily Democratic Press, May 30th.

CALILORNIA literature has been enriched by a new weekly paper, the CALIFONIAN, published under the direction of Mr. C. H. Webb, who has already known how to make his capacities as a distinguished writer appreciated. This new organ is consecrated to the propagation of literature and scientific works, and merits a kind reception.—Franco-American Union, June 1st

THE CALIFORNIAN.—We have been favored with a copy of the CALIFORNIAN, a new literary paper, which will make its first appearance to-day. The columns, in measure and style, are similar to those of the Round Table, published in New York, and its typographical face is very pleasing. Mr. Charles H. Webb, a gentleman of acknowledged literary attainments, and at one time one of the editors of the Bulletin, is its editor and proprietor. Mr. Webb's articles in the Golden Era, over the signature of "Inigo," were a great addition to that journal, and were eagerly sought for and read. We notice that "Inigo" is one of the features of the new publication. That the new issue will be a meritorious one there cannot be a doubt, and we wish Mr. Webb every success in his enterprise.—Spirit of the Times, May 28th.

THE CALIFORNIAN.—This new Saturday newspaper, owned and edited by Mr. C. H. Webb, who has become well known to the public under the nom de plume of "Inigo," made its first forward step on the threshold of existence yesterday. It contains sixteen pages of matter, and promises to be conducted with ability. We are sincere in wishing the proprietor all sorts and sizes of good luck.—Sunday Mercury, May 29th.

THE first number of the CALIFONIAN, a weekly paper, was published in this city last Saturday. Mr. C. H. Webb, recently one of the editors of the Evening Bulletin, is editor and proprietor. The CALIFORNIAN contains sixteen pages, is conducted with marked ability, grace and dignity, and presents a remarkably handsome appearance. It promises to become one of the best literary journals published in the country.—Monitor, June 4th

THE CALIFORNIAN, a new literary journal, C. H. Webb, editor and proprietor, made its first appearance Saturday morning, May 28th. Mr. Webb is widely known as the writer of "Things," in the Golden Era. He has also been connected editorially with the Bulletin. His paper (16 pages) presents an elegant and attractive appearance.—Golden Era, May 29th

THE CALIFORNIAN.—This new weekly candidate for literary honors and public patronage made its best bow on the perilous stage of newspaperdom last Saturday. It is published by Mr. C. H. Webb, late local editor of the Bulletin. Its general appearance is good, and its sixteen pages are prolific with amusing reading matter. Long may it keep its head above water.—Daily Despatch, May 30th.

And the following we clip from the exchanges which have reached us:

THE CALIFORNIAN.—The first number of a literary paper (weekly), bearing this title, has been received from the Sacramento agent, C. A. Carolan. In size and general appearance it resembles the New York Round Table. The contents of this number, original and selected, establish the presence of editorial taste and the command of intellectual resources to insure a literary success, at least. To render the CALIFORNIAN acceptable to the State at large, however, San Francisco, the locality of its publication, should not occupy too much space in its columns. C. H. Webb, a gentleman of considerable journalistic experience, and a facile, lively, piquant writer, is responsible for the advent of this publication.—Sacramento Daily Union, May 30th.

THE CALIFORNIAN.—This is the title of a new weekly literary journal which has just made its appearance in San Francisco, the first number of which has found a place on our table. It is got up in very fine style, and edited by C. H. Webb, a gentleman of considerable newspaper experience. From what we have seen of its contents, we believe the CALIFORNIAN will be a welcome visitor to the family fireside. Its editorials appear to be of a high-toned, liberal and finished order, while the selections are of such a character as should have a place in a respectable literary journal. It is not of the wishy-washy, sentimental, sickly order of publications, but one which we hope Californians will be proud to recognize as one of the productions of our coast.—Marysville Express, June 1st.

THE CALIFORNIAN.—The first number of this new literary weekly is on our table. It presents a beautiful typographical appearance, and we may safely say is the neatest printed paper in California. C. H. Webb, who has gained a local literary reputation under the nom de plume of "Inigo," is its editor. The CALIFORNIAN promises to be a popular and successful publication, and we add our quota of recommendation most cheerfully to this end.—Marysville Appeal, June 1st.

THE CALIFORNIAN.—This new weekly paper, published in San Francisco by Charles H. Webb, has been handed us for perusal. It is a literary paper of the highest order of merit, and deserves success. It contains, among other things, a highly humorous rhyme—The Ballad of the Emeu. Charles A. Carolan is agent for this city.—Sacramento Evening Star, May 30th.

THE CALIFORNIAN.—This is the name of a new literary paper in San Francisco, published by C. H. Webb, a literary gentleman of considerable ability. It is the best looking paper ever printed in the State, and well filled with good reading matter. Carolan is the agent for this city.—Sacramento Daily Bee, May 30th.

OCCIDENTAL HOTEL—Corner Montgomery and Bush streets, San Francisco.

This House possesses all the requirements of a FIRST CLASS HOTEL, its spacious READING ROOM, with large MINERAL CABINET and extensive COLLECTION OF SPECIMENS from the different Mining Regions of the Pacific Coast—BRANCH TELEGRAPH OFFICE connecting with Lines throughout the country—and NEWS STAND—all contributing to make it the Headquarters and Home for the Californian business man and tourist.

The TABLE of this House shall not be excelled by any.

BOARD, THREE DOLLARS PER DAY.

LEWIS LELAND & CO.,

my28 Proprietors

THE CALIFORNIAN.

A PAPER FOR THE TIMES.

Devoted to Live Topics,

AND THE

BEST INTERESTS OF CALIFORNIA.

Is published

EVERY SATURDAY MORNING,

AT

728 MONTGOMERY STREET.

Nothing will be spared that will enable THE CALIFORNIAN to appeal to the Public for support, not only as the

BEST JOURNAL ON THE PACIFIC COAST,

But also as being

THE EQUAL OF ANY ON THIS CONTINENT!

Imperial paper, of a quality and weight never before brought to this market, is ordered from the East

EXPRESSLY FOR THE CALIFORNIAN,

And will arrive here as soon as it can be brought by Isthmus transportation.

THE BEST TALENT OF THE STATE

Is employed upon the CALIFORNIAN, and arrangements have been made with contributors abroad for

EASTERN AND FOREIGN CORRESPONDENCE.

THE TERMS OF THE CALIFORNIAN are $5 per year by mail to subscribers, invariably in advance; 50 cents per month, served by carriers.

All communications and correspondence must be addressed to

C. H. WEBB,

Editor and Proprietor CALIFORNIAN,

728 Montgomery street.

MAGUIRE'S OPERA HOUSE.

T. MAGUIRE - - - - - - - PROPRIETOR.
C. L. GRAVES - - - - - - STAGE MANAGER.
W. STEVENSON - - - - - - TREASURER.

GRAND RE-OPENING

OF THIS BEAUTIFUL

TEMPLE OF THE DRAMA!

WHICH HAS BEEN ENTIRELY

RENOVATED AND RE-EMBELLISHED

SATURDAY AFTERNOON PERFORMANCE,

THE MARBLE HEART,

Cast with the full strength of the DRAMATIC COMPANY.

Operatic Season!

SATURDAY EVENING, - - - - JUNE 4TH,

And every night until further notice, Balfe's Magnificent Operatic Romance of

THE ENCHANTRESS!

Sixth Night of

MISS CAROLINE RICHINGS,

As "Stella;" and

MR. PETER RICHINGS,

As "Raiur;" assisted by

Messrs. FRANK MAYO,
C. R. THORN,
WM. O'NEIL,
W. BARRY,
D. C. ANDERSON,
W. STEVENSON,
H. CLIFTON,

And the Dramatic Company. In order to give effect to the Gorgeous Ballet, MLLE. C. ACOSTA and MONS H. WIETHOFF, together with an entire Corps de Ballet, have been engaged.

ALSO—An Enlarged Orchestra and an auxiliary force of nearly ONE HUNDRED PERSONS. my28

THE UNIVERSAL CLOTHES WRINGER!

WITH COG WHEELS.

BUY NO OTHER!

This Wringer is warranted in every particular. It was pronounced superior to all others at the World's Fair at London, in 1862, and has always taken the First Premium at every State and County Fair, when exhibited in competition with other machines.

No other Wringer has the cog-wheel, without which the rubber on the rolls will get torn, and the strain on the cloth is such as to wear it out.

A liberal discount made to dealers.

WM. FAULKNER & SONS, Agents,

je4 411 Clay street, San Francisco.

DISSOLUTION OF COPARTNERSHIP

The Copartnership heretofore existing under the name and style of H. WEBSTER & CO., have been dissolved by mutual consent.

H. WEBSTER,
A. D. NUDD,
S. L. STANLEY,
C. S. LORD.

NUDD, STANLEY & CO.,

Importers and Wholesale

LIQUOR MERCHANTS,

No. 410 FRONT STREET,

Successors to

H. WEBSTER & CO.,

Having purchased the entire interest of H. Webster, in the house of H. WEBSTER & Co., the undersigned will continue the business under the name and style.

ASA D. NUDD,
SAM'L L. STANLEY,
CHAS. S. LORD.

San Francisco, June 1st, 1864. je4

REMOVAL.—DR. H. J. PAINE,

DENTIST,

No. 522 CALIFORNIA STREET,

Room No. 19, Second Floor,

BETWEEN MONTGOMERY AND KEARNY STREETS,

Four doors west of Wells, Fargo & Co.,

je4 San Francisco.

METROPOLITAN THEATRE.

MANAGERS - - - - - B. C. MARSH, J. H. ALLEN.

AFTERNOON PERFORMANCE TO-DAY,

COMMENCING AT 2 O'CLOCK:

THE OUTCASTS!

MR. J. H. ALLEN, HARRY COURTAINE,
MRS. EMILY JORDAN, MISS FRANCES R. GASS.

In the principal characters

AT NIGHT:

BENEFIT OF WASHINGTON HOSE CO., No. 1.

SIGNORA GHIONI, MRS. JUDAH,
FRANK LAWLOR, JOE MURPHY.

Volunteers will appear, together with the full Dramatic Company.

MONDAY NIGHT,

MR. AND MRS. IRWIN,

— IN —

THE SPY OF THE POTOMAC!

PRICES—$1 00, 50 cents, and 25 cents.

OPPOSITION STEAMER DAY,

JUNE 23D.

THE OPPOSITION STEAMSHIP

MOSES TAYLOR,

J. L. BLETHEN - - - - - - - Commander,

Will be dispatched for Panama,

ON THURSDAY - - - - - - JUNE 23D,

From Mission street Wharf, at 9 o'clock, A. M.,

Connecting at Aspinwall, via Panama Railroad, with the magnificent new Steamship

GOLDEN RULE,

3,500 TONS, FOR NEW YORK.

☞ The GOLDEN RULE is the largest, fastest, and and most elegant steamship on the Atlantic Ocean.

For information or passage, apply to

I. K. ROBERTS, Agent,

Northwest corner Battery and Pine streets,

je4 Up stairs, San Francisco.

AUSTIN & SCHMITT, Importers and Dealers in

FRENCH, ENGLISH AND DOMESTIC DRY GOODS,

Offer for sale the best assortment of the above goods to be found in the city, consisting in part of

SILKS,
SHAWLS,
MANTILLAS,
LACES,
DRESS GOODS,

Of every description. Best quality of

MOURNING GOODS,
HOSIERY,
EMBROIDERIES,

Together with a complete assortment of

HOUSEKEEPING GOODS.

247 Montgomery street,

Between Sacramento and California streets.

SAN FRANCISCO AND SAN JOSE RAILROAD.

CHANGE OF TIME.

On and after MARCH 1st, 1864, Trains will leave the Depot on Brannan street, between Third and Fourth, for San Jose and Way Stations, as follows:

Leave San Francisco at 8 A. M. and 4:30 P. M.
Leave San Jose at 7:30 A. M. and 4 P. M.

SUNDAYS.

On Sundays, Three Trains will be run, as follows:

Leave San Francisco at 8 1-2 and 10 1-2 A. M., and 4 1-2 P. M.
Leave San Jose at 8 A. M. and 4 and 7 P. M.

Passengers can reach the Depot by either the Third or Fourth street lines of city cars.

A. H. HOUSTON,

my28 General Superintendent.

MARKET STREET RAILROAD.

CHANGE OF TIME TABLE.

ON AND AFTER APRIL 1, 1864, Trains will start from the City and the Mission as follows:

Between the hours of 8:20 A. M. and 6 P. M., every 40 minutes, instead of, as heretofore, every 30 minutes, thus:

FROM THE MISSION.
9:40	10:20	11:00	11:40
FROM THE CITY.
10:00	10:40	11:20	12:00

And so on till 6 o'clock.

Before 9 A. M. and after 6 P. M., the running will be the same as before.

my28 F. McCOPPIN, Superintendent.

FOURTH OF JULY CELEBRATION.

In pursuance of a Resolution of the Board of Supervisors, the citizens of San Francisco are respectfully invited to assemble at the Chambers of the Board, in the City Hall, on TUESDAY EVENING, June 7th, at eight o'clock, to make the necessary arrangements for the proper celebration of the ensuing Anniversary of our National Independence.

The Military, Fire Department, Masonic and Odd Fellows' Fraternities, and all other associations or organizations desiring to participate, are invited to be present.

A. H. TITCOMB,
H. L. KING,
G. W. BELL,

Committee of the Board of Supervisors.

San Francisco, May 31 1864 je4

The Californian.

"SURELY THERE IS A VEIN FOR THE SILVER AND A PLACE FOR GOLD WHERE THEY FINE IT."

VOL. I.--NO. 3. SAN FRANCISCO, JUNE 11, 1864. TERMS { $5 a Year, by Mail, in Advance / 50 Cents a Month, by Carrier

CONTENTS:

ORIGINAL ARTICLES:

Neighborhoods I have moved from.
Shadows—A Poem.
Things—by Inigo.

THE COUNTESS DIANA—A Translation.

SELECTED SKETCHES, STORIES and EXTRACTS:

Our Mysterious Subscriber.
The Dano-German War.
Poetical Justice.
Similia—Poetry.
Butterfly Life in Paris.
Kaspar Hauser.
On the Rapidan—A Poem.
Gentle Zephyrs.
Thackerayana.
Medori's Marriage.
A Princess on the Stage.
Water Ballad—Poetry.

TRUE GHOST STORIES:

The Rescue at Sea.
The Apparition of the Living.
Second Sight.
A Remarkable Dream.

EDITORIALS:

The Next President.
Two Generals.
Is it a Panic?
Financial affairs, Stocks, etc.
Editorial Paragraphs.

BRIEF MENTION.

DRAMATIC MENTION.

BOOK MENTION.

MISCELLANEOUS PARAGRAPHS.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

NEIGHBORHOODS I HAVE MOVED FROM.

BY A HYPOCHONDRIAC.

NUMBER THREE.

SOON after I had moved into Happy Valley I was struck with the remarkable infelicity of its title. Generous as Californians are in the use of adjectives this passed into the domain of irony. But I was inclined to think it sincere—the production of a weak but gushing mind, just as the feminine nomenclature of streets in the vicinity was evidently bestowed by one in habitual communion with "Friendship's Gifts" and "Affection's Offerings."

Our house on Laura Matilda street looked somewhat like a toy Swiss Cottage—a style of architecture so prevalent, that in walking down the block it was quite difficult to resist an impression of fresh glue and pine shavings. The few shade trees might have belonged originally to those oval Christmas-boxes which contain toy villages; and even the people who sat by the windows had a stiffness that made them appear surprisingly unreal and artificial. A little dog belonging to a neighbor was known to the members of my household by the name of "Glass" from the general suggestion he gave of having been spun of that article. Perhaps I have somewhat exaggerated these illustrations of the dapper nicety of our neighborhood—a neatness and conciseness which I think has a general tendency to belittle, dwarf and contract their objects. For we gradually fell into small ways and narrow ideas, and to some extent squared the round world outside to the correct angles of Laura Matilda street.

One reason for this insincere quality may have been the fact that the very foundations of our neighborhood were artificial. Laura Matilda street was "made ground." The land not yet quite reclaimed was continually struggling with its old enemy. We had not been long in our new home before we found an older tenant, not yet wholly divested of his rights, who sometimes showed himself in clammy perspiration on the basement walls, whose damp breath chilled our dining-room, and in the night struck a mortal chilliness through the house. There were no patent fastenings that could keep him out—no writ of unlawful detainer that could eject him. In the winter his presence was quite palpable; he sapped the roots of the trees, he gurgled under the kitchen floor, he wrought an unwholesome greenness on the side of the verandah. In summer he became invisible, but still exercised a familiar influence over the locality. He planted little stitches in the small of the back, sought out old aches and weak joints, and sportively punched the tenants of the Swiss cottages under the ribs. He inveigled little children to play with him, but his plays generally ended in scarlet fever, diphtheria, whooping cough and measles. He sometimes followed strong men about until they sickened suddenly and took to their beds. But he kept the garden-plants in good order, and was very fond of verdure, bestowing it even upon lath and plaster and soulless stone. He was generally invisible, as I have said; but some time after his grey wings over the valley, like some fabulous vampyre, I had moved, I saw him one morning from the hill, stretching who had spent the night sucking the wholesome juices of the sleepers below, and was sluggish from the effects of his repast. It was then that I recognized him as Malaria, and knew his abode to be the dread Valley of the Shadow of Miasma—miscalled Happy Valley!

On week days there was a pleasant hum of boiler-making from the foundries, and the gas works in the vicinity sometimes lent a mild perfume to the breeze. Our street was usually quiet, however—a foot-fall being sufficient to draw the inhabitants to their front windows, and to oblige an incautious trespasser to run the gauntlet of batteries of blue and black eyes on either side of the way. A carriage passing through it communicated a singular thrill to the floors, and caused the china on the dining-table to rattle. Although we were comparatively free from the prevailing winds, wandering gusts sometimes got bewildered and strayed unconsciously into our street, and finding an unencumbered field, incontinently set up a shriek of joy and went gleefully to work on the clothes-lines and chimney-pots and had a good time generally until they were quite exhausted. I have a very vivid picture in my memory of an organ-grinder who was at one time blown into one end of our street, and actually blown through it in spite of several ineffectual efforts to come to a stand before the different dwellings, but who was finally whirled out of the other extremity, still playing and vainly endeavoring to pursue his unhallowed calling. But these were note-worthy exceptions to the calm and even tenor of our life.

There was contiguity but not much sociability in our neighborhood. From my bed-room window I could plainly distinguish the peculiar kind of victual spread on my neighbor's dining table; while, on the other hand, he obtained an equally uninterrupted view of the mysteries of my toilette. Still that "low vice, curiosity," was regulated by certain laws, and a kind of rude chivalry invested our observations. A pretty girl whose bed-room window was the cynosure of neighboring eyes, was once brought under the focus of an opera glass in the hands of one of our ingenious youth; but this act met such prompt and universal condemnation as an unmanly advantage, from the lips of married men and bachelors who didn't own opera glasses, that it was never repeated.

With this brief sketch I conclude my record of the neighborhoods I have moved from. I have moved from many others since then, but they have generally presented features not dissimilar to the three I have endeavored to describe in these pages. I offer them as types containing the salient peculiarities of all. Let no inconsiderate reader rashly move on account of them. My experience has not been cheaply bought. From the nettle Change I have tried pluck the flower Security. Draymen have grown rich at my expense. House-agents have known me and were glad, and landlords have risen up to meet me from afar. The force of habit impels me still to consult all the bills I see in the streets, nor can the war telegrams divert my first attention from the advertising columns of the daily papers. I repeat, let no man think I have disclosed the weaknesses of the neighborhood, nor rashly open that closet which contains his secret skeleton of his dwelling. My carpets have been altered to fit all sized and shaped apartments from parallelopiped to hexagons. Much of my furniture has been distributed among my former dwellings. These limbs have been stretched upon uncarpeted floors, or have been let down suddenly from imperfectly-established bedsteads. I have dined in the parlor and slept in the back kitchen. Yet the result of these sacrifices and trials may be briefly summed up in the statement that I am now on the eve of removal from my PRESENT NEIGHBORHOOD.

THE ruler of Cashmere has recently taken stringent measures to prevent the further manufacture of the inferior shawls which are now sent in such large quantities to Europe, and are so poorly made as to be nearly unsaleable. In the city of Siree Nugger, or Cashmere, there are 70,000 persons engaged in this manufacture.

Talent is a docile creature; it backs into the shafts like a lamb; but genius is impatient—its wild blood makes it hard to train.

JUNE IN SAN FRANCISCO.

BY A SAN FRANCISCAN.

LET Eastern poets sing of zephyrs light,
And insects sporting under balmy skies;
Give us the sea-breeze and the brisk delight
Of chasing hats instead of butterflies!

Let those who can their moonlight vigils keep,
Or gaze from balconies on twinkling stars;
Wrapped in the sea-fog let us dreamless sleep
In double blankets, sans mosquito bars.

What though they rave of girls in spotless white—
In tulle or muslin, with bare necks and arms;
Behold our maidens—more unconscious sight—
Who trust Æolus to display their charms.

They talk of sunsets, and of skies aglow
With golden glories that the clouds unfold:
Well, let them talk!—to them the glittering show;
To us possession and the genuine gold.

The summer showers, of which they fondly sing,
The hush of Nature—the deserted street—
The inky heavens—the first drops that bring
A grateful coolness with their pattering feet;

The long-drawn sigh that brings the earth relief—
The pavements spattered with round wet rosettes—
The rush of waters—of all joys the chief,
If one the duties of his life forgets.

To eat and sleep, and eat and sleep once more,
Is all we ask for, (this our clime supplies,)
Ere we return to dust, in turn to draw
The tears unwilling from our children's eyes!

THE COUNTESS DIANA.

[TRANSLATED FROM THE FRENCH OF MARIO UCHARD.]

IV.

WILLIAM, I solemnly declare—I call heaven, the suns, the moons, the long-haired comets, nature, and all the world, to witness that Dr. Schultz is an ass—in everything but his spectacles!

I was at the end of the chapter yesterday when old Fritz came in announcing the doctor. I quickly hid my paper, and pretended to be reading an old book.

Dr. Schultz is a man of middle size, plump and proper; he offers to the observer the calm and naive physiognomy of the German school. He has a soft and honest eye, a youthful smile and grey hair, but his nose was never made to wear spectacles; they are always slipping down and he looks over them, revealing a mind full of after-thought—a reason why I distrust him.

"Well, my young friend," said he to me, stretching out his hand, "here you are, deep in your translation of Pindar."

"It has nothing to do with Pindar," I replied, ex abrupto; "I want to go out of here—to go and skate in Holland."

"That is marvellously well," he replied; "I just came to propose to you a trip in that direction. Have you skates?"

"No, I will buy a pair."

"I have a splendid pair, mon cher; permit me to offer them to you. I will order Herman to polish them, for they are a little rusty—in two days they will be ready. It is now September, and the canals are not yet frozen over."

"All right; you will send them to me," I replied, rising.

"What! do you wish to leave to-day, in this storm?"

"Instantly; I have been shut up here long enough."

"Ingrate!" he exclaimed; "have you such a contempt for my hospitality?

"Don't try to humbug me any more—it is not for hospitality that they take people into mad-houses."

"What do you mean?—hospital, if you please."

"Tell that to others. I know you, Dr. Schultz. I know what kind of people you think you can cure. Here is my reply: you must send instantly for the burgomaster; the counsellor Schreiber, with one of his colleagues; the rector of the Academy, and two professors of the Faculty; before them I intend to confound you and prove the soundness of my mind."

"What a strange fancy, mon cher; no one here has doubted your good sense."

"No one?" replied I, darting at him a scrutinizing glance. "Would you swear it?"

He was troubled, and hesitated a moment. "Well," replied he, at last, "since you compel me by your logic, I will tell you something in confidence. Yes, there is some one who does you this injury. You have an enemy."

"Ah, you see it, then?"

"And this enemy is—yourself," added he, crowning his pleasantry with a great burst of laughter.

I could not preserve my gravity, and laughed with him.

"What a paradox!" I said.

"A paradox! I will bet my Erasmas elzevir against your Rembrandt etchings that you cannot refute my assertion."

"I take the bet."

"Take care; I will overwhelm you with Locke, Kant, Liebnitz, Spinoza—"

"Bravo! I will refute it by Schelling and Hegel and the system of the absolute identity of the subjective and objective. I will make a clean sweep of you."

"Is it thus! I accept the transcendental idealism of Schelling. I hold that for each wise and thoughtful person there is nothing but real philosophical—do you follow me?"

"Parbleu! you have arrived at the Pyrrhoniau school, revived from the Greeks."

"Be it so: what mortal can affirm his own wisdom? Pythagoras, Socrates and Plato taught universal laws, which have been demonstrated to be false by the algebras of Galileo, of Newton and of Kepler."

And he strung out the whole litany of sceptical arguments from the hypotypose of Sextius Empiricus to the dialogues of Berkley.

The remainder of our discussion, dear William, I will not inflict upon you. My argument was very long. At first the doctor listened with a smile, but his incredulity was soon changed, first to surprise, then to trouble, and finally to confusion. He was silent. I pitied his embarrassment, and stretched out my hand to him; he seized it; then suddenly yielding to I know not what excitement, he precipitated himself into my arms.

"My friend, my Mentor and my brother!" he cried in a supplicating voice, "save me, save me, for you alone can cure me."

"What is the matter?" said I, astonished at such a transport.

"I am the most unfortunate of men! I conceal a secret sorrow which devours me, and my spirit is tortured without cessation by horrible pangs—I am mad!"

"You? bon Dieu!" I cried.

"It is a secret that no one has penetrated; I confide it to you, and implore you. Know that, like your own, my mother died crazy. I studied medicine, hoping to cure myself, but all my science is powerless. The least mental agitation throws me into absurd hallucinations. It is necessary that my faithful Herman confines me while the fit is on. That is the reason he watches over me always; he alone is in my confidence. My wife does not know the frightful truth. If she learned it she would die of grief for our poor children. Do not abandon me, my friend. Your words are a balm for my cruellest pangs. You have already dissipated a part of my terrors. Fill my mind with the light and truth you have already revealed to me. Remain near me, in order to convince me, and do not let me again be seized with error, for I feel that your words are those of truth. But I fear to have you leave me; I appeal to your humanity, to your heart. Save a father, a mother, from despair! Save my poor children!"

And in his excitement he threw himself at my feet and clung to my knees. I was affected, and knew not what to say. He saw tears in my eyes.

"André! André! You weep—I can then hope, for my salvation depends on you. You have a generous soul. You will sacrifice yourself—one month, I ask no more!"

Too much moved to resist, I have promised him not to go away, but to devote myself to his cure.

There was a lull in the storm, and the rain ceased. Profiting by the clearing up, I led him into the garden. His fevered look, his animated gestures, showed an extreme agitation which the electricity in the air increased. Without his perceiving it, I led the conversation to flowers; he has very rare ones, and I succeeded in diverting his mind from the sad preoccupation which oppressed him. I left him very calm, and returned to my room wearied and fatigued.

Poor man, how he must suffer! I am no longer astonished, William, at the trouble which I have for some time noticed on his mind. This morning he said that my heart was sound, but my mind was diseased. Alas! I feel that he is deceived. It is in my heart that the wound is—it is there that my delirium and torture exist.

But since I am in my senses to-day, I wish to be happy and to laugh all day long. To-morrow I will resume the story of my unhappy passion, and that sad but blessed season when my poor godmother charmed away my soul forever.

V.

Scarcely had I risen the next morning when the doctor came to see me. The agitation of yesterday had ceased, and he went away tranquil and reassured.

The storm raged all night, sweeping the heavy clouds towards the north. The air of the morning is pure.

A bullfinch whistles on the high branch of a poplar, and his loving companion replies to him from the next. They know me well, for I feed them with crumbs of bread, and they eat from my hand, bringing to me their brood. I call them Romeo and Juliet. Joyous little ones, they sing; it is day, and day does not separate them as it did the lovers of Verona. I see them flying gaily through the sky. Oh, how sweet it is to love, even in absence. The image of Diana smiles on me, and I see in memory the happy days gone by. Sad and regretted loves, consolation of my present hours, to you I consecrate this day!

The day after this unfortunate accident to my godmother, knowing she would not leave her room, and that I could not see her, I went off into the woods. I wished to cradle myself in my dream, and I must own that Diana herself would have troubled it; for I was still too much moved by the discovery of my love to bear her sweet looks without blushing. I thirsted for solitude in order to give vent to the joy which possessed me. Besides, I was full of her image, and in all the pathways I retraced her footsteps. Absent, I dared to speak to her, and the illusion followed me. She walked with me in the shady alleys, and a mystery hovered over us. Towards noon I met one of the wood-keepers, old Simon, who furnished me with my first gun when I went on my first hunt. Faraud, my dog, nearly threw me down in his joy at seeing me.

"Ah, Mr. André," said Simon; "good morning, and welcome home! Down, Faraud! You have travelled on foot, and must come to the house and rest, and take a glass of wine. There is still some of the Baron's—your father—left. Oh, how much you resemble him. It is Jane will be happy to see you."

All the world was keeping holiday—I carried happiness with me.

Jane had passed her youth in the service of my mother. She had danced me on her knee; and with these tried old servants I was carried back to my childhood. Their familiarity awakened the fading impressions of other times. I again saw the towers of my old chateau, and my mother and godmother running with me on the grass after butterflies. The sweet reminiscences of the past mingled themselves with the joys of the present, and blended in one single note, which said: Love.

I left my old friends with many promises to return soon, and resumed my wandering walks. The idea came to me to make a pilgrimage to the little cabin where the evening before my heart suddenly unfolded itself while I watched near Her. I arrived at the Wild Boar's glade, and was just entering the sacred resting place when suddenly I saw a man appear on the door step. Two others were inside; I recognized some smugglers of the neighborhood. Vexed with this contretemps, I was going away, when from the inside of the cabin a voice called me by name. It was Bastien; a lad from Maufert, who was as devoted to me as a dog, for some help I had given his sick mother once when he was away on one of his many voyages.

"Enter, Mr. André, and put yourself in the shade!"

I accepted his invitation. In a corner of the hut were ranged bales which gave out a strong smell of tobacco. In spite of the fiscal laws, the people of the frontier have no scruples as to smuggling. With them it is only an industry accompanied with risk, and no one engaged in it distrusts his neighbor.

"By my faith, Mr. André," resumed Bastien, "it has not been an hour since I spoke of you; we have some cigars not often seen here."

"It appears, then, that you still follow your dangerous trade. You will be hung some day, Bastien, or get finished by a bullet."

"Bah! in war, expect war!"

While speaking, he played mechanically with a trinket, which he turned by its chain, and which attracted my attention. He perceived it.

"That," said he, "is a waif found in this heap of leaves."

I recognized a little gold medallion, enamelled in blue, which my godmother often wore on her necklace. But I was very careful not to betray its identity, for I knew that Bastien would be eager to carry it to the "Countess Diana," as they called my godmother in the country.

"I don't know how much it is worth," resumed he; "it is to be divided among three, and I am going to carry it to Monthermé, to see what Father Abraham says. Good-bye, boys," continued he, addressing himself to his companions.

"You return to Maufert?" said I to him.

"Yes, Mr. André, and if you wish me to make the trip with you, I am at your service. The night will soon be upon us."

I accepted his company, and we left. "This medallion is very pretty," said I, after we had walked about a quarter of an hour.

"Well, if you please, Mr. André, take it, and give me for it what you choose. The Jew would be sure to cheat me."

I immediately concluded the bargain, and entered into possession of my treasure.

"The trip is ended," said he, joyfully, "and then I can see Catharine."

"You still talk to her?" inquired I, employing an idiom of the country, which means, to make love.

"Nay, nay," he replied, "we are always lovers."

"Look out for the Count. He doesn't like that any one should roam around the servants of the Countess. It is said that you have been seen in the park. If he watches and catches you he will play you an ill trick."

"Oh, he is not malicious enough to catch me; I have my means."

Next day I went down into the garden before the usual hour. My godmother was generally an early riser, and visited her flower-garden as soon as she got up; and I aided her to gather bouquets to fill the vases. I awaited her, anxious and troubled, desiring and at the same time fearing her coming. I trembled lest I should betray, by my joy, the tender passion which had blossomed in my heart. But I waited in vain; the breakfast bell rung, and still she did not appear.

"Ah! there you are," said my guardian, when I entered the breakfast-room; "I thank you for honoring me with your company."

I was invincible to his irony. At the first glance I remarked that Diana's plate was on the table. At the same moment the door opened and she entered. I ran to meet her. She stretched out her hand and I stopped short.

It had been my habit from infancy when I met her in the morning, and when I took leave of her at night, to kiss the hand which she extended me. This day I dared not. Doubtlessly she attributed my reserve to confusion from being frightened at the accident of which I had been the cause. With a charming gesture and an adorable smile she herself placed her hand to my lips and gave me a little tap on the cheek, that was a caress as well, and passed on. I could not keep from blushing, although I was sufficiently master of myself to conceal my interior emotion. I felt on my neck, near a medallion of the Virgin which my mother gave me, the trinket which Diana believed lost. It burned me.

"André," said she to me, "what did you do yesterday?"

"One thing, certain; he occupied himself very little about you," said my guardian.

I was not too much vexed at this stupidity of the husband, and I smiled disdainfully to myself, knowing what my godmother ought to think of it.

"I went to see Simon," replied I.

"It was in reality a splendid occasion to divert yourself," replied M. de Maufert.

"Catherine told me that you came twice to inquire about me, and I thank you for it, my child," added my godmother.

I was really so brave that had it not been for my obedience to the doctor's prescription, I would have been able to get out after one day's seclusion.

At this moment M. Placide (the steward of the Count) came in. I was glad of this arrival, which would absorb my guardian in a debate on affairs, and ensure me a tete-a-tete.

"I see with pleasure," said this obsequious person to me, "that the Baron is quite well this morning."

"It was not I that was sick; it was Madame the Countess," replied I.

The flat face of M. Placide wrinkled up, a grimace which passed with him for a smile.

I didn't like this cunning and roguish Norman, who hid his astuteness under an humble and soft air—like his name. He was the Count's ame damnée, a prerogative which was enough to make me detest him. I nicknamed him Tristan l'Hermite.

The breakfast over, the Count interrupted his conversation with M. Placide to say to my godmother, "You will stay at home still, to-day; will you not, my dear?"

"Pardon me; I am going to the church to witness the marriage of Dorothée. André will accompany me. It is as well that your farmers should not believe that you are altogether indifferent to their great family events."

"You can depend on it that they will be infinitely grateful to you," said he, ironically.

"I believe it, sir," replied Diana, with a certain tone of dignity, which her husband had learned to respect.

Delivered from these troublesome persons, we went gaily away, down the slope of the hill to the gate which opened on the village road. Diana still felt a little feebleness; she walked along leaning on my arm, and a vestige of paleness on her cheek reminded me that it was for me she suffered.

"Poor, dear godmother," said I, "how sorry I am to see you suffering by my fault."

"Chut!" interrupted she, "don't speak of it; but see there, what a beautiful fete!"

All the village was in tumult. It was the prelude to one of the Ardennoises marriages, which last eight days. Father Lelut, the farmer of the Count, was rich, and related to everybody in the country. For ten miles in every direction the large farmers came, piled up in their carriages with their families. The square before the church never saw so many embraces; and on the plump cheeks of the girls, dressed in pretty toilettes, there resounded kisses which might well frighten the birds.

On the arrival of the Countess, Lelut hastened to the door, bringing his daughter, and presenting the husband, a young man with a frank, open, intelligent face—one of those rustic natures, of which modern education and the school of Grignon will soon make us countrymen, whom England will envy. He paid his respects in perfect language, in his turn presenting his mother, a good old peasant leaning on his arm. He accomplished this piece of etiquette with a mixture of pride and respect which so well became the age of one and the rank of the other that my godmother held out her hand to the son and embraced the mother. The beautiful Dorothee blushed with pleasure. The happiness of these two young hearts, that loved each other with that healthy and honest affection which makes happy families, threw me into an indescribable melancholy—I also loved; but my love would never be but a dream.

As we left the church, a farmer's wife fifty years old, who had seen Diana when a child, came to pay her respects to her.

"Ah, Madame the Countess," said she, "where is the time when we ran in the field across the newly-mown hay? My daughter often talks to me about it. And your little one—he is well, I hope?"

"What little one?"

"Why, your godson, that you used to bring to drink milk."

"My little one, behold him!" said Diana, pointing to me.

"Ah, Siegueur! this large gentleman—he looks almost like a husband!"

And we returned home jesting on this charming theme, which threw me into indescribable trouble. Under the shelter of this pleasantry my godmother imposed on me that sweet servitude which is one of the most exquisite forms of love. A carriage passed us on the road, and we recognized one of our neighbors of the chateau. I saluted her.

"Perfidious!" said Diana to me. "I warn you that I am very jealous. You smiled at Madame Biernes!"

"And you looked at her husband," replied I, in the same tone.

POETICAL JUSTICE.

There are few things over which the reader of fiction is more inclined to ponder, if he reads thinking of anything besides the amusement of the moment, than the distribution of rewards and punishments with which a novel is invariably concluded. Till lately, the principle of this allotment was generally understood and followed. The writer treated his public like children, who were to be satisfied by having all they wished. Terrible calamities might distress the reader through the story, but a bonne bouche at the end sent him away in good humor. Except that a moral gloss was thrown round this conclusion, it differed nowise from that which recurs so steadily and so appropriately in the Arabian Nights—"And so they remained feasting and enjoying all imaginable pleasures till they were visited by the Terminator of Delights, the Separator of Companions." The rule was, to marry the hero and heroine, not without a sufficient income; to provide the faithful confidante with a husband from among the hero's friends; and to assign to the other actors domestic bliss on the one hand, death or Botany Bay on the other, according to their respective merits. With the great increase of novel readers, new fashions have come in, and success is sought by startling methods unknown to our simple ancestors. Sometimes the couple are left poor; sometimes they do not marry at all; sometimes the end is positively tragic. Yet the old theory stands its ground well, and seems likely to last as long as novels themselves. Scott's account of the remonstrances which forced him to mar the last chapters of Ivanhoe by recalling Athelstane to life, Charlotte Bronte's lively description of the letters she received inquiring after the fate of Paul Emanuel in her story of Villette, both witness to a widely spread feeling which few have braved with success.

Its cause is not far to seek. The principle on which it rests is one which, if it meets us most often here, is far more wide-reaching, and made its power felt before novels existed. Under one aspect, it is the expression of a belief in the moral government of the world in its oldest and simplest, one might almost say, its most childish form, which, looking merely at the outward result, seeks to comfort itself under the misfortunes and contradictions which it sees around it by the notion that injustice is only for the moment, and will be redressed, for good or for ill, before the end of life. Or, again, it is a kind of unconscious moral utilitarianism, which rests virtue on external consequences, and maintains, like the child's story book, that honesty is in the long run the best policy. It may not say expressly, "for this reason you are to pursue virtue," but the implied lesson is perhaps that which the pupil remembers best. With these ideas, however, we are only concerned so far as they stand related to the doctrine or rule, or whatever it may be, which we call Poetical Justice—as they explain its meaning and value, and how it comes to hold its place so firmly in fiction. It is the apportioning to every one his share of good and evil, of pleasure and pain, according to our estimate of his deserts—a justice which goes further than that of law and equity, inasmuch as it is not merely on claims and rights that it adjudicates. This would be but little; it professes to award exactly what character merits, and to represent the concurring judgment of the moral law and of human sympathy. So far from being guided by results, it will find a peculiar gratification in reversing the sentence which the world has passed—it will think less of what a man has done than of what he had the capacity for doing. Sensitive people, self-denying people, misrepresented people—all those, in short, to whom circumstances have been unfavorable—receive from its tribunal a general setting right. That such a distribution of rewards, whether they exist in external goods or in the content and happiness of the mind, is not to be found in actual life, needs no proof. Yet, if we except the earlier Greek tragedy, where an unappeasable fate punishes the innocent, and visits the sin of an ancestor on his race from one generation to another, it has been the creed or the practice of the poets in all ages. Its latest form is the worship of success, gained by whatever means, of which we have now so many fervent apostles. That doctrine has not yet succeeded in entirely diverting men's respect, much less their pity and sympathy, from those who fail, but it finds a powerful support in the belief to which they cling so fondly, that, as a matter of fact, good fortune steadily attends good conduct—a belief that continues to influence many who would be the first to disclaim it. For a time, it was the fashion to maintain this unshrinkingly in the teeth of experience. Job's friends argued that, since he was in misery, he must have committed sin to deserve and produce it. The same idea found expression in those who thought that the men on whom the tower of Siloam fell were sinners above all that dwelt in Jerusalem, and is still adhered to by a large number of respectable people, who see in a man's misfortunes what they call a "judgment," and felicitate themselves on prosperity as a mark of the deserved favor of heaven. It was an improvement on this rough and indeed coarse view to think that, however external rewards might be allotted, the inner condition rectified all injustice. The tyrant might surround himself with everything lust or ambition could desire, but conscience revenged herself by the pangs of his soul, while the sense of virtue enabled his victim to endure with calmness and hope whatever cruelty could threaten. It has now been long a commonplace to say that riches and fame, and such other goods, have little to do with happiness; but is it not equally certain that vice does, so invariably as Plato would have us believe, make miserable him with whom it dwells? The wicked—or those who, having been wicked, have neither made recompense for the wrong they have done nor shown any other sign of repentance—are often, to all appearance, as happy as their neighbors. A quiet and contented old age sometimes succeeds a heartless and unscrupulous manhood. Or a criminal, to take extreme cases, is often simply obtuse—feels no compunction for deeds at which others are horror-stricken, and grieves only at the detection and punishment of his offence as a misfortune, natural perhaps, but in no moral sense justly deserved. If this be so, we are driven back upon some further answer, and that answer can be only a confession of our ignorance. We cannot but suppose that it is worse eventually to live a lower life in which vice is not even felt to be be painful—a life whose enjoyments, however by ordinary measurements they may seem preferable to the uneasy strivings of a mind that can see and hope for something better, must, in the light of any absolute standard, appear vile and wretched. The difficulty is one that need press heavily on those alone who make the attainment of pleasure and the avoidance of pain the sole and ultimate principle of human action. Leave this sordid criterion, and the perplexity ceases, or is merged into a wider one.

If such, then, are the facts of the world—if poetical justice realizes itself irregularly in its old and simple sense, and not perfectly even in that later one which takes account of the man's inner state as well as of its external position—the question returns, in what manner is the artist to deal with it? Poet or novelist, the function of each, though in very different ways, is to present an image of nature and life less as they are than as they should be, to disentangle from the complexity of phenomena those which make up a perfect ideal whole, to give a type of things as they would look could we see them from a height at which the smaller would disappear and the larger show in their true relations. As the painter selects from the landscape before him those points in it which give it its character—omitting, so long as the likeness to a single real scene is not lost, any which distract the attention and mar the effect—so the writer of fiction is allowed to leave out of his narrative whatever interferes with the development of its leading ideas, and may, without being accused of untruthfulness, pass lightly over the mass of those petty incidents which make up the greatest part of human life. As neither this license nor that which permits him to confine his description to a limited portion of time, artificially separating the events which are his proper subject from those which have caused them and those which they in turn cause, can be denied him, so is he also free to represent the laws which govern character and action in a somewhat broader and bolder light than they can appear to one who moves among them. We are perplexed by the details which he neglects in order to give prominence to the principles working through them. We see only the half of an act, and only the outside of the man; he is supposed to know motives and conditions, to be master of the inmost workings of the mind. And so, just as the ancients thought that the fitness of things required that a noble soul should inhabit a noble body, the poet may depict virtue as accompanied by that which natural justice would assign to her—may make success attend great powers rightly exerted, and show evil as in itself weak and self-destructive. The more realistic representation which a novel gives ought, it might be supposed, to hold more closely to the facts of life, and to show, as they show, unlucky chance appearing to make sport of effort, baser natures victorious for the present over the higher. That the average novelist attempts this even less than the dramatist may be because it is his cue to please the multitude, who like a plain, comfortable morality which looks well, even if it will not bear examination. The stalest moral falsity is not too stale for the cheers of an audience in the minor theatres. But this is not the whole of the cause. Quite as much must be allowed to the mind's tendency to seek a completeness and perfection which is not satisfied unless actions are followed by their so-called legitimate consequences. To make the tale a work of art at all, it must be regularly wound up, with its threads disentangled, and each person left in a definite position naturally resulting from his previous course of conduct. In no way is it so easy to do this as by humoring the reader's moral instincts—by removing from this imaginary sphere the imperfection he finds in the world, and letting him forget for the time the casual, uncertain, fettered way in which men must be content to live. Thus a happy denoument gratifies a critical taste, while it excites a soothing emotion—happy if the chief actors of the tale deserve sympathy, without which the tale itself will seldom be popular. The poet's task is, indeed, a higher one. With a keener insight into the nature of things, it is his function to teach us all that the metaphysician can, but also something more; for he must display in the concrete, with the light and play of life, that which the other dimly shadows forth in the abstract. Dealing with acts as the grounds of emotion, he will describe the struggle of good or evil as they excite sympathy or aversion in our minds. Freed from the shackles of every-day life, he can choose and shape his materials, looking more to ideal truth than to external probability. He may still do Poetical Justice; but in his hands it will not be merely the distribution of ordinary rewards or ordinary ills, of wealth, or fame, or power, but of whatever is in each case the natural consequences of the inner principle. That result may be outward success or peaceful content; but it may also be neither. It may be a rising through struggles and sufferings into a worthier, though not therefore a more agreeable life. No problem that history can present need be too difficult to be met thus. It was surely, if not a sort of cowardice, at least the refusal of a task noble in proportion to its difficulty, when Schiller forsook history to gratify the old poetical justice, and gave his Maid of Orleans a glorious death on the field of battle, instead of the horror of the trial and the stake at Rouen. If the thing happened, a poet should be able to face it. If his principles, poetical and moral, are good for anything, they ought to find here, too, their application. To make virtue utterly baffled, would be too painful to be frequently attempted; to represent her as vanquished and miserable would probably call forth the instinctive answer, "Then the virtue was not true, after all." Moral teaching is not directly any part of the poet's aim; but the less he seeks to unfold a moral lesson in the old narrow sense, giving purple to virtue and rags to vice, the wider and the truer will his morality be.

It is of course not to be looked for that the ordinary novel or romance should forsake its usual object of amusing the reader by ingenious adventures, or clever sketches of the surface of things, to venture on questions so intricate as those hinted at above. But as, in every story, consequences must be attached to acts, and as every-day life shows us cases where the old method is palpably inadequate, it is surely the novelist's business to follow so far as he can in the same path. Most writers of fiction, finding it too severe a task to trace the growth of character and describe the subtler movements of emotion within the soul, confine themselves to the broader lines which distinguish one man from another, and to the more strikingly manifested passions in the individual mind. Thus, having treated everything in a broad rough way, they reckon with their creatures in the same coin, and deal out the tangible results which they have deserved. The lovers are married, neglected merit is recognised, and all the good people have their wishes gratified—their wishes being, like themselves, of a definite limited kind. When an author possesses greater power of psychological analysis, the artistic perfection and inner truth of his work will be so much the greater for it; but these are qualities we cannot expect to find often, still more rarely in union with the power of constructing an interesting plot. One would not say that either psychology or pathos was Mr. Thackeray's forte, yet perhaps there is no more successful instance of the neglect of the vulgar poetical justice than that which he gave in the end of Colonel Newcome's life. Some scenes are needlessly painful or tedious; some are not free from a false sentimentalism; but no one can say that the whole is not more true, more fitting, more moving and instructive, than it would have been if the good man had enjoyed the happy old age which our sympathy would have given him. In all cases, if the novel cannot solve the problems we have spoken of, it can at least suggest them. The old plan ignored them. Strangely mixing the ideal and the actual, it took from the latter the positive goods and ills of the world to distribute them with a freedom and on a principle which it professed to draw from the former. It was agreeable, it was simple; but it was true neither to fact nor to philosophy; and it purchased its success by perverse assumptions which were not always harmless.

Louis XVI. and Marie Antoinette in the Temple.—One of the most touching episodes in French history is that of the confinement, in the prison of the Temple, of Louis XVI. This subject especially struck Mr. E. M. Ward as one upon which he could display his art in historical painting. When Louis XVI. was first removed to the Temple he was still legally King, according even to the laws of that period. It was not until some time afterwards that he was formally deprived of his royalty, though his title was taken from him without any form at all, as soon as he fell into the hands of the Commune of Paris. He was attended in his prison by men who not only treated him with disrespect, but persecuted him perpetually in their incessant interference. In Mr. Ward's picture we see the gaolers in the room adjoining the one occupied by the King. This room they are converting into a cabaret, and one of the party is puffing the smoke into the chamber of the royal prisoner, though Mr. Ward could, with truth, have shown the gaoler in the same apartment; for they seldom left the monarch and his family alone, and were always present at their meals. After which, if their libations had been at all copious, they would dance and sing the Ca ira, and the Carmagnole, varied by some ribald ballads of the day. The insults and brutality of these men to the unfortunate captives, who were at first allowed the presence of the Princess de Lamballe and Madame de Tourzel, were only equalled by the treatment of the young Prince by Simon, the brutal cobbler gaoler, after Louis himself had been executed. Of the after sufferings of Marie Antoinette, all readers of French history are perfectly aware.

M. Victor Hugo, at Hauteville, in Jersey, is in the habit of giving forty "most necessitous" children a dinner once a fortnight. Twenty are dined weekly. The dinner is a sound meal of fresh meat and a small glass of wine. In this procedure M. Hugo is guided by the report of a commission of medical and other scientific men appointed in 1848 by the French Government to consider the causes of such diseases as scrofula, rickets, and impoverishment of blood among children of the poor. The commission gave it as their opinion that these diseases were caused by the children being almost entire strangers to animal food, and would be entirely prevented by their having a meal of fresh meat once a month. M. Hugo goes beyond the requirements of the report, and gives the needed meal once a fortnight. He has been rewarded by undoubted success—the cure of many and the sensible improvement of nearly all the fortunate children. What a respectable act of charity, displaying brains as well as heart! What goodly results! Scrofula and rickets kept at bay; the beauty of childhood, that had else been lost, saved! Little limbs, that had else become soft and lame, kept straight and strong—helps to the acquisition of the appearance and the sensations of health; the dullness of a monotonous poverty lighted up by the prospect and pleasure of a fortnightly feast; the strengthening of belief in kindliness and friendliness; the respect for wealth so used—in a word, a healthy physical foundation for any amount of good moral influence. This is the true charity alike of religion and reason. "Let it grow."

It is good to repeat old thoughts in the newest books, for the old works in which they stand are not read.

THINGS.

San Francisco, Saturday, June 11th, 1864.

THIS is an anniversary, a day full of memories. It is a dimple in the Present into which the wine of the Past has flowed—a strong wine that stirs the now languid blood like the shrill of a trumpet, a wine made more heady and neither softened nor mellowed by age.

No need to stoop the lips to meet the beverage; it bubbles up like the waters of a mountain spring, and one could not escape the draught if he wished.

Commend me to the man who is always ready to drink what he brews, though it be bitter as the ashes of that fruit which grows by the borders of the Dead Sea. Regrets are as weak as they are unavailing, and it is only the coward who starts and shudders at consequences—the brave man meets and controls them. The souls that win in life are those which run in iron grooves, never recking and never swerving, speeding to their goal though hopes and hearts are crushed beneath the wheels of their ambition; meeting the world at every turn straight and unyielding as the blade of a matador, and to friend and foe exposing but one front—the dead blank wall of indifference.

The pathway is red at first with the blood of victims, but it will soon whiten with the daisies that grow above graves, and then people will only say: The one who passed along this way was fond of flowers and cultivated them.

As I have already said, this day is an anniversary. It is needless that I say an anniversary of what, so those who are curiously disposed can fill up the blank as they choose. It may be an anniversary of my first trowsers, or my first measle, or my first love—one hypothesis is quite as good to bet on as another, and even those who do not pay their money may take their choice: The only thing I insist upon is that I be allowed to celebrate the day as best pleases me.

Imagine this page a table, my friends, and you all seated around. We are admonished not to look upon the wine when it is red—so I have provided for the convivial occasion a wine that is white as a woman's shroud. Never mind the cellar it comes from, and do not look to find the date of the vintage written on the bottle, for none is there. Fill your glasses—not noisily, for it is only the fool who is boisterous in his cups; and remember at this repast that we are all gentlemen, I beg of you. A toast:

Drink deeply, gentlemen, to all who love us! and I call for bumpers.

In the spring-time of my life, when I read Keats, and believed in woman's affection and all that, and thought what a nice thing it would be to have lots of whiskers and money, and to be a pirate, and to fall in with some damsel by the sea who would love me for myself alone and not for my money—in that redolent but unripe period of my existence, I used to drink in the thinnest of claret to those I loved.

Now I drink in rich, red, musical Burgundy, to those who love me!

This is a wisdom that comes to us with our riper age; it is pity that they do not teach it us with our primers in youth.

It is from those we love that all our pain comes—pleasure they give us seldom or never. It is upon the altars which their selfishness erects that we pour out a more costly chrism than any that ever flowed from the hand of priest, and it runs to waste, as it were, in a wilderness, leaving our own lives parched and arid as the sands of a desert.

Those who love us, on the contrary, give all and ask nothing—if they expect more, in the most cases they get fooled. And as it is generally more pleasant to be sacrificed for than to be sacrificed, I reiterate my toast, and will drink it as long as a drop is left in the bottle.

When the bottle is emptied, I'll prove my sincerity to the sentiment by smelling of the cork. . . .

Writing of wine has very much the same effect as drinking it. My pen staggers and reels, and I feel very much as our friend McDougall may be supposed to when he rises in the Senate to make a speech.

I wonder, by the way, how it feels to be drunk on the Senate floor. The sensation must be a very curious one, indeed; somewhat analogous, I fancy, to being drunk in a church. Fault is found with McDougall by some of his constituents, but I really cannot see why. There certainly is not a more consistent man in Congress. He got drunk the first day he went there and has been drunk ever since, and a greater proof of consistency he could not show, unless he started a distillery.

I am rather glad that McDougall is where he is. Not because it keeps him away from California, but because he answers the purpose of a great Moral Lesson. Spartan fathers used to cure their sons of drunkenness by the spectacle of a drunken slave. May we not cure the youth of our land of all desire to get elected to the Senate by showing them a drunken Senator? . . .

The idea suddenly occurs to me that I should like just now to go into the country. Everything goes, it is said, and at this particular season everything and everybody seems to be going where the scenery is truly rural.

"I know a bank whereon the wild thyme grows"—and I would like to go there and have a wild time if it were possible. But it isn't; other duties claim my attention, and the only approach I can make to a country residence this year will be by buying a few geraniums for my windows, scattering hay-seed over my carpet, and getting a bell-boy to shake a piece of green baize at me occasionally.

If I could only keep a cow on the roof or in the attic room, my happiness would be complete. For I don't care much for the country after all; it is only the name of going there.

A negotiation is on foot now that promises to result to the mutual satisfaction of all concerned—I being the only one concerned.

I have a back office that smells musty, and has not been swept for a year or two. I am negotiating with a small boy to sit constantly in the front room, so that when people rap and enquire for me I can slip through the back door and he will tell them that I've gone into the country for a few days.

And to tell the truth, when I go into that back room of mine it requires very little imagination to fancy myself in the country, for it smells musty and cheesey, and is full of bugs and earwigs and such things.

I went to the country last season. I was only absent from town a day or two, but that was long enough to be chased by a bull and worried by calves in a manner that passed the bounds of human endurance.

Not any for me, this year, if you please.

When I build that snug little residence which I intend to put up some day—it will be a bachelor's house, and, of course, without Eves—depend upon it that it will be built not many miles from town. . . .

If memory serves me rightly, the third number of the Californian is published to-day. I wonder how every one likes it as far as they've got. So far as returns have been received, people are well satisfied enough, but there are several back counties to be heard from that have not spoken yet.

I think of trying to effect a permanent and regular engagement on the paper, for the editor's health is weakening under his arduous duties, and the doctor thinks he had better go to Oakland or the Potrero for a few days.

The Fashion Editress of the Californian has gone to Mare Island to spend the summer. She gets the sea-breeze there, and besides it is a nice place in warm weather.

She requested me to attend to the fashions while she was gone; consequently I have been on Montgomery street every day looking at the women.

So far as my observation goes they all dress much alike—so much alike that when a bevy of girls goes along I really cannot tell which is my wife though I'm confident that she's among them.

Of course I cannot set myself up as an autocrat on fashion—though I do know a deal about other things. But for all that I know what I'd wear if I were a woman:

I'd wear a riding-habit made of pea-green moire antique, or a crimson poplin, and if I had pretty feet I'd make it my habit to hold the habit up when I crossed the street, whether the crossing was dry or not.

As a general thing I'd wear poplin dresses. The young men might ask me what it was, and then I could say "pop"—for short, you know—and if they popped I could tell them to ask "Pop," you see; and that would be so nice, you know; and a lot of us girls could go there together, and have the most splendid time, you know, and there wouldn't be anybody but our own set, for we wouldn't ask that hateful——

Bless me, if I didn't dream I was a girl again! That comes of singing: "Backward! oh, backward! turn Time, in thy flight!"

To resume about the fashions—sometimes I'd wear a piqué, and I'd sit in the parquet, and hold a bouquet, and look distingué—if I didn't, demmé!

Seigneur! Doesn't that look as though Time had gone back on me, and made me one of the boys again?

But to resume about the fashions: Principally, I'd wear poplin dresses; if I wanted a tulle, among the number of fools that are always stuck around a good-looking girl—I wouldn't be a girl unless I could be good-looking—I'd probably find one.

I'd wear an aigrette of some kind of feathers—I think the two that curl so prettily at the end of a drake's tail—and then if Montgomery street didn't notice me I'd go over to Oakland, where people have good taste but seldom an opportunity to see good clothes.

I have heard it said that a lady was best dressed when one could not remember what she wore.

According to that interpretation, I think Menken must have been the best-dressed woman that ever struck this town; for, really, I cannot remember that she wore anything!

Possibly some people may think that, notwithstanding all I've said about fashions, I know nothing at all about them. Bah! Don't I follow fashion about as closely as any one in San Francisco? Look at me when I go down Montgomery street of a bright sunshiny afternoon. The beauty and fashion are sure to be out, and that I follow them both—you bet! . . .

The translator of La Comtesse Diane has just come in, and requests me to say a word for him. He is a French exile of the old school; rich, but respectably connected. He was in France when the present Emperor executed that little change of base which placed him where he is, and Madame, his old chère amie, where she is. He has fought in the Grand Army—but desires me to say that he is not the Drummer Boy of the Ninth New York regiment who drummed an hundred and forty dollars out of our people, the other evening, to replace a drumstick which he lost in infancy. Although an elderly person, our French translator is too light-footed to need a cork leg.

But what I was going to say is this: I am desired to explain that a very large part of the argument between the man in the mad-house and Doctor Schultz is omitted. People need not conclude that it was omitted because there was something improper in it, and rush immediately off to buy the book, because they would be wofully disappointed. It was omitted because a very dry metaphysical discussion occurred that would only have bored readers and made the printers candidates for mad-houses themselves.

It had more words and fewer ideas in it than any editorial which the daily press has furnished during the week, and this is saying a great deal.

The editor of the Californian also desires me to make an explanation. He says that with the first number of his paper he took special pains, and that every proof was carefully read, but that notwithstanding it came from the press as full of typographical errors and bad grammar as any of the dailies.

He was very much disgusted and determined to have the second number perfect. It did not prove so by any number of right letters in the wrong places, other letters where they had no business to be, and all the many deviatious from orthography which the reader scarcely notices but which vex the editor's heart exceedingly.

What vexes him the more is to know that the fault is all his own, and that the foreman, who is the very glass of typographical accuracy, as well as the mould of the forms, and all his assistants, are "guiltless as the unborn babe"—which latter probably doesn't know much about type. I tell him, too, that the universal wonder about town is that the first number of a paper, issued in six days from the time the office was bought, should be so free from misprints; that in the hurry of correcting a proof just as the paper is going to press some trivial mistake can hardly fail to occur, and that the little things that to him and the sympathizing foreman seem so glaring, not one reader in a hundred would detect. But my words are not the balm they should be to his wounded spirit.

At this moment he is groaning over the first side of the present number. He has discovered that a word in the Countess Diana proof is one jumble of letters apparently tumbled into the form from the cases at hap-hazard. His eye lit on the unfortunate word on first seeing the first impression of the first side, and taking the Ex pede Herculem rule—which I tell him is not in all cases ex-pedi-ent to adopt—he declares that the paper is one tissue of blunders and that in consequence he will never again see a happy hour in a world where printers so corrupt your language and other papers steal your ideas. I tell him that faint heart never made the mare go, that yellow gold is the best policy, and that if he is virtuous he can win a fair lady; but it is all of no use.

He says he thinks he'll be a nun, and go where none will see him more—to some convent where the conventionalities of life are strictly disregarded, where the proprietors will not be responsible for valuables not deposited in the safe, where all board bills are payable weekly, and the guests are requested to turn off the gas on retiring.

I take the letters every day received from agents the country through and correspondents. I point to one in particular, in which, accompanying an order for papers, comes a request that he will send his photograph, and a promise to procure twenty subscribers.

Think of it! He send his photograph! Mighty good chance the paper would have for obtaining a circulation after that struck the town. I advised him candidly not to send the photograph until after he got all the subscribers that were likely to come in, and he promised not to.

From all quarters come the most encouraging and flattering letters; but he is unhappy, and contemplates a temporary retirement from a world which wearies him, and is principally made up of people whom he owes. If he does he will leave me in charge of the paper, and if in that case I do not improve its tone my head is not clear, and I am not

Inigo.

By reference to our advertising columns it will be seen that a new place of summer resort is opened in the "Calistoga Springs." The name presents a happy combination, and while it revives in the minds of pleasurers musical memories of Saratoga and the gayeties of the season there, it at the same time identifies these Springs with our own State. Sifting the etymology of the name, we find that it is meant to convey the impression of waters which can be best defined as Hot Saratoga. Calistoga, however, has one eminent advantage over its Eastern prototype—no Congressmen go there, and there is not such a thing as a Congress Spring among all its many founts of living waters. It has also hot mud baths, and in these luxurious appliances Saratoga is lamentably deficient—though some of its visitors not unfrequently get stuck in the mud. Mr. Brannan has spent a mint of money on the place, and many thought that he was sinking his dollars in a well and getting himself into hot water metaphorically as well as literally. But the event has proven different; Calistoga is already thronged with visitors to enjoy the trotting and trotting, and the enterprise even so soon gives an earnest of proving a fiscal as well as a physical success.

A mutiny occurred on board of the Ocean Queen, on her last trip from New York to Aspinwall, among some soldiers who were being transferred from the Atlantic side to replenish the navy of this coast. Two of the ringleaders were shot dead, and the mutiny quelled. Subsequently ten jumped from the cars on the Isthmus transit, the train running at the time twenty miles an hour. Two were shot by the guard, and the other eight were subsequently captured. Some of the men have been placed on the sloop-of-war Cyane, and the balance will probably be ordered to the Lancaster.

BOOK MENTION.

Notwithstanding the exorbitant price of paper, the presses of the Atlantic coast continue to turn out books almost as plentifully as they did in peace times. A number of books laid on our table by Roman have been awaiting notice so long that they can scarcely be called new, and the majority of readers being probably already familiar with their merits, will perhaps care little for our opinion. Nevertheless, a little mention may not be out of place.

A Woman's Ransom is by Frederick William Robinson, an author who had before given several volumes to the world. The present novel is his best work. The plot is carefully and skillfully constructed, and develops sufficient excitement in its progress to keep the reader's attention alive to the end, without at all partaking of that vividly sensational style which forms at the same time the charm and the bane of what are called "popular novels." The style is pleasant and graceful, and, all in all, the book is well worth reading—though we think that to have shortened the story and omitted a good share of the detail, would have improved it. Brevity, at times, is more than either wit or wisdom.

Eliza Meteyard, better known by the soubriquet of "Silver Pen," which Douglas Jerrold bestowed upon her, writes Mainstone's Housekeeping—a charming book for people to take who are going into the country. The plot, of course, is as improbable as most women's plots are, and her ideas of some things in life are as vague as a person's naturally would be, removed by the accident of sex and the intention of society from knowing anything about them, but the book has freshness and novelty, and power and vigor as well are discernible on every page.

Annis Warleigh's Fortunes is one of those pamphlet novels which the Harpers publish, and which everybody reads—Holme Lee is the author. As a general thing it is safe to buy anything that the Harpers think it worth while to republish. They occasionally make a mistake, of course, but these mistakes grow fewer and fewer year by year, and soon they will come to be infallible as republishers. To follow the fortunes of Annis Warleigh will not throw any one into spasms, neither will it put the reader to sleep. The author, or authoress, (for the sex of Holme Lee is yet a problem to the public,) tells in a good story in a quiet way, and merits thanks therefor.

A Southern Lady, in Cave Life in Vicksburg, tells a stirring story of the siege of that stronghold, and of the extremities to which the garrison and citizens were reduced. The title of the book indicates the style of habitations the people were compelled to pop into in order to avoid the shells, big with death and destruction, which fell like hailstones into the city. The book itself, written with the spirit which a personal experience of all that is narrated naturally inspires the author, gives one an excellent idea of how it feels to be in a city which is undergoing a determined siege, and makes one content to take the word of others on the subject without testing the truth of the story by personal experiment.

Red Tape and Pigeon-Hole Generals is a sort of camp-book, written to amuse the soldiers, and it will probably serve that end. It would not, however, particularly attract the cultivated literary taste, or divert the man whose leisure moments are few from the more serious occupations and duties of life.

Private Miles O'Reilly publishes His Book, a jolly, rollicking volume, containing much fun and some strong satirical hints at follies in the army and elsewhere. The author, Lieut.-Col. Chas. G. Halpine, was for some time one of the editors and part owner of the New York Leader, and connected as editorial writer at different times with the New York dailies. He is a dashing and forcible writer, with a strong vein of humor running through even his serious compositions. He is also possessed of a delicate poetic fancy, and some years ago published a volume of poems 'by the Letter H." At the commencement of the war he received an appointment under Corcoran, and has been doing staff duty ever since, the majority of his service having been with Gen. Hunter. Lest this notice may sound too much like an obituary, we will state that he yet lives.

The Laws and Principles of Whist, by Cavendish, is a book which we hope all who play at whist in the country will buy and carefully study. If there is one violation of moral law in life that deserves less forgiveness than another, it is surely the sin of trumping your partner's trick; revoking is but a minor crime. The ethics and religion of whist are too little understood. It is no trivial little game like euchre or seven-up, but it is a science, an art, an accomplishment, which should be as carefully cultivated as playing on the flute, or dancing, or doing anything else that society demands.

BOOKS THIS WEEK.

New and fresh from the press of the Harpers and the shelves of Roman comes a Journal of the Discovery of the Source of the Nile, by John Hanning Speke. Foremost in the book stands a vignette of the author, and if a bad pun were allowable in speaking of a good book we should say: This Spekes for itself! The author is a Captain in Her Majesty's Indian army, a Fellow and Gold Medalist of the Royal Geographical Society, and a fellow and correspondent of we don't know how many other different societies; but better than all that, he is a good fellow and a sensible one, with a great love of adventure, keen powers of observation, and the somewhat rare faculty of telling intelligibly what he sees. The expedition—his third one into Africa—which gave birth to this book was undertaken avowedly for the purpose of establishing the truth of his assertion that the Victoria N'yanza, which he discovered, would eventually prove to be the source of the Nile. He succeeded in establishing this, and the account of his adventures is as absorbing in interest as a romance, aside from the scientific information with which the book abounds. The author lets in much light, too, upon that vexed and dark question, the negro's capacity for improvement. One thing which will particularly arrest the reader's attention is the thorough unconsciousness exhibited to all dangers and hardships, except as they impede his footsteps in penetrating to the great fountain-head which he is determined to discover, as he pushes through cane-brake and among all the wild beasts of that huge menagerie, nothing daunted, nothing dismayed. And in his narrative he has given us a great story, plainly told—a monument of heroic proficiency under circumstances the most appalling, and a treasury of new and surprising knowledge, for all of which he merits a dozen additional medals to the ones he already has earned. We would be sorry that space did not permit us to make a few extracts from the work this week, did we not believe that it is one which should be bought and read by all.

The Small House at Arlington is, we think, one of Anthony Trollope's best novels. Having been published by the Harpers serially in one of their periodicals before its appearance in its present form, a detailed notice is unnecessary. Fewer deans, deaneries, bishops and curates are interwoven in the plot than the author commonly conceives it necessary to introduce, though the sameness which pervades the realm of Trollope generally is very perceivable. It was partly apropos of the use made by the novelist of a broken engagement to stimulate the interest and curiosity of his readers, that the article copied in last week's Californian from the Saturday Review was written. In this case it is the man who jilts; he is the false one, and Crosbie's behavior to Lily should form a text-book for mothers and aunts to all future generations.

The Raids and Romance of Morgan and his Men we open with fear and trembling, and close with a single glance at the title-page. It is written by Sally Rochester Ford, and is a reprint from the Mobile edition. If we praised it our patriotism would be suspected; if we condemned it the honesty and fairness of our criticism might be open to doubt. Were even the fact that we had read it to get abroad, who would defend us from the voice of the Howler? On the whole, we will allow the book to lie upon our table, if not until "this cruel war is over," at least until next week, when we have more time.

The Ferry Boy and the Financier is the alliterative and somewhat finny title of a Salmon-colored book, written appropriately enough by a "contributor to the Atlantic," and by another queer coincidence, the history of Salmon P. Chase, who, queerly again, appears to have come from the Connecticut river, a stream once famous for salmon. The story of the financier's life—which might have been happily titled The Tale of a Salmon—is plainly and simply told. Salmon seems to have been officious in youth, and an official later in life; he will go down to posterity noted as the inventor of greenbacks and the originator of a currency which, while it may have saved the nation from bankruptcy, has produced more financial confusion than can be adjusted in the present century.

Family Pride is a new novel by the author of Pique. The title indicates the plot, which turns upon that family pride which so often goes before a family's fall, but it does not open up the long line of incident and narrative through which the author contrives to lead the reader to the finale. A deal of ingenuity is displayed in the story, and it is in the main well managed, though the surprises might have been better planned, and the climaxes are not always adequate to the actions and events which precede them. It is a reprint from an English work, and it is in England that the scene is laid.

DRAMATIC AND MUSICAL MENTION.

Maguire's Opera House on Thursday evening asserted its right and title to the name by actually making itself the scene of a genuine Opera, La Traviata—Miss Richings appearing as "Violetta." A slight nervousness was visible in the lady's voice on first coming upon the stage, but she soon seemed at home with the Italian, and mistress of the music as well as the libretto; and her excellent acting soon won her friends from all parts of the house, who stood by her to the end. The last scene, where the poor girl at last finds rest from the troubles that haunt her pathway, was most effectively rendered. Of course the wan, whitened cheek of the prima donna, and the white-curtained bed with its white sheets and counterpanes, and the prevailing paleness of everything in the room, had a deal to do with the feeling; but aside from this, Miss Richings' acting was marked by a pathos which had power, and her vocalism was replete with sensibility. Bianchi made a rather adipose "Armand"—we should say "Alfredo," but Traviata always confounds itself with Camille in our mind—but he sang well, and acted well, aside from the paradoxical spectacle of a fat and middle-aged man dying of love. We fancy that Shakspeare's words should be so amended as to read: Fat men have died and worms have eaten them, but not for love. Gregg actually made his bow without a wow to it, and sang his part through with but a single hark—and that was on the C. Once he took a note up in his mouth and shook it, but he worried it with less than his usual pertinacity. Traviata will be repeated to-night, and to-morrow evening the prima donna takes her benefit. Let lovers of the lyric stage give the beneficiary something to remember California by. If people continue to come out as they did on Thursday evening, perhaps Mr. Maguire can be persuaded to give us a carnival of opera, for the house was full, and the audience, for a wonder, were well dressed.

The Wilson-Zoyara troupe has started on its tour through the interior; the lights are out, and the huge tent is gone—even the pegs are pulled up. No more of nights shall we see the immense chandelier whirling and twining like a python in coils of fire around the pillar that supported the canvas; the voice of the clown uttering his merry quips and jokes is heard no more within that ring from which the last vestige of sawdust is blown; gone is the graceful Zoyara and the no less charming Mlle. Eloise; gone, too, are the lithe brothers, Ross and Carlo, and the gymnastic pair, Durand and Painter. It will be many long days before we again see one brother impale the other with knives, and never paling himself as he performs the difficult feat; weeks will come and go before we again see the gaily caparisoned horses prancing through the streets, at the same time exercising themselves and advertising the performance, and, in the van, "sonorous music blowing martial sounds."

We are really sorry that the Hippotheatron has gone, for it was a charming place to drop into of an evening. There is a jollity about a circus that few other entertainments possess. One takes things al fresco, as it were, and ceremony and conventionality can be laid aside for the moment. The bad breaths of the crowd, and all offensive odors of musk, onions, and the like, are blown away into the outer air and across the bay—alas, for Contra Costa!

As a parting word to Mr. Wilson, and an honest endorsement for him in his country tour, it is only justice to say that in his Hippotheatron he furnishes the finest entertainment of the kind that ever visited this coast. The riding of Ella and Eloise is wonderful, and in the trained black horse of the former we see what education combined with intelligence can accomplish even with a brute. Carlo and Ross as acrobats stand without rivals, and the dexterity of one of the brothers in the use of the knife passes anything ever seen at a boarding-house. Still, he would have to pay us a considerable sum and furnish a coat of mail before we permitted him to see how near he could come to our skin with a knife without actually cutting it. The gymnastics of Durand and Painter show what may be done by the cultivation of muscle, and lend one to believe that the name Painter—backwoods speech for panther—was bestowed on the latter for his activity. The Hippotheatron pitched its tent at Redwood City last night, performs at San José to-night, and next week goes through the valley counties.

The Metropolitan has not been doing a very good business of late—not one paying house during the week. Mr. and Mrs. Irwin made their appearance on Monday night, in The Spy of the Potomac, but failed to draw—little wonder in that—and Thursday night, which was announced for Mrs. Irwin's benefit, saw the theatre closed—the bonfires and mass meeting in the street, and La Traviata at the Opera House, having drawn off amusement seekers, so that not enough were present to warrant the manager in keeping his doors open. Mrs. Julia Dean Hayne and Miss Annette Ince have now undertaken the task of the Metropolitan; and we hope they will succeed in solving the problem of how to keep it open and make it pay. But these be parlous times indeed for lessees and managers, as dollars have assumed gigantic dimensions of late, and one has to hunt to find them. Certainly the fair managers have our best wishes for their success in the undertaking.

Gilbert's Museum offers attractions to those who are fond of curiosities, or, borrowing the Round Table's motto for the moment, "the notable, the useful, and the tasteful." The Lightning Calculator has been so much occupied of late in calculating how fast Gould and Curr could fall and what extremely low figures it could get down to, that he has not been able to devote his spare time to footing up the profits of the Museum, as was his usual wont. But there is the Giant Boy, an innocent little fellow some eighteen years old and only eight or ten feet high, who illustrates what one can do in the way of growing if he only makes up his mind to it when he's young and does'nt "let up" as he gets long and along in life. Then there is the little North Carolina Slave, the greatest argument against miscegenation that can be produced, if not, as is claimed for her, the smallest woman in the world. The Tyrolean warbler who performs upon three wind instruments at once, has the advantage of political lecturers, who have to depend wholly on one mouth; and his conversion of a coffee-pot into a "Fountain of Harmony"—so the bill says—would seem quite as difficult as the conversion of a cannibal into a Christian. It is worthy of remark that those who can palm themselves off as children at the door of the Museum, can see the whole performance for fifteen cents.

A charming performance in light gymnastics was given by C. J. Robinson's classes at Miss Aldrich's gymnasium on Thursday evening. We have called it a performance, when perhaps we should have better said that a few were admitted to witness the exercises. It is pleasant to see what ladies can do if they only "make an effort," and learn that feminine muscle is as susceptible of cultivation as that which cords the backs and strengthens the arms of men. Mr. Robinson teaches Dr. Dio Lewis's system, and is himself a pupil of that eminent light weight of the gymnastic ring.

A Fracas at a London Theatre.—In 1721, half-a-dozen tipsy beaux, with one among them of the degree of an earl, who was wont to be tipsy for a week together, raised a riot to aveuge an affront in the theatre in Lincoln's Inn Fields. His lordship crossed the stage while Macbeth and his lady were upon it, to speak to a boon companion who was lolling at the opposite wing. There, too, stood Rich, the manager, who told the peer that, after such an act of indecorum, he should never be admitted behind the scenes again. The earl looked up, and, steadying himself, administered to Rich a slap in the face, which Rich returned, with interest. Swords dashed forth in a minute from half-a-dozen scabbards, whose laced and lordly owners solemnly decreed that Rich should die. But Quin, Ryan, and Walker rushed to the rescue, with their own weapons naked in their hands. With the aid of some other members of the company they made front, charged the coxcombs, and drove them headlong out of the stage door, and into the kennel. The beaux waxed wroth; but, executing a great strategic movement, they stormed the front of the house, and rushing into the boxes, they cut and thrust right and left, broke the sconces, slashed the hangings, and were proceeding to do further mischief—"fire the house!" was ever a favorite threat with these bullies—when doughty Quin and a body of constables and watchmen flung themselves on the rioters, and carried all they caught before the magistrates, by whom they were committed for trial. Ultimately the affair was compromised; but there is evidence that the actors were intimidated, inasmuch as they issued a declaration that they would "desist from acting till proper care be taken to prevent the like disorders for the future." The house was closed for nearly a week, and to prevent such outrages for the future, the angry King, who took an interest in theatrical matters, ordered that a guard should attend during the performance at either house. This was the origin of the attendance of soldiers—a custom which ceased at the patent theatres only a few years since.—Their Majesties' Servants, by Dr. Doran.

What was got by the Throat lost by the Heart.—A correspondent writing lately from Paris says:

The death of Vattemare, the bibliopole, who had taken in hand the cause of American literature, has caused some little sensation. Vattemare afforded, perhaps, the most extraordinary specimen of energy and industry which has been met with in modern times. Endowed by nature with the peculiar formation of the larynx which facilitates ventriloquism, he boldly set at defiance all conventional distinctions of classes, and leaving the desk and inkstand to which his father would have confined him, started forth reliant on his own resources to seek his fortune as a travelling exhibitor of the singular talent with which he had been gifted. For years he wandered all over the United States, the first man, perhaps, who ever dared to risk such a speculation alone. The results surpassed his hopes and expectations, and he returned to Europe, having realized an immense fortune, which, with true love of human kind, combined with that admiration of the fraternity of freedom to be beheld nowhere save in the United States, he resolved to dedicate to the furtherance of the brotherhood of thought and intellect amongst nations, fully persuaded that the fraternity of heart and soul would surely follow. In this he was disappointed. After sacrificing almost the whole of his hard-earned gains to the acquisition of thousands of volumes for the different libraries of Europe and America, he was fain to confess that, while the task of amusing mankind is one of splendid profit, that of instruction is one of bitter loss. And so he died, full of disappointment, leaving but little else than the regret experienced by his friends that all the care and labor of his life should have been expended in vain.

A gentleman had a parrot which had been taught many sentences; to a stranger he generally said, in a very consequential tone, "Who are you, sir?" There was also a black cat in the neighborhood which had a bad character for honesty, and who often made excursions into the room where the parrot was kept, in search of prey. In the course of time Miss Pussy got the name of "the black thief." Polly heard this and of course caught it up. One morning a chimney sweep came into the room, when Miss Polly called out, "Who are you, sir?" And then, after a pause, added again and again, most vehemently, "You black thief!" The poor man stood aghast at being thus accused, nor could the owner for some time make him believe that the parrot did not mean it for him.

SIMILIA.

Lo, I would bring the lily to my love,
And say that she was fairer than its snow;
But that faint flushes of a ruddier light
Than ever tinged its petals pearly white
Do up her cheeks in wondrous lustre go.

And I would bring the rose unto my love,
And say she was more beautiful than it;
But that a radiance lovelier than dreams
Wherein we gaze on silver-sanded streams
Doth o'er her face in trembling whiteness flit.

And I would bring the daisy to my love,
And say it only mocked her cheerfulness;
But that her cheerfulness may not be told,
E'en though this little star of white and gold
Should its own shortcomings to her confess.

So I would bring the violet to my love,
Nor further seek her sweetness to compare
To any flower that decks this common earth,
As all too meagre to portray her worth:
The violet alone may equal her!

OUR MYSTERIOUS SUBSCRIBER.

When I first received the letter announcing the fact of my appointment to the editorship of the Puddleton Gazette, the sudden revulsion of feeling for the moment almost overpowered me. I could scarcely persuade myself that I was not dreaming. Could it be possible that the enterprising proprietor of the journal in question had selected such an humble individual as myself, out of the legion of distinguished literary men with which he must be acquainted, to fill this important post? Was I destined to take a prominent part in "supplying a great local want," and "directing the political opinions of an intelligent industrial population?" Yet there it was before me—the very words of the letter, and I afterwards found they also formed part of the prospectus—in unmistakable black and white, and signed in due form with many flourishes, "Peter Mangles, proprietor." As the fever-heat of my exultation cooled down, I began to realize more fully the extent of my good fortune. I felt that a new era of existence was dawning upon me, and that the great opportunity, which is said to present itself but once in a lifetime, had at last arrived.

As I looked back upon all the bitter struggles and trials of the two long years I had been in London, striving hard to earn a beggarly pittance with my pen—the many rebuffs and disappointments I had experienced—rejected "copy," inexorable editors, and heartless publishers—I felt more than ever convinced that there had been a conspiracy to keep me down, and prevent my attaining the position to which I had once hopefully aspired. All these things, however, were past and gone, and here I was at last exalted to the pinnacle of my youthful ambition—the editorial chair—and, as a consequence, on the high road to fame and fortune. It is true the Puddleton Gazette was as yet in embryo, existing only as a concept in the fertile brain of the enterprising Mangles; but the first number was announced to appear in a fortnight's time, and I was to go down to the spot forthwith, in order to put matters in train for taking by storm the world in general, and the inhabitants of Puddleton in particular. Up to this moment, I confess I had not the most remote idea of the locality of Puddleton; in fact, for all I knew to the contrary, its existence might be as embryotic as that of the journal which was destined to enlighten it; but on referring to the Gazeteer, under letter P, I found it described as "a small fishing town on the coast of ——shire. Post town, Burton-in-the-Marsh, distant 7¼ miles. Population, 3000." This certainly differed very considerably from the account given by Mr. Mangles, who described it as "an important local centre, possessing great natural advantages, and doing a large and increasing trade," etc., etc.; in fact, according to Mr. M.'s view, if there was a town in England which any man in his right senses would instinctively select either for business or pleasure, that town was Puddleton. It had, indeed, one defect—the want of a representative journal; and that want Mr. Mangles, with my valuable assistance, now undertook to supply. It is needless to say which version I adopted. The Gazeteer was at least ten years old, and its Puddleton was the Puddleton of the past; while Mr. Mangles's description (and he was on the spot, and ought to know best) was of the Puddleton of the present, —the prosperous sea-port town that was rising, like another Liverpool, from the foundation of an humble fishing village. To Puddleton, therefore, I would go.

I will not weary my readers with an account of a long, tiresome journey by railway, or of a ten miles' jolting over one of the roughest roads I ever saw, in a superannuated fly with very "fluffy" cushions, and an unmistakable odor of tar and red herrings, but will briefly state that I was duly deposited, without any material injury, at the door of the "Coach and Horses," Puddleton, about four o'clock on a raw November afternoon. After ordering dinner, I inquired where Mr. Mangles was to be found, and having received my directions from the waiter, of whom I may here remark that he was as "fluffy" and dilapidated as the fly, and likewise smelt of tar and red herrings, I set forth to pay my first visit to my new employer.

I cannot say that my first impressions of Puddleton were altogether agreeable; but the first view of a strange place through a thick fog on a cold November afternoon seldom does present a very gratifying prospect to a tired and hungry traveler. As well as I could make it out, the town appeared to consist of a number of straggling houses, built without the least attempt at regularity or order, on the slope of a hill, so as to give the whole a kind of lopsided look. The same full-flavored odor of red herrings and tar, which I had noticed in the fly and the waiter, seemed to pervade the whole atmosphere of the place; indeed, I afterwards found they were the staple commodities of the town; and as I groped my way up the dimly-lighted street, the paving of which seemed to have been laid down on the ingenious principle of first a flagstone and then a puddle, at regular intervals, I began to suspect that the vividness of Mr. Mangles' imagination had imparted a certain amount of extraneous color to his description of the beauties, both natural and artificial, of the town of Puddleton. While indulging in these reflections I reached the top of the hill, and turning to the right, according to the waiter's instructions, found myself in front of a long nondescript-looking building, which seemed as though it had been begun for a barn and finished for a meeting-house, there being a large archway at one end, and in the centre a semi-Gothic looking porch, which was reached by a flight of three or four stone steps. Over the door were two oil lamps, and between them was suspended a large board, on which was painted in huge white letters, accompanied by suitable flourishes:

"The Puddleton Gazette."

Here, then, were my future headquarters. With a beating heart I passed the steps with a bound and knocked at the door, which, after a brief interval, was opened by a diminutive youth, who graced a suit of clothes at least three sizes too small for him. On informing him of my business he ushered me into a room on the ground-floor, and proceeded up stairs to announce my presence to Mr. Mangles. During his absence I had leisure to take a bird's-eye view of the apartment in which I was waiting. It was a tolerably large room, with a broad old-fashioned grate at one end, in which smouldered the remains of a fire; but there was no vestige of fire-irons or fender. A plain deal table, not particularly clean, and three rickety chairs, (one of them minus a leg,) and a narrow strip of matting, which did duty both for carpet and hearth-rug, comprised the whole of the furniture. On the table was a large bundle of advertising "posters" setting forth in the biggest words and type the manifold excellences of the forthcoming journal; a small ditto of prospectuses, from which I now perceived that Mr. Mangles had borrowed his vivid description of the trade and prospects of Puddleton; an enormous pair of scissors, with paste pot to match; a few battered pens, and a broken-down ink-stand.

As I was taking a mental inventory of these various articles, there was a heavy step in the passage, and the door slowly opening disclosed a form which I felt could be no other than that of Mr. Mangles himself. I say I instinctively felt it, although it did not resemble in the remotest degree what I had pictured him in my imagination. He was a short, stout man, from forty-five to fifty years of age, with thick, grizzly hair, and a broad, but not ill-humored face, which struck me on the first view I had of it, as possessing the peculiarity of being preternaturally clean; but this was perhaps owing to the force of contrats with a singularly dirty shirt-collar. All that I noticed of his dress was that he wore a plaid shooting coat; "continuations" of the same material, but so short as to disclose a gap of questionable-looking stocking, at least three inches in width, between their lower extremities and the top of an enormous pair of boots; and that he had a large silk handkerchief tied carelessly round his neck. As he entered the room he drew himself to his full height, after the fashion of all little men, as if to impress me with the dignity of his presence, and looking me full in the face, but without moving a muscle of his own, said curtly, "Mr. Walker?"

As this was put to me interrogatively, I merely bowed, and said that Walker was my name.

"Good. Mine is Mangles. Now we know each other, let's to business."

Now, prepared as I was to devote the whole of my time and humble talent to the interests of the Puddleton Gazette, I confess I was somewhat taken aback by the abruptness of this proposal, and ventured to hint, as delicately as I could, that I had been travelling all day, and stood in need of rest and refreshment; in fact not expecting that my services would be required that evening, I had ordered dinner at the "Coach and Horses" punctually at six o'clock.

"Oh, dinner!" was the reply; and Mr. Mangles, after looking hard for a few seconds at the dying fire, suddenly turned round and rang the bell with a jerk.

The urchin who had admitted me answered the summons.

"Dobs," said Mr. Mangles, addressing the youth in question, "have I dined?"

"Yesterday afternoon was the last time," was the prompt rejoinder.

"Then," replied Mr. Mangles, fixing his eyes upon me, "I shall dine with you, sir. Six precisely. Time is precious. Dobs, show this gentleman out.

And Mr. Mangles left the room in as stately and impressive a manner as he had entered it.

I confess that my meditations, as I retraced my steps to the inn, were not of the most encouraging character. I did not quite like the manner of my new employer—to say nothing of the very cool proceeding of inviting himself to dinner at my expense—and began to entertain serious misgivings that I had been hasty in throwing up a small but certain income in London, for the problematical prospects and profits of a country editorship. However, I felt I was fairly in for it, and must make the best of my bargain, bad as it looked. After all it might turn out better than it promised. As for Mr. Mangles, I consoled myself with the reflection that his strange conduct might, after all, be mere eccentricity. At all events, I made up my mind to humor him, and not abandon my present undertaking without at least an effort. On reaching the "Coach and Horses," I was ushered into a snug little back room, where a blazing fire crackled and roared cheerfully, and cast a genial glow upon a white table-cloth and sundry other preparations, pleasantly suggestive of dinner, that ornamented an adjoining table. I had, however, still three quarters of an hour to wait, and determined to occupy the interval in writing a few letters. Just as I was concluding my task the timepiece struck six, and simultaneously with the first stroke of the hour the door opened, and in walked Mr. Mangles just as I had left him with the exception of a rather whiter shirt collar, which had the effect of somewhat toning down the startling cleanness of his face. He was as methodical and uncommunicative as before, barely acknowledging my salutation, and took his place at the dinner-table in as cool and off-hand a fashion as if he had been presiding at his own mahogany. During the whole of the dinner—a better bill of fare, by the way, than I had argued from the appearance of the "Coach and Horses," the fish being exceedingly good and fresh for a seaside place—my self-invited guest maintained the same taciturn demeanor, replying to my efforts to get up a conversation with bare monosyllables, which occasionally degenerated into grunts. Indeed it was not until the cloth had been removed, when I suggested a bottle of the landlord's best port, that he seemed to awake out of his torpor.

"Port, sir! No—poison, sir! Punch!"

"Did you say you preferred punch?" I mildly inquired.

"Of course, I did. Punch, hot, strong, rum, lemons, sugar. Mix them myself."

I accordingly rang the bell and ordered the desired materials, which being duly forthcoming, Mr. Mangles set himself down to his task; not hastily or with any show of levity, be it understood, but calmly, deliberately, almost grimly, like an alchemist of old bending over the mysteries of his crucible. As, however, the fragrant ingredients became gradually blended together, and the genial compound grew under his creative hand, his features relaxed into something like a smile, which deepened into a sigh of satisfaction as the first glass of the mysterious concoction touched his lips. Filling a second tumbler, he pushed it across the table towards me, exclaiming: "Nothing like punch. Taste it."

It was certainly a marvellous compound, and seemed to grow more and more insinuating with every sip. I made rapid progress with my first tumbler; and my companion, who had by this time got half through a second, seemed gratified by this practical proof of my appreciation of his mixture, and gradually thawed into something like cordiality. I availed myself of his change of temperament, and with the view of drawing him out and paving the way to conversation, I inquired whether he had lived long at Puddleton.

"Came here three weeks last Wednesday," was the curt reply.

"But surely," I observed, "you must have been intimately acquainted with the neighborhood before you could have ventured upon the undertaking in which you are now about to engage?"

He glanced at me a queer sort of look, and taking a long pull at his glass, answered: "Never even heard of the place until a month ago."

This was certainly very cheerful news for me, who had risked everything on the faith of this man's representations, to find that after all he knew but little more about the place or the people than I did. A light flashed upon me that I might possibly have been the dupe of a lunatic's hallucinations. Determined however, to fathom the mystery, I again returned to the charge, with, "Perhaps, then, you came here under the advice of some friend acquainted with the people and the locality?"

"I tell you," he blurted out, "I never heard of the place; and what's more, never heard of anybody who ever had, until a month ago."

"Then," I retorted, a little nettled as I saw the cause gradually become more and more hopeless, "you must either be a very bold man, or else have remarkable confidence in your experience of journalism."

I had at last struck the true chord. "Experience of journalism!" he exclaimed, in a loud shrill voice, and setting down his glass on the table with a bang that quite startled me. "Experience of journalism!" he repeated. Then suddenly drawing his chair up so as to face me, and lowering his voice as if by a great effort of self-control, he continued: "Listen to me, young man. I flatter myself there are few men living who know more about journalism than I do. For nearly forty years it has been the one all-absorbing study of my existence. In my early youth I became impressed with an idea that there was a fortune to be made out of newspaper property, and my whole life has been an unceasing effort to carry it out. Perhaps, sir, you will scarcely believe me when I tell you that I have in my time been parent and proprietor of no less than fifty-nine different journals, in almost every quarter of the globe." And here he checked them off on his fingers with a rapidity that was perfectly amazing. "Let me see—seventeen in the United States, three in India, two in Australia, twelve in the various Continental towns, five in Scotland, four in Ireland, and sixteen in England and Wales—not to mention one in New Zealand, which unfortunately came to nothing, owing to my editor and principal compositor having been killed and eaten on the evening preceding the day on which the first number was to have appeared. Yes, sir—fifty-nine in all, and this will make the sixtieth and last—for I feel a deep internal conviction that the Puddleton Gazette is destined to yield the fortune which I have so long and vainly, yet confidently pursued. Now, sir, you know me. Good night!" And rising from his seat with the air of a man who had with much difficulty unburthened himself of a heavy load, he calmly tossed off the remnants of his seventh tumbler, put his hat upon his head with much deliberation, and left the room.

I shall pass over the next few days I spent at Puddleton; it will be sufficient to say that I was daily at the office, and saw a good deal of Mr. Mangles, who improved vastly on acquaintance. He dropped entirely the brusque patronizing manner which he had assumed at our first interview, and turned out to be a genial rollicking spirit, with a plentiful fund of anecdote, and a marked predilection for punch—on the whole, by no means a bad companion so long as he could be kept from his hobby of newspapers: on this subject he was a complete monomaniac. Whatever topic might be started, he invariably managed to lead the conversation—sometimes by subtle and almost insensible degrees, at others striking off at a tangent—to his favorite theme; and, notwithstanding all my efforts to check him, would expatiate for hours on the glowing prospects of the Puddleton Gazette, or enter into elaborate explanations respecting the failure of its fifty-nine predecessors—for it appeared they were all failures, though always through a most marvellous and unprecedented concurrence of adverse circumstances, and invariably when on the eve of becoming permanent successes. However, we worked on the whole very well together, and, by the evening of the day preceding the appearance of the first number of the Gazette, all our arrangements were completed, and the paper almost ready to go to press. During the last few days I had fancied there was something like a shade of despondency on the face of my coadjutor, but I attributed this to a natural anxiety for the result of his venture, more especially as the day of publication approached. On the evening referred to he was unusually vivacious; and as we sat in the twilight by the little office fire, with the comfortable reflection that the labors of the week were all but ended, he insisted on mixing a steaming brew of punch, to drink success to the new journal. While he was speaking, there came a single rap at the door, and without further warning there appeared the red head of Master Dobs, who now acted in the multifold capacity of buttons, printer's devil, office boy, and general messenger.

"Please, sir, printer wants candles."

"Then why the deuce don't you go to Prodger's, next door, and get 'em?" quoth Mr. Mangles, highly irate at being interrupted at such a convivial moment.

"'Cos he said as how he wouldn't let you have no more on tick." And the youth accompanied the reply with a ghastly grin, apparently under the impression of having said something exquisitely humorous. Mr. Mangles dropped the lemon he was squeezing.

"Go and be —" The rest of his sentence was lost in the loud bang of the door, followed by the indistinct pattering of hob-nailed shoes in the passage, as though the triumphant Dobs were executing a war-dance of victory.

"Mr. Walker," said Mr. Mangles, picking up the lemon aon turning to me with a bland smile, "do you happen to have such a thing as half-a-crown about you?"

Now this was peculiarly embarrassing. The fact was, that the slender stock of capital with which I left town had dwindled gradually away during my fortnight's residence at Puddleton; and, as I had only on that morning paid a week's rent in advance to my landlady (I ought to have mentioned that I had removed from the "Coach and Horses" into lodgings) the sum total of my finances was at that moment represented by a few halfpence. Indeed, I had fully made up my mind to speak that very evening to Mr. Mangles on the subject of a certain agreement with reference to the payment of a weekly salary, which seemed to have escaped his memory on the previous Saturday. However, there was no help for it; so I replied, with assumed calmness, that, by some singular coincidence, I did not happen to have such a thing as half-a-crown about me.

"Well, if this is not supremely ridiculous!" laughed Mr. Mangles; "I really don't believe I have a farthing of change in my purse."

All I could say in reply was, that if we intended to have the paper out on the following morning, as announced, the printers must have the candles, and that if he had no change, doubtless the landlord of the "Coach and Horses" would cash him a cheque.

"Yes," said Mr. Mangles, with a reflective air, and speaking very slowly, "I dare say he would; but the fact is that—that —not having a banker's aecouut, I don't, you see, happen to possess a cheque-book; eh!"

"Well," said I, driven at last fairly to bay, "I am sorry to say I can't assist you. Here's all the capital I posscss in the world." And so saying, I deposited on the office-table the sum of threepence-halfpenny, good and lawful money of Great Britain.

Mr. Mangles turned deadly pale. "Just like my iufernal luck," he groaned. "Here I've been and spent every farthing I have in the wide world upou plant, paper, posters and advertisements for this precious Gazette, which I feel sure must be a great success; and here's the whole conceru going to smash for the want of a few paltry candles. Oh! oh! just like my infernal luck."

"Do you really mean to say," I interposed, "that you have not—"

Mr. Mangles drew himself up to his full height—about five feet five—shoved both hands deep into his pockets, clenched his teeth audibly and hissed out, savagely and deliberately, "Not a stiver!"

It was now my turn to be disconcerted. It was getting darker and darker every minute, and a second message came dowu from the printing-room for the candles, to enable them to continue work. As a last desperate resource, Dobs was again despatched to Mr. Prodger for the necessary articlos, with instructions to be profuse iu his promises to pay the whole bill on the following day; but the fiendish griu which bespread his couutcnance on his return was in itself sufficient to announce the ill success of his mission. The more I reflected on our position, the more hopeless it seemed; and, forgetful of all the once fondly-anticipated glories of the editorial chair, I began to think how on earth I should ever get back to Londou agaiu. As for Mr. Mangles, he leaned moodily over the expiring embers, the very picture of misery and despair. Suddenly a sharp ringing "rat-tat" was heard at the door. "Those confounded candles again," he murmured; adding, in a roar, "In the devil's name, come in." The door slowly opened, but instead of the grinning face of Dobs, a strange figure, enveloped iu a long black cloak, reaching almost to the ground, walked, or I should rather say glided—for the step was perfectly noiseless—into the room, and stood by the table. A queer conical cap, of the same material as the cloak, was perched on the top of his head, from beneath which protrnded a mass of coal-black hair, twisted and tangled into innumerable curls, like so many corkscrews. I have also a vivid impression of a long peaked beard of the Vandyke pattern, a thin aquiline nose, shallow sunken cheeks with high bones, and a pair of bright roving eyes, which wandered about the room with a wild, restless and malevolent expression; but I was so startled by the apparition, that I can hardly trust my memory.

The strange visitor pansed for a few seconds, as if in expectation of being questioned, and then said quietly "I wish to take in your paper, here is my name and address, and a quarter's subscription in advance;" at the same time depositing on the table a card and the money. Before we could recover from our surprise he had left the room.

Mr. Mangles drew a long breath, and without saying a word, rushed to the door; but the stranger had disappeared. "At all events," he said "the money is good. Here, Dobs, you villain, fetch the candles."

My story is almost told. The Puddleton Gazette duly appeared on the following morning, and I understand became thriving property; but my connectiou with it was brief, as I was shortly afterwards recalled to town, to fill a more lucrative post. The most extraordinary feature of the whole affair, however, was, that when we came to send the paper to the address given by our mysterions visitor, there was no such name, street or number to be found in the whole of Puddleton, and all our efforts to discover him proved of no avail.

What become of my friend Mr. Mangles I cannot say; but there is talk of a new paper to be published in the Great Desert, printed half in English and half in Arabic, and I should not be greatly surprised if he had something to do with it.

When I related the above story to my friend Rattle of the Morning Snorter, he laughed, and said, "Depend upon it, old fellow, the evil one looks sharp after his interests in this world and will always take care of his own. A new paper is too good a chance to be lost for want of a few shillings."

There are calumnies that kill women, but do only a slight injury to men, as certain reptiles kill with poison in the warm months and only wound in the cold ones.

Shut your eyes if you would disceru a truth clearly. The corporeal eye puts out the mental one.

BUTTERFLY LIFE IN PARIS—LONGCHAMPS.

Longchamps presents a lively appearance on those beautiful days of the year, when the queen bee and butterflies and any number of drones unfold their wings and go out for an airing. The Boston Post has a picture of the scene under the head of "Paris Gossip." The day, it says, is magnificent, the road well tended, hundreds of gens d'armes keep order amougst the disorderly procession of unrepentant thieves and magdalens which the Bourse and the Rue de Breda let loose upon the gaping population that lines the sidewalks of the Champs Elysées. The Empress has just passed by. She is attired in a species of gallant half-mourning, indicative of the share she takes of the sorrow occasioned by the loss of King Maximilian of Bavaria. Her dress is of violet-colored moire, with a paletot of the same cut, with tails en gigot exactly like the coats worn by the daudies of 1836, when the Duke of Orleans ruled the fashions by which ladies' hearts were to be ensnared. Two large buttons at the waist behind, and a row of the same in front, add to the illusion which leads us to believe we have before us a specimen of the handiwork of the great tailor of that day. Her Majesty's bonnet is very small, covered with black lace, and flashes in the sun, being embroidered with steel bugles—no doubt to denote the vivacity of her regrets; her hair is turned back from her face, which, alas! is growing hard in its expression, while the bloom of complexion is maintained by artificial means; and the dark lines on eaeh side of the mouth are growing deeper and deeper still—some say furrowed by sorrow, others by auxiety and vexation. But away rolls Her Majesty's carriage with its outriders, its emblazoned panels, and its liveried domestics; away with it roll likewise all care aud trouble; brilliant equipages follow—splendid vehicles so highly varnished that each turn of their gaily-painted wheels blinds the looker-on, as the sun shines down as usual with equal power on the unjust extravagauee of their occupants as well as on the righteous y acquired conveyance of the provincial devotee or Parisian bourgeois surging along the same road. Lovely wicker carriages follow in quick succession, baskets made to contain the ripest fruit of the hotbed of corruption furnished by the nineteeuth century. They are mostly driven by their fair owners; the horses are in general most splendid. The great horse-dealer went to England recently, to fetch the finest pair that could be bought, for one of these ladies—by name Cora Pearl—who has absorbed for the momeut all the intelligence, vitality, and capital of the youth of Paris. She does more than this, for she absorbs the whole attention of the public in the Bois de Boulogne, and the refined and intellectual race which was once at the head of all advancement and spiritual progress is so occupied with the doings of a painted harlot, that the elections which containcd the germs of liberty or the seeds of bondage are not even mentioned among the crowds of young men who loll upon the chairs or stroll down the asphalte, waiting with impatience for the appearance of the heroine. She comes at last; see how scornfully she passes by; her steeds are the most spleudid to be seen at Longchamps—and well they may be, for Hawes, who purchased them at Tattersall's, gave £1,000 apiece for them. The lady drives with nonchalance. She is alone in her wicker basket, and her whole appearance combines in itself the insolence and vice of this weak and frivolous populatiou. She sits upright to master the fiery coursers—and a cold sneer curls her lips as she pretends to be uuconscious of the attention of which she is the object; her eyes are seemingly fixed upon the horses, but all the while they flash right aud left, and convey to her brain without chance of error the net returns, the debtor and creditor account of the diamonds, laccs and bank notes which this drive aud its display will bring. She is attired wholly in blue satin; a broad flouuce of point lace, hooped at intervals by a huge rosette of ribbon, floats far and wide over the edge of the vehicle, now sweeping the mud from the steps, now brushing the dust from the splashing board—what cares she? the dress will be thrown to the rag bag on her returu; its cost was a miserable thousand francs; the good honest bourgeois, all agog at such magnificence, calls out to warn her that the glorious point-lace flower is catching in the wheel; she laughs at his ignorant notions of economy, and wrenches it away with such a suddeu jerk that it is torn to ribbons—she laughs again, this time quite loud; and throws the skirt with a sudden jerk over to the other side of the carriage, thus showing the silken hose and the great diamond shoe-buckles which adorn her feet. She has powdered her hair with gold, and this also is so successful that the public can scarce refrain from applauding as she passes by; they say the buttons on her dress are of real pearl, and exaggerated rumors run along the promenade concerning their value; in short, the Paris shopkeeper, whose whole soul is devoted to money and its power, is struck with reverence to behold its very representative in the person of this woman. Not so the Paris workman; he stands sullen and silent, gazing on the wanton waste and wicked spoliation of the people, which the long procession of such splendid equipages conveys to his troubled mind. He clenches his fist and turns away with a muttered oath to regain his home in the Faubourg St. Antoine. Groups of his fellow-workmen are gathered there; they too have just returned from Longchamps, and have beheld the same disgraceful sight with the same disgust and indignation, and vow that no such procession shall sully their Faubourg on Easter Monday, when the races at Vincennes attract the same display of barefaced insolence and vice. The threats have been so loud this year that the police force has been doubled to prevent violence. It is supposed that some of the boldest of the harlots will venture to parade their infamy through the honest Faubourg all the same; if so, it is most likely that the lesson which Parisian immorality will receive through its polluted idols will be a rather severe one.

Coating of Ships with Glass.—By direction of the English Admiralty, experiments, which are stated to be highly satisfactory, have been carried out at the Woolwich dockyard, to ascertain the practicability of coating the bottom of iron ships on a plan invented by Mr. Leatch, which consists in coating the iron surface with gutta-percha or other cement, and on this soft material to fasten sheets of glass about a quarter of an inch thick. The glass is previously bent to the shape of the ship, and pierced for the reception of the screws or bolts, the apertures being lined with a soft adhesive composition, which prevents the fastenings from coming into immediate contact with the glass.

KASPAR HAUSER.

Like the "Man in the Iron Mask," the identity of the unfortunate Kaspar Hauser, the foundliug of Nuremberg, has formed the subject of much speculation. To the present, the mystery hanging over his origin remaius uudispelled, and the whole affair is beset with such anomalies and contradictions that it is almost impossible to form even a well-grounded conjecture on the subject. The followiug are the ascertained facts of the case.

Between 4 and 5 o'clock in the afternoon of the 26th of May, 1858, a young lad of apparently about sixteen or seventeen years of age, was found in a helpless and forlorn condition in the market-place of Nuremberg, by a citizen of that town. He was dressed like a peasant-boy, and had with him a letter addressed to the captain of the Sixth Regiment of Horse at Nuremberg. Being conducted to this officer and interrogated, it soon became evident that he could speak very little, and was almost totally ignorant. To all questions he replied, "Von Regensberg," (from Regensberg,) or "Ich woas nit," (I don't kuow.) On the other hand, he wrote his name in firm, legible characters on a sheet of paper, but without adding the place of his birth, or anything else, though requested to do so. Though short and broad-shouldered, his figure was perfectly well-proportioned. His skin was very white; his limbs delicately formed, the hands and feet small and beautiful,—the latter, however, showing no marks of his having ever worn shoes. With the exception of dry bread and water, he showed a violent dislike to all kiuds of meat and drink. His language was confined to a few words or seutences in old Bavarian dialect. He showed entire ignorance of the most ordinary objects, and great indifference to the conveniences and necessaries of life. Among his scanty articles of clothing was a handkerchief marked K. H.; he had likewise about him some written Catholic prayers. In the letter which he carried, dated "From the confines of Bavaria, place unknown, 1828," the writer stated himself to be a poor day-laborer, the father of ten children, and said that the boy had been deposited before his door by his mother, a person unknown to the writer. He stated further, that he had brought up the boy secretly, without allowing him to leave the house, but had instructed him in reading, writing and the doctrines of Christianity; adding that it was the boy's wish to become a horse-soldier. The latter enclosed a line, apparently from the mother, stating that she a poor girl, had given birth to the .boy on the 30th of April, 1812, that his name was Kaspar, and that his father, who had formerly served in the Sixth Regiment, was dead.

The poor boy having been taken before and attended to by the magistrates, his story was soon made known to the public, and he himself became the object of general sympathy. Binder, a burgomaster, exerted himself, in particular, to throw some light on the obscurity in which the origin of the young man was involved. In the course of many conversatious with him, it came out that Hauser, from his childhood, had worn only a shirt and trowsers; that he had lived in a dark place under grouud, where he was unable to stretch himself at full length; that he had been fed on bread and water, by a man who did not show himself, but who cleaned and dressed him, aud provided him with food and drink while he was in a state of natural or artificial sleep. His sole occupatiou was playing with two wooden horses. For some time before he was conveyed to Nuremberg, the man had coffie oftener to his dungeon and had taught him to write by guiding his hand, and to lift his feet and walk. The narrative gave rise to various rumors and superstitions. According to some, this mysterious foundling was the natural son of a priest, or of a young lady of high rank, while others believed him to be of princely origin, or the victim of some dark plot respecting an inheritance. Some incredulous persons believed the whole affair to be an imposition. On the 18th of July, 1828, Hauser was handed over to the care of Professor Daumer, who afterwards acted the part of his biographer. The history of his educatiou is remarkable in a pedagogic point of view, as his origiual desire for knowledge, his extraordinary memory and acute understanding decreased in proportiou as the sphere of his knowledge extended. His intellectual progress was, on the whole, small.

On the 17th October, 1829, he was found bleeding from a slight wound on the brow, which he said had been inflicted by a man with a black head. All efforts made to discover the perpetrator were ineffectual. The incident excited a great sensation; Hauser was conveyed to the house of one of the magistrates, and constantly guarded by two soldiers. Among the many strangers who came to see him was Lord Stanhope, who became interested in him, and sent him to be educated at Anspach. Here he was employed in an office of the Court of Appeal, but he by no means distinguished himself either by industry or talent, and was gradually forgotten, till his death again made him the subject of attention. This event took place under the following singular circumstances: A stranger, under the pretext of bringing him a message from Lord Stanhope, and informing him of the circumstances of his birth, engaged to meet Hauser in the palace garden at 3 o'clock in the afternoon of the 14th December, 1833. The hapless young man was faithful to the rendezvous, but he had scarcely commenced to converse with the unknowu emissary, when the latter stabbed him in the left side and he fell mortally wounded. He had, however, sufficient strength left to return home and relate the circumstances of his assassination; and three days afterwards, on the 17th of December, 1833, he died. Among the many surmises current regarding the unfortunate Hauser, the latest is that he was the scion of a noble family in England, and that his dark and mysterious history, with its atrocious termination, had its origin in this country. But nothing beyond mere conjecture has ever been adduced in reference to the subject,

---

Warning to Young Men.—A young exquisite, who was anxious to raise up a ferocious crop of whiskers, and was told that bear's oil would facilitate their growth, went to a druggist and procured a bottle of oil which he put profusely on his face when going to bed. Next morning, on looking in the glass he was horrified to find either side of his face covered with a thick coat of white feathers. The druggist had made a mistake, and giveu him goose oil instead of bear's oil.

NOTICE.

The publication of "The Californian" takes place on Saturday mornings, and copies may be obtained in the City at all News-stands, and of our News-agents through the country. It will also be served by carriers on the morning of publication.

 Correspondents will address all communications, business and otherwise, to C. H. WEBB, Office of "The Californian," 728 Montgomery street, San Francisco.*

THE CALIFORNIAN.

SAN FRANCISCO, SATURDAY, JUNE 11, 1864.

THE NEXT PRESIDENT.

WHILE we write the wires are still tingling with the news of Mr. Lincoln's nomination for re-election to the Presidency—for that this result will be achieved there cannot well be a doubt. The few may except to this action of the Baltimore Convention, but the many will recognize in it simply an act of political justice. Mr. Lincoln's heritage on his first election was far from a desirable one; the most experienced statesman might well have shrunk from the difficulties and embarrassments which the position offered. The whole machinery of our National Government was disorganized and disarranged; the Treasury was empty of money and the arsenals were of arms—both had been stripped by traitors; important Federal posts were in possession of the rebels; the army and navy were left half officered by the desertion of men of Southern birth; and, more than all, even that portion of the country which recognized him as President was divided and disunited as to its policy. In the Past there was no precedent by which he could guide his course; the Present was dark; in the Future there glimmered no beacon light. The Constitution made no provision for the emergency which had arisen, and the responsibility of overstepping its boundaries rested with him alone. In short, he found himself a President without power, a Commander-in-Chief without an army, the head of a nation without national support. He occupied the position of a pilot called to guide a ship which was rudderless.

Many of his friends doubted his competency to the herculean task which lay before him, and his enemies denied it—he surprised the ones and confounded the others. He displayed a remarkable sagacity in first outlining his policy. One indiscreet movement would have ruined everything; popular opinion was divided, and it was only by the most cautious steps that it could be led. Firm but conciliatory measures were adopted, and the inauguration of the war was left with the States in revolt. To have moved against them with fire and sword, as the radicals urged, would have divided the North as cleanly as by the blow of a scymitar, as well as lopped off all the Middle States with the Gulf ones forever. On the other hand, to have done nothing, would have been a confession of weakness, of which immediate advantage would have been taken by those in revolt. Mark the tact he displayed at this difficult juncture! A ship laden with provisions was sent to Fort Sumter; she went peaceably, not a gun was on her; the Government had a right to feed its soldiers; there was no harm in that. Impetuous South Carolina opened fire on the provision transport and the flag which flew above it—a flag which was endeared to every loyal heart by memories sacred as the ashes of our fathers who fought and conquered beneath it; a flag crowned with the glories of the sky, and to whose stars we look up proudly and reverently as we do to the eternal ones which burn in the heavens. The first gun fired from Morris Island awoke an echo of thunder in the Northern heart that now reverberates along the Rapidan and shakes the stronghold of the Confederacy to its centre. One burst of indignation went up from the lips of a people united by this crowning outrage and insult; they were ripe for the bold policy which the President immediately inaugurated. Few men in his position could have done as well—we know of none on this continent who could have done better. And a similar sagacity has marked his term of office throughout. Mistakes have occasionally occurred, but in the main the policy of the Administration has been a wise one; and whatever clamors have been excited for the moment, it has been justified almost without exception by the logic of events.

In the last Presidential campaign, Mr. Lincoln's election was urged by injudicious friends because he had been a rail-splitter, a Mississippi boatman, or something else of the kind. We endorse his nomination for re-election, and shall support him honestly and warmly, not because he was once a hewer of wood or a drawer of water, but simply because he has proven himself possessed of honesty and ability, because his Administration has been a successful one, and because it is only political justice to permit him to carry out the policy he inaugurated. His merit lies not in having once been a rail-splitter, but in the fact that he overcame all early disadvantages and rose to a more honorable position—in this one thing he displayed ability of no common order. That we are not at war with half the European powers, is due to his sagacity alone. Vague denunciation is all that can be arrayed against him, and no specific act of mal-administration can be alleged. His re-election is certain.

"Things," "Dramatic Mention," and "Shadows," (an original poem,) on the 4th and 5th pages.

TWO GENERALS.

PROMINENT among the candidates for what would seem an eminently undesirable position at present, the Presidency, stand two candidates. Both are generals, and there is a remarkable similarity in the claims which they put forward, one for a nomination, the other for an election, to the highest and most uncomfortable office within the gift of the people. One has done nothing; the other has said nothing. Each in his own peculiar field is unrivalled; which of the two is better fitted from his idiosyncrasy to fill the Presidential chair for the next four years others must determine, for we do not even propose its discussion.

But the even balance of justice may sometimes be adjusted by one who stands outside the ring—whose hands are free from the tremor and emotion which passion prompts or self-interest excites. So far as one of these candidates is concerned, even his bitterest opponent will not deny that no man, with the means which were placed in his hands and the opportunities which were offered him, could possibly have done less than George B. McClellan did. At this late hour it is not worth while, nor, indeed, is it necessary, to review in detail a career which proved a signal failure from the first. Placed in command of one of the finest armies the world ever saw—provided with everything which goes to make an army effective, and enjoying in an almost unprecedented degree the confidence of the nation—General McClellan had that golden opportunity to achieve distinction and write his name high and imperishably on the scroll of fame and history which occurs to few men in a century, and to none oftener than once in a life-time. Inaction marked his whole course. While the enemy were massed at Manassas and Centerville—their outposts stretching to Fairfax Court-house and beyond, the red, white and red fluttering within sight of the National Capital, and almost whipping the muzzles of our guns with its folds—all this while the immense army entrusted to his command lay encamped at Alexandria Heights, like a huge, supine turtle lying on its back and not even snapping its jaws. The generals of divisions and brigades longed for action; they were wearied of camp life, and clamored for an opportunity to drill their soldiers, already as perfect in the manual and theory of arms as soldiers well could be, under the fire of an enemy. They represented that there could be no harm in a reconnoissance to find out what the enemy was doing; that to dash with a brigade or two occasionally against his outer line, feeling the pulse of his army and gauging the strength of his fortifications, would season our men to fire and give them a confidence in themselves and in each other which would stand them in excellent stead in the first battle. But, no! there was a vague talk of strategy, and a fatuous whispering about some mythical "anaconda," until people came to see in our army, with all its flags and bayonets, only the glittering outlines of a great boa. The press, which had adopted McClellan as its pet for the moment, was ready with its excuses for all this non-action. At one time it told the people that the army did not move because the leaves were on the trees: "Wait until the leaves fall, so that our General can see the enemy," said these ready apologists. When fall came, shaking the green leaves to the ground, and the clear outlines of naked forests showed against the sky, it was: "Wait until the leaves grow, so that the enemy cannot see him." There was a talk of mud, and of rain, and of impassable Virginia roads—farmers were carrying their grists to mill over these same roads, but McClellan could not stir an inch with his! The mill of our General, like that of the gods, ground slowly. All this while he was likened to Napoleon! Perhaps the unfriendliness shown by the present Emperor of the French for the North may be traced to this injustice done to his uncle! It was forgotten that the First Napoleon led his army across the Alps, while the one which fluffy newspapers furnished ready-made to an impatient country could not lead his men over tolerable turnpikes—because it had rained, and the walking was bad. Our men remained in camp the long winter through, drilling and playing poker.

At last there came news, one night in March, that the enemy was evacuating Manassas. The next morning the army was in motion, and the advance division camped that night beyond Fairfax. Before the sun or the General was up next morning, Manassas was taken by a dozen newspaper correspondents and a few early birds wearing cavalry uniform, riding for the nonce as independent rangers. There were only burning ruins, the debris of a camp, and a few "formidable fortifications" left as a legacy to the army which took possession some hours subsequently. About noon a grand cavalry cortège came riding on a grand reconnoissance, McClellan and his staff in the van. The "formidable fortifications" underwent inspection. Formidable!—one would have thought the whole Confederate army the winter through had been engaged in making dirt-pies. There were little mud walls thrown up, which an active lieutenant jumped over—forgetful of the Romulus and Remus imbroglio which arose from a somewhat similar pleasantry. Fortifications! No soldier would have fought inside such traps. A single shell falling in one of them would have filled it with corpses. In place of the Columbiads and heavy guns that our General had supposed were mounted there, a few smooth-barked logs of wood showed their innocent ends through holes in the mud that could not well be dignified by the name of embrasures. Of course, it would be no more fair and logical to conclude that because these were found there they constituted the whole defensive armament, than it would be if one finding ten-penny nails in a hen's nest should conclude that the hen laid them, and had never laid, and was incapable of laying, anything else. But the platforms for the guns were of common inch-boards, proving that no heavy ordnance had ever been mounted there, and the ground showed ruts of the wheels of ordinary field-pieces. These had been wheeled in and wheeled out long before our army thought of moving.

The fact was revealed that a bugaboo had kept our army at bay the whole winter—a bugaboo that could have been discovered long before by one manly move or look.

Then came the Peninsula campaign. One would have thought that the hero of the Manassas movement went down to the Peninsula simply to pout and complain. He never was on a battlefield to inspirit his men with his presence during all those disastrous days; he was actually on no battlefield during the war. He led the van of the retreat to Harrison's Landing, and was safely housed on a gunboat with steam up and orders to the captain that he must be saved at all events, while the whole Peninsula was black with the smoke of guns, crimson with the blood of his generals and soldiers.

It was from this sylvan retreat that he addressed his letter to the President, disapproving the policy of the Administration, attempting to dictate to the power by which he was employed. Here he evinced a signal ignorance, or a wilful disregard, of what is taught as the soldier's first duty—obedience. It is laid down—underlying all lessons in tactics and in strategy—that what the statesman has planned it simply remains for the soldier to execute; that a policy once dictated by the civil power is to be carried out by the military arm, without regard to consequences. A subtle thread of ambition running through the man's whole nature is revealed in this letter, and a plan looks out from it which causes one to start with alarm for what might have happened. For had he proved successful in that campaign, there is ample margin to apprehend that he would have seized the reins of government and declared himself Dictator. It would have been easy in the flush of victory to have done so, and the letter to the President shows that with him the voice of duty was second to that of ambition!

That General McClellan is equal to the exigencies of the nation's need, at this perilous moment, scarcely even his warmest supporter can believe. His forte lies in something widely different from directing a nation's policy, or even launching its armies. As a drill master he has no compeer, as the organizer, perhaps, of an army, he has scarcely a rival. But this said of him and all is said. To use a simile which farmers will understand, in the Army of the Potomac he made a good plough, an excellent and efficient plough, but he proved himself unable to turn the first furrow when it was all done. The oxen were yoked, and the plough-shear was ready for its work, but he who had his hand on the plough could not even start the team, much less guide it.

To sum all up, a story is told which illustrates the character of our candidate completely. One of the large owners of the Illinois Central railroad came into the office of that company one day (this was when McClellan's shoulders had just been crowned with the third star) and said:

"So we give Generals-in-Chief to the army! Who is this McClellan? They say he was once an employé of our road. Tell me something about him!"

"I will tell you," replied one of the officers, who happened to be seated there. "He is one of the best engineers in this or in any other country. Probably there is no man in the world who can build and equip a road better, and put it in more excellent running order; but when this is all done, when he has it all built, equipped and completed—he cannot run it a single inch!" Anecdotes are scarcely argument, but this one is illustrative, and gives a key to the man's whole character.

As for the other candidate, this coast is already acquainted with him. He has been placed in situations where he might have said a great deal, but he has been singularly reticent on all occasions. With an opportunity to say more than any other man of the century, he has said less, and this silence has given him a certain prestige. People say to themselves, "How much he could have said if he had only spoken!" In the course of this campaign it will be necessary for him to speak, and we are rather anxious to hear his utterances. He has spoken once in accepting the nomination of the Cleveland Convention, and the result was hardly what would have been expected after such continued silence. But our people are personally acquainted with him, and whether or not he will receive their support can scarcely be regarded as problematical—there is not much reason to believe that he will prove an exception to the old rule about a prophet having honor in his own country. On the whole, we think his escape from the Presidency will not be so narrow as it was in 1856.

In conclusion, without taking sides at all, we simply wish to ask whether the election of a General—in this count we are not reckoning Butler, for he, in brief, is a barrister—is at this moment the wisest choice that can be made? Is it not better to have soldiers in the field, and statesmen in the Cabinet? Has the time arrived when a military dictatorship is necessary to the salvation of the country, that it is proposed to make the White House brilliant with gold lace and sabretashes? Would not brains do quite as well there as buttons?

IS IT A PANIC?

WE SCARCELY know whether to call the present financial flutter a panic or not. Leading mining stocks which have hitherto been regarded as legitimate and safe investments, offering to the buyer a security which was only equalled, not exceeded, by investments in real estate, have drooped to a figure which no one three months ago thought they would touch during the century. That their intrinsic value remains the same is patent to any who give the subject a moment's thought. All advices from the mines represent them as being in a more flourishing condition than ever; they pay the same dividends as usual, and, if disposed, could increase their dividends materially with the surplus which is permitted to accrue in their treasuries. Those holders who are behind the scenes and familiar with everything pertaining to the mines, their present state and future prospects, have not sold an inch, but on the contrary have taken advantage of the depression to increase their interests. If the movement now agitating the market had originated with them, there would have been some cause for alarm; but coming from another direction, we can only find a solution for it in the natural timidity of holders and that tendency to leap wildly at the first scare, and rush frightenedly in droves, which the weaker and woolier of men seem to possess in common with sheep.

If it did not promise to prove so disastrous in its consequences, the present scare would be ludicrous in the extreme. Gould and Curry is generally adopted as the standard by which other stocks adjust themselves, so we will take that to illustrate our position. All along during the past year it has paid a monthly interest of about three per cent. a month on the value at which it stood—between $4,000 and $5,000 a foot. The regular dividend of $125 a foot—it has paid higher than that—gave an interest of nearly three per cent. on $4,200. Compounding this monthly and the stock would pay for itself in about two years, and the mine as now developed shows, it is said, sufficient ore in sight to supply its mills for ten years at least. They be greedy capitalists indeed who would look for a better investment than this! Yet within the past few days, with no reason at all—for the dividends continue the same, and the mine, if possible, promises better than ever—this stock ran down as low as $2,400, and for some time stood at but little over that sum.

When the fool-killer goes his rounds on this coast, if he does not find considerable to do in Montgomery street, we are entirely out in a hypothesis we have lately established.

Parties are rushing their stock into the market for sale, and seem as anxious to get rid of it as though its next month's dividend would burn their fingers if they held it. Under this pressure the stock momentarily droops, but that it is worth one penny less than it was three months ago no one can seriously imagine. If a man has an acre of ground which regularly yields him a certain amount from its crop, paying a sure interest upon a certain value, that acre of ground does not actually lessen in value so long as the crop continues, let real estate depreciate to what price it may. The cases in one respect are not analagous, however; and the difference turns wholly in favor of the mining side of the argument. For while the crop which the acre of ground yields its tiller may bring a less price one year than another, the crop which the mine gives is immutable in value, inasmuch as it is the representative and exponent of all values. Of course we assume it as a fact that the gold and silver crop is certain and not liable to give out—a hypothesis which in the case of the illustrative mine under discussion is fair enough, unless all who have visited it have conspired together to tell an untruth, and the trustees and all familiar with its workings have been deceived greatly to their disadvantage.

One thing ought to stop this senseless sacrifice of property by the timorous crowd, if no other influence—even their own individual interests—have weight with them. Our large capitalists are quietly bagging all the stock they can take—preparing to reap a financial harvest from the whirlwind which fools are sowing to their own prejudice. Cannot people understand that the stock is worth as much to them as to any one else, and that the fact that shrewd capitalists are buying it up, and that owners familiar with the mine in every detail are increasing their already large interests, is proof enough that the investment is considered an advantageous one, and that the ill wind they are kicking up blows good to the pockets of their neighbors!

SOME one assures us that hydrophobia in dogs may be guarded against by amputation of the tip of the tail. The theory is excellent, but is not the practice too limited? Is not a grievous error committed on the score of caudal economy? If allowed to offer a hint, we would suggest that operators go a greater length in the curtailment, on the principle that whatever is worth doing at all is worth doing thoroughly and well. How would it do to cut off the dog's tail immediately behind his ears?—he would never miss it, and thus all the horrors of hydrophobia might be prevented. Let those who have howling dogs try the experiment and report progress.

A CORRESPONDENT writes to know how San Francisco is laid out. We have not a map of the town at hand, and could not give a stranger very clear information if we had; but if the present state of things continues long, we fancy it will be laid out flat.

FINANCIAL AFFAIRS, STOCKS, ETC.

THE Money market during the week has exhibited much less stringency than for some time past, and discounts are readily obtained in bank at 1½ per cent. per month. Capitalists have been curtailing in some quarters lately, and now have an accumulation of unemployed means. The recent panic in the Stock market has measurably disappeared, and leading mining shares since Tuesday last have rallied very handsomely, and are now in great favor at enhanced rates. Hypothecated stock has been sold and taken out of the market. The "bears" have lost their grip, being compelled to become purchasers at high rates, to fill their short sales; and all timid holders have suddenly been inspired with singular confidence, and are not disposed to sell without awaiting further developments. It is now obvious that no legitimate cause existed for the recent break down in first-class stocks, whatever might have been thought of those known to be purely speculative, and a lesson has been taught some parties that may be of profit in the future.

It is asserted, with no little plausibility, that the recent decline in one or two prominent stocks was the result of the combined efforts of certain large holders, who confidently hoped to sweep every obstacle before them, and force the market down to a point that would shake the faith of the staunchest stock-holders, and thereby enable them to take in their sellers' option contracts at low rates, and also to buy largely for a rise. If this was the strategy employed it was only a partial success, and of very brief duration. A number of small holders have been sacrificed, and lost heavily. The injury inflicted upon the general market for all mining stocks was not so serious as might have been anticipated; but the mischievous influence of the effort to depreciate the value of the only stock hitherto beyond the reach of any material depression, will be felt for some time to come.

Receipts of Treasure from the interior have been up to the usual average this week. From Washoe, shipments of Bullion have exceeded in the aggregate those of last week. The steamer from Victoria and Portland brings nearly $500,000 in gold dust, most of which will go into the U. S. Branch Mint for coinage. Large receipts of gold dust from the Boise region are looked for the ensuing summer.

Legal Tender Notes have been moderately dealt in, and rule at about 54 and 54¼ at the close. The market is well supplied, but a fair demand may be noted for the payment of freights. The latest Eastern quotation for Gold is 199.

In Gould and Curry heavy transactions have taken place at the Stock and Exchange Board, and 160 feet were sold, falling from $2,600 to $2,400 seller 30, then rising to $3,200, dropping back again to $3,075 and closing yesterday afternoon at $3,125. The most reliable Washoe advices speak in flattering terms of this mine and there can be no longer any question as to its reliability and permanency.

Ophir shares fell on Monday to $600 but quickly advanced to $950 and $980, buyer 30, and were sold to-day at $875. These are important fluctuations and aptly illustrate the sensitiveness of the market at this juncture. The Ophir mine is looking as well as at any time since January last, and the current expenses of the Company have been much reduced of late.

Savage has obtained more favor the past few days, and advanced from $1,400 to $1,675, and was sold yesterday at $1,825. It is thought that this mine can resume the payment of dividends at an early day.

Chollar continues to be strongly held at about $565—sales were made during the week at $630, buyer 30 days. This mine is said to be looking well. Large quantities of fair ore is being hoisted to the surface.

Lady Bryan has fluctuated between $24 and $33, within which range of prices more than 1,200 shares were sold. Advices from the mine are favorable.

North American has been largely dealt in at exceedingly valuable rates, advancing from $105 to $130, then dropping to $110, again rallying to $135, buyer's option, and closing at $115.

North Potosi fell from $80 to $68, rose to $70, and is now held at about $71. Small sales were made.

Burning Moscow fell from $49 to $41½, and sold last evening at $43. Real Del Monte has been quiet but firm at $40.

Golden Age and Empire is in more favor and has advanced from $30 to $35. A second dividend is expected at the close of the month.

A COUNTRY EDITOR tells his readers that "some women have appeared in the streets of San Francisco lately, wearing 'plug hats,' and others wearing regular soldier caps, ornamented, of course, with a variety of costly trimmings." Does not our country friend know that he is behind the times, and that the fashions have changed since he heard from here? In his next issue he can tell his readers and the marines of the interior that some San Francisco ladies at present are wearing tin pots and trooper's boots, and that others have created a mild sensation by standing on their heads and thus promenading the streets. But if any of his lady readers are betrayed into following the fashion, he and he alone must bear the responsibility.

A DEMOCRATIC PAPER lying open or openly lying before us, says of McClellan: "There he stands, firm and unshakable, the rock of the Democratic party." As things look now, he will be the rock upon which they split.

BRIEF MENTION.

AT HOME.

THE crops this season do not promise fairly, and the prospects, the country through, are of scarcity, all flattering reports to the contrary notwithstanding. So it is as well to make up our minds to bear it this once, and look for a better time to come next year.

Two Virginia ladies lately made the ascent of Mount Davidson. The Esmeralda Union calls it the greatest "feet" movement in Washoe for many months.

Charles Wheatleigh (an actor well known in this city) and his wife arrived from the East in the last steamer.

A bill appropriating $30,000 for the erection of additional Mint buildings in this city lately passed the Senate, and no difficulty is apprehended in its passing the House.

The "Drummer Boy" who raised a contribution of $140 at the Metropolitan Theatre on the occasion of the sale of the Sanitary Flour, for the purpose of replacing with a cork leg the one of flesh which he said he lost at Fredericksburg, turns out to have been a swindler. He had never taken up arms at all, and he lost his leg in infancy.

The new General of the Military Department of the Pacific is said to have left New York on the 23d of May. If so, he will soon be due. The question is, What will he do when he gets here?

Judge North has been ill, but is now sufficiently recovered to attend to the business of his Court. The recovery is good news to many mining litigants.

Washoe is shipping a remarkable quantity of bullion. There seems no symptom of a giving-out in the products of Silver Land.

There is a saloon in Colusa called "The Copperhead." The proprietors advertise Constitutional Cocktails, Seymour Smashes, Habeas Corpus Juleps and Vallandigham Eye-Openers.

On the principle which impelled the ass to kick the dying lion, a few discourteous papers are abusing General Wright, and already chanting the praises of his successor. A General who has grown grey in his country's service is too well seasoned to actual battle to be much disturbed by Billingsgate.

A meteor flashed over the heavens on Monday night. At first sight it looked as though it meant to stay in our city, but it passed on.

No preparation has been made in Mariposa county for celebrating the Fourth of July. Do not the butterflies intend to let the flag fly this year?

Dr. Franklin Tuthill, one of the editors of the Evening Bulletin, in addition to making the speech of the day at the College commencement in Oakland last week, gave the following singularly graceful and original toast: "God, Grant, Victory."

Roman, the bookseller, is mated and married and gone off on a wedding tour. The day of the Tribunes is past, but we have no doubt that he will prove a Roman father.

ABROAD.

The advent of Garibaldi in England has been a godsend to its writers of cheap biographies, who have flooded the market with memoirs of the People's Hero.

Alexander Dumas, the younger, is said to have failed in his last comedy, L'Ami des Femmes, which is as heartless as it is clever.

Lamartine denies the report that he intends to marry, for the present at least.

Fitz Hugh Ludlow is said to have dissolved his literary connection with the New Nation.

Aldrich, the poet, is reported to have written a comedy for Edwin Booth, the tragedian.

General Winfield Scott is reported to be busy with an autobiography of his Life and Times. The portion written has been set up, and the proof-sheets already number over three hundred octavo pages.

James Holbrook, well known as special agent of the Post-office Department, and author of Ten Years among the Mail Bags, died at Brooklyn, Conn., on the 28th of April.

Madame George Sand lately achieved a very marked success on the stage, by her dramatization of her novel, Le Marquis de Villemer.

Eight thousand school-houses have been erected in Russia since the emancipation of the serfs took place.

Silver has been discovered in Michigan, near Lake Superior. One tract which was bought of Government a few weeks since for $200, has recently been sold for $6,000.

The Ocean Queen is said to have had a narrow escape from a pirate on the Atlantic side in her last trip to Aspinwall, as the Florida was lying off Bermuda to intercept her. The Ocean Queen being two days behind her time probably accounts for her escape from the Florida's florid attentions.

A new periodical, upon the plan of Notes and Queries, has just been started in Paris, with the appropriate title of Intermédiarie. It is the journal which has set on foot the investigations relative to the tomb of Voltaire.

The small pamphlet called Miscegenation has been republished in London by Mr. Trübner. It should have a run in Exeter Hall.

The original score of Mozart's Zauberflöte is said to be now on sale at Dresden.

Martin Farquhar Tupper, who writes upon almost every subject, has published an Ode for the Three Hundredth Birthday of Shakspeare. The verses are said to be of that class which neither gods, men nor columns accept, and the price is only six cents.

AN IMMENSE MASS MEETING was held on Thursday evening to endorse the nomination of Lincoln. Platt's Hall was filled to overflowing, and the multitude in the street outside blocked the road to carriages. Guns were fired during the day, and at night music paraded the streets, rockets were set off in various parts of the city, and illuminations and flags made quite a carnival time. The pulse of the people showed plainly in this demonstration: San Francisco has spoken!

THE editor of the Commonwealth writes from London that the Spectator is beginning to show signs of favor towards Fremont, and that, among other exiled patriots living in London, Karl Blind is full of enthusiasm for his election, Karl is probably a patriot, and he may as well be Blind as not so far as Fremont's election is concerned, for even those who have good eyes don't see it!

ON THE RAPIDAN.

The languid Southern night was faint
With wafted breath of odorous bloom;
The heavy masses of the trees
Were clustered full of dewy gloom;
With slumberous voice, a wakening breeze
To murmur to the leaves began;
Only the picket kept his watch
All night beside the Rapidan.

Hour after hour his weary eyes
Had marked the torrent dart and gleam—
Had seen the shadows rise, and float,
And vanish down the falling stream.
The moon peered through the leaves and watched,
With curious glance, the lonely man;
And still he saw the shadows toss
Upon the rushing Rapidan.

He saw them, but he heeded not:
His dreaming mind was far away,
Where, through the night, the crested waves
Went flashing up the moonlit bay.
On rock and tree his gaze was bent;
But Northward, far, his quick thoughts ran
To eyes that wept and lips that prayed
For one beside the Rapidan.

The moon that filled the Southern sky
With glancing floods of silver light,
On distant plain and river poured
Her splendors through a Northern night.
The very breeze that stirred his hair
Perchance her tear-worn cheek might fan.
Slow dragged the night, in dreams like these,
Beside the lonely Rapidan.

What sounded through the quiet air?
What flashed beside the hurrying stream?
The waning moon's uncertain light
Brightened upon a bayonet's gleam.
With breath quick-caught, and eyes wide strained,
He bent, the shadowed banks to scan;
So throbbed his heart he scarcely heard
The rushing of the Rapidan.

Ah, watcher by the lonely shore,
Thy moments glide with winged feet!
One prayer to Heaven, one thought for her,
Ere that true heart shall cease to beat!
The light winds caught the murmured name,
A sigh along the stillness ran;
A shot—a plunge—and onward rolled
The waters of the Rapidan! [Boston Transcript.

TRUE GHOST STORIES.

The following narrative, taken from Mr. Owen's book, and drawn from nautical life, exhibits coincidences unmistakably produced by some agency other than chance:

THE RESCUE AT SEA.

Mr. Robert Bruce, originally descended from some branch of the Scottish family of that name, was born, in humble circumstances, about the close of the last century, at Torbay, in the south of England, and there bred up to a seafaring life. When about thirty years of age (in the year 1838) he was first mate on board a bark trading between Liverpool and St. John, New Brunswick.

On one of her voyages, bound westward, being then some five or six weeks ont, and having neared the eastern portion of the Banks of Newfonndland, the captain and mate had been on deck at noon, taking an observation of the sun; after which they both descended to calculate their day's work.

The cabin—a small one—was immediately at the stern of the vessel, and the short stairway descending to it ran athwartships. Immediately opposite to this stairway, just beyond a small square landing, was the mate's state-room; and from that landing there were two doors, close to each other—the one opening aft into the cabin, the other, fronting the stairway, into the state-room. The desk in the state-room was in the forward part of it, close to the door; so that any one sitting at it and looking over his shoulder could see into the cabin.

The mate, absorbed in his calculation, which did not result as he expected, varying considerably from the dead-reckoning, had not noticed the captain's motions. When he had completed his calculations, he called out, without looking round, "I make our latitude and longitude so and so. Can that be right? How is yours, sir?"

Receiving no reply, he repeated his question, glancing over his shoulder and perceiving, as he thought, the captain busy writing on his slate. Still no answer. Thereupon he rose; and, as he fronted the cabin door, the figure he had mistaken for the captain raised its head, and disclosed to the astonished mate the features of an entire stranger.

Bruce was no coward; but, as he met that fixed gaze, looking directly at him in grave silence, and became assured that it was no one whom he had ever seen before, it was too much for him; and instead of stopping to question the seeming intruder, he rushed upon deck in such evident alarm that it instantly attracted the captain's attention. "Why, Mr. Bruce," said the latter, "what in the world is the matter with you?"

"The matter, sir? Who is that at your desk?"

"No one that I know of."

"But there is, sir; there 's a stranger there."

"A stranger! Why, man, yon must be dreaming. You must have seen the steward there, or the second mate. Who else wou'd ventnre down without orders?"

"But, sir, he was sitting in your arm-chair, fronting the door, writing on your slate. Then he looked up full in my face; and if I ever saw a man plainly and distinctly in this world, I saw him."

"Him! Whom?"

"Heaven knows, sir; I don't. I saw a man, and a man I had never seen in my life before."

"You must be going crazy, Mr. Bruce. A stranger, and we nearly six weeks out!"

"I know, sir; but then I saw him."

"Go down and see who it is."

Bruce hesitated. "I never was a believer in ghosts," he said; "but if the truth must be told, sir, I'd rather not face it alone."

"Come, come, man. Go dowu at once, and don't make a fool of yourself before the crew."

"I hope you 've always found me willing to do what 's reasonable," Bruce replied, changing color; "but if it 's all the same to you, sir, I' d rather we should both go down together."

The captain descended the stairs, and the mate followed him. Nobody in the cabin! They examined the staterooms. Not a soul could be found!

"Well, Mr. Bruce," said the captain, "did I not tell you you had been dreaming?"

"It 's all very well to say so, sir; but if I didn't see that man writing on your slate, may I never see my home and family again!"

"Ah! writing on the slate! Then it should be there still." And the captain took it up.

"By heaven!" he exclaimed, "here 's something, sure enough! Is that your writing, Mr. Bruce?"

The mate took the slate; and there, in plain, legible characters, stood the words, "Steer to the nor'-west."

"Have you been trifling with me, sir?" added the captain, in a stern manner.

"On my word as a man and a sailor," replied Bruce, "I know no more of this matter than you do. I have told yon the exact truth."

The captain sat down at his desk, the slate before him, in deep thought. At last, turning the slate over and pushing it towards Bruce, he said, "Write down, 'Steer to the nor'-west.'"

The mate complied; and the captain, after narrowly comparing the two hand-writings, said: "Mr. Bruce, go and tell the second mate to come down here."

He came; and at the captain's request, he also wrote the same words. So did the steward. So, in succession, did every man of the crew who could write at all. But not one of the various hands resembled, in any degree, the mysterious writing.

When the crew retired, the captain sat in deep thought. "Could any one have been stowed away?" at last he said. "The ship must be searched; and if I don't find the fellow, he must be a good hand at hide and seek. Order up all hands."

Every nook and corner of the vessel, from stem to stern, was thoroughly searched, and that with all the eagerness of excited curiosity—for the report had gone out that a stranger had shown himself on board, but not a living soul beyond the crew and the officers was found.

Returning to the cabin after their fruitless search, "Mr. Bruce," said the captain, "what the dence do you make of all this?"

"Can't tell, sir. I saw the man write; you see the writing. There must be something in it."

"Well, it would seem so. We have the wind free, and I have a great mind to keep her away, and see what will come of it."

"I surely would, sir, if I were in your place. It's only a few hours lost, at the worst."

"Well, we'll see. Go on deck, and give the course nor'-west. And Mr. Bruce," he added, as the mate rose to go, "have a look aloft, and let it be a hand you can depend on."

His orders were obeyed. About three o'clock the look-out reported an ice-berg nearly ahead, and, shortly after, what he thought was a vessel of some kind close to it.

As they approached, the captain's glass disclosed the fact that it was a dismantled ship, apparently frozen to the ice, and with a great many humau beings on it. Shortly after they hove to, and sent out the boats to the relief of the sufferers.

It proved to be a vessel from Qnebec, bound to Liverpool, with passengers on board. She had got entangled in the ice, and finally froze fast, and had passed several weeks in a most critical situation. She was stove, her decks swept—in fact, a mere wreck; all her provisions and almost all her water gone. Her crew aud passengers had lost all hope of being saved, and their gratitude for the unexpected rescue was proportionally great.

As one of the men who had been brought away in the third boat that had reached the wreck was ascending the ship's side, the mate, catching a glimpse of his face, started back in consternation. It was the very face he had seen three or four hours before, looking up at him from the captain's desk!

At first he tried to persuade hinuself it might be fancy; but the more he examined the man the more sure he became that he was right. Not only the face, but the person and the dress exactly corresponded.

As soon as the exhausted crew and famished passengers were cared for, and the bark on her course again, the mate called the captain aside. "It seems that was not a ghost I saw to-day, sir; the man's alive."

"What do you mean? Who's alive?"

"Why, sir, one of the passengers we have just saved is the man I saw writing on your slate at noon. I would swear it in a court of justice."

"Upon my word, Mr. Bruce," replied the captain, "this gets more and more singular. Let us go and see this man."

They found him in conversation with the captain of the rescued ship. They both came forward, and expressed in the warmest terms their gratitude for deliverance from a horrible fate—slow-coming death by exposure and starvation.

The captain replied that he had but done what he was certain they would have done for him under the same circumstances, and asked them both to step down into the cabin. Then, turning to the passenger he said, "I hope, sir, you will not think I am trifling with you: but I would be much obliged to yon if you would write a few words on this slate," and he handed him the slate, with that side up on which the mysterious writing was not.

"I will do anything yon ask," replied the passenger, "but what shall I write?"

"A few words are all I want. Suppose yon write, 'Steer to the nor'-west.'"

The passenger, evidently puzzled to make out the motive for such a request, complied, however, with a smile. The captain took up the slate and examined it closely; then, stepping aside, so as to conceal the slate from the passenger, he turned it over and gave it to him with the other side up.

"You say that is your handwriting?" said he.

"I need not say so," rejoined the other, looking at it, "for you saw me write it."

"And this?" said the captain, turning the slate over.

The man looked first at one writing, then at the other, quite confounded. At last, "What is the meaning of this?" said he. "I only wrote one of these. Who wrote the other?"

"That's more than I can tell you, sir. My mate here says you wrote it, sitting at this desk, at noon to-day."

The captain of the wreck and the passenger looked at each other, exchanging glances of intelligence and surprise; and the former asked the latter: "Did you dream that you wrote on this slate?"

"No, sir, not that I remember."

"You speak of dreaming," said the captain of the bark; "what was this gentleman about at noon to-day?"

"Captain," rejoined the other, (the captain of the wreck,) "the whole thing is most mysterious and extraordinary; and I had intended to speak to you about it as soon as we got a little quiet. This gentleman"—pointing to the passenger—"being much exhausted, fell into a heavy sleep, or what seemed such, sometime before noon. After an hour or more he awoke, and said to me, 'Captain, we shall be relieved thi this very day.' When I asked him what reason he had for saying so, he replied that he had dreamed that he was on board a bark, and that she was coming to our rescue. He described her appearance and rig; and, to our utter astonishment, when your vessel hove in sight, she corresponded exactly to his description of her. We had not put much faith in what he said; yet still we hoped there might be something in it, for drowning men, yon know, will catch at straws. As it has turned out, I cannot donbt that it was all arranged, in some incomprehensible way, by an overruling Providence, so that we might be saved. To Him be all thanks for His goodness to us."

"There is not a doubt," rejoined the captain of the bark, "that the writing on the slate, let it have come there as it may, saved all your lives. I was steering at the time considerably to the south of west, and I altered my course to nor'-west, and had a look-out aloft to see what would come of it. But you say," he added, turning to the passenger, "that you did not dream of writing on a slate?"

"No, sir. I have no recollection whatever of doing so. I got the impression that the bark I saw in my dream was coming to rescue us; but how that impression came I cannot tell. There is another very strange thing about it," he added. "Everything here on board seems to me quite familiar; yet I am very sure I never was in your vessel before. It is all a puzzle to me. What did your mate see?"

Thereupon Mr. Bruce related to them all the circumstances above detailed. The conclusion they finally arrived at was, that it was a special interposition of Providence to save them from what seemed a hopeless fate.

—

AN APPARITION OF THE LIVING.

During the autumn of 1857, Mr. Daniel Muller, a young American gentleman, after having travelled throughout Germany, was returning to the United States in a Bremen packet.

One tempestuous evening his mother, Mrs. Anne Muller residing near New York, knowing that her son was probably then at sea, became much alarmed for his safety, and put up in secret an earnest prayer that he might be preserved to her.

There was residing in the same house with her, at that time, one of her nieces, named Louisa Allen, who was in the habit of receiving impressions of what might be called a clairvoyant character. This niece had heard the expression of her aunt's fears; but, like the rest of the family, she was ignornnt that these fears had found expression in prayer for her cousin's safety. The day after the tempest, she had an impression so vivid and distinct that she was induced to record it in writing. It was to the effect that her aunt had no cause to fear, seeing that the object of her anxiety was in safety, and that at the very hour of the previous evening when the mother had so earnestly put up a secret prayer for him, her son, being at the time in his state-room, had been conscious of his mother's presence.

This she read to her aunt the same day, thinking it might tend to comfort her.

And then she waited with great anxiety for her cousin's return, when she might have her doubts resolved as to the truth or falsehood of the mysterious impression regarding him. He arrived three weeks afterwards, safe and well; but during the afternoon and evening that succeeded his arrival, no allusion whatever was made by any one to the above circumstances. When the rest of the family retired, Louisa Allen remained, proposing to question him on the subject. He had stepped out; but after a few minutes he returned to the parlor, came up to the opposite side of the table at which she was sitting, looked agitated, and, before she herself could proffer a word, he said, with much emotion: "Cousin, I must tell you a most remarkable thing that happened to me." And with that, to her astonishment, he burst into tears.

She felt that the solution of her doubts was at hand; and so it proved. He told her that one night during the voyage, soon after he had lain down, he saw, on the side of the state-room opposite his berth, the appearance of his mother. It was so startlingly like a real person, that he rose and approached it. He did not, however, attempt to touch it, being ultimately satisfied that it was an apparition only. But on his return to his berth he still saw it for some minutes, as before.

On comparing notes, it was ascertained that the evening on which the young man thus saw the appearance of his mother at sea was the same on which she had so earnestly prayed for his safety—the very same, too, which his cousin Louisa had designated in writing, three weeks before, as the time when he had seen the apparition in question. And, as nearly as they could make it out, the hour also corresponded.

The foregoing history is taken from Mr. Dale Owen's remarkable book, to which we have before been indebted; and that gentleman adds:

"The above narrative was communicated to me by the two ladies concerned, the mother and her niece, both being together when I obtained it. They are highly intellectual and cultivated. I am well acquainted with them, and I know that entire reliance may be placed on their statement."

—

SECOND SIGHT.

The celebrated German author, Zschokke, writes thus of his singular gift of second sight: "If the reception of so many visitors was troublesome, it repaid itself occasionally either by making me acquainted with remarkable personages, or by bringing out a wonderful sort of seer-gift, which I called my inward vision, and which has always remained an enigma to me. I am almost afraid to say a word upon this subject; not for fear of the imputation of being superstitious, but lest I should encourage that disposition in others; and yet it forms a contribution to psychology. So to coufess.

"It is acknowledged that the judgmeut which we form of strangers, on first meeting them, is frequently more correct than that which we adopt upon a longer acquaintance with them. The first impression which, through an instinct of the soul, attracts one towards, or repels one from another, becomes, after a time, more dim, aud is weakened, either through his appearing other than at first, or through our becoming accustomed to him. People speak, too, in reference to such eases of involuntary sympathies and aversions, and attach a special certainty to such manifestations in children, iu whom knowledge of mankind by experience is wantiug. Others, again, are incredulous, and attribute all to physiognomical skill. But of myself.

"It has happened to me occasionally, at the first meeting with a total stranger, when I have been listening in silence to his conversation, that his past life, up to the present moment, with many minute circumstances belonging to one or other particular sceue in it, has come across me like a dream, but distinctly, entirely, involuntarily, and unsought, occupying in duration a few miuutes. During this period 1 am usually so plunged in the representation of the stranger's life, that at last I neither continue to see distinctly his face, on which I was idly speculating, nor to hear intelligently his voice, which at first I was using as a commentary to the text of his physiogomy. For a long time I was disposed to consider these fleeting visions as a trick of the fancy; the more so that my dream-vision displayed to me the dress and movements of the actors, the appearance of the room, the furniture, and other aceidents of the scene; till, on one occasion, in a gamesome mood, I narrated to my family the secret history of a seamstress who had just before quitted the room. I had never seen the person before. Nevertheless the hearers were astonished, and laughed, and would not be persuaded but that I had a previous acquaintance with the former life of the person, inasmuch as what I had stated was perfectly true. I was not less astonished to find that my dream-vision agreed with reality, I then gave more attention to the subject, and, as often as propriety allowed of it, I related to those whose lives had so passed before me the substance of my dream-vision, to obtain from them its contradiction or confirmation. On every occasion its confirmation followed, not without amazement ou the part of those who gave it.

"Least of all could I myself give faith to these conjuring tricks of my mind. Every time that I described to any one my dream vision respecting him, I confidently expected him to answer it was not so. A secret thrill always came over me when the listener replied—'It happened as you say;' or when, before he spoke, his astonishment betrayed that I was not wrong. Instead of recording many instances, I wi l give one which, at the time, made a strong impression upon me.

"On a fair day I went into the town of Waldshut, accompanied by two young foresters, who are still alive. It was evening, and, tired with our walk, we went into an inn called 'The Vine.' We took our supper with a numerous company, at the public; when it happened that they made themselves merry over the peculiarities and simplicity of the Swiss, in connection with the belief in mesmerism, Lavater's physiognomical system, and the like. One of my companions, whose national pride was touched by their raillery, begged me to make some reply, particularly in answer to a young man of superior appearance, who sat opposite, and had indulged in unrestrained ridicule. It happened that the events of this very person's life had just previously passed before my mind. 1 turned to him with the question whether he would reply to me with truth and candor, if I narrated to him the most secret passages of his history, he being as little known to me as I to him. That would, I suggested, go something beyond Lavater's physiognomical skill. He promised, if 1 told the truth, to admit it openly. Then I uarrated the events with which my dream vision had furnished me, and the table learnt the history of the young tradesmau's life, of his school years, his peccadilloes, aud finally, of a little act of roguery committed by him on the strong box of his employer. I described the uninhabited room with its white walls, where, to the right of the brown door, there had stood upon the table the small black money-chest, etc. A dead sileuce reigned iu the company during this recital, interrupted only when I occasioually asked if I spoke the truth. The man, much struck, admitted the correctness of each circumstance—eveu, which I could not expect, of the last. Touched with this frankness, I reached my hand to him across the table, and closed my narrative. He asked my name, which I gave him. We sat up late in the night conversing. He may be alive yet.

"Now I can well imagine how a lively imagination could picture, romance-fashion, from the obvious character of a person, how he would conduct himself under given circum stances. But whence came to me the involuntary knowledge of accessory details, which were without any sort of interest, and respected people who for the most part were utterly indifferent to me, with whom I neither had, nor wished to have, the slightest association? Or was it in each case mere coincidence? Or had the listener, to whom I described his history, each time other images in his miud than the accessory ones of my story, but, in surprise at the essential resemblance of my story to the truth, lost sight of the points of differeuce? Yet I have, in consideration of this possible source of error, several times taken pains to describe the most trivial circumstances that my dream-vision has shown me.

"Not another word about this strange seer-gift, which I can aver was of no use to me in a single instance, which manifested itself occasionally only, and quite independently of any volition, and often in relation to persons in whose history I took not the slightest interest. Nor am I the only one in possession of this faculty. In a journey with two of my sons I fell in with an old Tyrolese who travelled about selling lemons and oranges, at the inn at Unterhauerstein in one of the Jura passes. He fixed his eyes for some time upon me, joined in our conversation, observed that though I did not know him he knew me, and began to describe my acts and deeds, to the no little amusement of the peasants and astonishment of my children, whom it interested to learn that another possessed the same gift as their father. How the old lemon-merchant acquired his knowledge he was not able to explain to himself nor to me. But he seemed to attach great importance to his hidden wisdom."

—

BISHOP HALL'S ACCOUNT OF A REMARKABLE DREAM.

In my youth, when I was at Cambridge, my brother Henry lying with me, early one morning I dreamed that my mother passed by with a sad countenance, and told me that she would not come to my Commencement (having promised at that time to come to Cambridge). When 1 related this dream to my brother (both of us waking together in a sweat) he protested he had dreamed the very same. The next carrier brought us word of our mother's death.

How can this be accouuted for on merely rational principles?

GENTLE ZEPHYRS.

M. Camus, in a volume lately published in Paris, entitled The Bohemians of the Flag, gives this selfish sketch of the Zephyr:

Clever acts of swindling, if successful, live in the memory of the battalion, and the first rule of the Zephyr is rem, quocumque modo rem. When sufferiug from impecuniosity, or to use the barrack argot, "stivercramp," the Zephyr combines the most ingenious schemes to draw "cartwheels" out of the pockets of the simple-minded Arabs. Thus, he will pick up some old rag and palm it off as the banner carried by the Emperor of Morocco at the Battle of Isly; at another time he sells to the highest bidder a knife which once belonged to Abd-el-Kader. Another Zephyr, whose name has not been handed down to posterity, was the inventor of humanitarian cartridges; that is to say, he made up cartridges of pounded charcoal and old bullets, which he sold at a high figure to the Kabyles, to be employed against the French in the next revolt. The Zephyrs, too, have turned their attention to natural history, and their greatest exploit was the inventiou of rats with a trunk, which proved the awful down-come of a Parisian savant. The experiment was ingenious, though perhaps a trifle cruel. The Zephyr cut off the tails of sundry rats, made an incision in their foreheads, and inserted the tails in them. The latter grew in their novel position, and thus the Zephyr was not only enabled to solve a rhinoplastic problem, but also to pick up sundry crowns to be incontinently converted into absinthe by himself and his comrades.

The Zephyrs' barracks offer a strange and dazzling spectacle. The walls are loaded with curious objects; ostrich eggs are laid out on tiger skins or those of other wild beasts; weapons of Arab origin are intertwined with grotesquely carved walking-sticks; peacocks' feathers float over stuffed birds. and pebbles of divers hues form capricious arabesques by the side of oriental papooshes. Every bed is a laboratory, where articles are fashioned to cheat the Arab and dupe the European, which the Zephyrs effect "with the attention of a tooth-drawer and the politeness of a pirate in straw-colored kids." Many of the Zephyrs have led a strange life ere drifting into Algeria. Let us take one of them, generally known as the Jackal, for a type of the accomplished military Bohemian: "His life resembled a romance of the cloak and the sword; it was a perfect Odyssey, in which the fantastic was allied with the incredible, and chance has written such singular chapters that the most skilful narrator would have hesitated to repeat them." Educated at an Italian seminary, his youth had been spent between the altar and the cell. On returning to France at the age of the passions, he shared all the liberal aspirations of his generation, and took part in the sanguinary revolts which in Paris followed the July Revolution. In turn carbonaro, republican, phalansteriau and St. Simonian, he had served all possible ideas, enlisted under every flag, caring nothing for the consequences of the shiftiness of his religious and political principles. At length, the turmoil of war in Algeria offered him a fresh sensation. He became a soldier, and from this moment his impetuous activity found aliment. He constantly astonished his chiefs by a rare intrepidity, but for all that he remained a simple private. While execrating the service all the time he was bound to it, he no sooner received his discharge than he re-enlisted, sure to find his way ere long back to the African battalion, for, as he said, "On revient toujours a ses premiers amours." On one occasion he deserted disguised as an Arab, and traversed the whole of Oran, performing the part of a Marabout. And what was his end?—an obscure death from a bullet, a coarse jest from his comrades, and a hastily-dug grave in the desert.

It must be borne in mind that the Zephyrs are almost entirely recruited from the mauvais sujets of the middle classes; the Alsatian or Norman boor rarely commits an offence which will entail deportation. The cleverest among them is selected as grand master, or grand-zig of a species of Freemasonic corps; the members all pay obedience to him; he punishes any clumsy tentatives and encourages a bold stroke. Who but a Zephyr would have the audacity to sell the chargers of the officer to whom he was orderly? Detected in the very act, he had the ineffable coolness to reply, that as the horses were eating their heads off in the stalls, he thought it advisable to turn them out to grass for a while with a colonist. Another variety is the gallant Zephyr, who draws in his waist, hangs his kepi on a dozen of hairs, and acts the Lovelace. Cooks are beneath his notice, and his greatest delight is when a deceived husband challenges him, for that creates a scandal, of which he is the interesting hero. He is certain to be a clerk in the regimental office, for he cauuot endure the thought of handling a spade or doing sentry-go in the burning sun. He introduces himself to the colonists, gives lessons ou the piano, keeps books, teaches Arabic, and keeps his hand in by making love to all the fair members of the household. His comrades are naturally jealous of him, and christeu him the "Sentimental Swallow," but a judicious offer of glasses round generally secures him tranquillity.

The greatest achievement ever performed by the Zephyrs was stealing General Pelissier's dinner during the expedition against Laghouat; and next to that ranks the battle of Mazagran, in which the 10th company was entirely destroyed. The anniversary of this truly Spartan battle, in which 120 men resisted for a whole day legions of fanatics inspired by their Marabouts, is kept by a high mass and a glorious feed. The evening is spent in singing songs, the favorite of which is L'Etoile du Bazar, the motive being the star on the battalion button and the offence called bazarder, that is to say, selling the regulation shirts and stockings. The frequency of the latter offence is regarded as a virtue in the African battalion, and every recruit must have been guilty of it once at least, or he is sent to Coventry. Such is the Zephyr; and we may say that his character as drawn by Camus reminds us irresistibly of the dame, in Tom Jones, who granted that she was a so-and-so and a what's-her-name and a no-better-than-she-should-be; but, barring that, defied anybody to say that black was the white of her eye.

THACKERAYANA.

Mr. Thackeray's house is sold. Within the last few days it has been purchased by Mr. Huth, the rich city merchant. It is his intention to add another story to the building, which will thus lose much of its previous antique character. The sale of the library took place on Friday, the 18th inst., and although the collection of books was not extensive nor very important, yet the interest that attached to the dusty and ragged volumes, as they were brought in by the auctioneers' porter, was of a kiud that is only manifested on rare occasions—as when the personal effects of a great and loved individual, removed from amongst us, are exposed to view. The first book that was sold was the school-boy Thackeray's Ainsworth's Latin Dictionary. It contained the autograph, "W. M. Thackery, Charterhouse, July, 1827"—curious for the error in spelling the name—and was scribbled in when the Charterhouse lad was just sixteen years of age. This volume, which might have been worth 1s. 6d. on auy ordinary bookstall, realized £4 15s., and was carried off with great glee by the purchaser. Two Americans, and a tall. nervous gentleman, who employed a husky porter to bid for him, were the keenest speculators for the various lots. One of the most interesting books disposed of was not mentioned in the catalogue, but was discovered among some old waste paper by the auctioneers' clerk. It was a tiny French volume, with an inscriptiou on the fly-leaf stating that it was once the property of Lord Byron, who gave it to Maginn, the editor of Frazer's Magazine, from whom it passed, as a valuable gift, to Mr. Thackeray. It realized a goodly sum. The most speculative lots were four old kitchen drawers full of what the auctioneers' man termed "rubbish," but which actually contained all the used and imperfect volumes of Mr. Thackeray's library—those books that were apparently most frequently in his hands—full of little drawings, autograph memoranda, stray letters, and other personal memorials. These drawers realized a goodly sum, but they would have been cheap for biographical purposes at ten times the amounts paid for them. Amongst the other lots we may enumerate—Biographie Universelle, Ancient et Moderne," 52 vols., Paris, £8. A Christmas Carol, by Charles Dickens, presentation copy, inscribed "W. M. Thackeray, from Charles Dickens, whom he had made very happy once a long way from home." For this little book, an ordinary copy of Mr. Dickens's story, there was a most exciting competition, and it was at length sold for £25 10s. Chastellux, (Marquis de) Travels in North America, with autograph of Washington, (1787) £4 10s. Cornhill Magazine, from January, 1860, to June, 1862, 5 vols., in red morocco, £8 12s. 6d.; 5 vols. of the same, in green morocco, £8. De Quincey, (Thomas,) Selections, Grave and Gay, Edinburgh, £5 10s. Bronte, (Charlotte,) Villette, 3 vols., a presentation copy, £5 5s. The Gentleman's Magazine, from commencement in 1731 to 1827, 142 vols., £11. A Course of Mathematics, by C. Hutton, with an autograph of Mr. Thackeray, £3 10s. The Midnight Spy; or, a View of the Transactions of London and Westminster from the Hours of Ten in the Evening till Five in the Morning, (1776) £2 4s. The Bloody Register; a Select and Judicious Collection of the most remarkable Trials from the Year 1700 to 1764, 4 vols., £4 17s. 6d. Richard Doyle's Foreign Tour of Messrs. Brown, Jones and Robinson, 1854, £1 3s.

The copy of Dickens's Carol, alluded to above, was, it is understood, purchased for the Queen. Mr. Waller, the bookseller of Fleet street, was a large purchaser of Thackerayian relics, and has other curiosities belonging to that author.

Mr. Thackeray's property has been administered, and is sworn under £20,000.—London Weekly, March 26th.

Death of an English Bibliopole.—The London Athenæum furnishes a brief biography of George Daniel, an English author of considerable reputation, who recently died in an apoplectic fit at Stoke Newington. He was well known in literary circles and to bibliopolists, both as an author and as the collector of one of the best libraries of rare books in existence. His Shakspearean collection, first folios aud first editions, black-letter ballads, etc., are singularly interesting and complete. Among the Shakspearean treasures in the possession of the deceased is the famous cassolette so often described and engraved, and which was presented to David Garrick by the corporation of Stratford-on-Avon upon the occasion of the Jubilee. This, with the whole collection, acquires a peculiar interest at this period, when the Tercentenary Festival to the honor of the great dramatist has just been celebrated. Mr. Daniel was the author of the Modern Dunciad, a clever satirical poem published by Pickering in 1830, which passed through six editions; Virgil in London, an antiquarian novel; Merrie England in the Olden Time, and numerous other works. The deceased was in his seventy-fifth year, and was the direct descendant of Paul Danieli, the head of a distinguished Huguenot family. We presume Mr. Daniel's collection will at once be thrown into the market, such being the rather unfeeling custom which at present obtains in England.

Remarkable Beneficence.—I acquainted you with the appearance of a periodical devoted to fac-similies of the handwriting of eminent people. In looking over one of the recent numbers I was struck by a touching letter from Casimir Delavigne. A poor literary man wrote him, in 1832, to beg for a loan of money. It unfortunately happened that the day the letter fell into Casimir Delavigne's hands they were empty; so he replied, stating the unfortunate circumstance which prevented him from relieving an unfortunate brother. He signed his name and proceeded to fold the letter, when his conscience appealed to him in charity's name not to turn off the beggar empty-handed. He took his pen again and added this touching postscript: "Sir, I cannot resist the painful emotion I experience. I send you the only object of value I possess. It is a repeater-watch, which I beg you will use in any way you may please. You will not deprive me of it, for I shall not use it again; it would remind me every hour of the day that an unhappy man appealed to me in vain when I still possessed the means of being useful to him."—Paris Correspondence, Publisher's Circular.

SHADOWS.

FROM the low seat by my window
I watch through the misty rain,
And think of the far-off dear ones
With a sad and tender pain.

I think of a far, far valley,
Where budding and blossoming trees
Are full of delicious odors
And tuneful with birds and bees.

And there my blue-eyed darling—
My only little boy—
Calls from amid the lilacs
With shouts of childish joy.

He has found a nest of birdlings,
And he cries aloud with glee
As he hears their first faint chirpings
In the broad-leaved lilac tree.

Now in the dreary twilight
As the sea is growing dark,
Through the golden gateway yonder
Comes a little phantom bark.

I hear a child's sweet laughter,
A musical, broken speech,
And the wee feet's dainty patter,
As they come along the beach.

I feel the warm arms twining
Around my neck in glee;
I see the golden shining
Of a fair head on my knee.

Back, over leagues of forest
And miles and miles of sea,
The spectre flies, and, flying,
Seems beckoning to me.

I start—it was a vision;
I am silent and alone,
And still the mists are falling,
And the dull wind makes its moan.

Again I fall to dreaming,
And watch through drizzling damps
Each shadow as it passes
By the dimly shining lamps.

For over that worn pathway
I have seen a shadow fall,
The heartiest friend—the brightest,
The dearest of them all.

A genial face and radiant,
A mirthful eye and bright,
A mouth up-curved with frolic
Crosses the street-lamp's light.

I hear some Scottish ballad,
Some curious, quaint old song,
And the half dancing footsteps
As they gaily come along.

One or two fancy shuffles
Upon the lower floor,
The snatch of a tune on the stairway,
And a whistle at my door.

I start again—it has vanished;
I am sitting still alone;
It was but the storm-wind's whistle
And the frail roof's creaking groan.

And so my life is ebbing
Like the dark waves down the bay,
Each tide some vain dream bearing
Forever and ever away.

I hear the departed calling
From the farther and better shore,
And I know, by their happy voices,
They are sorrowing no more.

But even in that far haven,
Where the weariest are blest,
I know my haunted spirit
Could never find a rest.

I would turn from the angels' singing
For the sound of his coming feet,
For the magic of his laughter,
For the home songs low and sweet.

There would be no heavenly sunlight
Like the sunshine of his hair,
The amber hair that clusters
On his forehead broad and fair.

No heavenly affection
Of the starry angel band
Like the love so strong and human,
And the clasp of that warm hand.

And among the radiant children,
Not one so dear to me
As the child that comes in shadow
Through that gateway of the sea.

And so, through sober twilights,
And nights that endless seem,
I sit by the little window
And dream—and dream—and dream.

And wake again to wonder
What the dear ones may relate,
And if ever and forever
My soul must watch and wait.

At the French Opera, in Paris, there has been produced a singular one-act comedy, called Le Docteur Magnus, written by M. Ernest Boulangir. The plot seems to be absurd enough, (one oddity being that the characters are all asleep at the rise and at the fall of the curtain,) and this is described by a friendly critic as even less interesting than the story—the "destination" of the whole being described as simply that of "making one wish for the ballet."

THE DANO-GERMAN WAR.

CAVALRY SKIRMISH AND SURPRISE NEAR KOLDING.

It was about eleven o'clock, on the 3d of March. The weather was a keen, dry frost; the ground was slightly coated with snow; the sky was beautifully azure, and, for the latitude and season of the year, remarkably free from clouds. Field Marshal General Wrangel was standing at the door of his hotel, surrounded by a group of officers, uniformed in blue and gold. The sunbeams glanced and shone on well-polished helmet and cuirass. From the earnest expression of the Field Marshal's face, and the rapt attention of his staff, it was manifest that matters of profound importance were being discussed. But whatever might be the precise subject of this conference, a speedy termination was put to it. A well-mounted dragoon came galloping up to the group—way was instantly made for him; the Marshal having returned the salute of the new comer, curtly inquired, "What is it?"

"A Danish peasant, who seems friendly to our side, declares he has tidings of some importance to convey," was the prompt reply.

"Let me see him," said the General.

The horseman galloped back for about a hundred yards, until he came to the summit of a knoll; here he halted and waved his sword.

In a few seconds, he was seen to return at a smart walking pace, accompanied by a tall, strongly built, fair-haired and remarkably ruddy complexioned man, dressed in a suit of thick, dark grey woollen stuffs.

"Your name?" said the General, when the apparent peasant was brought into his presence.

"Ulric Christiansen."

"Your occupation?"

"A farmer—or rather, has been."

"Where is your farm?"

"It is within a mile or so of Snoghol."

"And what want you with me?"

"I want to deliver a body of Danish horse into your hands."

"Are you a Dane?"

"I am."

"How then come you to be a traitor to your own King and country, thus to favor the foes of the one and the invaders of the other?

"Because my King has been a tyrant, and my country a harsh step-mother to me."

"But King Christian has only been a few months on the throne, and within that time he has had no time to oppress his subjects, however much inclined he might be to tyrannize."

"True; but King Christian has continued the policy of King Frederick and his predecessors."

"What precise act of oppression do you complain of?"

"I have had my sheep, my horses, and my cattle seized for rent, which was paid, but the receipt for which I had mislaid and could not produce. I went to law. I lost, and was cast in costs, for the payment of which my household furniture was seized, and I, with my wife and children, were cast forth destitute on the high road. I appealed to the High Court of Copenhagen, but as I had no money, I could get no redress. I presented, or rather tried to present, a petition to the King, but I was spurned from the palace by a pampered menial in livery. Think not that only the German subjects of this monarchy are the oppressed, or that there are not thousands of Danes disaffected to the Danish rule."

"If you speak truly, you have been hardly used, and though your treason cannot be justified, it is not without extenuating circumstances. But where are those Danish horse which you propose to deliver into our hands?"

"Do you see the grey ruins of what was once the noble Castle of Koldiug?"

"Of course I do. It is situated on a hill, and conspicuous for miles all around."

"Well, then, a little beyond that hill is a hollow. In the little wood at the western end of this hollow a body of Danish cavalry is concealed, waiting for an opportunity to make a dash on the outposts of the allies, and effect what mischief they can. I propose to you a plan by which these horsemen may be captured; it is very simple. Let a hundred or so of your cavalry make a detour, keeping to the base of the hill, by which, after an easy canter of about half an hour's duration, you will have cut off the Danish detachment from the main body of the army, and surprise, capture or kill those who expect to surprise you."

"You speak plausibly," said the Prussian General, "but what security have I that you are not a spy, whose object is to entrap us?"

"My word," replied the Dane.

"It is not enough," said the German.

"My life, then!" exclaimed Ulric Christiansen. "Let me accompany the body of hussars, and if my information should prove false, let me undergo the doom of the detected spy."

"That is fair enough," said the Field Marshal; "but the hussars do not want your guidance; you will therefore remain with us, until the result of the expedition is known. Let this man," continued the General, addressing himself to one of his aides-de-camp, "be watched, but well treated. Remember, on no account must he escape."

Five minutes after, a troop of a hundred Prussian horse was seen skirting the base of the range of low hills which lie to the north and to the west of Kolding.

The Prussians were confident, and joked freely among themselves of the surprise which they had in store for the Danes. They had just entered on a part of the road which runs through a wood, when they were startled by a loud shout which rose on rear and flank, and before they had time to change their position they found themselves fiercely attacked and surrounded by a strong body of Danish cavalry. A desperate fight ensued; but the Prussians were out-numbered as well as surprised. About twelve of them were killed or disabled, some seven or eight contrived to make their escape and to regain the headquarters, from which they had been allured; the rest, to the number of eighty were taken prisoners. The fact is, they had been designedly led into an artfully contrived ambuscade.

The wrath of Field Marshal Wrangel when he became aware of the occurrence was terrible. He foamed at the mouth; his face became of a livid white, through the intensity of his rage. He could scarcely articulate himself with sufficient clearness for them to understand that he desired that Ulric Christiansen should be brought into his presence. As, however, his intention with regard to this matter was naturally anticipated, that personage was speedily before him.

By this time the face and bearing of the Dane had undergone a complete change. Instead of his previous meek and almost abject appearance, his port was now bold, contemptuous, and even defiant.

He gazed unflinchingly into the eyes of the angry Field Marshal, while a smile of exultation and disdain spread over his usually simple and good-natured countenance. After a few moments' hard staring and furious facial convulsions on the part of the Field Marshal, that dignitary found composure to exclaim, "You are a spy."

"I know it," was the quiet reply.

"You shall die!" said the German.

"I am already avenged," said the Dane.

The cool and dauntless bearing of Ulric told upon his enemies. Half-suppressed murmurs of admiration were heard among the officers assembled.

The old Field Marshal himself was not proof against this feeling.

The General was rapidly growing cool. At length he said, addressing himself to the prisoner:

"Well, you have played us an ugly trick; but all is fair in war. But die you must. As, however, you are a brave man, and as I prefer a spy to a traitor, instead of the death of a dog, you shall have the death of a soldier. Instead of being hanged as you deserve, I will take it upon myself to order you to be shot."

Ulric thanked the General for his kindness, and ten minutes after he lay stretched upon the snow, a riddled and bleeding corpse.

Kolding—the neighborhood of which was the scene of this incident—is a town in North Jutland. There is also a province of the same name. The town is built at the mouth of the Kolding Aue, or stream, in the Kolding Fjiord or creek. It has a church, a town-house, normal school, hospital, and the ruins of a fine old castle, which was once the residence of the Danish kings. This castle was built in 1248. In 1808 it was consumed by fire, in consequence of the imprudence of the Spanish troops quartered there. The ruins are very fine, and highly interesting. Kolding has manufactures of woollen cloth and flannel, and a winter haven of the fourth class, admitting vessels drawing nine feet of water. The population is about 3,000.

VEXATIOUS TO THE LAUREATE.—The London Daily News tells of an annoyance to which Tennyson was subjected by the Garibaldi fever which, at the date of the paper, was raging in England. It says:

The tree planted by General Garibaldi in the garden of the poet-laureate on Friday last, had two of its branches torn off during the night of Saturday. It was carefully watched by Mr. Tennyson's gardener until after dark, but between bedtime on Saturday and the morning of Sunday was so mutilated that the beauty of its foliage is permanently and seriously marred. The tiny tree itself possessed previous interest of association: it was valued for the circumstances under which it had been procured and presented to Mr. Tennyson, who has now the mortification of feeling that its crowning honor—that of being reset by Garibaldi—has been its bane. Whilst the injuries done to this plant (Wellingtonia gigantea) were being pointed out to the present writer, he heard with mortification of the indecent intrusion to which Mr. Tennyson is exposed. Strangers are found from time to time seated in his garden, peering in at his windows, wandering freely through his grounds. From the lawn in front, when conversing with his family in assumed privacy, he has, on casually looking up, discovered an enterprising British tourist taking mental notes of his conversation from the branches of a tree above. Mr. Tennyson has been compelled to make fences, raise embankments, train foliage, and in fact half fortify his house, and in spite of all is not permitted to enjoy what any of our readers so circumstanced would expect to enjoy as a thing of course—the quiet freedom of a country home.

STERNE AT THE GEORGE INN.—A recent Life of Sterne, by Percy Fitzgerald, gives us the following picture of Sterne taking his ease in his inn:

Entering "The George," we find Mr. Sterne sitting with a large company, chiefly "gentlemen of the gown," listening with deep offence to a smart young fellow scattering his flippancies against the clergy and the whole personnel of religion—specially addressing himself to the hypocrisy of ministers. At length, when he has made an end, he turns to our Laurence, and rashly and besottedly asks if he does not agree with him. Possibly he interpreted that Voltairean mouth as being sure to deal with Voltairean matter. With a twinkle of those eyes, and a lifting of the corners of that ace-of-hearts mouth, the young clergyman ignores the question utterly, and begins to describe a particular pointer of his, reckoned the most beautiful in the whole country, but which had one "infernal trick" of always flying at clergymen. Here was warning for the incautious youth; there was mischief at the bottom of this apologue, and he should draw off while there is yet time. But he must put a question—from sheer embarrassment, perhaps: "How long, sir, may he have had that trick?" "Sir," replies the other (and we see Mr. Sterne taking his first Shandean somersault), "ever since he was a puppy!" The witling was crushed, amid the tumultuous applause of the "gentlemen of the gown." The joke was presently all over Yorkshire. People now begin to respect—even to regard with awe—the man who kept such dangerous petards by him, and will be cautious of offence.

A TOURIST stopping at a French hotel, saw the phrase "fresh water chicken" on the bill of fare. Desiring to know what this meant, he sent for a dish of water chicken. He tried it, and finding it excellent, recommended it to the rest of his party, ladies and all. All liked the dish wonderfully, and so became frog-eaters without knowing it.

WATER BALLAD.

THE following poem has been excavated from an old volume of the Athenæum, to which it is said to have been contributed by Samuel Taylor Coleridge, the poet, a year or two before his death. It is not included in any edition of his works:

"Come hither, gently rowing,
Come, bear me quickly o'er
This stream, so brightly flowing,
To yonder woodland shore.
But vain were my endeavor
To pay thee, courteous guide;
Row on, row on, for ever
I'd have thee by my side.

"Good boatman, prithee haste thee,
I seek my fatherland!"
"Say, when I there have placed thee, Dare I demand thy hand?"
"A maiden's head can never
So hard a point decide;
Row on, row on, for ever
I'd have thee by my side."

The happy bridal over,
The wanderer ceased to roam,
For, seated by her lover,
The boat became her home;
And still they sang together,
As steering o'er the tide,
"Row on, through wind and weather Forever by my side."

MAXIMILIAN AND A MUDDLE.

A PARIS correspondent, under date of April 22d, speaks of the departure of Maximilian. In this connection he gives a gossiping tale which he says came out on the occasion of a breakfast given in honor of the departure of his Mexican Majesty, the Imperial family being all assembled. Here is the picture:

The day is splendid, the view from the windows of the banqueting hall most heavenly. Early spring wafts in its cool, balmy breath from the fresh flowers newly brought from the imperial green-houses to adorn the terrace beneath the windows, so that light and life and animation may be given to this parting scene; the band below plays patriotic airs, which should stir the feelings of the imperial family and make them gush with fondness towards each other at such a solemn moment as this. But imperial grandeur evidently brings with it a solemn curse, for not one member of the family there assembled seems touched by any other sentiment than that of a selfish ambition, and the departure of the son, brother, and nephew, which by right should occasion a sad vacuum in the household, seems looked upon by all as a happy relief! The conversation proceeds from coldness to urgent exhortation, from that to resistance, then on to recrimination, until at length, like the spark from the penny pipe with its innocent smoke, the explosion becomes inevitable, deadly and inexorable. The Emperor Francis Joseph is of a cold and sullen temper, but seldom dares to give way to passion, for fear of the awful visitations to which he has been subject ever since the attempt made upon his life in 1853. But like all people who are forced to place restraint upon themselves, when the temper does break out, it becomes tremendous and overwhelming; and they say the scene which took place on the occasion of this harmonious family breakfast will never be forgotten. It appears that a strange and mysterious incident had occurred a day or two before the meeting. A peasant of Transylvania—a sort of half-savage cross between the Slowak and the gipsy—had clamored loudly at the palace gates for admission to a private audience with the Emperor. The man, evidently possessed of great energy and tenacity of will, ended by interesting one of the aides-de-camp, who consented to listen to his story, which was simply that, one day, being at work in the fields, he had beheld a glorified figure like that of Saint Francis suddenly standing before him. The figure had spoken in mild, persuasive accents; had bidden him, as he valued his eternal salvation, to hie directly to Vienna and disclose to the Imperial ear the awful secret which was then whispered into his own. For this purpose had the peasant walked barefoot from the plains of Transylvania, upheld by faith in his divine mission, and maintained through cold, hunger and fatigue by that sentiment alone. The aide-de-camp, impressed with the man's earnestness, mentioned the circumstance to the Emperor, who instantly ordered the messenger to be admitted. What passed at the interview none can tell; but the peasant was dismissed with great consideration, and was provided with every comfort for his return home. He would accept no money, but refused not the offer of a conveyance, in order to insure speed enough to enable him to be in time for sowing his autumn crops; and it was observed that from the very hour of his visit, the Emperor, who had strenuously opposed the departure of the Archduke, began to be as urgent in its favor. The secret seemed, however, to weigh upon his soul, and in the heat of the dispute at the farewell breakfast, what wonder that it should have come out hot, burning, and suddenly like the thunderbolt! It fell amid the group with the same effect, scattering shame, dishonor and dismay into every heart. The Archduchess Sophia fled in consternation, not merely from the room, but from the palace, from the city, from the very country; for she hurried by rail to Munich, where she staid till the actual departure of the Archduke rendered a repetition of the terrible scene between the brothers no longer possible. The secret, which, as usual, although kept a profound one in the palace, is none to the public of Vienna, declares that the Duc de Reichstadt, being left in sole charge of the Archduchess Sophia, during his last illness, had made so great an impression on her heart that the extremest affection and intimacy arose between them, and that the knowing ones of that very knowing city of Vienna never wonder at the contrast presented by the Archduke Maximilian, both physically and morally, to the rest of the imperial family; nor that he should always from his youth have manifested such a passionate admiration of the Bonapartes; nor that he should all his life have sought to imitate their love of tinsel, vanity and lies! This gossiping tale, also, is made to account for the interest taken in the Archduke by Louis Napoleon, whose passion for everything Bonapartean has been surely sufficiently proved all through his career. The Archduke, whose resemblance to the Bonapartes is again displayed in his reckless expenditure and running into debt, has managed to obtain four millions from his brother, in addition to the vast sum already bestowed upon him by Napoleon III. as a sort of compensation for his abandonment of the remotest chances of succession to the crown of Austria. The Transylvanian peasant's story is supposed to have caused this deviation from the solemn word of honor already given by the Emperor that he would not bestow one farthing! From having been regarded as an obnoxious measure, replete with humiliation and wounded dignity, it has been at last considered as a consummation devoutly to be wished.

A PRINCESS ON THE STAGE.

THE same correspondent who tells us of the doubts about Maximilian's legitimacy, narrates how a lady of rank yielded to the fatal fascination of the foot-lights:

If royalty has been humbled in the person of an Emperor since I last wrote, the aristocracy has likewise had a let-down in the person of a princess of almost imperial blood, who, seized with sudden passion for art strong enough to make her regard it as the only loyalty, the only aristocracy, the only distinction worth possessing on this earth, has cast her birth, rank, and education to the dogs, and consented to play Phédre and the Gamin de Paris before an audience as numerous as could be squeezed into the smallest and dirtiest little theatre of Paris, that of Jeunes Eleves. The lady in question happens to be triply endowed with the aristocratic element, inasmuch as she is an Apraxine by birth, (which family is the first in Russia after the Romanoffs;) a Bathyany by marriage, being wedded to the Count Bathyany, some time Governor of Pesth, high in the good graces of the Emperor of Austria, and by alliance an Esterhazy, her mother being married to Prince Pepe Esterhazy, also of the first Hungarian family! The lady is, moreover, the mother of a numerous family and the leader of the highest aristocratic clique which exists, that of Vienna. She was married young to Count Bathyany, and lived in all the regal pomp and splendor which the great wealth and official importance of her husband not only enjoined but compelled for many years. No thought of devoting herself to any other interest than that of her husband and children, when one fine day the manager of the Great Theatre at Pesth, being in the painful situation to which theatrical managers in every country seem destined, applied to the Countess Bathyany, as being the greatest lady in the place, for assistance in the dilemma to which he was reduced. This was no less than the proposition to stop the performance unless the actors could be paid before the rising of the curtain, as they positively refused to come on without their salaries. The Countess describes her own emotion at the appeal: "I had no money, and my grief was great. I gazed around the room in despair, when my eyes fell upon the casket which contained the diamonds that had been presented to me on my marriage, and which, according to Hungarian custom, stood on a satin cushion on the table where the bridal prayer-book, handkerchief, and bouquet are likewise, and where they remain until replaced by those of the daughter first married. I rushed to the table and seized the casket, and opening the lid, tore from it the brilliant necklace, ear-rings, brooches and other gewgaws whose value was immense, and placing them in the hands of the astounded manager, desired him to go and pawn them at once, and save the theatre from ruin, while I would come in state and fill the house with my friends and dependents." The case was too urgent to admit of resistance on the part of the manager, who was blessed with that reliance on Providence so characteristic of his class, and seems to have taken the incident as proof of the favor with which he was regarded by heaven, and hurried forth to obey the lady's high behest, with what satisfaction you can imagine. The theatre was crowded that night with all the rank, beauty and fashion of Pesth; the drama was saved for a while, but the lady was lost forever! The excitement of the adventure, the love of publicity, the desire to shine, brought out at once the craving for admiration which had been her besetting sin, and she became that "slave of the drama," that "worshipper of art" which, by our cold Anglo-Saxon races, is simply denominated "a stage-struck heroine." Soon was she found to play on those very boards of the Grand Theatre for the benefit of the poor, and threatened by the Governor, who had proceeded to her husband, with annoyance and imprisonment if she attempted the unheard-of step. Soon was she adored by the students, and protected by them in defiance of the Governor's command; and at length, mortified and triumphant, glorious yet ashamed, did she journey forth to Paris, leaving husband, children, family, friends, rank, wealth and fortune, to throw herself completely into the arms of art! The divine mother has proved, however, up to this moment, but a sorry parent, for no great success has been obtained as yet. The role of Phédre was just as badly played as it would have been by a roturiere, neither better nor worse, while that of the Gamin de Paris was infinitely worse than ever before attempted. Distinction must show itself somewhere! As authoress as well as actress did the benevolent Countess attempt to amuse the audience, and a little piece of her own composition was likewise to be played. Fortune was not propitious, however. No other description of the plot can be given than this: The curtain rises, and discovers a young lady deep in thought. The storm is raging without—thunder rolling, lightning flashing, rain falling. A joyous hurrah is heard behind the scenes; the young huntsman, evidently intended to be the hero of the piece, arrives, glad and uproarious. The door bursts open; he appears upon the threshold in full hunting-costume, top-boots, velvet coat, tight breeches and all. He pauses for an instant to produce an effect, then exclaiming with a gush of delight, "At last behold me!" springs with a bound to the footlights, when, O horror! the bound was to sudden—the breeches were too tight—need I go on? No, you can guess the rest. Decorum, commiseration, sympathy, public morality, all mixed together, formed an amalgamation in the minds of the spectators, which betrayed itself in shouts of laughter and loud cheers, amid which, as the poor actor could neither advance nor retreat, nor move to the right or to the left, no other course was left but to drop the curtain, and so ended amid the most frantic screams of merriment, "Le Reve d'un Artiste, Vaudeville en un acte, par la Comtesse Bathyany." The accident was so flagrant, and withal so apropos, that it has been imagined to have been created by the Russian cabal which had assembled in great numbers to annoy and ridicule the great lady of high Russian birth who had boldly preferred the distinction afforded by art to that awarded by fortune. The endeavor, however unsuccessful, will certainly mark an era in the annals of the social world. The Countess Bathyany has leaped over a high fence, it is true, but has broken it in the attempt to clear it.

It is better to labor under aberration of mind than aberration of morals.

MEDORI'S MARRIAGE—O MORES!

THE Morning Call's New York correspondent, who has a singular ear for gossip, tells us about Medori's marriage. Blankman will be remembered from his having been made heir of the lady whom the correspondent errs in terming demi monde, since she decidedly belonged to tout le monde. Another dame celebrée is building a splendid residence in Fifth Avenue. What is New York coming to?

One of the sensations of the day with us is the precipitate marriage of Medori, the famous prima donna of Maretzek's Italian Opera Troupe. Medori is no longer a "chicken" in years, and in point of beauty would not much alarm the Venus di Medici; but she has a magnificent voice and sings divinely. You may suppose the latter when you learn that her salary, opera or no opera, is $2,000 a month, payable in gold, for three performances a week. That's an auriferous mouth you see, and no mistake whatever about it. I presume she is about thirty-five years of age, and weighs, it may be, 225 pounds. She is decidedly corpulent, has a large, round face, and can neither be called handsome nor homely. She is quite as excellent an actress, though, as vocalist, and consequently we have had a very few prime donne in this country who can be justly said to have surpassed her professionally.

Medori's first husband was a gentleman of distinction in Brussels, and one of great affluence. She took to opera from choice, therefore, not from necessity. She lived in grand style in Belgium and was immensely popular. She finally came to the United States on a professional visit, over a year ago, and produced quite a furore with her vocalism. While she was here, her husband died, and much to the general chagrin, she had to leave New York in the midst of a wonderfully successful engagement, in order to return, temporarily, to Belgium, to administer on her late husband's estate. Rumor says that he left her property worth $250,000! As soon as she could complete her legal arrangements at home, she returned to this country, where she has been singing ever since, and evincing ostensibly not the slightest desire to marry again. But it seems that widows are "very onsartin," as the darky observes; for Medori has long been receiving the attentions of a young lawyer here, of indifferent character and associates, but a good looking and dashing fellow. And now, despite all the opposition of her friends, she has privately married him.

This gay young fellow, who has carried off Medori, looks youthful enough to be her son. He is about twenty-eight years of age, though, and Medori is his third wife. Bets are being made, therefore, as to how long she will live now. The name of this gentleman is Edmund Blankman. He has an older brother, who is, or was, a chorus singer at the opera. He has also a younger brother, who is studying law under him. Edmund was a poor fellow in Philadelphia, but was resolved to grow rich. "Put money in thy purse," was his maxim, and he concluded to try and do it by means of his "shape and figure," since he was not built to do it on his "muscle." Edmund married a lady cigar dealer in Philadelphia, who had a thousand or two saved up, and they came on to this city. She soon died, and her money helped to keep him in his profession until he became the "lover" of a celebrated woman of the demi monde, named Fanny White. Fanny at last married him, and having amassed a fortune as proprietress of two or three licentious houses, retired to the enjoyment of private life. Some two years ago she was suddenly found dead in her room, and her will, discovered hidden away in an old closet, left all her wealth to Blankman. He was suspected of murder and of forging the will; but, after a tedious investigation he was pronounced innocent and the validity of the will was sustained. Then he was rich at last. But he wanted to be a millionaire. He met Medori. He made love to her. He went to the opera every night. He sat in a conspicuous seat. He applauded her vehemently. He threw her cartloads of beautiful bouquets. She rewarded him with her hand, as the finale to all this incessant exertion.

Blankman now boasts that he has arrived at the apex of his desire. He is really wealthy. He thinks he is worth half a million; and he speaks in language nicely proportioned to such an extent of opulence. He and his bride propose, as soon as her engagement with Maretzek is over, to make the tour of Europe en Prince. They design then to return to New York, and purchase a magnificent mansion up the Fifth Avenue, among the creme de la creme. They expect to have horses and carriages which shall be the envy of the whole city. In short, they meditate making all our mushroom fashionables, shoddy included, die outright of jealousy. That's the grand result. And why not? Mme. Restell, who is so notorious for the success with which she aids wicked women in disembarrassing themselves of the consequences of crime, has made money enough, they say, to buy a superb dwelling, worth $100,000, up the Fifth Avenue; and she not only intends to occupy it, herself, but carry on her business in it! What will delicately-nerved Fashion say to this?

NOT TO BE BELIEVED.—The New Nation republishes the following scandalous paragraph as having appeared in a New York journal of the 30th of April. If the story be false—and its monstrosity is too incredible for belief—the correspondent deserves to have his ears slit:

Washington is full of stories of startling developments, certain to be made before the Special Committee authorized today on Treasury Department. Affidavits and witnesses are ready to testify that, in addition to gross frauds, a regular system of prostitution is going on in the female bureau of the Treasury, with the connivance of its band of officials, and that a code of morals exist, degrading to women as it is repugnant to decency, and calling for the brand of infamy on those at the bottom of it. Many of the female clerks have been secured as witnesses. The stories that are told and vouched for as true respecting the appointment of female clerks, and the relations that some of them hold to very high officials, are simply shocking. The scandal has got to be so notorious that it leaked out in the debate in the House on Friday last; and it was announced that the revelations were of such a nature that they could not be repeated before the ladies in the gallery.

PARIS, where small journals have so long been the rule, at last rejoices in one very nearly as large as a comfortably-sized blanket—very appropriately called Le Grand Journal. It is published on Sundays, and at one franc per month—bringing its price to about five cents a number. Paris is progressive.

ELECTRICITY AS A REMEDIAL AGENT.

When it was promulgated that disease could be entirely eradicated from the system without the use of poisonous drugs, the unthinking, or those who do not look deeply into cause and effect, scouted the assertion as chimerical, and adduced strong evidence of its utter impossibility. Long articles, replete with arguments, seemingly unanswerable, of the position that only through the digestive system could the blood be purged of the accumulation of the poisons which constitute disease. A great cry went up from the interested in the continued supremacy of the old system of one poison to cure another, that electricity, as a curative agent, had been tried and proved to be of but little if any value—thinking, poor souls, the world of science stood at the same point it occupied one hundred years ago. That were wrong, while those old fogies were content if they cured one in every five patients, there were those who were diving into the science of electricity, and finally it was discovered that the trouble was in the instruments used. From that time to the present improvements have rapidly advanced, until every disease in the catalogue of human ills have been either cured altogether or checked so as to enable the sufferer to seek those changes of climate which ultimately perform a perfect cure. Diseases hitherto considered incurable have been cured, and those diseases which took months, and even years, to cure by medical process, are now cured in a few weeks; and all by the Improved Instruments of Dr. J. H. Josselyn, Resident Physician at the Electropathic Institute, 645 Washington street, San Francisco. It is astonishing to see the number of patients and diversity of diseases that have been relieved by the electropathic system. From early morn till late at night his instrument is engaged imparting strength and health to all who have the good fortune to obtain his services.

The charges, too, are not as heavy as by the old system; besides there is no medicine to pay for, let alone the unpleasantness of swallowing the nauseous stuff. During the time the Institute has been in operation there has been more benefit to the human family derived from the system than from all other systems combined during the same period. Among the most troublesome diseases to which Californians have been exposed is Rheumatism. None have given the honorable practitioner more trouble to relieve, and none have pretended to cure (if we except kaowu empirics) permaneatly. But this subtle disease gives way before the Electropatbic System in a very short time, enabling the sufferer to go about his business without pain or the fear and dread of a relapse. And so with most other diseases considered incurable. We mention Rheumatism because of its abundance, but we could enumerate many other diseases fully as troublesome, and some far more fatal in their results.

Connected with this system are the renowned Electro-Magnetic Baths. Here let us caution the public against the numerous imposters in the bathing line. The pure magnetic bath is one of the most effective aids in the removal of disease from the system; but if given at the wrong time is likely to aggravate trouble, and cases have been known where the patient has been injured so badly as to require months to remove the injury. Persons in quest of this bath should be careful and not apply to a place where there is no physician to judge of the necessity of the remedy. In fact, the only place where they can be obtained, in all their purity, is at the Institute, where the Resident Physician will always be happy to examine and see that they are not unseasonably administered, and if not necessary, advise the requisite remedy.

To FEMALES, the Directors would say, Electropathy is particularly applicable to your delicate and fragile systems, and to the numerous troublesome and painful diseases to which you are liable; should you be irregular, a few treatments will restore the functions to the proper state without pain or inconvenience; should you be weak and enfeebled, either general or local, this system imparts strength and vitality, making the recipients feel buoyant and youthful where before they were languid and unable to enjoy the pleasures of life One great blessing connected with Electropathy is, it purifies the system so thoroughly that it beautifies the complexion, making the coarse and freckled skin as pure and fair as possible, giving the patient a fresh and healthful look.

To the nervous the Directors would say, that you can be entirely removed from those dreadful feelings of evil foreboding, and your system strengthened so that nothing can disturb the current of your life. Several cases of insanity, arising from a disarrangement of the nervous system, have been permanently cured by this system. The Directors, in issuing this pamphlet, do it in the hope that it may be the means of awakening the public who have not studied into such things, to a sense of their duties, and if possible prevent those who have the care of a rising generation from poisoning their young charges with vile drugs, thereby entailing upon them troubles which, after life, may cause them to curse the origin. Also, that those in need of remedial agents may know where they can find them without resorting to taking the thousand-and-one poisonous nostrums that are continually being palmed off as sovereign panaceas for all the ills of humanity. Avoid them all—they are snares set to rob you, and do you bodily injury at the same time.

The Electropathic Institute was started amid the cry of interested charlatans, who used all the power their riches and the prejudices of the public gave them to prevent its success. It has risen to a position that is beyond their baffled malice, and will be honored in the scientific world when they are forgotten, or only remembered for their crimes and impositions. A thinking public are fast consigning them to that oblivion their works merit. Let them go, they will not be missed.

Persons seeking remedial assistance may wish to know something of the system by which diseases are so rapidly removed from the body. Electricity is a fluid of so subtle a nature, that it can only be studied by its results. We know by its action it forces everything of a foreign nature in the body from the centre to the surface, by its energy, while the vitality which it imparts fills up the vacuum, preventing thereby the subtle poisons from returning to the hitherto diseased parts—and here let it be understood, that the Bath should never be administered until the disease has been forced to the surface—except, perhaps, in cases of cold where fever has not set in. Its action upon mercurial disease is peculiar. The best authorities are of opinion that it liquifies the mercury—which, when in a liquid state, by its own specific gravity forces itself out of the body. This result has been arrived at by testing the water after an Electro-Magnetic Bath. After such tests have been found in the water, the patient is not troubled any more with those pains peculiar to the diseases. In all other cases it forces to the surface and is washed off by the bath. The whole system in its application is a luxury—there being no pain or inconvenience attending upon it; but the reverse is the case—being one continued pleasure all the time. Try it you that are suffering either from disease or the injudicious use of poisonous drugs, and you will be made to rejoice that you have had the courage to strike out from the beaten path.

Below are a few certificates from patients that have been cured at the Institute:

CERTIFICATES OF CURES.

San Francisco, April 18th, 1860.

This is to certify that I have been under the treatment of Dr. Josselyn, at the Electropathic Institute, and that he has cured me. My disease was mercurial, accompanied with chills. I applied to him on the 11th day of this month. I recommend all afflicted to employ him. He has cured me without medicine, by the use of his Electropathic Instrument. JOHN CALLAGHAN.

State of California, City and County of San Francisco—ss.
Subscribed and sworn to before me this eighteenth day of April, A. D. 1860. P. BARRY, Notary Public.

The undersigned takes this method of acknowledging publicly the benefits he received from the treatment applied to him at the Electropathic Institute while, suffering under a terrible infliction.

This is to certify that I have been under Electropathic treatment at the Electropathic Institute, 645 Washington street. When I applied to Dr. Josselyn I was cramped up with rheumatism, and also had the coast ague. So bad was I that, without relief. I don't think I could have lived more than one week. The Doctor, with his instrument relieved me the first treatment from all pain, and perfectly cured me of all disease in twenty treatments, without the use of medicines. I cordially recommend all afflicted to patronize the Institute, for it is truly a blessing to the afflicted, and the operation is very pleasant I wish to publicly thank Dr. Josselyn for his care and sympathy. JOSEPH SEGER, of Bolinas Bay.

September 19, 1860.

State of California, City and County of San Francisco—ss.
Subscribed and sworn to before me this 19th day of September, A.D. 1860. P. BARRY, Notary Public.

Sacramento, October 19th, 1860.

DR. JOSSELYN—Dear and Honored Sir:—You requested me to let you know how I felt after being at home three weeks. Well, sir, I have now been here little over two weeks, and there is no return of that very unpleasant trouble My sleep is sound, and there is no disturbance of the regular laws of nature. I feel as strong as I ever did before bad habits had weakened my system. Not only is the general debility entirely disappeared, but the local trouble is gone. I feel so strong that there is no fear of its return. Considering that you only took one month to cure a disorder of seven years' standing, I think your system almost miraculous. Accept my sincere thanks, and publish this, if you please. I have sworn to it, as you see. C. BOWMAN.

State of California, County of Sacramento—ss.
Subscribed and sworn to before me this tenth day of October, A.D. 1860. CHAS. HART, Notary Public.

Hornitos, November 1st, 1860.

Well, Doctor, I am at home and have been to work in the water for several days, and there is no return of the Rheumatism, as I call it; and Mercurial pains, as you stated them to be. I feel as gay as a lark, no pain or bad feelings, no stiffness, but perfectly well, and all done by you in three weeks, without one drop of medicine. You had hard work to make me believe before you commenced, that you would cure me, but now I find it very easy to believe. Although my friends look rather incredulous, they cannot doubt my sober earnestness. Doctor, you have my thanks, and I will benefit you all I can, by spreading your fame up in these parts. Respectfully yours,
GEO. PERKINS, JR.

To J. M. Josselyn, M.D., Resident Physician, at the Electropathic Institute.

Nevada, November. 8th, 1860.

DEAR DOCTOR.—Pursuant to agreement, upon my arrival, I sit down to pen you a few lines in acknowledgment of the great service you have rendered me, in relieving me of that painful case of neuralgia and rheumatism. When I look back and see the gallons of medicine I have swallowed to no purpose, and then to think how soon you cured me, I am astonished. You were only twelve days performing a cure of the trouble for which I had taken medicine over six months. Dear Doctor, if you could see the wonder exhibited by my friends, who can hardly believe that a cure was performed without medicine; but here I have been cured, and I have not taken a drop of medicine from you nor from any one else while being treated by your splendid Instrument. I shall try to show my gratitude by sending every sick man I come across to you.
Yours, till death,
FRANCIS GARLAND,

To J. H. Josselyn, M. D., Resident Physician Electropathic Institute.

State of California, County of Nevada—ss.
Subscribed and sworn to before me this eighth day of November, A. D. 1860. F. SPAULDING, Notary Public.

Yreka, November 10th, 1860.

DR. JOSSELYN—Dear Sir: Your letter dated October 16th is before me. You wish to know how my bronchial troubles are. Now, Doctor, that looks a great deal like a joke. I once had such an affection, of several years' standing, but thanks to your natural mode of treating disease, it has gone to be numbered with the things of the past. Since my return I have not felt the slightest trouble from it. When you pronounced me well I did not expect to ever hear from it again. Any one who sits under treatment of that Improved Instrument of yours will have the same feelings.. It imparts vitality to the system so rapidly that confidence is at once established. I have to thank you that you did not refuse to treat me because I could not pay you the whole of your reasonable charge; enclosed is the balance due you, and God bless you for the kind treatment I received at your hands.
Yours, ever grateful, WM. GARDNER.

State of California, County of Siskiyou—ss.
Subscribed and sworn to before me this tenth day of November, A. D. 1860.
B. F. WELLITS, Notary Public.

This is to certify that I, the undersigned, was troubled with dumb ague, accompanied with rheumatism, very badly. My disease was taken in Washoe. After having exhausted medicines without benefit I applied to Dr. Josselyn, at the Electropathic Institute, on the first day of November. After taking twenty treatments with his Improved Electropathic Instrument, I am perfectly cured, having been entirely relieved of all pain or inconvenience I feel as strong as I ever did when in the best of health. I cheerfully recommend all afflicted to his care, as being the best physician I ever became acquainted with. One great advantage, he uses no medicines, but cures by a process which is perfectly natural. The time occupied in my case was thirteen days. D. O. HARRA.

November 14th, 1860.

State of California, City and County of San Francisco—ss.
Personally appeared before me, D. O. Harra, and subscribed and sworn to the above certificate, on this 14th day of November, A. D. 1860. P. BARRY, Notary Public.

San Francisco, August 31, 1861.

To the Directors and Resident Physician of the Electropathic Institute: Sirs—You requested of me a certificate of the cure you performed in my case. Below I append it:

This is to certify that I was troubled with a swelling which commenced in my ankles, and gradually extended upward until it affected my whole body. I sought the best medical aid in New York and Boston, and they all pronounced it dropsy Hoping to retrieve my health I visited California in February last. I consulted the Resident Physician at the Electropathic Institute, and now, after five months of treatment, and waiting to see its effects, I am pronounced well by competent judges. It did not take but three months of treatment to cure me, but I waited to see that it did not return. I feel perfectly assured, from what I saw while under treatment, that Electricity, as applied at this Institute, will cure any disease to which the human family is liable.

Now, gentlemen, you can make what use you please of this certificate. With my thanks to the Resident Physician for his kind attention, I subscribe myself,
Your thankful patient,
MRS. C. A. CARLTON.

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.

The advantages of electricity as a remedial agent are universally admitted by the medical and scientific world. It requires, however, experienced skill to apply this remedy efficiently, and this skill of application is possessed in an eminent degree by Dr. J. H. Josselyn, of the San Francisco Electropathic Institute. The Doctor is well known to us as a scientific gentleman, and an ardent devotee to his profession. He is no pretender, but has conferred incalculable benefit to those who were so fortunate as to seek relief at his hands. For those who desire speedy and permanent relief from the rheumatic pains so prevalent in this region, we can recommend no surer remedy than a visit to Dr. Josselyn, at his rooms in San Francisco, No. 645 Washington street.—Placerville Republican.

ARE YOU SICK?—We wish to say a word to those that are sick. We have in this city an institution known as the Electropathic Institute, situated at 645 Washington street. The establishment is under the care of Dr. J. H. Josselyn, a physician who has no superior in the city. He has been in charge of the Electropathic Institute for several years, and has been unfeignedly successful in his treatment of the numerous patients that have placed themselves under his charge. The electric treatment will cure many diseases that cannot be reached by any other mode. Dr. Josselyn gives his personal attention to all of his patients, and is always ready to give advice to those that may call upon him. His charges are very moderate; and we cannot do the sick a greater favor than to recommend them to call on him before placing themselves in charge of another.—San Francisco Daily Journal.

We call the attention of our readers to the advertisement of Dr. Josselyn's Electropathic Institute. Voluntarily and unsolicited, we make the following statement, proving its great beneficial effects, particularly in rheumatic cases. Some months since we were on an editorial trip, visiting the mountains. The stage upset and landed all the passengers including the writer, below in the valley, where the Deer Creek overflowed by receiving the additional material, extraneous to its usual contents For some hours exposed in our wet clothes to night wind and weather, we soon felt the effects of the accident, in the mountains—pains in the back, hip, and legs; so much so that for weeks we hardly could walk. Treatments of all kinds were applied, but without avail, until our attention was called to the Electro-Galvanic Baths and appliances of the above Institute. Thank God, after two weeks, we have been fully restored, and enjoy now the free use of our limbs and body, as fully as previous to our involuntary bath in Deer Creek.—DR. H. BIEN, Ed. True Pacific Messenger.

ELECTROPATHY.—Electricity has long been classed among the most effective medical agents. It possesses great advantages over the system of therapeutics hitherto relied upon, as it reaches more certainly the seat of disease, especially in nervous or rheumatic complaints. The Electropathic Institute, No. 645 Washington street, under the charge of its able Resident Physician, Dr. J. H. Josselyn, has attained a well merited celebrity for the many cures which have resulted from the skilful application of this invaluable remedy.—Daily Morning Star.

☞ All letters answered with promptness and pleasure. Office open from 9 A. M. to 9 P. M. Advice gratis.

J. H. JOSSELYN, M. D.,
Ja4 Resident Physician.

R. H. McDONALD & CO.,

R. H. MCDONALD.) (J. C. SPENCER.

IMPORTING

Wholesale Druggists,

Corner of Sansome and Pine streets,
SAN FRANCISCO,
—AND—
J STREET, SACRAMENTO.

We respectfully beg leave to inform our customers and the public generally that we have opened a House in the city of San Francisco, where we will be pleased to see as many of our old friends and customers as can make it convenient to call upon us. We shall keep at both places a large and well selected stock of

DRUGS AND MEDICINES, SURGICAL INSTRUMENTS,
Dental Goods, Fancy Articles, Brushes and Combs,
SHOULDER AND BODY BRACES,
Ladies' Bandages and Supporters,
GUM ELASTIC STOCKINGS, TRUSSES,
Paints and Oils,
PATENT MEDICINES, HERBS AND EXTRACTS,
Brewers' and Soda Stocks,
CORKS (LARGE VARIETY), ASSAYERS' MATERIAL,
Burning Oils and Fluids,

Together with a large and complete assortment of all goods kept in a well supplied Wholesale Drug Store,

We respectfully solicit those dealing in our line to examine and price our stock before purchasing elsewhere.

R. H. McDONALD & CO.,
Sacramento and San Francisco.

R. H. McDONALD & CO.,
IMPORTING DRUGGISTS,
J STREET, SACRAMENTO,
AND
CORNER OF PINE AND SANSOME STREETS,
SAN FRANCISCO, CALIFORNIA.

IMPORTERS OF
DENTAL AND SURGICAL INSTRUMENTS,
TEETH, GOLD FOIL.

VULCANITE MATERIAL.

Vulcanizers, Vulcanite Base, and Impression Gutta Percha. A large variety of VULCANITE MATERIAL, Screpers and Packers; together with a large and complete assortment of all articles of the latest and most approved styles of Vulcanite work.

DENTAL BOOKS.

We keep constantly on hand a supply of all the most approved Standard Works on DENTISTRY. Our efforts will be to keep a large and well selected stock of all Dental Material, where the Dental Profession may confidently rely upon having their orders filled in the best possible manner.

R. H. McDONALD & CO.,
Sacramento, 139 J street,
my28 San Francisco, cor. Pine and Sansome sts.

REMOVAL.

HASKELL & CO.,
CANTON TEA STORE. | ESTABLISHED IN 1858.
Wholesale and Retail Dealers in
JAPAN AND CHINA TEAS, AND GROCERIES,
515 Market street,
And 15 Sutter street, three doors below Metropolitan Market, between Montgomery and Sansome streets.

It is the LARGEST STORE OF THE KIND in San Francisco my28

NEW YORK AGENCY.—$15 PER DAY MADE EASY, by selling our great "Original and only genuine"
PRIZE AND STATIONERY PACKAGES.
Each one contains more real valuable articles than any half dozen packages ever sold. They contain
FINE STATIONERY,
PENS,
PENCILS,
ENVELOPES,
AND A
GIFT OF JEWELRY IN EACH PACKAGE.
The whole worth several dollars if bought separate. Price, 50 cents. Wholesale rates to Agents low. Agents wanted in every town and camp on the Pacific coast. Send for our New Circular with inducements. Mailed free. Address J. B. WILLMAN & CO.,
my28 502 Montgomery street, San Francisco.

OCCIDENTAL HOTEL—Corner Montgomery and Bush streets, San Francisco.

This House possesses all the requirements of a FIRST CLASS HOTEL, its spacious READING ROOM, with large MINERAL CABINET and extensive COLLECTION OF SPECIMENS from the different Mining Regions of the Pacific Coast—BRANCH TELEGRAPH OFFICE connecting with Lines throughout the country—and NEWS STAND—all contributing to make it the Headquarters and Home for the Californian business man and tourist.

The TABLE of this House shall not be excelled by any.

BOARD, THREE DOLLARS PER DAY.
LEWIS LELAND & CO.,
my28 Proprietors.

G. FORREST WALTER & CO.,
EXCELSIOR
PIONEER MERCHANT TAILOR
OF THE PACIFIC.
ESTABLISHED, 1849.
NO. 611 SACRAMENTO STREET,
Three doors above Montgomery,
my28 San Francisco.

COMMERCIAL STEAM PRINTING HOUSE.
FRANCIS, VALENTINE & CO.,
517 CLAY and 514 COMMERCIAL STREETS.

Every description of BOOK, JOB and POSTER PRINTING done in the best style and at the lowest rates.
BOOK-BINDING and RULING done to order.

STERETT'S
STEAM
PRINTING HOUSE,
533
CLAY STREET.

W. P. HARRISON & CO.,
PRINTERS,
ENGRAVERS AND ELECTROTYPERS,
PRINTERS' WAREHOUSE,
417 Clay Street. my28

NO HOME SHOULD BE WITHOUT ONE OF
MASON & HAMLIN'S
Cabinet Organs.

The cost is trifling, while its good effects in the education and good training of a family are beyond computation.

DO NOT DELAY, but send for an Illustrated Catalogue at once.

Address,
A. KOHLER,
my28 Music Dealer, San Francisco.

J. R. MEAD & CO.,
HAVE OPENED WITH
AN ENTIRE NEW STOCK
OF
FINE CLOTHING!
AND
GENTS' FURNISHING GOODS.
Corner of Montgomery and Bush streets, San Francisco.
my28

BILLIARD TABLES.
NOTICE!

Phelan & Collender have sold all their stock and disposed of their business on this Coast to MATHEW E. HUGHES, who will in future have Billiard Tables with PHELAN'S PATENT IMPROVED COMBINATION CUSHIONS for sale in this market.

While returning thanks to the Public for the patronage bestowed upon them, Phelan & Collender desire to recommend Mr. HUGHES as their SUCCESSOR, to those desirous to provide themselves with Billiard Tables with Phelan's Unequalled Patent Cushions, which Mr. HUGHES will always be prepared to supply, as received direct from the undersigned, sole proprietors and manufacturers.

PHELAN & COLLENDER,
By GEORGE E. PHELAN, Attorney.
San Francisco, May 26, 1864.

Referring to the above, the undersigned takes pleasure in calling the attention of PRIVATE GENTLEMEN and SALOON-KEEPERS to his fine stock of BILLIARD TABLES and CUSHIONS. Just received, an assortment of the

NEW STANDARD AMERICAN BILLIARD TABLES
WITH PHELAN'S LATEST IMPROVED CUSHIONS.

These Tables have just been adopted by all the leading Professional as well as Amateur Players in the East—over Six Hundred having been sold to private families alone in the last nine months.

BILLIARD BALLS AND TRIMMINGS

Of all kinds on hand Orders for Repairing of Tables, and everything in connection with the business, promptly attended to, at the Office, 724 and 726 Montgomery street, opposite the Metropolitan Theatre.
my28 M. E. HUGHES, Sole Agent.

REDINGTON & CO.'S ESSENCE OF Jamaica Ginger!

This valuable compound, which is now regarded as one of the most popular remedies in the domestic practice for various complaints of the digestive organs, such as Dyspepsia, Nausea, etc., is prepared solely from the WHITE JAMAICA GINGER, which is the best of all the varieties in use. In the preparation of

REDINGTON & CO.'S

ESSENCE OF JAMAICA GINGER,

Great care is taken to have none but select Root, and to manufacture it in air-tight vessels, thus preventing the evaporation of its delicate essential oil, and preserving the true aroma of the Ginger. It thereby contains in its concentrated form all the valuable properties of the Jamaica Ginger, and is guaranteed to be free from any impurities whatever

It is a grateful stimulant and carminative, giving warmth and tone to the stomach equal to Brandy, without any of its injurious effects.

It will cure Nausea, caused by riding in railroad cars, or from sea-sickness, or other causes.

Miners and others who are exposed to the heat of the Sun often whilst working in cold water, should never be without

REDINGTON & CO.'s

ESSENCE OF JAMAICA GINGER,

As by taking it as a tonic two or three times a day, it is almost a sure preventive to Chills and Fever; and to those who are farming the rich bottom lands of California it is likewise invaluable as a tonic, and should invariably be taken in the early morning before going to the fields, at the mid-day lunch, and before leaving off work at night.

Ask for REDINGTON & CO.'S ESSENCE OF JAMAICA GINGER, and take no other, if you would always have a Pure and Reliable article.

An excellent external application for Gout, Rheumatism, Neuralgia, &c.

REDINGTON & CO., Proprietors,
416 and 418 Front street,
my28 San Francisco.

RAREY'S CONDITION POWDERS.

THE MOST POWERFUL AND BENEFICIAL AGENT known on the Stomach, Blood, Lungs and Bowels of

HORSES, MULES, CATTLE, AND STOCK

of all descriptions.

GREAT BENEFIT TO HARD-WORKING HORSES.

All diseased Stock SPEEDILY and CERTAINLY CURED; healthy Stock will be brought into the very HIGHEST STATE of PERFECTION by giving them a SPOONFULL, weekly.

NO LIVERY STABLE SHOULD BE WITHOUT

RAREY'S

CELEBRATED CONDITION POWDERS!

All FARMERS and RANCHMEN should use constantly

RAREY'S

CELEBRATED CONDITION POWDERS!

TEAMSTERS and STAGE COMPANIES everywhere should keep constantly on hand and freely use

RAREY'S

CELEBRATED CONDITION POWDERS!

They are equal to a Life Insurance on all Stock, as will be fully appreciated on trial by all True Economists.

REDINGTON & CO., Sole Agents,
my28 416 and 418 Front Street, San Francisco.

STOP THAT COUGHING.

Some of you can't and we pity you. You have tried every remedy but the ONE destined by its intrinsic merit to supercede all similar preparations. It is not surprising you should be reluctant to try something else after the many experiments you have made of the trashy compounds foisted on the public as a certain cure; but

NEWELL'S PULMONARY SYRUP.

It is really the best remedy ever compounded, for the cure of coughs, colds, sore throat, asthma, whooping cough, bronchitis, and consumption. Thousands of people in California have been already benefitted by the surprising curative powers of

NEWELL'S PULMONARY SYRUP,

And with one accord give it their unqualified approbation. We now address ourselves to all who are unacquainted with this, the greatest panacea of the age, for the healing of all diseases of the throat and lungs, assuring you that

NEWELL'S PULMONARY SYRUP

Has cured thousands, and it will cure you if you try it.

This invaluable medicine is pleasant to the taste; soothing, healing and strengthening in its effects; entirely free from all poisonous or deleterious drugs, and perfectly harmless under all circumstances. Among others it is indorsed by the following gentlemen, all of them well-known in San Francisco as respectable citizens: E. S. WOOLEY, grocer, 358 Stockton street; H. P. HUBBARD, merchant, Sansome street near Clay; Capt. DAVID VAN PELT; JAMES PRATT, at Harrison & Co., printers, Clay street, and hundreds of other residents in San Francisco.

REDINGTON & CO., Sole Agents, 416 and 418 Front street, San Francisco, and for sale by all Druggists. my28

PACIFIC MAIL STEAMSHIP COMPANY.

The following Steamships will be dispatched in the month of JUNE, 1864:

June 13—CONSTITUTION, J. T. Watkins, Commander.
June 23—GOLDEN AGE, W. F. Lapidge, Commander.

From Folsom-street Wharf, at nine o'clock A. M., punctually,

FOR PANAMA

Passengers will be conveyed from Panama to Aspinwall by the PANAMA RAILROAD COMPANY, and from Aspinwall to New York by the ATLANTIC AND PACIFIC STEAMSHIP COMPANY.

A. B. FORBES, Agent P. M. S. Co.,
my28 Cor. Sacramento and Leidesdorff sts.

FORTY-FOUR FIRST PREMIUMS IN 1863!

THERE IS BUT ONE

FIRST

PREMIUM SEWING MACHINE.

The GROVER & BAKER SEWING MACHINE has been awarded Twenty-three First Premiums at State Fairs, and Twenty-one at City and County Fairs, in 1863, making Forty-four in all.

R. G. BROWN, Agent.
my28 329 Montgomery Street.

WHEELER & WILSONS Family Sewing Machines.

OFFICE:

CORNER MONTGOMERY AND SACRAMENTO STREETS.

J. H. HAYDEN, Agent.

A full assortment of the best quality of MACHINE SILK and THREAD, for the TRADE, constantly on hand. my28

WHAT IS A CABINET ORGAN?

A NEW REED INSTRUMENT,

Made by

MASON & HAMLIN,

The famous Melodeon Manufacturers.

ASK

GOTTSCHALK,

MASON,

STRAKOSCH

Or any other eminent Musician.

They know what it is, having publicly acknowledged it to be the best instrument of the kind in the World.

Send for an Illustrated Catalogue,

To

A. KOHLER,

Music Dealer,

my28 San Francisco.

A. ROMAN & CO., BOOKSELLERS,

PUBLISHERS, IMPORTERS, Nos. 417 and 418 Montgomery street, desire to invite the special attention of the BOOK TRADE on the Pacific Coast to their superb and complete assortment of STANDARD AND MISCELLANEOUS BOOKS, embracing works in every department of Literature; also Medical, Military, Scientific, Theological and School Books of every description. Constantly in receipt of all the late publications by every steamer. Special inducements offered to LIBRARIES. All orders will be promptly filled, and upon the most reasonable terms—wholesale and retail.

A. ROMAN & CO.,
my28 San Francisco.

"KUSTEL'S PROCESSES OF SILVER AND GOLD EXTRACTION."

—The January number of the "American Journal of Science and Arts" conducted by Professors Silliman and Dana—probably the best Scientific authority in our country—says of this valuable work: "The book is written and arranged with from by one who evidently understands his subject; and care, our examination of it, we should think it to be well adapted for the purpose for which it has been prepared."

Price—post paid—Cloth, $6; Sheep, $7.

A. ROMAN & Co.,
Booksellers, Importers and Publishers,
417 and 419 Montgomery street,
my28 San Francisco.

JONES, WOOLL & SUTHERLAND,

Manufacturers for the Trade

OF

SQUARE, OVAL AND ARCH-TOP MIRRORS, WINDOW CORNICES, AND PIER TABLES,

Of any Size or Pattern.

PORTRAIT AND PICTURE FRAMES

Of all Styles.

IMPORTERS OF

Fine Engravings and Artists' Materials.

312 MONTGOMERY STREET.

FACTORY—Market street, between Seventh and Eighth, opposite Yerba Buena Park. my28

LAWRENCE & HOUSEWORTH,

OPTICIANS,

IMPORTERS OF OPTICAL, MATHEMATICAL AND PHILOSOPHICAL INSTRUMENTS,

STEREOSCOPIC GOODS,

PHOTOGRAPHIC ALBUMS,

CARTES DE VISITE,

AND

JOSEPH RODGERS & SON'S

SUPERIOR CUTLERY,

No. 637 CLAY STREET,

SAN FRANCISCO,

(ESTABLISHED IN 1851,)

HAVE FOR SALE THE LARGEST STOCK ON THE PACIFIC COAST, consisting in part as follows:

720 dozen SPECTACLES, in Gold, Silver, Steel and Plated Frames.
305 dozen EYE GLASSES, in Gold, Silver, Steel, Horn, Shell and Rubber Frames.
150 dozen WIRE GAUZE GOGGLES.
300 dozen SPECTACLE GLASSES and BRAZILIAN PEBBLES.
350 dozen SPECTACLE and EYE GLASS CASES.

395 Opera and Marine Glasses.
75 Telescope and Spy Glasses,
178 dozen Magnifying Glasses,
80 doz. Pocket Compasses,
325 Hand Stereoscopes,
74 Revolving Stereoscopes
1025 doz. Stereoscopic Views
Drawing Instruments in German Silver and Brass,
Boxwood and Ivory Scales,
Microscopes in every Style,
25 Magnetic Machines for Medical purposes,
Aneroid Barometers,
20,500 Card Photographs,
Photographic Albums,
600 Album Pictures—in oil colors,
50 doz. Union Card Frames,
Joseph Rodgers & Son's CUTLERY,
100 doz. Table Knives,
260 doz. Pocket Knives,
120 doz. Razors,
50 doz. Razor Strops,
130 doz. Scissors,
SCISSORS, in Cases,
100 doz. Gyroscope Tops,
169 doz. Thermometers,
25 doz. Hydrometers,
Galvanic Batteries.

☞COUNTRY TRADERS will consult their own interest by examining our Stock and Prices before purchasing elsewhere.

 ORDERS FROM THE COUNTRY promptly executed.
☞CATALOGUES sent to any address FREE.
Address

LAWRENCE & HOUSEWORTH,
OPTICIANS,
637 CLAY STREET,
my28 SAN FRANCISCO.

PACIFIC INSURANCE COMPANY.

436 CALIFORNIA STREET,

SAN FRANCISCO.

Insure against loss or damage by fire, on Buildings, Merchandise, Wares, and other Personal Property.

CAPITAL STOCK - - - - - - - - $750,000

The largest sum at present to be taken on any one risk is $30,000. All Losses payable in United States Gold Coin.

The Personal Liability of Stockholders, under the Law of this State, recognized.

The following List of Directors is a sufficient guarantee of the stability and responsibility of the Company:

Louis McLean,
W. C. Ralston,
Frederick Billings,
H. Carlton, Jr.,
Wm. M. Lent,
J. G. Kittle,
J. B. Thomas,
J. G. Bray,
Asa T. Lawton,
J. Whitney, Jr.,
Edward Martin,
L. B. Benchly,
A. Seligman,
Wm. Sherman,
Wm. Alverd,
Charles Mayne,
Erwin Davis,
P. L. Weaver,
Samuel C. Bigelow,
Herman Michels,
H. L Dodge,
H L. Goldstein,
H. Hanssmann,
Morton Cheesman,
H. M. Newhall,
W. Norris,
Edgar Mills, Sacramento.
C. T. Wheeler, Sacramento.
J. H Jewett, Marysville.
J. C. Ainsworth, Portland (O.)
Lloyd Tevis,
H. F. Teschemacher,
Geo. H Howard,
A.B. Forbes,
A. L. Tubbs,
Jonathan Hunt,
J. B. Newton,
John O. Earl,
S. J. Hensley,
John Wightman,
L. Sachs,
Jas. DeFremery,
J. G. Kellegg,
G. W. Beaver,
Elie Lazard,
William Sharon,
Adam Grant,
Alphens Bull,
A. G. Stiles,
M. P. Jones,
D. Stern,
S. M. Wilson,
D. J. Oliver,
Jabez Howes,
F. W. Brooks,
I. Lohman, Sacramento.
T. R Anthony, Stockton.
D. W. C. Rice, Marysville.
W. S. Ladd, Portland (O.)

J. HUNT, President.
A. J. RALSTON, Secretary. my28

BOYS! BOYS! BOYS!

NOW IS THE TIME!

H. M. LOCKWOOD & CO.,

New No. 624) CLAY STREET, (Old No. 176

Have received a Large Stock of

GENTS' AND BOYS' CLOTHING

—AND—

FURNISHING GOODS,

Which they are selling

AT VERY LOW PRICES.

Every Garment warranted. All are invited to call and examine our goods.

H. M. LOCKWOOD & CO.,
my28 624 Clay street, San Francisco.

GREAT TRIUMPH!!

STEINWAY & SONS

Were awarded the FIRST PRIZE MEDAL at the late great INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITION AT LONDON, over the two hundred and sixty-nine Pianos entered for competition from all parts of the world.

The Special Correspondent of the New York Times says: "Messrs. Steinway & Sons' indorsement by the Jurors is emphatic, and stronger and more to the point than that of any European maker."

A constant supply of the above superior instruments can be found at the Agent's,

M. GRAY, 613 Clay street.

PIANO TUNING done by a first-class Workman, from Steinway & Son's Factory, New York. my28

CARPETS, OIL CLOTHS,

UPHOLSTERY GOODS,

PAPER HANGINGS.

THE LARGEST

—AND—

BEST ASSORTED STOCK IN THE STATE,

And everything to be found in a well-conducted

Carpet Warehouse,

For Sale at the Lowest Rates.

WM. M. HIXON'S

CARPET WAREHOUSE,

NOS. 606 AND 608 CLAY STREET.

One Door above Montgomery street. my28

FEET! FEET! FEET!

Listen all ye that deal in feet and are barefooted:

GOOD TIMES COME AT LAST!

No Assessments to Pay, but Dividends Secured at Once!

FOR SIXTY DAYS

We will dispose of our IMMENSE STOCK

AT UNPRECEDENTED LOW PRICES.

We have in store and arriving, upwards of

$150,000 WORTH

OF

BOOTS, SHOES AND GAITERS,

Which we are determined to give the public, and all our customers, for cash,

25 PER CENT. BELOW NEW YORK COST.

5,000 PAIRS LADIES' BUTTON, LACE AND CONGRESS GAITERS,

Suitable for House Shoes, Regardless of any Cost,

ON ACCOUNT OF HIGH PREMIUM ON GOLD.

We solicit a call to convince, then send along your friends, to the largest RETAIL SHOE STORE in the State.

HOLCOMBE BROTHERS,

PIONEER SHOE STORE,

Corner Washington and Kearny streets.

my28

WM. SHEW'S PHOTOGRAPHIC GALLERY!

☞IS NOT REMOVED!☜

As many persons have erroneously supposed, but remains at the same place where it has been all the time for the last eight years,

NO. 423 MONTGOMERY STREET,

And is the best place in the world to obtain a good likeness and a durable picture. my28

REMOVAL.

J. K. PRIOR,

Importer and Dealer in

GAS FIXTURES AND PLUMBING MATERIALS,

Has removed to 730 MONTGOMERY STREET, near Jackson, opposite Metropolitan Theatre. Just received, an extensive assortment of plain and ornamental Gas Fixtures, of entire new patterns. Being constantly in receipt of new goods by every steamer, the attention of the public is invited.

FOR SALE:

IRON PIPE, | LEAD PIPE,
SHEET LEAD, | SHEET ZINC,

As low as any importing house in the State. my28

DINNER SETS.—We have just received,

ex Giscours, several extremely fine

FRENCH CHINA DINNER SETS,

WITH TEA SET, COMPLETE.

A SUPERIOR ARTICLE to anything ever offered in this market.

Connoisseurs will find great pleasure in examining our stock of VERY RARE CHINA, and

ELEGANT GLASS SETS,

FRENCH BRONZE STATUARY,

Comprising some very fine pieces.

PARIAN STATUARY, ELEGANT VASES, ETC., ETC.

HAYNES & LAWTON,

516 and 518 Sansome street, corner Merchant,
my28 San Francisco.

SQUARZA'S PUNCH.—First Premium,

Sacramento, 1862.

First Premium at San Francisco District Fair, 1863.

First Special Premium, Sacramento, 1863.

Wholesale and Retail.

my28 44 Leidesdorff street, San Francisco.

EDWARD BOSQUI & CO.,

517

CLAY STREET, SAN FRANCISCO.

BOOKBINDERS, PAPER-RULERS, AND

ACCOUNT-BOOK MANUFACTURERS.

Blanks of all kinds printed and ruled to any desired pattern. my28

"THE CALIFORNIAN."

WHAT THE PRESS SAYS OF IT.

Of the many noticee received since our last iseue, the following, owing to the preeeure on our advertising colnmns, are all we have room to publish:

THE CALIFORNIAN.—This is the title of the new literary hebdomedal which made ite appearance in San Francieco last Saturday. It ie edited hy C. H. Webb, formerly of the Bulletin, a gentleman of rare scholarly attaiuments and ripe judgment in conducting a newspaper. The journal is beautifully gotten up after the Englieh style of literary papers, and ie by far the handsomeet journal of its character on the Pacific coast. The people of Califonia are in need of just snch a paper ae the CALIFORNIAN appears to he, and if the publisher will eend us hie journal in exchange for ours we will wish him the succese he merite.—Napa County Reporter, June 4th.

We have received from Bradshaw the first number of THE CALIFORNIAN, a literary weekly published by C. H. Webb, the "Inigo" of the Golden Era. It is neat and plain in typography, and gives evidence of the heet of editorial talent.—Placerville Weekly News.

THE CALIFORNIAN ie the name of a new weekly literary paper which ie to make ite débût in San Francisco to-day. C. H. Webb is editor and proprietor. Mr. Webb is a gentleman of education, fine fancy, and sound common sense. If he has the tact to manage the husiness affairs of his journal properly, it is eure to eucceed, for in other respects he will have no rival.—Stockton Independent, June 3d.

THE CALIFORNIAN.—This is the title of a new candidate for literary honors, the first number of which appeared on Saturday. It is published weekly in San Francisco, hy C. H. Webb, a gentleman who has obtained eome celebrity as a writer. As a specimen of heautiful typography the CALIFORNIAN is unexcelled. It is in octavo form, and therefore convenient for binding, and we conclnde the editor will endeavor to make ite contents sufficiently valuable for preservation.—Territorial Enterprise, June 3d.

THE CALIFORNIAN.—This is the name of a new literary weekly published at San Francisco, the firet number of which has reached us. The hest compliment we can give our new cotemporary is that if it holds up to the standard of its specimen number, it ie hound to he a success. It is substantial.—Gold Hill Daily News.

THE CALIFORNIAN.

A PAPER FOR THE TIMES.

Devoted to Live Topics,

AND THE

BEST INTERESTS OF CALIFORNIA.

Is published

EVERY SATURDAY MORNING,

AT

728 MONTGOMERY STREET.

Nothing will he spared that will enable THE CALIFORNIAN to appeal to the Puhlic for support, not only as the

BEST JOURNAL ON THE PACIFIC COAST,

But also as being

THE EQUAL OF ANY ON THIS CONTINENT!

Imperial paper, of a quality and weight never before brought to this market, is ordered from the East

EXPRESSLY FOR THE CALIFORNIAN,

And will arrive here as soon as it can he hronght hy fsthmue transportation.

THE BEST TALENT OF THE STATE

Is empleyed upon the CALIFORNIAN, and arrangements have heen made with contrihutors nbroad fer

EASTERN AND FOREIGN CORRESPONDENCE.

THE TERMS OF THE CALIFORNIAN are $5 per year hy mail to subscrihers, invariably in advance; 50 cents per month, served hy carriers.

All communications and correspondence muet he addressed to

C. H. WEBB,
Editor and Proprietor CALIFORNIAN,
728 Montgomery street.

"OLD THINGS PASS AWAY."—The advent of the Florence dates a new era in sewing mechnnism. To purchase any of the old contrivances for sewing, since the introduction of this "Ne Plus Ultra" of Machiaes, would he as unwise as for a lady with her needle and thread to attempt to stitch a race with the imperfect sewiag machiaes formerly nsed. We know positively that Mr. Hill, agent for the Florence, (office, 111 Montgomery street,) has, up to this time, heen nnable to supply the demaad for these admirahle Sewiag Machiaes, showing conclusively thnt the public fully nppreciate their many advantages. jn11

WANTED—The Dashaway Employment Office, 513 Kearney street, near California, caa supply families, hotels, restaurants, farmers, ships, steamers and coasters with every description of male and female help, free of charge. Orders from the couatry for women must be accompanied with their passage money, as hundreds of poor girls are nnable to pay their own passage. Orders promptly filled at the Dashaway Employmeat Office. jul1

R. G. SNEATH,

408 FRONT STREET, SAN FRANCISCO,

Importer and Wholesale Dealer in

GROCERIES, PROVISIONS, FLOUR, RICE,

TOBACCOS, LIQUORS, ETC.

Branch House, - - SNEATH & BOARMAN, - - Red Bluff.

Forwarding Agent, D. W. EARL, Sacramento, who will receive and fill orders for all kinds of Goods oa my account, and keep a large stock of Flour, Barley, Potatoes, Ground Feed, etc., etc. No charge for forwardiug.

ALMADEN QUICKSILVER!

Orders for Goods not in my line furnished customere without extra charge. Orders for Goods in the Eastern markets attended to promptly. Daily Prices Current furnished when desired.

Orders respectfully solicited. jul1 1m

MAGUIRE'S OPERA HOUSE.

T. MAGUIRE - - - - - - - PROPRIETOR.
C. L. GRAVES - - - - - - STAGE MANAGER.
W. STEVENSON - - - - - - TREASURER.

AFTERNOON PERFORMANCE TO-DAY,

FOR LADIES AND CHILDREN,

At HALF PRICES,

Commencing at 2 o'clock,

JOHN BROUGHAM'S NEW COMEDY

OF

PLAYING WITH FIRE!

Cast with the full strength of the DRAMATIC COMPANY.

Operatic Season!

SATURDAY EVENING, - - - - JUNE 11TH,

Verdi's grand Opera of

LA TRAVIATA,

MISS CAROLINE RICHINGS,

As "Violetta;" and

SIGNOR BIANCHI,

As "Alfredo Germont;" assisted by

Mr. JOHN GREGG,

Mons. CHARLES,

Sig. RONCOVIERI,

Aad the Italian opera choruses, and MLLE. C. ACOSTA aad MONS H. WIETHOFF, in Ballet.

SUNDAY EVENING,

LUCREZIA BORGIA,

In preparation, the operatic spectacle of

SATANELLA.

PRICES OF ADMISSION:—Dress Circle aad Orchestra Seats $1; Parquet $1; Gallery 50c; Reserved seats, extra 50c. Private Boxes, $10 aud $5.

Doors open at 7 o'clock. Performances will commence at a quarter before 8.

WILSON & ZOYARA'S

Great Circus!

THIS MAMMOTH NEW HIPPOTHEATRON

Will exhibit throughout

THE INTERIOR OF THE STATE

During the preseat season.

Performaaces will he givea during the coming week nt the towns in the

SAN JOSE AND CONTRA COSTA VALLEYS.

THE NEW AND SPLENDID COMPANY, brought by Mr. Wilson from New York and Havaaa at immense cost, have a world-wide reputatioa, eaabling the manageaeat to produce all the ELEGANT, SENSATIONAL, THRILLING, COMIC, nad ENTERTAINING NOVELTIES OF THE DAY. At the head of the Equestrian Department ie the world-renowned

ELLA ZOYARA,

MLLE. ELOUISE,

And a nnmber of elegant and daring Riders, whilst

MESSRS. ROSS AND CARLO
Head the Acrobatic Corps;
MESSRS. DURAND AND PAINTER
The Gymnastic;
MESSRS. AYMAR AND WILLIAMS
The Comic Departmeat.

The Ring is under the supervision of MR VINCENT; with TRAINED and PERFORMING HORSES, PONIES and MULES—being the most complete Company that has ever appeared in the State.

KIDD'S CELEBRATED BRASS BAND accompanies the entertainment. WILSON & ZOYARA, Proprietors.

GILBERT'S MUSEUM,

Market street, opposite Second street, over the Occidental Market.

F. GILBERT - - - - - - - - Proprietor
J. M. HUDSON - - - - - - - Superintendent

OPEN EVERY DAY AND EVENING.

THE LIGHTNING CALCULATOR!

THE GIANT BOY,

Eighteen yoare old, and eight feet in Height!

THE MUSICAL ANOMALY, THE TYROLEAN WARBLER,

Whose remarkable skill in performing upon THREE WIND INSTRUMENTS AT ONCE, and whose wonderful coaversion of a commoa COFFEE POT into a fountain of harmony, have astouaded all who have seen him.

THE GREAT CHROPLASTIC

GROUP OF LIFE-LIKE FIGURES.

THE LITTLE NORTH CAROLINA SLAVE,

The emallest woman in the world,

And upwards of two thousand Curiosities.

Also, a heaatiful set of Cosmoramic Views, illnstrating the PRINCIPAL CITIES OF AMERICA. There is also an Aquaria Garden attached to the Museum.

The admission to the eatire Exhibition le only 25 cents; Childreu 15 cents. jul1-tf

PERSONAL TAX ASSESSMENT ROLL

OF SAN FRANCISCO—1864-65.

PUBLIC NOTICE IS HEREBY GIVEN, in accordnnce with Section 1 of an Act eatitled "An Act to provide for the collection of the Taxes oa Personal Property in the City aad County of San Francisco," approved May 9th, 1862, that the Persoual Assessment List hae heen completed aad delivered over to me as Clerk of the Board of Supervisore; aad thnt the said Board will meet as a Board of Equalizatioa on this the SIXTH DAY OF JUNE, at twelve o'clock nooa, and continue in session from time to timo uatil the 20th day of June, 1864, for the purpose of determining complaiats in regard to errore of Assessment of Personal Property and correcting errors therein.

Tho Assessment List will be open for examination in my office from this date, from 9 o'clock A. M. until 4 o'clock P. M., daily, (Suudays excopted,) durlug the sitting of the Board of Equalization.

All applicatioas for reduction of assessments are required to he made in writing and verified hy oath.

JAMES W. BINGHAM,
Clerk of the Board of Supervisors.

San Francisco, June 6, 1864 jul1 1t

HEALTH

—AND—

AMUSEMENT,

Combined!

C. J. ROBINSON'S SELECT CLASSES,

In Dr. Dio Lewis's System of

LIGHT GYMNASTICS!

At MISS ALDRICH'S ACADEMY, Stevenson street,

Near corner of Market and Second streets, San Francisco,

For Scientific Physical Training and Recreative Exercise, in classes, by persons of all ages and conditions of health, and by both sexes, with light and movable apparatus, and an invariable and appropriate musical accompaniment; while the Exercises of the Light Gymnastics impart strength, grace, activity and symmetry to the person, they nt the same time furnish an exhaustless fund of social enjoyment and mental recreation.

PROF. ROBINSON has recently heen employed to teach this system in all the public schools of this city.

CLASSES FOR LADIES AND GENTLEMEN meet on Mondays and Thursdays at 8 P. M. For Ladies, Lads and Misses, on Tuesdays and Fridays at 4 P. M. For admission or further information, apply at the Academy.

PROF. ROBINSON will give instructiou, on applicatioa, to classes aad private pupils, in VOCAL CULTURE and ELOCUTION, as taught by the best masters in the East.

jn11-1m

CALISTOGA SPRINGS,

NAPA VALLEY,

The great watering place of the Pacific, not excelled in Europe or America.

BATHS OF EVERY DESCRIPTION,

GRAND HOT MINERAL SWIMMING BATH,

STEAM BATH,

From the Natural Springs—a sure cure for the Rheumatism, Gout, Sore Eyes, and Pulmenary Complaints, helag impregnated with Sulphur, Iron and Magnesia.

CELEBRATED HOT MUD BATH,

The same as used by the Romans in Italy two thousand years ago.

An elegant TROTTING PARK, one mile in length.

The best TROUT FISHING and SHOOTING within one mile.

Seven hours from San Francisco, hy Steamboat and Stage, four hours hy hoat and three hours by stage—starting at 9 o'clock every morning. Fare hy steamer and stage, five dollars.

Thirty miles from the Geysers, etages running every day.

Telegraph line connecting with nll parts of the State.

 No finer public accommodations on the contiaent.

jul1-1m F. B. GILMORE, Landlord.

REOPENED FOR THE SEASON.

THE CRYSTAL SPRINGS HOTEL,

Situated four miles from the San Mateo Railroad depot, in a most spleadid valley, surrouaded with large, heautiful, natural trees, is now open for the public. The road from San Mateo to the house has heea recently macadamized, making it the finest drive in California. The House and Cottages have been refitted aad thoroughly renovated. New spring heds aad every modern improvement have been added to the sleeping department. The larder, as usual, contains all the delicacies of the season. Stages leave San Mateo depot on the arrival of the trains for Crystal Springs.

A fine stable is now opened at San Mateo hy Messrs. Byrnes & Ames, who will furnish horses and carrisges, or saddle horses, at few rates, to the public. Parties wishing rooms or meals, on arrival, can engage them hy telegraph, via San Mateo.

jul1-tf TONY OAKES, Proprietor.

McRUER & MERRILL,

WHOLESALE AUCTION HOUSE,

204 and 206 California street.

Regular Sale Days - - - WEDNESDAYS and SATURDAYS.
(Advances on Consignments.)

NOTICE!

From this dsto Mr. A. P. EVERETT has an interest in our business. McRUER & MERRILL.

San Fraucisco, October 20, 1862.

A. P. EVERETT, - - - - - - - - - Auctioneer.

jul1-3m

DISSOLUTION OF COPARTNERSHIP

The Copartnership heretofore existiag under the name and style of H. WEBSTER & CO., have been dissolved hy mutual consent.

H. WEBSTER,
A. D. NUDD,
S. L. STANLEY,
C. S. LORD.

NUDD, STANLEY & CO.,

Importere and Wholesale

LIQUOR MERCHANTS,

No. 410 FRONT STREET,

Successors to

H. WEBSTER & CO.,

Hnviag purchased the entire interest of H. Webster, in the house of H. WEBSTER & Co., the nadersigned will continue the business under the name and style.

ASA D. NUDD,
SAM'L L. STANLEY,
CHAS. S. LORD.

San Francisco, June 1st, 1864. je4

BOARD OF EQUALIZATION.

PUBLIC NOTICE IS HEREBY GIVEN, thnt Supervisors WM. C. HINCKLEY, MONROE ASHBURY, and MICHAEL CODY, a Committee of the Board of Equalization for the correction of errors in Assessment upon Personal Property for the fiscal year 1864-65, will meet in the Chambers of the Board of Supervisors daily, (Suadays excepted,) from 12 M. to 3 o'clock P. M., until WEDNESDAY, 15th last., for the consideration of such applicatioas as may be brought before them. Sworn statements are required hy law. The Roll will be open for public examination from 9 o'clock A. M. to 4 o'clock P. M. By order of the Committee,

JAS. W. BINGHAM, Clerk.

San Francisco, June 6, 1864. jul1-1t

REMOVAL.—DR. H. J. PAINE,

DENTIST,

No. 522 CALIFORNIA STREET,

Room No. 19, Second Floor,

BETWEEN MONTGOMERY AND KEARNY STREETS,

Four doors west of Wells, Fargo & Co.,

je4 San Francisco.

OPPOSITION STEAMER DAY.

JUNE 23D.

THE OPPOSITION STEAMSHIP

MOSES TAYLOR,

J. L. BLETHEN - - - - - - - Commander,

Will he dispatched for Panama,

ON THURSDAY - - - - - - JUNE 23D,

From Mission street Wharf, at 9 o'clock, A. M.,

Connecting at Aspinwall, via Panama Railroad, with the magnificent new Steamship

GOLDEN RULE,

3,500 TONS, FOR NEW YORK.

☞ The GOLDEN RULE is the largest, fastest, and and most elegant steamship on the Atlantic Ocean.

For luformation or passage, apply to

I. K. ROBERTS, Agent,
Northwest corner Battery aad Pine streets,
je4 Up stairs, San Francisco.

AUSTIN & SCHMITT, Importers and

Dealers in

FRENCH, ENGLISH AND DOMESTIC DRY GOODS,

Offer for sale the best assortment of the above goode to he found in the city, consisting in part of

SILKS,
SHAWLS,
MANTILLAS,
LACES,
DRESS GOODS,

Of every description. Best quality of

MOURNING GOODS,
HOSIERY,
EMBROIDERIES,

Together with a complete assortment of

HOUSEKEEPING GOODS.

247 Montgomery street,
Between Sacramento and California streets.

SAN FRANCISCO AND SAN JOSE

RAILROAD.

CHANGE OF TIME.

On and after MARCH 1st, 1864, Traiae will leave the Depot on Brannan street, between Third and Fourth, for San Jose and Way Stations, as follows:

Leave San Francisco at 8 A. M. and 4:30 P. M.
Leave San Jose at 7:30 A. M. and 4 P. M.

SUNDAYS.

On Sundays, Three Trains will he run, as follows:

Leave San Francisco at 8 1-2 and 10 1-2 A. M., and 4 1-2 P. M.
Leave San Jose at 8 A. M. aad 4 and 7 P. M.

Passengers caa reach the Depot hy either the Third or Fourth street liaes of city cars.

A. H. HOUSTON,
my28 General Superintendent.

MARKET STREET RAILROAD.

CHANGE OF TIME TABLE.

ON AND AFTER APRIL 1, 1864, Trains will start from the City and the Missiou as follows:

Between the houre of 8:30 A. M. nnd 6 P. M., every 40 minutes, instead of, as heretofore, every 30 minutes, thus:

FROM THE MISSION.
9:40	10:20	11:00	11:40
FROM THE CITY.
10:00	10:40	11:20	12:00

And so on till 6 o'clock.

Before 9 A. M. and after 6 P. M., the running will be the same as before.

my28 F. McCOPPIN, Superintendent.

IN THE COUNTY COURT OF THE CITY and County of San Francisco, State of California. In the matter of the Petition of JOHN ZEIS, an insolvent debtor.

Pursuant to an order of the Hon. Samuel Cowles, Judge of the said County Court, notice is hereby given to all the creditors of the said insolvent, Joha Zeis, to be and nppear before the Hon. Samuel Cowles, Judge as aforesaid, in open Court, at the Court Room of said Court, in the City Hall, in the City nnd County of San Francisco, on Monday the 11th day of June, A. D. 1864, at 10 o'clock A. M. of that day, then and there to show cause, if any they can, why the prayer of said insolvent should not he granted, and an assigament of his Estate be made, nnd he ho discharged from his debts and liabilities, in pursuance of the statute in such case made and provided; and in the mean time all proceedings against said insolvent he stayed.

Witness my hnad and the seal of said Court, this eighth day of June, A. D. 1864. WM. LOEWY, Clerk.

By J. NARHTALY, Deputy Clerk.

(Seal aad Internal Revenue Stamp.)
Stanley and Hayes, Attorneys for petitioner.
jul1-4w

PILES! PILES!! PILES!!!

Not pilee of Gold nor yet of Silver so much coveted hy all men, but tho bleediag, blind, or external Piles can he easily and speedily cured hy the use of

WOOD'S SUB-POSITORY.

It is a preparation totally distinct from anything heretofore offered as a remedy for this painful and often fatal complaint. Tho Sub-Pository is neither a pill, powder, wash or salve, nnd yet it has proved to he a certain remedy for the Piles. Do not doubt this assertion, nor delay testing the truth of it if you are troubled with the Piles—you will not be deceived in it.

Sold wholesale aad retail hy W. NEWELL, jul1 No. 530 Merchant street.

THE UNIVERSAL CLOTHES

WRINGER!

☞ WITH COG WHEELS. ☜

BUY NO OTHER!

This Wringer is warrnated in every particular. It was pronounced superior to all others at the World's Fair at London, in 1862, aad has always taken the First Premium nt every State and County Fair, when exhibited in competition with other machines.

No other Wringer has the cog-wheel, without which the rubber on the rolls will get torn, and the strain on the cloth is such as to wear it out.

A liberal discount made to dealers.

WM. FAULKNER & SONS, Agents,
je4 411 Clay street, San Francisco

The California.

"SURELY THERE IS A VEIN FOR THE SILVER AND A PLACE FOR GOLD WHERE THEY FINE IT."

VOL. I.--NO. 4. SAN FRANCISCO, JUNE 18, 1864. TERMS { $5 a Year, by Mail, in Advance. 50 Cents a Month, by Carrier.

CONTENTS:

ORIGINAL ARTICLES:
- Things—by Inigo.
- Women's Boots.
- The Sanitary Commission.
- Anecdotes.
- Wurds of Greetin'. } Poetry.
- First Born. }

SELECTED SKETCHES, STORIES, etc.
- Mary Stuart and Chastelar.
- After the War—What Then!
- Notre Dame de Paris.
- George Sand's "Marquis of Villemar."
- How Books should be Written.
- What it Costs to Dress a Lady.
- Fight with an Eagle.

EDITORIALS:
- The Union State Central Committee and Congressional Nominations.
- What Capital can Do.
- Financial affairs, Stocks, etc.

MISCELLANEOUS PARAGRAPHS:
- Interesting Items from Exchanges.

STORIES OF THE SUPERNATURAL:
- The Ghostly Rider of Hardwick Hall.
- The Fakeer who was buried alive at Lahore.

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS:
- Minor Topics as They suggest Themselves.

BRIEF MENTION:
- The News of the Day at Home and Abroad, in Nutshells.

MINING MENTION:
- News from the Mining Districts, in Brief.

WAR MENTION:
- The Telegraphic News of the Week condensed.

DRAMATIC AND MUSICAL:
- A review of the Drama and Lyric Stage.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

FIRST-BORN.

I.

A stillness of death all around—
A hush in the sea and the sky:
The damp of the dew on the ground;
The vapors all dark, in a mound
Do lie,
Where the day did burn out in the west,
When the great, kingly sun had gone by,
Goldeu crowned—
When the great, kingly sun had gone hy
To his rest,
Deep down in the Ocean's breast.

II.

And what does it mean that so pale
Is the delicate blue on high?
And what can it mean, what can ail
The beautiful heaven to fail
And lie
In a pallor of pain aud affright?
Ah! a flickeriug flame I espy—
Siug it, Hail!
Now a flickering flame I espy
With delight—
Lo! a star is born of the night!

MARY STUART AND CHASTELAR.

IN TWO PARTS.

PART ONE.

The peerless Mary Stuart was still in her blooming teens when, by the death of her young husband, Francis II., bereft alike of wedded love and regal supremacy in the "land of the lilies," aud abandoned wholly to her sorrows, she reluctantly quitted that fair France she loved so well, to seek once more in doubt and danger tho rugged shores of her native realm.

Admiration for for the *Reine Blanche was at that time not confined to France and Scotland; it was European. Can an impulse so universal be wondered at when we gaze on her portraits? All about her yielded to the resistless charm of that beautiful face and form, which only to look on was to love. Cotemporary poets might aptly say that "the loveliest rose of Scotia bloomed on the topmost branch." Ronsard and Du Bellay called her the tenth Muse. Yet, after all the rhapsodies of the poets, she was rather worshipped as a real woman, endowed with infinite perfections, than as a mythical ideal—and that with a devotion as touching as it was chivalrous in its hopeless generosity.

Unhappily, the favor of the lovely Stuart was as signally disastrous to those upon whom it lighted as her own "fatal gift of beauty" proved to herself. There is a strange, sad moral in the history of this beautiful queen. "Probably the gift that women most desire, beyond riches, wisdom, even virtue itself," remarks a recent writer, "is a power of fascination over the other sex;" and this dangerous charm must have been possessed by Mary to a degree that in the days of Greece and Rome would have been attributed to supernatural influence. With all her advantages of rank, talent and education, this very quality, so far from adding to her happiness, seems to have been the one engine which worked her destruction, and that of every kindly heart that came within her sphere. Of all the eminently beautiful women the world has seen, Mary Stuart wrought the most of wreck and utter ruin with the kindliest disposition and best intentions. Delilah, we have never doubted, was a heartless sensualist, covetous only of pleasure and gold. The Phrynes and Aspasias were probably, finished courtesans, with whom the affections were but instruments necessary to a profession of which they were thorough mistresses. Cleopatra, like a royal voluptuary, grudged no price for her desire; and in her love of conquest, blazoned forth and made the most of her rich southern charms. Marguerite de Valois knew and cultivated her resplendent beauty with the diligence of a devotee and the scientific aptitude of a Frenchwoman. But the Queen of Scots alone seems to have been half ignorant and wholly careless of those advantages which women most prize and cherish—seems to have regarded her loveliness as little as the flower its fragrance, and to have gone about frankly and freely dispesing her dangerous notice with the innocence of an involuntary and unconscious coquette.

Of physical beauty there is no question that she possessed an extraordinary share, perhaps more than any woman of that or any other age. Like her mother, (Mary of Lorraine,) she was of lofty stature and peculiar dignity of bearing, whilst she inherited from her father an exact symmetry and the most graceful proportions. James V., though he made bad use of his physical advantages, was one of the comeliest and best-limbed men in his dominions. Mary's hand was a model for a sculptor, whilst every gesture and every movement of her body was at once womanly and dignified. But it was the Queen's face that riveted the attention and fascinated both sexes with its entrancing loveliness. Other women might be beautiful; other women might have had the same smooth, open brow, the same chiselled features and pencilled eyebrows, the same delicate chin, and white, full neck and bosom, ay, even the same long, soft hazel eyes, and rich, dark chestnut hair; but where was the woman in Europe whose glance, like hers, raised from under those sweeping eyelashes, found its way straight to the heart? whose smile seemed at once to entreat aud command, to extort obedience aud bestow reward, like sunlight penetrating the coldest object, and warming and brightening all within its sphere?

Since her return from France to the land of her birth, the young sovereign had "behaved herself in a manner so princely, honorably, and discreetly," and was at the same time so courteous and affable, that, with the assistance of Knox and his followers—whose judgment cannot be supposed unprejudiced—she had gained the universal love and approbation of her subjects—no easy task, considering the conflict of selfish interests around her. She treated gravely of affairs of state with her council, sitting all the while over her embroidery frame, quietly aud demurely plying her needle. Hunting, hawking and other sports filled up the day; and music and dancing were the usual amusements of the evening. The majority of her subjects made allowance for their Queen's youth, gaiety, and beauty; and, so long as she discharged her duties in a grave and princely manner, did not blame her for endeavoring to enliven the Court of her native kingdom with some shadow of the festivities which had surrounded her while on the throne of France. Unimpeachable in her public conduct, the accomplished princess loved to retire into something like private society, but always with the honorable attendance of her ladies, and accessible to the ambassadors who resided at her Court. When Randolph, the English envoy, once pressed matters of state upon her at such a moment, "I see," she said, "you are weary of this reception. You had better preserve your diplomatic gravity and return to Edinburgh, and keep all your weighty conversation till the Queen returns there; for I promise you, I do not know myself what is now become of her, or when she will return to her throne or canopy of state."

Mary—at this epoch of her life more the heroine of romance than of history—was herself conscious, it would seem, of her tendency to this easy pleasantry, and had an apprehension that in an unguarded moment it might be carried too far. Indeed, a melancholy instance of this did occur in the case of one of her suite. This girl-queen had the good sense, shortly after her enthronement in the gloomy halls of Holyrood, to dismiss most of her French followers. It would have been well had the poet Chastelar been among the number. Young, handsome, and well-born, his romantic disposition and undoubted talents had rendered him an especial favorite in the gay circles of the Court of France, where so many of its nobility had congregated round the youthful consort of Francis, to pay their homage as much to her beauty as to her sovereignty. To look on Chastelar, with his long dark curls and his bright eyes, was to behold the poet-type in its most attractive form; and when to beauty of feature and culture of mind were added a graceful figure, skill in horsemanship—as in knightly exercises—great kindliness of disposition, and gentle birth, what wonder that with the ladies of Mary's Court to be in love with Chastelar was as indispensable a fashion as to wear a pointed stomacher or a delicate lace edging to the ruff? And Chastelar, with true poet-nature, sunned himself in their smiles and enjoyed life intensely, as only such natures can, and bore about with him the while an unsuspected and incurable sorrow near akin to madness in his heart.

Chastelar was a nephew on his mother's side of the renowned knight "sans peur et sans reproche," Bayard, and a native of Dauphiny. At an early age he had entered the household of the Constable Montmorency, and was afterwards promoted to that of the Marshal d'Amville. Firmly attached from childhood to the illustrious house of Montmorency, he was one of those gallant and loyal gentlemen who followed its fortunes, alike ready to share the disgrace or favor which was reflected by turns, as the event might be, from chief to retainer. Possessing the defects as well as the good qualities of the men of his day—imaginative, intellectual, brave, a duellist, indifferent as to religious matters, and a poet in his hours of love and leisure—at the Court of the Louvre, among the gay and glittering retinue of Catherine de' Medici, Chastelar was held pre-eminently a la mode—in its salons by his wit and courtesy, in its duels by his courage and address. Hitherto he had trifled with love as he had with danger. When his duties as a gentleman and a soldier were fulfilled, and the Marshal had nothing further to require of him, Chastelar thought only of penning some quatrain wherewith to insinuate himself the more willingly into some fair one's heart, or was equally ready to do battle for the friend or mistress whose colors he wore. He had several brilliant affairs of honor, and the boatmen of the Seine knew him well, for more than twice or thrice had they ferried him across the Louvre shore to that of the Pré-aux-Clercs opposite. Chastelar had indeed figured conspicuously among the heroes of that rendezvous for measuring swords; and in those days great was such prestige both in court and city, and a high recommendation even to princesses of the blood as well as to fair dames and demoiselles of quality. Chastelar owed more than one conquest to the renown thus acquired for skill and valor. Even Ronsard had allowed himself to be captivated by the halo of wit and gallantry which hovered around Chastelar. From the height of that poetic throne upon which his cotemporaries had placed him he had deigned to encourage and applaud the inspirations of the enterprising youth who, without rest or truce, pursued at the same time military glory, literary fame, and ladies' love:

Farfallone amoroso
Notte giorno e d'intorno e girando
Delle belle turbando il riposo
Narcisetto Adoncino d'amor.

A somewhat frivolous exterior and volatile manner, however, concealed a strong and fervid nature, a delicate and morbid sensibility which none suspected, not even Chastelar himself, but the revelation of which grew out of suffering, through the indescribable tortures of a passion into which he rashly threw his entire soul, and which passion the lovely woman who was its idol reciprocated at most by coquetry only. Availing himself of the marked and flattering notice he had obtained at the Court of Francis II., Chastelar had, during the brief term of her widowhood in France, paid assiduous court to Mary Stuart, who on her part, never regarded the homage he offered her in verse as anything else but those purfled phrases, the loyal and gallant declarations which were so much the fashion at that epoch, and with which she was daily overwhelmed. A poetess herself, as much by nature as by study, her heart warmed towards those who indulged in the same delightful art. Chastelar wrote both in French and Italian; and finding that Mary deigned to read and admire his productions, he seemed thenceforth to have made her the only theme of his enamored and too presumptuous Muse. But it happened that at the time Chastelar's mad passion for the Queen was at its height, she was, as we have already said, forced to quit the land she loved so well. Marshal d'Amville—who was utterly ignorant of Chastelar's infatuation, and who, encouraged by the kind demeanor of the Queen, himself aspired to succeed to Francis as her husband—accompanied the fair exile to Scotland, and took Chastelar with him, to whom, as he never thought he should find in him a rival, he entrusted the secret of his love; and when he was forced to quit Mary he left the young poet with her, charging him to maintain the recollection of his passion in the heart of the Queen. This confidential office brought Chastelar in still closer contact with Mary: and as, from his talents as a musician and a poet, the Queen treated him with unusual favor, he grew insensibly bold enough in his own blind adoration to risk everything in order to obtain another title.

* Mary was called "La Reine Blanche," from having mourned forty days in white for her first husband, Francis II.

Chastelar, shortly after Mary's return to Scotland, went repeatedly backwards and forwards between Paris and Edinburgh, both as a retainer and confidant of d'Amville, and occasionally as the special messenger of the Queen, charged with important communications to her uncles, the Guises, and other high personages; and bringing back, in prose and verse, not only the homage of the enamored d'Amville, but of Ronsard and the rest of her adorers at the Court of Charles IX. It was Chastelar who laid at her feet these tuneful regrets of his literary patron, Ronsard :*

Le jour que vostre voile aux vents se recourba,
Et de nos yenx pleurans les vostres désroba,
Ce jour, là même voile emporta loin de France,
Les Muses qui souloient y faire demeurance,
Quand l'heureuse fortune icy vous arrestoit,
Et le sceptre françois entre vos mains estoit.
Depuis, notre Parnasse est devenu sterile:
La source maintenant d'une bourbe distille,
Son laurier est séché, son lierre est detruit,
Et sa croupe jumelle est ceinete d'une nuit.

* * * *

Quand cet ivoire blanc qui enfle votre sein,
Quand votre longue, gresle et délicate main,
Quand votre belle taille et votre beau corsage
Qui ressemble au portait d'une céleste image;
Quand vos sages propos, quand vostre douce voix
Qui pourroit esmouvoir les rochers et les bois,
Las! ne sont plus icy; quand tant de beautez rares
Dont les graces des cieux ne vous furent avares,
Abandonnant la France, ont d'un autre costé
L'agréable sujet de nos vers emporté;
Comment pourraient chanter les bouches des poëtes,
Quand par vostre départ les Muses sont muettes?
Tout ce qui est de beau ne se garde longtemps:
Les roses et les lys ne régiment qu'au printemps.
Ainsi vostre beauté, seulement aparüe
Quinze ans eu nostre France, est soudaine disparüe,
Comme on voit d'un eclair s'évanouir le trait,
Et d'elle n'a laissé sinon que le regret,
Sinon le désplaisir qui me remet sans cesse
Au cœur le souvenir d'une telle prueesse.

* * * * * *

Mary, in return for these gallant verses, sent the author from Holyrood a magnificent buffet of chased silver plate, which cost two thousand crowns, with the inscription, "A Ronsard, l'Apollo Francois." This royal guerdon was placed in charge of Chastelar, to deliver among other tokens and pledges of the White Queen's enduring love for her "most cherished, pleasant land of France."

Unhappily for the amiable and light-hearted Mary, excessive familiarity and undue favoritism exposed her at this time to slanderous attacks. The respect due to the Queen was forgotten in the great liberty allowed by the woman. One Capt. Hepburn ventured to behave towards her with brutal indelicacy, and escaped punishment only by flight. His example did not, however, serve as a warning to the unfortunate Chastelar. That fervid lyrist addressed impassioned verses to her, which too plainly revealed his invincible passion.

O déesse . . . .
Ces buissons et ces arbres
Qui sont entour de moy,
Ces rochers et ces marbres,
Sçavent bien mon émoy

Bref, rien de la nature
N'ignore ma blessure,
Fors seulement
Toi que prende nourriture
En mon cruel tourment.

Mais s'il t'est agréable
De me voir misérable
En tourment tel;
Mon malheur déplorable
Soyt sur moy immortel!

Mary replied to these effusions by others of responsive sentiment, and so kindled the already heated imagination of the devoted young man, that it reached the verge of delirium and madness. On his return to France, at the time of the first civil war, he had felt no disposition to march with D'Amville against his co-religionists, the Huguenots, or join the Huguenots against his liege lord D'Amville, ad had consequently taken an early opportunity to revisit Scoland. He arrived secretly in Edinburgh, without apprising any one in that city of his movements.

Mary Stuart was sitting one morning in her favorite bower at Holyrood, surrounded by those youthful maids of honor who had attended her in France, and to whom she had become so greatly attached—for they were her countrywomen, and of the same age as herself. The young and lovely princess was engaged at her embroidery frame, laughing and chatting with her four attendant Maries, when the gentleman usher, who stood at the door of the apartment, entered, and with a low obeisance presented a letter to the Queen. Mary took the missive with a gracious smile from the person presenting it, and contemplating it for a moment before she opened it, with a look of pleased surprise—for it was curiously, or rather fancifully, folded, tied with green silk thread, and highly perfumed—

"This, sure," she said, "is from none of our Scottish subjects; the fold is French." And she sighed. "It hath the cut and fashion of the billet-doux at St. Germains, and," she added, laughing, "the precise flavor, too, I dare avouch. But I should know this handwriting," she went on; "I have seen it before. This, however, will solve the mystery." And she tore the letter open, and was instantly employed in reading it, blushing and smiling by turns, as she proceeded with the perusal. When she had done, "Mary Seton," she said, raising her eyes from the paper, and addressing that one of the bevy nearest her, "whom, think you, is this letter from?"

"I cannot guess, madam," replied the young lady appealed to.

"Do try," rejoined Mary.

"Nay, indeed I cannot," said the former, now pausing in her work, and looking laughingly at her royal mistress. "Perhaps from the Count Desmartine, or from Dufour, or Dubois?"

"No, no, no," replied the Queen, laughing; "neither of these, Mary. But I will have compassion on your curiosity, and tell you. Would you believe it?—it is from Chastelar, the poet."

"Chastelar!" repeated the maiden, in amazement; "what in all the earth can have brought him here?"

"Nay, I know not," said the Queen, blushing, for she guessed, or rather feared the cause. "But read and judge for yourself," she added, handing her attendant the letter, which contained a very beautiful laudatory poem, full of feeling and passion, addressed to herself, and which the writer concluded by requesting that he might be permitted to form part of her Court, declaring that it would be joy inexpressible for him to be near her person, he cared not how lowly or mean a capacity. The having opportunities of seeing and serving her, he said, would reconcile him to any degradation of rank, to any loss—save that of honor.

"In sooth, very pretty verses," said the maid of honor, returning the poem to the Queen, "but, methinks, somewhat over bold."

"Why, I do think so too, Mary. Chastelar rather forgets himself; but poets, you know, have a licence, and I cannot be harsh to the poor young man. It would be cruel, ungenerous, and unworthy of me."

"But what say you, madam, to his request to be attached to your Court?"

"As to that, I know not well what to say, indeed," rejoined the Queen. "Chastelar, you know, Mary, is a gentleman, both by birth and education. He is accomplished in a very high degree, and of a graceful person and pleasing manners, and would thus do no discredit to our Court; but, I fear me, he might be guilty of some indiscretions—for he is a child of passion as well as song—that might lead him into danger, and bring some blame on me. Still, I cannot think of rejecting altogether his humble suit, so prettily preferred; and if he would promise to conduct himself with becoming gravity and reserve in all matters, and at all times avoid ruffling and duelling, I object not that he be attached to our Court. I will, at all events, make trial of him for a short space. Kerr," she now called out to a page in waiting, "go to the hostelry whence this letter came, and say to the gentleman by whom it has been sent, that we desire to see him forthwith. Let him accompany you, Kerr."

In a short time after the messenger had been despatched with the invitation to Chastelar, the door of the Queen's apartment was thrown wide open, and that person entered. His bow to the Queen was exceedingly graceful, and not less so, though measured with scrupulous exactness in their expression of deference, were those he directed to her ladies. Chastelar's countenance was at this instant suffused with a vivid blush, and it was evident that he was under the excitement of highly agitated feelings, but he lost not for a moment, nor in the slightest degree, his presence of mind; neither did these feelings prevent him conducting himself at this interview with the most perfect propriety.

"Chastelar," said the Queen, after the ceremonies of a first salutation were over, "I perceive you have lost none of your cunning in the gentle craft. Those were really pretty lines you sent me, choice in expression, and melodiously arranged. I assure thee it is a very happy piece."

"How could it be otherwise, madam," replied Chastelar, bowing low, "with such a subject?"

"Nay, nay," said Mary, laughing and blushing at the same time, "I am no subject, Chastelar, but an anointed queen. Thou canst not make a subject of me."

Chastelar now in turn blushed, and said, smiling, "Your wit, madam, has thrown me out; but, avoiding this play on words, my position is good, undeniable. All men acknowledge it."

"Go to, go to, Chastelar; thou wert ever a flatterer. But 'tis a poet's trade. Thou art a dangerous flatterer, however; for thou dost praise so prettily that one cannot suspect thy sincerity, nor be angry with thee, even when thou deservest that one should. But enough of this in the mean time. You may now retire, O prince of troubadours, and I think the sooner the better, for the safety of these fair maidens' hearts, and your own peace of mind, which a longer stay might endanger. Our chamberlain will provide thee with suitable apartments, and see to thy wants. Mark," she added, laughingly, "we retain thee in our service in the capacity of our poet—of Court poet—a high and honorable appointment; and thy reward shall be the smiles and approbation of these fair ladies, the beauty of all and each of whom I expect thou wilt forthwith embalm in immortal verse."

Chastelar, bowing, was now about to retire, when the Queen, again addressing him, said, "We will send for thee again in the afternoon, to bear us company for a while, when thou wilt please bring with thee some of thy newest and choicest madrigals."

Expressing a deep sense of the honor proposed to be conferred on him, of the Queen's kind condescension, and avowing his devotedness to her service, Chastelar withdrew, and was provided with the promised apartments by the express orders of Mary herself. On being left alone, Chastelar again fell into one of those reveries to which he was prone, and again launched into that strain of extravagant adulation which, on another occasion, he had embodied in verse. Again he compared Mary, in his incoherent ravings, to everything that is beautiful in earth, sea and sky; but comparing her to these only that he might assert how far she surpassed them. There were mingled, too, with his eulogiums on this occasion, expressions of that imprudent passion which subsequently at once urged him to commit the most daring offences, and blinded him to their consequences. Poor Chastelar's ravings, in the instance of which we are just speaking, were unconsciously uttered; but they were unfortunately loud enough to arrest the attention of the domestics, who were passing to and fro in the lobby into which the door of his apartment opened. These, attracted by his rapturous exclamations, listened, from time to time, at his door, and were highly amused with the rhapsodies of the imprudent poet. The latter becoming more and more vehement, and in proportion more entertaining, the domestics finally gathered in a cluster around the door, to the number of six or eight, and, with suppressed laughter, overheard all that the excited and unguarded inmate chose to utter. That, however, was so incoherent, or at least of so high-flown a character, that the listeners could make nothing of it; and, as they could not, they immediately concluded it to be nonsense, and the speaker a madman. But there came one to the spot, at this unfortunate moment, who, with sharper intellect and more comprehension, at once discovered the meaning that lurked under the florid language of the poet's ill-timed soliloquies.

While the servants were crowded round the door of Chastelar's apartment, too intent on their amusement to notice the approach of any one, a chance-comer had advanced unseen to within a few paces of where they stood. Here, with his arms folded across his breast, he had remained unobserved for several seconds, gazing with a look of surprise and displeasure on the merry group assembled around the poet's door. When, however, he was discovered, the knot of listeners instantly broke up in the greatest hurry and alarm.

"How now!" exclaimed the unexpected intruder—a person of about thirty years of age, of rather slender form, of cold and haughty demeanor and austere countenance—"how now!" he repeated, in a voice the tones of which were naturally severe; "what means this idling? what do ye all here, knaves, in place of attending to your duties?"

Instead of answering this question, the terrified domesties were now endeavoring to make off in all directions; but the querist's curiosity, or perhaps suspicion, having been excited by what he had seen, he instantly arrested their progress by calling on them, in a voice of increased severity and vehemence, to stop.

"Come hither, Johnstone," he exclaimed, addressing one of the fugitives; "I must know what ye have been all about." And without waiting for an answer, "Who occupies this apartment?" he inquired, pointing to that in which was Chastelar.

"An' please, my lord," replied Johnstone, bowing with the most profound respect, "ane that we think 's no vera wise. He's been bletherin' awa' there to himsel', saving your honor's presence, like a bubbly-jock, for this half-hour back, and we can neither mak tap, tail nor mane o' what he's saying."

"What! a madman, Johnstone?" said the Earl of Moray, the Queen's half-brother, for it was no less a personage; then hurriedly added, "Who is he? what is he? where is he from? when came he hither?"

The man answered categorically:

"I dinna ken, my lord, wha he is; but frae the thinness o' his chafts, I tak him to be ane o' your French lauuloupers. He cam to the palace aboot twa hours syne."

The Earl's curiosity was now still further excited, and without saying a word more he drew near to the door of Chastelar's apartment, and became also an auditor of the poor poet's unguarded language; but not such as it was in the case of the listeners who had preceded him. To him that language was perfectly intelligible; at least, to the extent of informing him of Chastelar's ambitious love. To Moray this was a secret worth knowing; and in the hope that he might discover this attachment to be reciprocal, and thus acquire an additional influence over the Queen, his sister, at the expense of her reputation, he considered it a singularly fortunate incident. Perhaps he expected that it would do even more for him than this; that it would eventually help him to the accomplishment of certain daring views towards the Crown itself, of which he was not unsuspected. Whether, however, he was able to trace, in distinct and definite lines, any consequences favorable to himself from the fact which had just come to his knowledge, it is certain he was pleased with the discovery, and considered it an important acquisition. That he viewed it in this light, indeed, was evident even by his countenance, cautiously guarded as its expressions ever were.

Lord James Stuart, created Earl of Moray by his half-sister—the lay-churchman, the soldier-statesman—was, after her, the most important personage in Scotland, by reason of his royal descent, the position which he had taken in the affairs of the country, the influence which he exercised as the secular head of the "Reformed" party, and the confidence with which he had inspired most of the nobility. Though still young, he had earned considerable distinction, both as a soldier and a politician. To the most undaunted courage he added the most consummate ability. Possessing great judgment, energy of character and firmness of purpose, with less variableness and cunning than is commonly ascribed to his astute and fickle countrymen, frank and blunt, though not incapable of dissimulation and falsehood, he was always guided by that resolute good sense which seldom fails to conduct a man quickly and safely to the object he has in view.

The Earl, on being assured of the fact of Chastelar's attachment to the Queen, withdrew from the door with a look and brief expression of satisfaction, and went directly in quest of the chamberlain. On finding whom,

"So, Mr. Chamberlain," he said, "we have got, I find, another animal added to our herd of fawning, drivelling courtiers. Pray, who or what is he—this person who has taken up his quarters in the northern gallery? and by whose authority has he been installed there?"

"By the Queen's, my lord," replied the chamberlain; "I have had express and direct orders from the Queen herself to provide this gentleman with apartments in the palace, and to see to his suitable entertainment."

"Ah, indeed!" said the Earl, biting his lip and musing for a moment. "By her own express orders!" he repeated; "it is very well." Then, after a pause, "Know ye this favored person's name, Mr. Chamberlain?"

"Chastelar," replied the latter.

"Chastelar! Chastelar!" repeated the Earl, mechanically, and again musing; why, I think I have heard of that gallant before. He is one of those trifiers called poets, methinks—a versifier, a scribbler of jingling rhymes. Is it not so?"

"I have heard the Queen say so, my lord," replied the chamberlain. "She has spoken of him in my hearing as a poet."

* Ronsard had in his youth lived for three years as page to Mary's father, the gay and handsome James V, was teacher of poetry afterwards to his lovely daughter, when Dauphiness, and became one of her most ardent admirers.

"Ah! the same, the same," said the Earl; "but how obtained he access to the Queen, know ye?"

"Through his own direct application, my lord. He addressed a poetical epistle to her Grace. I understand, from Goodal's hostelry, where he had taken up his quarters in the first place, requesting permission to wait upon her."

"And it was granted?" interrupted the Earl.

"It was, my lord; and he has already had an audience."

"Ah! so!" said the Earl, without having, during any part of this conversation, evinced the slightest emotion, or symptom of the deep interest he took in the communications which were being made to him. "Know ye," he went on, "if that favor is to be soon again conferred on him? When will he be again admitted to the presence?"

"That, my lord, rests on the Queen's pleasure; but I hear say that he is to attend her this evening in her sitting apartment."

"So, so!" said the Earl, nodding his head as he uttered the words; and turning on his heel, he walked away without further remark.

From the officer with whom he had just been speaking the Earl of Moray carefully concealed the motives which had prompted his inquiries, but determined henceforth to watch with the utmost vigilance the proceedings of the Queen and Chastelar, until some circumstance should occur that might put them both fairly within his power. Unaware of the dangerous surveillance under which he was already placed, it was with a delight which only he himself, perhaps, could feel, that Chastelar received in the evening the promised invitation from the Queen to attend her and her ladies in their sitting-chamber. The invitation was conveyed in some playful verses—an art in which Mary excelled—written on embossed paper. The enthusiastic poet read the delightful lines a thousand times over, dwelt with rapture on each word and phrase, and finally kissed the precious document with all the eagerness and fervor of highly excited and uncontrollable emotion. Having indulged in these tender susceptibilities for some time, Chastelar at length folded up the unconscious object of his adoration, thrust it into his bosom, took up a small port-feuille covered with red morocco leather, gilt and embossed, the depository of his poetical effusions, and hurried to the apartment of the Queen, where he was speedily set to the task of reading his composition for the entertainment of the assembled fair ones; and it is certain that on more than one of them, the tender and impassioned manner of the bard, as he recited his really beautiful verses, added to his highly prepossesing and graceful delivery, made an impression by no means favorable to their night's repose. It would, however, perhaps be more tedious than interesting, were we to detail all that passed on the night in question in the Queen's apartment, to record all the witty and pleasant things that were said and done by the Queen, her ladies and her poet. Be it enough to say that the latter retired at a pretty late hour; his imprudent passion, we cannot say increased, for of that it would not admit, but strengthened in its wild and ambitious hopes.

From that fatal night poor Chastelar firmly believed that his love was returned; that he had inspired in the bosom of Mary a passion as ardent as his own. Into this unhappy error the poet's own heated and disturbed imagination had betrayed him, by representing in the light of special marks of favor occurrences that were merely the emanations of a kind and gentle nature—thus fatally misled by a passion which, if notorious for occasioning groundless fears, is no less so for inspiring unfounded hopes. Such, at any rate, was its effect in the case of Chastelar on the night in question. On gaining his own chamber he flung himself into a chair, and spent nearly the remainder of the night in the wildest and most extravagant dreams of future bliss; for in the blindness of his passion and tumult of his hopes, he saw no difficulties and feared no dangers.

Curious Consequence of Eating Salmon.—My friend Mr. J. K. Lord has been kind enough to submit for my inspection the under jaw of a human being, the condition of which is most remarkable. The depth of the teeth in the solid bone is very singular, but the most curious part of this jaw is, that the teeth are all worn down level at the line to which the gum would have been attached when the person was alive, so that had we looked into the mouth of the living person the teeth would appear to be just projecting out of the gums, just as does the stump of a tree when sawn off close to the grass of a well-mowed lawn. The upper or grinding surface of the teeth are ground perfectly flat and smooth, so that the three substances that compose the teeth can easily be made out, viz., (from without inwards,) the enamel, the dentine and the pulp. The cause of this most curious grinding down of the teeth is as follows: Mr. Lord tells me that vast numbers of salmon run up the Columbia river, and their progress being stopped by the falls, the Indians catch them in large quantities, and preserve them for winter food, These poor Indians cannot obtain salt with which to dry their fish, so they split it up into slabs and put it on the hot rocks to be dried by the heat of the sun; the sand from the disintegration of these rocks is blown by the wind on to the fish which are exposed to dry, and the consequence is that it becomes thoroughly peppered with sand, which sinking into the soft fish becomes more or less incorporated with it. The Indians, nevertheless, are obliged to eat it, as they have not much else for food; and the consequence is that the sand gradually wears down the teeth, just as a "nether" mill-stone is worn down by constant attrition. The under jaw now before me probably belonged to a man about twenty-five or thirty years of age. The condition of the wisdom teeth teaches us this; they have been "cut" some time, but yet are not nearly so much worn as their neighbors in the jaw. Though all this curious wearing down of the teeth has taken place, still there are, strange to say, no symptoms of decay, or anything like a hollow tooth in the whole series, so that if any dentist having read the foregoing remarks should think of pitching his tent near the falls along the shores of the Columbia, he would be grievously disappointed, as there being no bad teeth, there will be no business to be done. I have observed that the teeth of ancient monks and ancient Britons are more or less ground down, but in them the wearing away of the substance of the teeth is not nearly so marked as in the case of the Columbian Indian. In the case of the monks the eating of hard food, such as pulse, has caused this appearance.—Frank Buckland.

WHAT IT COSTS TO DRESS A LADY.

Modern civilization and refinement is developing among us, from the female chrysalis, a brilliant creature, who bears about the same relation to woman that a meteor does to the sun. This peculiar and radiant specimen of feminine human nature is the "lady" par excellence. One occasionally shoots across our pathway in going up and down Broadway. We notice her stepping from her carriage or daintily crossing the sidewalk, and wonder how anything so exquisite and perfect in its way was ever put together, or how, being completed, it remains so mysteriously charming and unapproachable, so wondrous and admirable a creation of beauty and art, as to scarcely betray a suspicion of human origin.

We gaze with admiration, mingled with awe, on the fair and delicately-moulded figure, on the stately and immaculate folds of silk and lace in which it is enveloped, on the swimming motion which presses and parts the air without apparently touching the earth, and on the marvellous whiteness of the jeweled fingers which disdainfully hold the rich robe from any fear of passing contact.

The idea of wearing so peerless a creature next to one's heart as wife, sister or mother, is simply an absurdity. She is quite too bright, if not too good, for human nature's daily food. Kisses would discompose her, tears commit unheard-of ravages, even smiles must not be indulged in too often, and laughter never. This superb stoicism is a chief point of difference between a lady and a woman. A woman is emotional; she is sympathetic; she is quickly excited to laughter or to tears; she will even neglect her personal adornment, and forego her own wishes and inclinations, where her feelings are very much interested. But the modern "lady" never by any accident forgets herself. Under any circumstances, her own individuality is the first object of her attention and the last of her thoughts, and the result is a dazzling female phenomenon, which we are content to worship at a distance and have no wish to appropriate.

Such an idea, in fact, would be little less than insanity in anything short of a millionaire. A lady, at present prices, is a luxury too great for an ordinary man to contemplate; the figures attached plainly to her making-up and adornments would frighten any man who did not possess a printing press of his own that could turn out an unlimited number of greenbacks.

Take the lady, for instance, who sweeps the pavement as she passes to the marble steps of a dry goods palace. Her dress is a rich mauve moire antique, at eight dollars per yard, and it is trimmed with lace leaves, edged with tiny drop buttons, which we happen to know can be purchased only at six dollars per pair. Twelve pairs, including the epaulets and trimming for the body, would be required at the very least, involving a cost of seventy-five dollars for the trimming alone. Add fifteen yards of moire, at eight dollars, and you reach nearly two hundred dollars, without the making, which, together with linings and smaller items, will be thirty dollars more. Her magnificent cloak is black velvet, enriched with a profusion of jet and guipure lace, and was imported at a cost of five hundred dollars. Her hat is Parisian also, and with its sweeping plume, which is the envy of half her female friends, was considered cheap at fifty dollars.

Were it worth while to come down to smaller details, we could enumerate her collar of real point, which cost fifteen dollars; her lace-covered parasol, which cost twenty-five; her lace-edged mouchoir, a bargain at forty, and her dainty walking boots, which, it is complained, do not pay the price of exchange at seven dollars per pair. Even then we leave out the jewelled watch, the daintily fitting gloves, once one dollar, now two dollars per pair, and two boxes of which scarcely suffices for a season. Taking the more prominent articles of costume, however, which can be seen at a glance, we have the following result:

Dress, including trimming and making	$225 00
Cloak, " "	500 00
Hat, " "	50 00
Parasol, " "	25 00
Collar, " "	15 00
Handkerchief	40 00
Veil	25 00
Watch, including chain and charms	225 00
Walking-boots	7 00
Gloves	2 00

Pursuing the subject still further, we find the following aggregate cost of an outfit actually purchased in New York recently, which we give without adding to or detracting from a single figure. The bill of a lady's furnishing establishment for supplying six plain and six elegantly trimmed and embroidered undergarments of each kind, including a puffed "corset cover," was nine hundred and twenty-five dollars. Add to this sum fifty dollars for two morning-wrappers, one woolen, the other buff cambric, with ruffles; one hundred and seventy-five dollars for white waists, three trimmed with lace and insertions, and three plain; sixty dollars for shoes, which gives two pairs of "mules" or dressing-room slippers, two pairs of kid breakfast slippers trimmed with ribbons and jet, two pairs of walking boots, two pairs of dress or carriage boots, and two pairs of embroidered "dress" slippers.

Next came the millinery bill, which amounted to one hundred and sixty dollars for four hats—one a white lace evening bonnet, another a "dress" Neapolitan, the third a straw for "demi-toilette," and the fourth a "round" country hat. Forty and fifty dollars is now considered a moderate sum to pay for a French bonnet. Leghorns, trimmed with real lace and plumes, sometimes mount as high as one hundred and fifty.

The dry-goods bill from a single large establishment was fourteen hundred and fifty dollars, and includes an embroidered white satin robe, one hundred and fifty dollars; a very handsome new style silk robe, one hundred and twenty-five dollars; black silk for a dress, forty dollars; violet and gold changeable silk, for dress also, seventy-five dollars; two organdie robes, fifty; cambric robe, fifteen; and a summer poplin, embroidered, twenty-five. A black silk cloak, neatly trimmed with guipure ornaments, was one hundred and twenty-five dollars; a Paisley shawl, one hundred and fifty; a real lace shawl, five hundred dollars; a handsome cloak of light French cloth, trimmed with silk ruching and steel embroidery, seventy; and a small real lace cape, fifty dollars.

The dress-maker's bill for making eight dresses, and finding linings, thread and the like, was one hundred and fifty dollars. Trimmings of every other description were supplied by the lady herself, which brought in another bill with the details of which we will not weary the reader. We must not omit, however, a simple lace evening dress which cost one hundred and fifty dollars, including garniture, nor three head-dresses, the aggregate cost of which was seventy-five dollars. Now add the following figures:

Undergarments	$ 925 00
Morning wrappers	50 00
White waists	175 00
Shoes	60 00
Bonnets	160 00
Dry goods	1,450 00
Lace evening dress	150 00
Dress-maker's bill	150 00
Head-dresses	75 00
	$3,195 00

The total here presented was much more alarming to the young lady principally interested than it can possibly be to the reader. She had come to New York with a check for three thousand dollars to purchase an outfit, exclusive of a watch which she possessed, and jewels which were to be presented by her lover. To her astonishment she found herself one hundred and ninety-five dollars ahead of her cash-book, and sundry articles, such as veils, furs, scarfs, fancy combs, collarettes, handkerchiefs, and the like, still unpurchased. She could not charge herself with extravagance. A Paisley shawl and a real lace shawl had been among the desirables insisted upon by her mother, and a rich wedding dress was an ultimatum with her father. She had bought no hundred-dollar handkerchiefs or camel's hair shawls, no furs, no expensive winter cloaks or delicate bijouterie, yet the fact stared her plainly in the face that the money which she had imagined capable of buying all these was gone, and that two thousand more would be needed before this year was out to supply other indispensable requisites to a fashionable wardrobe. Is it any wonder that young men are afraid to marry, when, after that event, they feel called upon to keep up the same rate of supplies, and even indulge to a greater extent the costly fancies of their young and pretty wives?

The statement, moreover, provides for none of the extraordinary occasions for which an extraordinary toilet has to be procured, and which not unfrequently costs the wearer thousands of dollars.

At a fancy dress ball, for instance, given only a few weeks ago, in Madison avenue, the cost of the dresses would be deemed fabulous. One beautiful lady wore a superb rose de chine satin, embroidered with real pearls. Upon her head, and enveloping her entire person, was a magnificent veil of real lace, also embroidered with pearls. The goddess Diana was represented by a young lady in a short dress of ponceau satin, embroidered with golden arrows; the top boots were of red satin to match the dress, and were finished with golden heels and tassels. Another young lady wore a short dress of green satin, green satin boots with silver heels, and laces, and hair powdered with silver dust. A lady, well known in the world of fashion, wore a rich robe of white satin, embroidered all over with dominoes; head-dress and white satin boots were made to correspond. The cost of these splendid costumes is greatly enhanced by the extreme difficulty of having every part made to correspond with the others. The city must frequently be ransacked for some small yet indispensable item of material, and as only a few artists are capable of executing the orders, their time and ingenuity become doubly valuable.

Gentlemen are frequently not a whit behind ladies even in the matter of dress. On the occasion above mentioned, the costume of the gentlemen consisted of suits of black velvet, knee breeches, ruffles of lace, and diamond buttons. This costume cost one of the gentlemen nearly one thousand dollars, including the hire of a superb set of diamonds worth ten thousand dollars, and the purchase of lace ruffles of extraordinary depth and fineness.

What we are coming to, when in the midst of our republican simplicity, without the necessity of upholding state forms and ceremonials, such sums are lavished on frail and perishable articles of attire, it is worth while seriously to consider, and having considered to determine whether or not to go and do likewise.—Round Table.

Encouraging to New Newspapers.—It is pleasant, in starting a new paper, to run across a paragraph like the following, which we find in a late London journal:

There is scarcely a newspaper in London in which three or four fortunes have not been sunk and by which as many persons have been ruined. The usual history of a journal is this: A, thinking to make a fortune, starts a journal. He spends £1,000 upon it, and finds it still exhibiting a loss. Money goes very fast in a newspaper, for the drain is a steady one, week by week, without pause—a process that will soon empty the wealthiest pocket. Having spent so much, he does not like to stop there. He proceeds, and another £1,000 vanishes. He stakes his last £500, and that goes too. Then he is obliged to sell at any price. He perhaps gets £100 for that which has cost him £2,500, and he is ruined. Then the buyer expends another £2,000 in like manner, and he is ruined, and sells to a third for £200 perhaps. The process may be continued even for a fourth or fifth, until even hope dies, and the enterprise is abandoned. But sometimes it happens that the fourth or fifth fortune has succeeded by the mere force of living on, and the journal is made to pay. But even then what is that profit, commercially considered? True, it is a fair profit for him who bought it for £200 and expended £2,000. But the actual cost of establishing it was the three previous fortunes of £7,500; add these, and the expenses of establishing the journal were, in fact, £10,000; and the profits do not pay as well as any other occupation would do for such capital as that. Try it thus: What annuity could be bought for £10,000, and would not that annuity be greater than the profits of the journal, successful though it may appear to be? These results may occasion surprise; but when we show what are the expenses of establishing and conducting a journal, and what are the receipts, and the reader will cease to wonder at the ruin in which journalism involves so many, and at the certain sinking of capital that is occasioned even by the most successful of these enterprises.

It is often the case that men, for the sake of getting a living, forget to live.

WOMEN'S BOOTS.

BY OUR FASHION EDITRESS.

IT IS SAFE to say that twenty years ago every fashionable woman in Ameriea wore thin-soled boots. The thinner they were the more elegant they were, in the estimation of their wearers. Then no woman could venture out in winter or bad weather without disfiguring her feet with unsightly India-rubber over-shoes. Balmoral boots came like a benediction upon the sex. They were imported first from England; and we are indebted to Queen Victoria for setting a fashion which has saved more lives perhaps than all the humane societies in the world put together. Her Majesty (like all Englishwomen) is a great walker—or she used to be twenty years ago—and she not only adopted stout boots herself, but insisted that the ladies of her household should wear them also. They were so much the fashion at her Highland Palace, that they took the name of Balmoral from it. Women are also indebted to her Majesty for those warm, sensible skirts which rejoice in the same name, and which have now become indispensable to them; but universally as they are adopted now, and sensible as they are acknowledged to be, we remember, when they first came into fashion, they were so stared at and ridiculed by the men, that few women had the eourage to wear them on the street. The introduction of a new fashion in San Francisco is very much like the introduction of a new religion among the heathen—the pioneers are very apt to become martyrs to their faith.

But to return to our boots: Happily for womankind a new civilization has dawned upon them, so far as their feet are concerned; and one sees no more upon the damp sidewalks and muddy crossings those paper-soled abominations in which they used to walk so surely and so swiftly to their graves. Stout boots with high heels and thick water-proof soles have taken their place. Women—especially in the country—are no longer debarred by bad weather from proper exercise in the open air; they no longer fear to cross the fields after a shower, or shrink from a rough path or muddy highway. Balmorals have emancipated them from a terrible thraldom. Queen Victoria, by her good sense and good example, has done more for them than their husbands and fathers ever did, and so we say "God save the Queen!" At the same time, we cannot help recording our wonder that the aforesaid parents and guardians should have permitted their wives and daughters to commit paper-soled suicide through so many years without making greater efforts to save them than the miserable subterfuge of India-rubber over-shoes—a fashion so hideous that many a woman with a pretty foot has doomed herself to voluntary captivity, or ran the risk of consumption, rather than take refuge in such monstrosities.

Balmoral boots, as first made by the English, were simply for service and for comfort. The French improved upon them, uniting elegance and grace to their other good qualities, until the present construction is very near perfection. Fashion, however, is never satisfied, and she has introduced many varieties and called them by many names. They are all excellent, and yet so different that they leave something for every taste. The most elegant and expensive style is called the Polonaise. They are made of the very finest kid, with Pompadour heels and water-proof soles. They are very high, ascending half way to the knee, where they terminate in two deep scallops, finished with black silk tassels. They are buttoned up the outer edge, and are elaborately stitched in white silk. We saw a beautiful pair of this description a short time ago at Lucke's, on Washington street. They were from the fashionable house of Chappelle, in Paris. Ladies who prefer home-made boots can get an excellent article of California manufacture in this city. For evening dress—that is to say, for ball dress and for dancing—white satin boots and slippers are always elegant. Black satin slippers, and even black satin gaiters, are admissible when worn with a dark-colored dress. Ladies who have large feet should strain a point in favor of this fashion, and avoid white shoes as much as possible, as they tend to magnify their size. We confess to a weakness for black satin gaiters, they do so idealize the most commonplace foot. In dancing they seem to twinkle like arrowy glances from a pair of coal black eyes, and the light seems to linger so lovingly around them, encircling them, as it were, in a halo of glistening sheen.

There is no reason why women of taste and fortune should not always be bien chaussée, there are so many beautiful shoes in fashion. What can be more dainty than those delicate kid slippers, lined with silk, decked with ribbons and embellished with embroidery; or those satin demi-toilets, quilted and wadded, and edged with costly fur or delicate swan's-down; or the simple Morocco slipper, with its slide of steel or silver, and its high Pompadour heels; and daintier than all, the lace embroidered slipper, fine as a cobweb, lined with delicate-tinted satin, and adorned with rosettes and borders of real lace?

Fond as the ladies of San Francisco are of imported fashions, there is one which we are surprised to see so little adopted. In Europe it is universal. It is what we call here embroidery, and braiding; they call it soutache there. It is the stitch made by the Grover & Baker sewing-machiue. Whether this machine has brought soutache into fashion, or soutache has brought this machine into fashion, is a question we cannot pretend to decide; but that they are the fashion, any one who has observed the style of dress during the last two years must admit. At the great Exhibition in London, one of the chief points of attraction to ladies was this embroidering machine. It was always surrounded by eager and admiring crowds—often by ladies of the highest rank. The royal Princesses inspected its performances more than once, and we remember handsome Mrs. Rogers dispensing bits of embroidered cloth and handbills of explanation (as fair chatelaines of yore used to give bread) to the hungry seekers after information. Ladies of all degrees bought them, from Duchesses down to commoners. Six were ordered for Windsor Castle, and as many more for the Dowagers of Kensington Palace. Even the fair Empress of Fashion and of France took lessons in its mysteries and miracles. We do not understand machinery—it is all a mystery to us. We cannot "run a machine"—we cannot even tell one from a steam engine, except by its surroundings; but we remember the pride with which we beheld this American invention superseding the dull, slow routine of hand labor. For English women it must have had a peculiar charm, for embroidery is a passion with them—a hereditary passion, descending through many generations. In the days of the Crusades, when their husbands and lovers were fighting for the Holy Sepulchre, under the red-cross banner, when it was not the fashion to go to town for the season, nor to the seaside for the summer, nor to Paris for the spring fashions, nor to Italy for the winter—before newspapers and circulating libraries, shopping and visiting, came in fashion—the unhappy wives and sweethearts who were left behind in their desolate old castles must have had a dismal time but for their embroidery. In nearly all the old palaces and castles in Europe one sees evidences of their woes and weariness in melancholy tapestries, faded and worn, worked years and years ago by loving fingers, long since turned to dust. It makes one sad to think of these patient women, bending month after month and year after year over their embroidery, with eyes weary with watching and dim with tears, with aching hearts full of a thousand nameless fears, with restless nervous fingers, sewing upon the senseless canvas, not stitches alone, but for every stitch a memory of the beloved ones far away. It was slow work then, but it belonged to a slow age, and so they suited each other. We live in a fast age, when men no longer go away for years to fight the Infidels, and women no longer hang the walls of their houses with their sorrows stitched in silk at the rate of a square inch a day. Those things have all passed away with the days of knight-errantry and travelling on horseback. Now that we have railroads and steamboats, and ploughing-machines and reaping-machines, it is fit that we should have sewing-machines also. Labor has been made light for women as well as for men, and the Countess of A. and the noble Lady B. can do as much embroidery now in a single day as their disconsolate ancestresses and all their maidens could do while their husbands were absent in the Holy Land.

In Paris a year ago every lady's dress and cloak and skirt was a walking advertisement of Grover & Baker's sewing-machine, and we hear from our correspondents that the fashion still prevails. Cloth cloaks in divers colors, black and blue and scarlet, and purple and white, are the mode. They are embroidered in colors to suit the taste of the wearer. They are used for visiting, for the street, and for the opera. We wonder that they are not more worn here, for they are neither too warm nor too thin, but are especilly adapted to this climate.

DRAMATIC AND MUSICAL.

IL TROVATORE, at Maguire's Opera House on Wednesday night, was fairly attended, although not as largely as on former representations of this popular opera. Sparkling as Verdi always is, sometimes audiences tire of sensation music as they do of sensation drama; and our composer—who is the Boucicault of the lyric stage—may be no exception to the rule. Miss Richings sang "Leonora" with her usual good style, precision and clearness, but her quality of voice lacked that dramatic intensity of expression which is a very essential feature of Verdi's music. In the fourth act she warmed a little, and her duet with "Count di Luna" (John Gregg) was deservedly applauded. Fresh from an afternoon concert, she may not have been in the best condition to render the music of a composer who has ruined quite as many voices as he has been the means of gaining reputation for. Signora Bianchi ("Azucena") looked well in her gipsy dress, and certainly displayed so much of that fire which "Leonora" lacked as to make her audience forget the absence of some essential contralto qualities in her voice. Signor Bianchi ("Manrico") came up to the measure of his reputation for artistic grace and good style—shown particularly in those bits of recitative in which both he and his wife excel. John Gregg ("Count di Luna") as usual spoiled the effect and degraded the uses of a splendid voice by an uncouth barbarism of style, and utterly marred the tasteful harmony of the whole opera by singing in English—a feature of Mr. Gregg's performance the more unpardonable as a few hours' study could remedy the defect. San Francisco audiences are forgiving and generous, yet we venture to say that in no other city in the Union would a singer attempt to force so gross a violation of good taste on the public. The chorus, evidently trusting to memory, without previous rehearsal, introduced some surprising effects in the Miserere. which would have utterly swamped the harmony of the whole scene, ensuing aria and all, but for the prompt leadership of Signora Bianchi, who from behind the scenes rushed vocally to the assistance of her liege. The Anvil Chorus, as a stage trick (quite unworthy the better genius of Verdi) lost its effect by being hammered out of time, and rendered the Minstrel performance of William Birch and Charles Backus in this same chorus an infinitely superior attempt. By the way, we would like to see Trovatore sung once again as an entire opera, and not mutilated to suit the tastes or inclinations of performers. Each successive representation shows the pruning knife. Di quella pira as sung on Wednesday night had a surprisingly ridiculous effect, owing to the absence of "Leonora," who should have been present, and to whom it was partly addressed.

Miss Richings on Thursday evening appeared as "Melanie" in Napoleon's Old Guard, and as "Isma" in the Spirit of the Rhine. Last evening she took the part of "Clari" in the Maid of Milan, and this afternoon and evening will sustain the principal role in the operatic spectacle of Satanella, which is to be brought upon the stage, if report speak truly, with magnificent effects of dress and scenery.

We learn that Maguire has effected an engagement with Charles Wheatleigh, who will make his appearance at the Opera House on Saturday next. This announcement will give great satisfaction to San Francisco where Mr. Wheatleigh has always been pleasantly known. Every one remembers the managerial good taste and ability he displayed two years ago in introducing Boucicault's dramas, as well as his professional skill in thoroughly identifying himself with "Salem Scudder," "Danny Mann," etc. Versatile and always correct, modest and talented, aiming rather to bring out the conception of the playwright, than to exhibit his own peculiarities, Mr. Wheatleigh has the reputation of being one of the most reliable and conscientious actors who appeared before a California audience.

Mrs. Julia Dean Hayne and Miss Annette Ince, the last lessees of the Metropolitan, have revived the "legitimate drama" during the past week with very fair success. In addition to the Hunchback and Richelieu, they have given us Romeo and Juliet—Mrs. Hayne playing the love sick youth of Verona to Miss Ince's "Juliet." Altogether there was a strong cast in this piece—Mrs. Judah as the "Nurse," and Courtaine as "Mercutio." Mrs. Hayne's make-up as "Romeo" would scarcely have led even the most imaginative to believe that she was a son of the house of Montague, though they might have accepted her as a daughter,—the woman being too apparent. Aside, however, from the rather incongruous spectacle of two women making love to each other, and shuffling off their respective mortal coils, because there were obstacles to their union, the play went off very well—Mrs. Hayne's reading being excellent. This afternoon the piece is repeated at the matinée, and this evening an unusually strong bill is presented—Jane Shore, with a powerful cast, to conclude with the comedietta of The Lady of the Lake.

Paul Julien's concert at Platt's Hall on Wednesday afternoon was fully attended, and proved one of the successes of the season. He brought music from the violin which not every one thought that instrument capable of. He is a genius in his line, and that line is a vio-line—if a bad pun may be pardoned because it embodies a palpable truth. Miss Richings and the Bianchis had an excellent opportunity for vocalization, and availed themselves of it, singing in their best voices and winning all the applause which Julien did not appropriate. We sincerely hope that the young maestro will give other concerts while among us. He came unheralded, but he has already won himself a position and a reputation by his own talent which is better than any ready-made one that he could possibly have brought with him.

A concert is to be given on Wednesday afternoon in aid of the family of the late Mr. Bucchel, and for the benefit also of Signor Poncini, who has long been connected with Italian opera in this city—and who has not got rich thereby. All the leading artists promise to appear. Julien will bring his bow, and the Bianchis and Signora Ghioni will come with their voices. Let it be a benefit, indeed, good people all; remember in your charity those who have so often contributed to your amusement, and come with your dollars notwithstanding the proverbial "tightness of the times."

The Wilson-Zoyara troupe have been starring it through the country with great success, delighting the people of the valleys with their magnificent tent and other things. They have taken possession of the New Almaden mines without the aid of Marshal Rand or his soldiers, and to-day exhibit in Oakland, so that those so disposed can cross over the bay and see them. On Monday the 27th, they perform at Sacramento, then away they go through the mines. If the people up there won't part with a few of their feet to see people stand on their heads, what will they do?

THE news has not come over the wires that Richmond is taken; but there is definite information that the Union Hotel at Saratoga Springs is taken, and by one of the Lelands—him who is known as William. It is strange how things run in families. All the Leland's nearly are Lelandlords. There are two or three of them at the Metropolitan; another one is at Saratoga; here is Lewis away out here keeping the best hotel in the country, on strictly Union principles; and seven or eight of the other brothers are quarrelling to see which shall get the big Lindell hotel at St. Louis, which it cost two fortunes to build and one to furnish. And some day we expect to see Jerome fling down his carving knife, dash his three-cornered white cap to the ground, and rush over to Oakland or up in the sage brush, and open one of the best houses the country ever saw, except the ones where his brothers, cousins, or uncles preside.

CAPT. SPEKE'S JOURNAL.*

AT ABOUT the time that the destiny of the negro had become seriously involved in the problem of our country's salvation Capt. Speke was quietly pushing certain geographical investigations in the heart of that country from which the negro had been originally deported. His expedition to Victoria N'yanza, undertaken in 1860, under the auspices of the Royal Geographical Society, did not, as may be supposed, attract much attention from our people—engaged in the more serious task of preserving the time-honored lines and divisions of their own geography. It was not until the return of Capt. Speke, after two years' arduous toil, bearing the rich crown of discovery, that American eyes were turned reverently on that intrepid and persevering Englishman. The history of that expedition, which resulted in the discovery of the source of the Nile, is contained in the good-sized volume before us. It has other merits than those which spring from the settlement of a mere geographical speculation. It opens a hitherto unexplored region of adventure, and constitutes a kind of connecting link between Robinson Crusoe and modern scientific travel. Speke, with his two hundred "Fridays," and the awe that he and his firearms excited among the wondering savages, have an irresistible fascination to the reader. The few extracts introduced in these columns are clipped at random from its pages without reference to the progress of the narrative, which we cannot even outline here.

Capt. Speke does not give too great space to sporting details, although he occasionally indulges us with an episode which has the flavor of Burton. At Ugogo he bagged three buffaloes :

Starting in the early morning, accompanied by two of Sheikh Said's boys, Suliman and Faraj, each carrying a rifle, while I carried a shotgun, we followed a foot-path to the westward in the wilderness of Mgunda Mkbali. There, after walking a short while in the hush, as I heard the grunt of a buffalo close on my left, I took "Blissett" in hand, and walked to where I soon espied a large herd quietly feeding. They were quite unconscious of my approach, so I took a shot at a cow and wounded her; then, after reloading, put a ball in a bull and staggered him also. This caused great confusion among them: but as none of the animals knew where the shots came from, they si mply shifted about in a fidgety manner, allowing me to kill the first cow, and even fire a fourth shot, which sickened the great bull, and induced him to walk off, leaving the herd to their fate, who, considerably puzzled, began moving off also.

I now called up the boys, and determined on following the herd down before either skinning the dead cow or following the bull, who I knew could not go far. Their footprints being well defined in the moist sandy soil, we soon found the herd again; but, as they now knew they were pursued, they kept moving on in short runs at a time, when, occasionally gaining glimpses of their large dark bodies as they forced through the bush, I repeated my shots and struck a good number, some more and some less severely. This was very provoking; for all of them, being stern shots, were not likely to kill, and the jungle was so thick I could not get a front view of them. Presently, however, one with her hind leg broken came down with a charge the instant I showed myself close to her. One crack of the rifle rolled her over, and gave me free scope to improve the bag, which was very soon done; for on following the spoors, the traces of blood led us up to another one as lame as the last. He then got a second bullet in the flank, and, after hobbling a little, evaded our sight and threw himself into a bush, where we no sooner arrived than he plunged headlong at us from his ambush, just, and only just, giving me time to present my small 40-gauge Lancaster.

It was a most ridiculous scene. Sulimnn by my side, with the instinct of a monkey, made a violent spring and swung himself by a bough immediately over the beast, while Faraj bolted away and left me, single-gunned, to polish him off. There was only one course to pursue, for in one instant more he would have been into me; so, quick as thought, I fired the gun, and, as luck would have it, my bullet, after passing through the edge of one of his horns, stuck in the spine of his neck, and rolled him over at my feet as dead as a rabbit. Now, having cut the beast's throat to make him "hilal," according to Mussulman usage, and thinking we had done enough if I could only return to the first wounded bull and settle him too, we commenced retracing our steps, and by accident came on Grant. He was passing by from another quarter, and became amused by the glowing description of my boys, who never omitted to narrate their own cowardice as an excellent tale. He begged us to go on in our course, while he would go back and send us some porters to carry home the game.

Now, tracking back again to the first point of attack, we followed the blood of the first bull, till at length I found him standing like a stuck pig in some bushes, looking as if he would like to be put out of his miseries. Taking compassion, I levelled my Blissett; but, as bad luck would have it, a bough intercepted the flight of the bullet, and it went "pinging" into the air, while the big bull went off at a gallop. To follow on was no difficulty, the spoor was so good; and in ten minutes more, as I opened on a small clearance, Blissett in hand, the great beast, from the thicket on the opposite side, charged down like a mad bull, full of ferocity—as ugly an antagonist as ever I saw, for the front of his head was all shielded with horn. A small mound fortunately stood between us, and as he rounded it, I jumped to one side and let fly at his flank, but without the effect of stopping him; for, as quick as thought, the huge monster was at my feet, battling with the impalpable smoke of my gun, which fortunately hung so thick on the ground at the height of his head that he could not see me, though I was so close that I might, had I been possessed of a hatchet, have chopped off his head. This was a predicament which looked very ugly, for my boys had both bolted, taking with them my guns; but suddenly the beast, evidently regarding the smoke as a phantom which could not be mastered, turned round in a bustle, to my intense relief, and galloped off at full speed, as if scared by some terrible apparition.

Oh, what would I not then have given for a gun, the chance was such a good one! Still, angry though I was, I could not help laughing as the dastardly boys came into the clearance full of their mimicry, and joked over the scene they had witnessed in security, while my life was in jeopardy because they were too frightened to give me my gun. But now came the worst part of the day; for, though rain was falling, I had not the heart to relinquish my game. Tracking on through the bush, I thought every minute I should come up with the brute; but his wounds ceased to bleed, and in the confusion of the numerous tracks which scored all the forest we lost our own.

The following description of the "freedmen," who formed part of his retinue, exhibits some peculiarities of the negro which most readers will recognize :

Sometimes they will show great kindness, even bravery amounting to heroism, and proportionate affection; at another time, without any cause, they will desert and be treacherous to their sworn friends in the most dastardly manner. Whatever the freak of the moment is, that they adopt in the most thoughtless manner, even though they may have calculated on advantages beforehand in the opposite direction. In fact, no one can rely upon them even for a moment. Dog wit, or any silly remarks, will set them giggling. Any toy will amuse them. Highly conceited of their personal appearance, they are forever cutting their hair in different fashions to surprise a friend; or if a rag be thrown away they will all in turn fight for it, to bind on their heads, then on their loins or spears, peacocking about with it before their admiring comrades. Even strange feathers or skins are treated by them in the same way.

Should one happen to have anything specially to communicate to his master in camp, he will enter giggling, sidle up to the pole of a hut, commence scratching his back with it, then stretch and yawn, and gradually, in bursts of loud laughter, slip down to the ground on his stern, when he drums with his hands on the top of a box until summoned to know what he has at heart, when he delivers himself in a peculiar manner, laughs and yawns again, and, saying it is time to go, walks off in the same way as he came. At other times, when he is called, he will come sucking away at the spout of a teapot, or scratching his naked arm-pits with a table-knife, or, perhaps, polishing the plates for dinner with his dirty loin-cloth. If sent to market to purchase a fowl, he comes back with a cock tied by the legs to the end of a stick, swinging and squalling in the most piteous manner. Then, arrived at the cook-shop, he throws the bird down on the ground, holds its head between his toes, plucks the feathers to bare its throat, and then, raising a prayer, cuts its head off.

Between open theft and pillage, and the equally scandalous though more civilized system of taxation by "hongo" or "déolé," extracted from our traveller by every petty black potentate through whose domain he passed, he was finally worried and harassed into a fever. Here is a single instance of the system of torture :

Incessant badgering went on for hours and hours, until at last Baraka, clean done with the incessant worry of this hot-headed young chief, told him, most unfortunately, he would see again if he could find a déolé, as he had one of his own. Baraka then brought one to my tent, and told me of his having bought it for eight dollars at the coast; and as I now saw I was let in for it, I told him to give it. It was given, but Makaka no sooner saw it than he said he must have another one; for it was all nonsense saying a white man had no rich cloths. Whenever he met Arabs, they all said they were poor men, who obtained all their merchandise from the white men on credit, which they refunded afterward by levying a heavy percentage on the sale of their ivory.

I would not give way that night; but next day, after fearful battling, the present of friendship was paid by Baraka's giving first a dubnani, then one sahari, then one barsati, then one kisutu, and then eight yards of merikani—all of which were contested in the most sickening manner—when Baraka, fairly done up, was relieved by Makaka's saying, "That will do for friendship; if you had given the déolé quietly, all this trouble would have been saved; for I am not a bad man, as you will see." My men then had their first dinner here, after which the hongo had to be paid. This for the first time was, however, more easily settled, because Makaka at once said he would never be satisfied until he had received, if I had really not got a déolé, exactly double in equivalents of all I had given him. This was a fearful drain on my store; but the pig, seeing my concern, merely laughed at it and said: "Oh, these savage chiefs are all alike here; you will have one of these taxes to pay every stage to Uyofu, and then the heavy work will begin; for all these men, although they assume the dignity of chief to themselves, are mere officers, who have to pay tribute to Suwarora, and he would be angry if they were shortcoming."

At Uganda, however, Capt. Speke's lines fell in more pleasant places. We append a description of King Mtésa, and the cool audacity with which Speke broke through the absurd ceremonials of his court :

The mighty king was now reported to be sitting on his throne in the state hut of the third tier. I advanced, hat in hand, with my guard of honor following, formed in "open ranks," who in their turn were followed by the hearers carrying the present. I did not walk straight up to him as if to shake hands, but went outside the ranks of a three-sided square of squatting wakungh, all habited in skins, mostly cow-skins; some few of whom had, in addition, leopard-cat skins girt round the waist, the sign of royal blood. Here I was desired to halt and sit in the glaring sun; so I donned my hat, mounted my umbrella, a phenomenon which set them all a-wondering and laughing, ordered the guard to close ranks, and sat gazing at the novel spectacle. A more theatrical sight I never saw. The king, a good-looking, well-figured, tall young man of twenty-five, was sitting on a red blanket spread upon a square platform of royal grass, encased in tiger-grass reeds, scrupulously well-dressed in a new mbugu. The hair of his head was cut short, excepting on the top, where it was combed up into a high ridge, extending from stem to stern like a cock's comb. On his neck was a very neat ornament—a large ring of beautifully-worked small beads, forming elegant patterns by their various colors. On one arm was another head ornament, prettily devised; and on the other a wooden charm, tied with a string covered with snakeskin. On every finger and every toe he had alternate brass and copper rings; and above the ankles, half-way up to the calf, a stocking of very pretty beads. Everything was light, neat and elegant in its way; not a fault could be found with the taste of his "getting-up." For a handkerchief he held a well-folded piece of bark, and a piece of gold-embroidered silk, which he constantly employed to hide his large mouth when laughing, or to wipe it after a drink of plaintain wine, of which he took constant and copious draughts from neat little gourd cups, administered by his ladies in waiting, who were at once his sisters and wives. A white dog, spear, shield and woman—the Uganda cognizance—were by his side, as also a knot of staff officers, with whom he kept up a brisk conversation on one side; and on the other was a band of wichwézi, or lady-sorcerers, such as I have already described.

I was now asked to draw nearer within the hollow square of squatters, where leopard-skins were strewed upon the ground, and a large copper kettle-drum, surmounted with brass bells on arching wires, along with two other smaller drums covered with cowrie-shells, and heads of color worked into patterns, were placed. I now longed to open conversation, but knew not the language; and no one near me dared speak, or even lift his head from fear of being accused of eying the women; so the king and myself sat staring at one another for full an hour—I mute, but he pointing and remarking with those around him on the novelty of my guard and general appearance, and even requiring to see my hat lifted, the umbrella shut and opened, and the guards face about and show off their red cloaks—for such wonders had never been seen in Uganda.

Then, finding the day waning, he sent Maula on an embassy to ask me if I had seen him; and on receiving my reply, "Yes, for full one hour," I was glad to find him rise, spear in hand, lead his dog, and walk unceremoniously away through the enclosure into the fourth tier of huts; for this being a pure levee day, no business was transacted. The king's gait in retiring was intended to be very majestic, but did not succeed in conveying to me that impression. It was the traditional walk of his race, founded on the step of the lion; but the outward sweep of the legs, intended to represent the stride of the noble beast, appeared to me only to realize a very ludicrous kind of waddle, which made me ask Bombay if anything serious was the matter with the royal person.

For six months Capt. Speke was forced to dance attendance at this court, struggling and trying all diplomatic means to get assistance to go onward to his goal. The six months were not spent idly; all this time he recorded everything he saw, and that record is one of the most extraordinary diaries ever penned. The absurd ceremonials, extravagances, simplicity and cunning of court life, the reckless and sanguinary scenes he continually witnessed, the despotic king's cool disregard of the life of his subjects make a most remarkable episode. In the first transport of joy at learning of Capt. Speke's arrival, the king through sheer exuberance of spirits ordered one hundred and fifty of his subjects to execution, and repeatedly during our traveler's stay, offered to entertain him with the spectacle of women cut to pieces. But once was Capt. Speke enabled to interfere or arrest the tyrant's hand :

The first operation on shore was picnicking, when many large mbugus of pombé were brought for the king; next, the whole party took a walk, winding through the trees, and picking fruit, enjoying themselves amazingly, till, by some unlucky chance, one of the royal wives, a most charming creature, and truly one of the best of the lot, plucked a fruit and offered it to the king, thinking, doubtless, to please him greatly; but he, like a madman, flew into a towering passion, said it was the first time a woman ever had the impudence to offer him anything, and ordered the pages to seize, bind, and lead her off to execution.

These words were no sooner uttered by the king than the whole bevy of pages slipped their cord turbans from their heads, and rushed like a pack of cupid beagles upon the fairy queen, who, indignant at the little urchins daring to touch her majesty, remonstrated with the king, and tried to beat them off like flies, but was soon captured, overcome, and dragged away, crying, in the names of the kamraviona and mzungu, (myself,) for help and protection; while Lubuga, the pet sister, and all the other women, clasped the king by his legs, and kneeling, implored forgiveness for their sister. The more they craved for mercy the more brutal he became, till at last he took a heavy stick and began to belabor the poor victim on the head.

Hitherto I had been extremely careful not to interfere with any of the king's acts of arbitrary cruelty, knowing that such interference at an early stage, would produce more harm than good. This last act of barbarism, however, was too much for my English blood to stand; and, as I heard my name, mzungu, imploringly pronounced, I rushed to the king, and, staying his uplifted arm, demanded from him the woman's life Of course, I ran imminent risk of losing my own in thus thwarting the capricious tyrant; but his caprice proved the friend of both. The novelty of interference even made him smile, and the woman was instantly released.

One more extract and we have done. Capt. Speke has struggled over burning sands and through tangled bushes, he has faced hardships and dangers in gaining these fountain waters which few men would endure even to win a bride, and now he has his reward.

At last, with a good push for it, crossing hills and threading huge grasses, as well as extensive village plantations lately devastated by elephants—they had eaten all that was eatable, and what would not serve for food they had destroyed with their trunks, not one plantain nor one hut being left entire—we arrived at the extreme end of the journey, the farthest point ever visited by the expedition on the same parallel of latitude as King Mtésa's palace, and just forty miles east of it.

We were well rewarded; for the "stones," as the Waganda call the falls, was by far the most interesting sight I had seen in Africa. Everybody ran to see them at once, though the march had been long and fatiguing, and even my sketch-block was called into play. Though beautiful, the scene was not exactly what I expected; for the broad surface of the lake was shut out from view by a spur of hill, and the falls, about 12 feet deep, and 400 to 500 feet broad, were broken by rocks. Still it was a sight that attracted one to it for hours—the roar of the waters, the thousands of passenger-fish, leaping at the falls with all their might, the Wasoga and Waganda fishermen coming out in boats and taking post on all the rocks with rod and hook, hippopotami and crocodiles lying sleepily on the water, the ferry at work above the falls, and cattle driven down to drink at the margin of the lake, made, in all, with the pretty nature of the country—small hills, grass-topped, with trees in the folds and gardens on the lower slopes—as interesting a picture as one could wish to see.

The expedition had now performed its functions. I saw that old Father Nile without any doubt rises in the Victoria N'yanza, and, as I had foretold, that lake is the great source of the holy river which cradled the first expounder of our religious belief. I mourned, however, when I thought how much I had lost by the delays in the journey having deprived me of the pleasure of going to look at the north-east corner of the N'yanza to see what connection there was, by the strait so often spoken of, with it and the other lake where the Waganda went to get their salt, and from which another river flowed to the north, making "Usoga an island." But I felt I ought to be content with what I had been spared to accomplish; for I had seen full half of the lake and had information given me of the other half, by means of which I knew all about it, so far, at least, as the chief objects of geographical importance were concerned.

Let us now sum up the whole and see what it is worth. Comparative information assured me that there was as much water on the eastern side of the lake as there is on the western—if anything, rather more. The most remote waters, or top head of the Nile, is the southern end of the lake, situated close on the third degree of south latitude, which gives to the Nile the surprising length, in direct measurement, rolling over 34 degrees of latitude, of above 2,200 miles, or more than one-eleventh of the circumference of our globe. Now, from this southern point, round by the west, to where the great Nile stream issues, there is only one feeder of any importance, and that is the Kitungulé river; while from the southernmost point, round by the east, to the strait, there are no rivers at all of any importance; for the traveled Arabs one and all aver, that from the west of the snow-clad Kilimaudjaro to the lake where it is cut by the second degree, and also the first degree of south latitude, there are salt lakes and salt plains, and the country is hilly, not unlike Unyamuézi; but they said there were no great rivers, and the country was so scantily watered, having only occasional runnels and rivulets, that they always had to make long marches in order to find water when they went on their trading journeys; and farther, those Arabs who crossed the strait when they reached Usoga, as mentioned before, during the late interregnum, crossed no river either.

There remains to be disposed of the "salt lake," which I believe is not a salt, but a fresh-water lake; and my reasons are, as before stated, that the natives call all lakes salt if they find salt beds or salt islands in such places. Dr. Krapf, when he obtained a sight of the Kenia mountain, heard from the natives there that there was a salt lake to its northward, and he also heard that a river ran from Kenia toward the Nile. If his information was true on this latter point, then, without doubt, there must exist some connection between his river and the salt lake I have heard of, and this, in all probability, would also establish a connection between my salt lake and his, which he heard was called Baringo. In no view that can be taken of it, however, does this unsettled matter change the established fact that the head of the Nile is in 3° south latitude, where, in the year 1858, I discovered the head of the Victoria N'yanza to be.

Resisting the temptation to make further extracts—a temptation which meets us on every page—we resolutely close the book. It is impossible for us to republish it entire, and in no other way can we do the author justice. In Capt. Speke's Journal we have the most novel and valuable book of travel that has been given us for years, and those who do not buy the book and accompany the author on his travels from beginning to end, lose a most enjoyable treat.

Journal of the Discovery of the Source of the Nile. By John Hanning Speke, Captain H. M. Indian Army, Fellow and Gold Medalist of the Royal Geographical Society, Hon. Cor. Member and Gold Medalist of the French Geographical Society, etc. With maps, portraits and numerous illustrations. New York: Harper and Brothers. Sold by A. Roman & Co., San Francisco.

NEW STEAMSHIP OF THE OPPOSITION LINE.—The Opposition Steamship Line will have their new steamship, the Golden Rule, running on the Atlantic side the 23d of this month. She is a side-wheeler, built by Steers, and beautifully modeled, resembling in her lines the Adriatic. On her trial trip she made fifteen miles an hour. Her dimensions are as follows: 310 feet long, 44 feet 6 inches wide, and 24 feet 6 inches deep. She is very heavily built. Her frame is entirely of white oak and locust, which is thoroughly iron-braced and strapped. Her floors are filled in solid and caulked. She also has four water-tight compartments. Her engines were built by the Morgan Iron Works. Diameter of cylinder, 81 inches; stroke of piston, 12 feet; diameter of piston rod, 8½ inches; diameter of crank-pin journal, 10½ inches; length of crank-pin journal, 3 feet 6 inches; diameter of beam centre journal, 12 inches; diameter of water wheels outside of buckets, 30 feet; width of buckets, 12 feet; diameter of water wheel shaft journal, 18 inches; length of water wheel shaft journal, 20 inches. She has surface condensers and tubular boilers.

MISERY is the crucible into which destiny casts a man whenever she desires a scoundrel or a demi-god.

THE BLEEDING HEART.

"And hast thou then wounded so deeply my heart,
Thou beautiful maiden so dear?
O heal it again, love! but let it be soon;
'Twill break else for sorrow, I fear!"

But the maiden shook laughing her ringlets so fair,
And said, "O you poor foolish youth,
How can I your wishes fulfil, since you know
That I long since have plighted my troth?"

"And hast thou then lightly, and only in jest,
Thus wounded my heart? In return,
I pray that thy bosom, O never may know
All the anguish with which I now burn!"

With heart sorely bleeding the youth rushed away,
His eye bitter weeping, he flew;
And wander'd through street after street, till he came
To the house of a doctor he knew.

And when at the house he had quickly arrived,
He said to the old man, "O cure
My bleeding and suffering heart, for such pain
I no longer, alas! can endure."

The doctor replied, as he shook his grey head,
"Poor boy, thou canst leave me alone!
Though remedies many for pains I have found,
For this one, alone, I have none!"

And once more the youth wandered sadly away,
So inwardly gloomy and dull;
He wandered through street after street, till he came
To the churchyard so quiet and full.

And as in the churchyard he silently stood,
The sexton was digging a grave;
"O canst thou not heal my poor suffering heart?
O sexton! thy kind help I crave."

Then he, sadly smiling, nods slowly his head,
And says, "Just step in; there you'll see,
If I throw a few shovels of earth in, how soon
From your heartache and pain you'll be free!"

STORIES OF THE SUPERNATURAL.

THE GHOSTLY RIDER OF HARDWICK HALL.

Hardwick Hall is memorable for a tragic event which took place there many a year ago now—a tragedy so dark and criminal, in fact, that becoming "haunted" was only the natural result of the henious offence committed.

It is situated in the vicinity of Chesterfield, a thriving town in the north of England, some six miles removed from the same, and is associated by name and position with the great wars of an early period; and with a fine Elizabethan mansion bearing the same name, belouging to the Duke of Devonshire, and which was completed about 1584.

The story we have to relate belongs, however, to a much later date, and to another dynasty; for there are some particulars in the history of crimes in great families which elude too close a scrutiny, so that only the leading facts associated with the great culminating one is all we venture to offer.

The Hall itself is a remarkably fine pile, occupying an elevated site, overlooking, every way, many an acre of waving woods—the ancestral oaks and elms, in fact, representing a vast estate, and testifying to the wealth and high condition of the family which possessed it. In one respect, the Hardwicks approach to historical interest, for at the time of the Civil Wars the head of the house befriended Charles with his wealth, his own blood, and the loss of his eldest son—these casualties culminating at Marston, when the fortunes and fate of the day were in favor of Cromwell.

In addition to the losses sustained by Sir Ralph Hardwick, who found himself coming to the ancient home he had once been so proud of—wounded so severely that his sword must rest on the wall henceforth, and bereaved by the loss of a favorite son—in addition to the great subsidies he had raised by loan and mortgage, and the pawning of his plate in order to aid the Royalist cause—he was mulcted in heavy fines by the Parliament, and found enough to do to keep the wolf from the door, besides mortgages foreclosing, and the like.

Lingering on daily till the Restoration, however, he bequeathed the old Hall and restored wealth to the sole surviving son of the race; and having seen the younger Sir Ralph wedded to the daughter of an old Royalist house, he closed his eyes in pious content, leaving a son, and the promise of a generation, to bear the old family name after him.

Here, therefore, we are now arrived at the true beginning of our story.

Sir Ralph Hardwick (the younger) was a fine, hearty specimen of his class—a gentleman with a fine estate, an Oxford student, but in no way too polished. The gentlemen of those days partook a little of the character of the "roysterer," and having huge appetites, sat long to the table; and in their libations were by no means so abstemious as their equals of the present day.

As a sportsman, like his father before him, he kept a fine stud, and lost or won at Newmarket or Epsom with equal indifference.

His kennels, his hounds, his preserves—add to which his wide-handed hospitality, rendered him one of the most popular men in the county.

He had married, at under thirty years of age, a most fair and accomplished lady, by whom he had a son and heir, who (after the family name his wife descended from, and to add a title to the estates,) was named Ralph Assheton Hardwick, who, in process of time, after having been adored and all but spoiled by his grandmother, grew to be a fine youth approaching his majority, and likely to prove a Hardwick every inch of him.

But the poor lady died in childbirth of a daughter, some three years after young Ralph was born, and Sir Ralph, (his father, old Sir Ralph being dead too,) found that the great Hall was lonely to him, despite the continued flow of company and visitors, and, perhaps, too, with a manly tenderness of how much his departed wife had helped to make his sumptuous home happy.

Be the reason what it may, he soon looked round for another partner, and only found a difficulty as to choice.

In the neighborhood there lived a spendthrift knight, of good "blood" and family, but of very impoverished fortunes. A mansion once magnificent, and now very forlorn and mouldy-looking, testified to its past splendor.

Sir Gervase Moore had been a "blood" in his day, and had led the "Mohocks," of the reign of James and the commencement of Anne, into glory and disgrace for many a day; and as his reputation in a middle sphere of life would have rendered him infamous, as he belonged to the roués and "rake-hells" of the age, he occupied a pedestal somewhat unduly elevated.

He had married, a little late in life, a woman who had brought him what sounded like a dowry; but as she rivalled him in extravagance and lavish expenditure, their short reign of glory was now over, and decay, with its crumbling timber, was overtaking the Moore family once more, when fortunately, as it seemed, Sir Ralph Hardwick's eyes turned more forcibly upon them than they had ever hoped to find in the limits of any past personal experiences.

This curiously-matched pair could boast of a daughter whose beauty, when Sir Ralph beheld her, captivated him, and made him her slave at once.

If Sir Gervase Moore was but too willing to seize upon the chance of an alliance that a nobleman need not have contemned, the solid wealth of dowry he could convey to his wife was surely sufficient to solve any doubt.

Lady Moore carried herself throughout with due decorum; and as Ethel Moore, the daughter, had no objection, the marriage was solemnized with much splendor.

If there is here some little complication apparent to the reader, it arises solely as an important element of our story, and indispensable to its thorough comprehension—a fact which must plead our excuse, and be our best reason, at once.

Our story will now march on with a more marked progress. Premising this with a few remarks.

Lady Moore had been a "beauty" in her prime, and was now long past it. Cynical, insolent, capricious, incapable of feeling the worth of wealth in any way but as to what it would bring to her—it may be judged, and rightly, too, that she was not of the class of mothers who bring up a daughter to one of the "bevy of fair women," which renders the maidens of England stars in that firmament where goodness, piety, tenderness, loving devotion, and instinctive good—all involved in the word Beautiful—are qualities we always look intuitively for, and rarely if ever, in vain.

Ethel Moore, now Lady Ralph Asshcton Hardwick, did not miss in any one item, or atom, the lessons of selfishness, pride, and impassive insolence her lady mother had taught.

She had taught her to conceal so much, that there might be something associated with the infernal in this unholy schooling.

She was certainly very beautiful; but it was a beauty that repelled and never won upon you, save when she made play with it at you, as she did to Sir Ralph before she wedded him; and soon he began to read her nature too thoroughly.

Cold and statuesque, tall, with a stately air, and a sweeping carriage, she was a showy splendor enough, and as a piece of living furniture in a rich man's house, might gratify his sense of pride; but she had crushed his heart, deeply hurt his love, and was likely to change his frank, loving nature utterly in the course of a few years.

To find out that the woman you are linked with for life is utterly the converse of what you expected her to be is something far from agreeable to contemplate.

The departed Lady Hardwick's son, Ralph Assheton Hardwick, had grown up to be a fine lad of four. The present Lady Hardwick gave birth to a son, and some few of Sir Ralph's hopes revived that the fact of her having borne him a son might, through the agency of the maternal sentiment, warm her cold, chill heart to him again; and he—as for him, he would be only too glad to respond.

It was a fine child, undoubtedly; but it bore less the stamp of the Hardwick face upon it than Ralph's eldest born did.

The one was a true Hardwick—the second, only "half a one;" and, in fact, though this face had the cut of the mother about its fine profile, the more questionable eyes, mouth, laugh of Sir Gervase Moore, neither of which people much cared to look upon, marred its early promise; for while the lights in the one shifted, the smile in the other was so suggestive of falsehood that men only associated with him equally under protest.

The step-brothers grew together side by side, and were remarked for their fine development; and, in truth, Sir Ralph was proud of both.

Soon they had their pony apiece, and the same tutors had the charge of them, and no possible difference could possibly be made between the half-brothers.

Only Lady Moore knew there was one—there would be one insuperable difference; for some day the one brother would be the heir of all the broad lands of Hardwick, and the other would not possess an acre!

Lady Moore knew this well, and did not fail in making her daughter, Lady Hardwick, know it also.

She made her know it so venemously, so darkly, so blackly, that had she whispered "murder!" into her daughter's ears she could not have spoken more plainly.

It is not necessary to sow too thickly that which is to grow into hemlock—deadly night-shade—things out of which crime distils poisons to attack the fount of life.

No! Little by little would do it, and effectually enough, too.

It is not necessary to come to the matter of a hideous, horrible, red-handed crime all at once.

To do that, is to shock and revolt, where, by degrees—sure, if slow—the consent which only backs the will is lacking.

It is not necessary to adduce the arguments—to give the precise, explicit details of conversation, short and broken—more in the shape of "hints" than of a didactic laying down of a plan which passed between them.

It would be useless to enter upon this ground further than by stating the result as yet only arrived at, namely:

That Lady Moore made her daughter (Lady Hardwick) see and know, beyond all doubt, that the true heir of the great estates of Hardwick, entailed too as they were, which would prevent any division—to the helpless, hopeless exclusion of her own son, Gervase Philip Hardwick, from any participation in the lordly share of the spoil—was certainly not her offspring.

The young mother hated Sir Ralph's elder born with a hatred that might be borne out of the depths of Gehenna, and this hate constantly engendered and warmed into a sullen fire, ready to be fanned into flame at the right moment.

The theory being ready, the idea entertained and cultivated, time, patience, circumstances would come, and the opportunity would quickly follow.

It seems incredible that a scheme—and we only hint at it—so full of probabilities of frustration, of meeting a degrading and even ludicrous end, should have been dreamt of at all.

If it was the result of an after-thought on the part of the woman, it was sufficient, for it was adopted in the main; yet there must be some years of delay yet, and one out of the thousand chapter of accidents might help to remove the heir, and leave the plotter unmasked.

Years of delay, such as might bring the elder son on the verge of his majority, when he would "come of age" with the usual rejoicings familiar to Hardwick Hall. And so the boys grew, the mother waited, and time went on.

Time only confirmed this immitigable woman in her purpose—for the mother, Lady Moore, had passed away, and Sir Gervase slept in the family vault, and another Gervase reigned in his stead, with whom we have nothing to do—time went on, and other children were born to Lady Hardwick; but her purpose only slept—it never faltered.

Sir Ralph had continued to live in a sort of sulky amity with his wife. His contentedness and domestic joy were, however, totally gone.

He had begun to take an extraordinary interest in his eldest son, who was now fast approaching his twentieth year! "But two years more of life," sighed the old man, for to his infirmities were added an accident in the hunting field; "two years longer and there will be another Sir Ralph, heaven bless him! Two years more——" and with these words upon his lips, he fell back in his bed, and expired with the calmness of an infant falling to his rest.

* * * * * * *

There had appeared upon the scene, so soon to be the seat of "action," an additional individual in the form of a lady of surpassing grace and charms, the daughter of an old friend of the dead Sir Ralph's, and according to old friendly family fashions at odd times—"few and far between," we will say—she had been betrothed to Ralph Assheton from her earliest infancy.

Miss Felicia Wingrove—an heiress in her own right, and a beauty of no ordinary kind—had been making, with her aunt and father, a short stay at Hardwick Hall; and meantime the note of preparation was sounded out on behalf of the great festivities to be held when the heir of the estates came of age.

It was on a bland, delicious summer afternoon that in a sumptuous boudoir, which overlooked a noble garden stretching away to right and left till the eye failed to take in its limits—it was on such an afternoon that a lady, stately still, for all she was approaching forty, sat looking forth out of an open window of this chamber, and with a glance of deadly ferocity and cat-like stealth watching two persons who were walking slowly up an avenue of trees and bushes, all of a varied kind, and glowing in all the pride of its very finest development of horticultural art.

They passed beneath the window, paused a moment, and Lady Hardwick could hear their pleasant voices borne on the summer air.

"Soh! they are there. It is time to commence the play," she muttered. "Well, I have felt my way, and if he has ambition, a sense of vengeance, what matter for a wrong or no?—we will make one!" she laughed scoffingly.

A footstep sounded in the chamber, and a handsome, well-built youth, his limbs set off by an elegant hunting dress of the period, stood before her.

"Philip," she said, "Philip Gervase Hardwick!" giving an emphasis to the name.

"Well, mother?" he replied.

"Come hither! Look forth!"

He advanced, obeyed, and with a cry and a change of color on his cheek, stood before his mother.

"You know who she is, do you not?"

"One fairer than the day, lovelier than the dawn; one I love till I think it will almost drive me mad if I have not from her lips the words I have begged of her."

"She will be your half-brother's bride soon, my son, and the words you want are matters of doubt."

"Not if I can stay them; not if——" he checked himself.

"Hah! you would use force, eh?"

"I swear that! I have not heard you speak in vain, so full of purpose as you have, without understanding you."

"You know him, then?"

"Who—my half-brother? Yes—oh, yes!"

"Do you think that he is, or will be, something more than that?" She uttered this with an all but tragic emphasis.

"Something more?" he repeated, as not having quite caught her meaning.

"Have you forgotten, then?"

"What, mother—what have I forgotten?"

"That he is heir to the lands, to the wealth, to the manor, to the Hall—to all that lies within, and all that lies without; park, forest, fields, lake, rivers—all, all, far as the eye can reach, either way."

The youth set his teeth together, and his breath came hissing between them.

"Yes, yes," he muttered; "I have not forgotten, and that shall soon be told. Where is Paolo?"

"With Orsino; and they have dug—what—what they have been told to do, and have left it ready for the work—finished and gone——"

"Gone?"

"They have gone where those who knew them will never know them more!" replied the lady, with a ghastly smile.

* * * * * * *

That night Ralph Assheton Hardwick disappeared, to the astonishment of the whole county; and to the shock was added the mystery attached to it.

Two Italians, Paolo and Orsino, a courier and a valet, the lady had brought with her on returning from a recent tour in Italy, disappeared too, and all search for them was ineffective.

It was not unnatural to arrive at a conclusion that the disappearance of the young heir was associated with the sudden vanishing of these two.

Rewards were offered: the woods, the towns, the cities were ransacked: all the north was, in fact, occupied by an army of defeated detectives.

All in vain!

As a consolation, however, there was a new heir at Hardwick—to wit, Sir Gervase, the half-brother; and as the farmers, tenants on the estates, and the mob of hob-nailed villagers from the vicinity round, found roast beef and October ale in plenty, the health of Sir Gervase was as easy to drink as Ralph's might have been.

And he was, speedily after his coming of age, to wed the maiden whose hand had so long been betrothed to the elder half-brother, poor Ralph; and while the lower class of visitors to the Hall had found the "coming of age" much to their liking, the wedding would induce the gentry around to crowd to the ceremony; and the day was finally named, though it had not yet quite come to pass.

* * * * * * *

But ghostly rumors began to circulate about the Hall, and crept about among the servants, and made them shudder when the night hours came, and surrender their places sooner than go by certain passages and galleries any time about midnight; and——

And, in fact, Hardwick Hall was haunted!

Haunted within, and haunted without.

Within, the shadowy forms of two bearded men, wearing cloaks, glared with fiery eyes upon the horrified creatures they happened to meet with in their midnight rounds.

Without——But the finishing part of our legend will more fully delineate him—or it—and indicate who the ghostly rider by night must necessarily be.

A hunting party, on a very large scale, had been got up, and while Miss Felicia Wingrove rode on the right of the young heir of Hardwick, and kept the post of honor in the hunt, a goodly cavalcade of cavaliers and ladies followed, and all was joy and laughter—hounds baying, horses neighing, horns braying—till a young buck was started, which led all pell-mell through the forest glades, till the turrets of Hardwick were fast lessening behind the waving trees.

Philip had turned to say some words to his fair companion, when he was at once aware of a shadowy phantom-rider by his side, and speeding on his ghostly steed between them.

A moment, the ghostly rider had turned a sort of reproachful look upon her, and she recognized the features at once!

The next, the wild rider had turned its blazing orbs upon Philip, while, with a gesture of the hand, it pointed to the ground, where felled timber and brushwood formed a thick encumbrance.

It seemed to say, "There!" as it pointed, and the younger Hardwick seemed to know it.

He uttered a cry—his horse shied and fell; and, amidst a great cry of alarm from those who now followed fast, they saw that he fell over the horse's ears, and lay stunned and bleeding on the ground.

Many trembling riders came up, and the retainers being called, Philip Hardwick was carried to the Hall.

Miss Felicia Wingrove, pale and frightened, had her pony led by a cavalier, while a huntsman walked beside her to prevent her falling off. She, too, returned to the Hall and sought her own chamber and attendants.

To those that yet remained behind the conduct of the dogs became a matter of astonishment—of almost fear.

The sagacious animals howled and yelled—beginning to tear up the earth at one particular spot, till some, remarking how loose it was, and that it was taking a particular shape or form, began to reflect.

Picks and spades were soon obtained, and the dreadful deed which had been done lay exposed in all its horrors.

There lay the corpse of young Ralph Hardwick, covered with gashes, and fouly spotted, splashed with blood.

That he had been murdered was now too clear.

* * * * * * *

The rumor soon reached the Hall—reached Lady Hardwick's ears, and her demeanor became awful.

With a wild shriek, she rushed from the room—hastened by corridor and passage, up the stairs, where at last they found her a grovelling, gibbering maniac, crouched on a broad slab of stone, over which she was moaning, and calling upon the names of the two Italians who had been in her service.

Alas! such a service.

This slab was taken up, and two grisly corpses were seen lying there, green with the poison which had been given them, and already decomposing under the effects of lime, which had been flung over them in their unhallowed grave.

The story, which has been "extant, though (not) written in very choice Italian," here closes; the usual results of such deplorable catastrophes taking place here, as they do throughout the world, and in every stereotyped form.

After this, Hardwick Hall became deserted, and was suffered to lapse into a sort of muddy decay for many a year; but another heir to Hardwick appeared in course of time, and his conduct, to some extent, palliated the "blot in his escutcheon."

THE FAKEER WHO WAS BURIED ALIVE AT LAHORE.

I was present, in the year 1837, at the Court of Runjeet Singh when the Fakeer mentioned by the Hon. Capt. Osborne was buried alive for six weeks; and although I arrived a few hours after his actual interment, and did not, consequently, witness that part of the phenomenon, I had the testimony of Runjeet Singh himself, and others, the most credible witnesses of his Court, to the truth of the Fakeer having been so buried before them; and, from my having myself been present when he was disinterred and restored to a state of perfect vitality, in a position so close to him as to render any deception impossible, it is my firm belief that there was no collusion in producing the extraordinary fact which I have related. Capt. Osborne's book is not at present before me, that I might refer to such parts of his account as devolve the authenticity of the fact on my authority. I will therefore briefly state what I saw, to enable others to judge of the weight due to my evidence, and whether any proofs of collusion can, in their opinion, be detected.

On the approach of the appointed time, according to invitation, I accompanied Runjeet Singh to the spot where the Fakeer had been buried. It was a square building, called a baraa durra, in the middle of one of the gardens adjoining the palace at Lahore, with an open verandah all round, having an enclosed room in the centre. On arriving there, Runjeet Singh, who was attended on the occasion by the whole of his Court, dismounting from his elephant, asked me to join him in examining the building to satisfy himself that it was closed as he had left it. We did so; there had been a door on each of the four sides of the room, three of which were perfectly closed with brick and mortar; the fourth had a door, which was also closed with mud up to the padlock, which was sealed with the private seal of Runjeet Singh, in his own presence, when the Fakeer was interred. Indeed, the exterior of the building presented no aperture by which air could be admitted or any communication held by which food could be conveyed to the Fakeer. I may also add that the walls closing the doorway bore no mark whatever of having been recently disturbed or removed.

Runjeet Singh recognized the seal as the one which he had affixed; and as he was as sceptical as any European could be of the success of such an enterprise, to guard as far as possible against any collusion he had placed two companies from his own personal escort near the building, from which four sentries were furnished and relieved every two hours, night and day, to guard the building from intrusion. At the same time he ordered one of the principal officers of his Court to visit the place occasionally, and to report the result of his inspection to him, while he himself, or his minister, kept the seal which closed the hole of the padlock, and the latter received the report, morning and evening, from the officer on guard.

After our examination we seated ourselves in the verandah opposite the door, while some of Runjeet Singh's people dug away the mud wall, and opened the padlock. When the door was thrown open, nothing but a dark room was to be seen. Runjeet Singh and myself then entered it in company with the servant of the Fakeer; and a light being brought, we descended about three feet below the floor of the room into a sort of cell, where a wooden box, about four feet long by three broad, with a sloping roof, containing the Fakeer, was placed upright, the door of which had also a padlock and seal similar to that on the outside. On opening it we saw a figure enclosed in a bag of white linen, fastened by a string over the head—on the exposure of which a grand salute was fired, and the surrounding multitude came crowding to the door to see the spectacle. After they had gratified their curiosity, the Fakeer's servant, putting his arms into the box, took the figure out, and closing the door, placed it with its back against it, exactly as the Fakeer had been squatted, (like a Hindoo idol,) in the box itself.

Runjeet Singh and myself then descended into the cell, which was so small that we were only able to sit on the ground in front of the body, and so close to it as to touch it with our hands and knees.

The servant then began pouring warm water over the figure; but, as my object was to see if any fraudulent practices could be detected, I proposed to Runjeet Singh to tear open the bag and have a perfect view of the body before any means of resuscitation were employed. I accordingly did so: and may here remark, that the bag when first seen by us looked mildewed, as if it had been buried some time. The legs and arms of the body were shrivelled and stiff, the face reclining on the shoulder like that of a corpse. I then called to the medical gentleman who was attending me to come down and inspect the body, which he did, but could discover no pulsation in the heart, the temples, or the arm. There was, however, a heat about the region of the brain, which no other part of the body exhibited.

The servant then recommenced bathing him with hot water, and gradually relaxing his arm and legs from the rigid state in which they were contracted, Runjeet Singh taking the right and I his left leg, to aid by friction in restoring them to their proper action; during which time the servant placed a hot wheaten cake, about an inch thick, on the top of his head—a process which he twice or thrice renewed. He then pulled out of his nostrils and ears the wax and cotton with which they were stopped: and after great exertion opened his mouth by inserting the point of a knife between his teeth, and, while holding his jaws open with his left hand, drew the tongue forward with his right—in the course of which the tongue flew back several times to its curved position upwards, in which it had originally been, so as to close the gullet.

He then rubbed his eyelids with ghee (or clarified butter) for some seconds, until he succeeded in opening them, when the eyes appeared quite motionless and glazed. After the cake had been applied for the third time to the top of his head, the body was violently convulsed, the nostrils became inflated, respiration ensued, and the limbs began to assume the natural fulness; but the pulsation was still faintly perceptible. The servant then put some of the ghee on his tongue, and made him swallow it. A few minutes after the eyeballs became dilated, and recovered their natural color, when the Fakeer, recognizing Runjeet Singh sitting close to him, articulated, in a low sepulchral tone, scarcely audible, "Do you believe me now?" Runjeet Singh replied in the affirmative, and invested the Fakeer with a pearl necklace and superb pair of gold bracelets, and pieces of silk and muslin, and shawls, forming what is called a khelat, such as is usually conferred by the princes of India on persons of distinction.

From the time of the box being opened, to the recovery of the voice, not more than half an hour could have elapsed and in another half-hour the Fakeer talked with myself and those about him freely, though feebly, like a sick person; and we then left him convinced that there had been no fraud or collusion in the exhibition we had witnessed.

I share entirely in the apparent incredibility of the fact of a man being buried alive, and surviving the trial for various periods of duration; but however incompatible with our knowledge of physiology, in the absence of any visible proof to the contrary, I am bound to declare my belief in the facts which I have represented, however impossible their existence may appear to them.

Spiritualism in Europe.—A correspondent writing from Europe says: "A little bird has whispered to me that among the new poems of Mr. Robert Browning which will burst out along with the flowers of May, there is one that relates to 'mediums,' and will make a sensation in 'spiritual' circles. Mrs. Browning, as is well known, was in her last years much impressed with the alleged phenomena of spiritualism, but Mr. Browning felt far otherwise. However, his curious brain sifted them carefully. I have just learned, by a private letter, that spiritualism is rising up in Eastern countries. A Russian lady, now at Nice, has given séances in that city, and it is said that her powers as a medium are unparalleled. One séance had taken place at the house of Mr. Leslie, the U. S. Consul."

FIGHT WITH AN EAGLE.

On the 12th, my boy Dan had a curious adventure. After he had eaten his breakfast I gave him permission to take one of my shotguns and go out after birds. I heard the report of his piece several times, and finally, as the oxen were not ready for a start, I thought I would go out and see what he was doing. I had gone some little distance, and had stopped to consider which way I had better take around an abrupt, rocky hill, when I heard another discharge, which gave me a clue to my proper course. I was hurrying on, with my rifle over my shoulder, but before I reached the scene of my boy's exploits I heard his voice in loud, excited tones. I did not stop to listen, but kept on my way, for I fancied he must be in danger. When I came in sight of him I found him battling with an enormous bird, which I was then and am still willing to call an eagle. Dan was on his knees, his musket lying empty by his side, and the bird tearing at the light clothing upon his back. I noticed that he had a fowl of some kind in his right hand, and quickly afterwards I discovered that the eagle's attention was chiefly directed that way—that it seemed more anxious to get its talons upon the dead bird which the boy held in his hand than to do any particular mischief; and this naturally led me to the conclusion that the eagle was a female trying to gain possession of one of her offspring.

As soon as I comprehended this I called out for Dan to throw away the bird he had in his hand; but he did not hear me; the flapping of those enormous wings about his ears entirely shut out the sound of my voice. When I first came in sight of the engagement I had stopped from the very force of the novelty of the scene: and just as I was on the point of advancing, Dan made a desperate effort to overcome his adversary. Throwing himself quickly upon his back, he caught the bird by the legs and endeavored to hold her while he gained his feet; but he was forced to let go in a very few seconds. One blow of the powerful wing upon the shoulder sent him over upon his side, and he was glad enough to hide his face again. There was to be no more trifling. The foe was becoming dangerous. She now settled upon Dan's back, and would have torn the skin and flesh from the bones if he had not leaped to his feet. As he gained this latter position he saw me, and started towards me on the run. Whether the bird had seen me or not I could not tell; but if she had she did not mean that my presence should keep her from her revenge. She contrived quickly to sail above the boy's head, and again she threw him down. I could not tell exactly how she did it, though she seemed to strike him with both her wings.

As quickly as possible I hastened to the spot, with my rifle ready for use; and as the bird settled a second time I stooped and fired, putting a bullet directly through her body beneath the wings. She fell over upon her side, and I finished her with a pistol shot.

I found my boy Dan much bruised, and quite lame; but, fortunately, his flesh had not been torn. The cause of the trouble was what I had apprehended. I found the bird which Dan had held in his hand to be not fully fledged, though of a goodly size. He told he had seen it sitting upon a low branch; that he had shot it: and that when he went to pick it up, this parent bird, which he had not before seen, dropped from somewhere above his head and attacked him. The very first stroke of her powerful wings blinded and stunned him, and from the first he had not full possession of his senses. The bird might not have killed him, but if I had not arrived as I did he would have stood a pretty good chance of having his flesh badly torn.—Col. Walter Dunlop's Note Book of South African Adventures.

The Malden Murder.—A pamphlet has been written in defense of Edward Green, the Malden murderer. The circumstances of his killing the clerk of the Malden Bank at the counter by a pistol shot in broad daylight, and his robbery of the safe, will be remembered by all our readers. A correspondent of the Call furnishes the following concerning him:

Since his arrest and confession of guilt, his character and past life have been pretty thoroughly ventilated. One of these stories I have heard recently, and it is as follows: A gentleman, resident in Malden, two or three years ago, moved to your State, leaving behind him a young lady, to whom he was tenderly attached, and with whom he agreed to maintain a correspondence during his absence. Green admired the same lady, and being Postmaster, had an opportunity of knowing the fact that the Californian and the object of his affections maintained a lively correspondence. He paid marked attention to the lady for some time, and finally offered her his hand and heart. She was in a quandary; for a long time no letter had arrived from her old lover, and she had no doubt but that he had forsaken her. What should she do? At last, Green's importunate devotion was rewarded and the lady became his wife. In just about one year from their marriage, he was arrested on the charge of murder, confessed his guilt, and was an inmate of a prison. A few days after his arrest, his wife received a letter from her old lover, addressed to her by her maiden name, affectionate as ever, yet filled with expressions of wonder at her silence. From this she learned that he had written regularly, constant in spite of silence, was ignorant of her marriage, and hoped still for the continuance of their attachment and its final consummation in matrimony. In the general unbosoming of himself which Green made after his arrest, he confessed that he had intercepted and destroyed the letters of these two lovers, and had found in her correspondent's apparent neglect an argument in his own favor, in his suit to the lady.

It is understood that the British Government has granted the right of way through British Columbia for an electric telegraph to connect the existing United States lines with those to be extended from Russia across Behring Straits—a concession for the latter portion of this world-girdle telegraph having been previously granted by the Russian Government to Mr. Collins, an American citizen. By the completion of these lines communication between Europe and America will be established without encountering the risks of a submarine cable across the Atlantic. Mr. Collins has conveyed his grants to the Western Telegraph Company. The line will be pushed forward as soon as arrangements can be made.

NOTICE

The publication of "The Californian" takes place on Saturday mornings, and copies may be obtained in the City at all News-stands, and of our News-agents through the country. It will also be served by carriers on the morning of publication.

* Correspondents will address all communications, business and otherwise, to C. H. WEBB, Office of "The Californian," 728 Montgomery street, San Francisco.*

THE CALIFORNIAN.

SAN FRANCISCO, SATURDAY, JUNE 18, 1864.

THE UNION STATE CENTRAL COMMITTEE AND THE CONGRESSIONAL NOMINATIONS.

SEVERAL political newspapers — more especially the leading organs of the two factions in San Francisco known as the "boys" and the "men"—have accused the State Central Committee of having acted improperly in regard to the Congressional nominations. The official record of the proceedings of the Committee says:

A resolution was unanimously passed * * * to call District Congressional Conventions for the three Districts to meet at Sacramento immediately after the adjournment of the State Convention [which will meet on the 30th August]; the delegates to the State Convention to be delegates to the District Convention for the District in which they reside respectively, in all cases where the Union County Committees shall not order an election of delegates specially to the Congressional Conventions—or where no delegates to the Congressioual Convention shall be elected under such call of the County Committee; such Congressional Conventions, when organized, to each determine for itself the time and place where they will make their nominations for Congressmen and District Committees.

The "men" complain that the Committee in assuming jurisdiction over District affairs has meddled with the business of the County Committees, and that each District Convention should be held only within the limits of its own District. The "boys," or one disappointed and repudiated organ of that faction, complain that the Committee should have required the submissiou of the names of the nominees to the State Convention for ratification. All these complaints are unreasonable, as a little consideration will show.

The State Committee has no express jurisdiction over District affairs, but it has an implied supervision. In this case, it was necessary that the Committee should assume jurisdiction. In the Northern District an attempt was made by the County Committees to agree, and they could not; and there was no authority to decide. In the Southern District there could not have been an agreement, and there was no attempt on the part of any County Committee to fix a time or place for a District Convention. Neither was there any attempt in the Middle District. It was well known that the Central Committee proposed to call Congressional Conventions; the people had abundant time to consider the matter; they were forced to consider it by the publication of objections on many sides; and yet the majority of the County Committees and of the Union party undoubtedly expected and desired the State Committee to take the action which was taken. The call for the Congressional Conventions is therefore in accordance with the popular will and with reason.

The proper place for holding the Conventions is Sacramento, and there, as the future will show, they will do all their business. The Southern District Convention immediately after organizing might adjourn to San Francisco; the Northern District Convention might adjourn to Marysville; but neither will do so. There is no reason why the Conventions should not act as fairly and independently at the capital as elsewhere; and it is certain that the Conventions will be fuller and the business better attended to there than at any other place. Nearly all the counties will send only one set of delegates to both Conventions; and many who would attend a District Convention in Sacramento would not attend it elsewhere. To remove the Convention would be to fill it with proxies and increase the power of traders. The delegates from Tulare, Fresno, Stanislaus, Merced and Mariposa will certainly oppose an adjournment of the Southern District Convention to San Francisco; and in the North, Yolo, Solano, Napa, Lake, Sonoma, Marin, and Mendocino will object to going to Marysville. Custom has determined that nominations for the Judicial Districts containing many counties should be made at the State Convention. That has been the invariable rule, with all parties. The Union party did not depart from it last year. So much for the complaint of the "men."

The other complaint is still more unreasonable. No district nomination has ever been submitted to a State Convention. A mere formal ratification would do no good; and any refusal to ratify would not induce the District Convention to change its purpose, and could only lead to ill-feeling. The motive of this complaint is well understood and it has met the treatment it deserved.

Our conclusion is that the State Central Committee have done precisely what they should have done, and what all well-informed and sensible men would have done in their place. There has been some talk of a bolting Union nomination in this district but the idea must be abandoned. Good Union men cannot venture upon anything so dangerous. Independent Union tickets may be run safely in San Francisco when the County Committee does not command the public confidence, and when the regular nominees are unfit men, because we have a large majority, and the Independents have a thorough organization; but in the interior counties the regular Committees have the public confidence, the Independents have no organization, and the Union majority is not large. Out of 32,000 votes in this district we have only 5,000 majority; and any division would send a Copperhead to Congress. That idea of a bolting nomination must be abandoned.

WHAT CAPITAL CAN DO.

ANNOUNCEMENT is made in our financial article of the dissolution of the old banking house of Donohoe, Ralston & Co., and the organization of a new house which will carry on the business of the old, with a capital stock paid in of $2,000,000. W. C. Ralston and R. S. Fretz of the old house continue in the new one, and associated with them are twenty or more of our most eminent business men and prominent capitalists.

In this movement we have at last a step forward in the right direction, and one which will be recognized as a public good. The organization of this house is especially timely, and must have a beneficial influence not only in our city but also throughout the State. The bad prospects in the country and the tightness in the money market here were already causing people to draw long faces and look with gloomy forebodings at the future. The infusion of new capital, or rather the concentration of it for judicious use and circulation at a time like this, is like new blood in sinking veins, or the introduction of fresh air into a close and crowded room. The need on this coast has long been a large bank, a house built upon a comfortable capital and backed by brains. The curse of the country hitherto has been small banks, public borrowers and private lenders. Capital that judiciously applied would have given a new impetus to everything and brought back a golden return to its controllers as well, gathered in private hands and rusted in iron safes, to be doled out occasionally at extravagant rates of interests upon doubtful securities, but benefitting the community at large very little. There were banks enough about, but they were too limited in capital to meet financial needs when scarcity came. If a temporary tightness occurred in the money market, loans already out were called in and further accommodations refused. The action was very much like that which a water company would be guilty of if they, the moment that a temporary choking of their pipes occurred and the town became thirsty, should cut off the supply of water altogether. In some respects, capital is like water—not in that it is apt to evaporate or get spilled, but because when dispersed in little rivulets and springs it runs to waste, while, if concentrated, it can be made to turn the wheels of manufacture or float the sails of commerce. Of course, the capitalist owes a duty to himself to which the needs of his customer are secondary. But in most cases their interests are common, and what tends to the good of the one turns directly to the benefit of the other. The idea that the interests of lender and borrower are directly opposed to each other is as fallacious as was the long prevalent impression that authors and publishers are natural enemies and that their interests run in counter channels.

A concentration of capital for banking purposes is what this coast has long needed. In this new house, which is very aptly called "The Bank of California," it has it. Unless all commercial interests are greatly benefitted by the new bank, and the capitalists interested come in for a rich reward as well, we are greatly out in our surmises.

A Death March in our Busy City.—The funeral of a well-known musician of this city took place on Tuesday afternoon. As the cortége, with a band of eighty instruments, passed through Montgomery street, both sides of the thoroughfare were packed with a slowly-advancing crowd, who kept perfect time with the rhythmical swell of Beethoven's exquisite music. Every block added to the number of self-constituted mourners, who fell into step with the moving procession. Clerks and customers joined in the throng. The broker for the moment forgot his professional "feet" as he timed his own to the solemn cadence of that funeral strain; bulls and bears locked arms and walked reverently forward in the atmosphere of its harmony. An original threnody, of great pathos and beauty, said to have been composed by the deceased in anticipation of this event, was played for the first time, and the cortége was followed to the summit of Bush street hill before a large portion of the crowd were content to return to their regular pursuits. Altogether, the occasion formed an instructive and wholesome episode in the bustle and selfish life of a business thoroughfare.

The Countess Diana came in too late this week for a place on the first form, and an extra page of advertisements crowded her out from the second. The story of this interesting lady will be resumed next week and continued without further interruption. In the meanwhile those interested in the progress of the romance can rest assured that godmother and godson are doing as well as can be expected.

The New Nation intends to support Fremont or nobody in the coming election. It may just as well support one as the other; very little difference is involved in the result. As far as we are concerned, we had about as lief have nobody as Fremont.

FINANCIAL AFFAIRS, STOCKS, ETC.

THE feature of the week in financial circles is the prospectus of the Bank of California and the announcement of a dissolution of the eminent banking house of Donohoe, Ralston & Co. The Bank of California, a joint stock company, comprising some of the solid men of this city as stockholders, will commence business on the 5th proximo, with a cash capital of $2,000,000, under the immediate direction of D. O. Mills, as President, and W. C. Ralston as Executive Manager. The transactions of this institution will embrace the general features of a banking business, and will doubtless prove an important auxiliary to the many interests requiring aid from such sources. Its capital stock will be increased to $5,000,000 if the operations of the Bank should assume in the future the proportions anticipated by those intimately connected with the association.

The British and California Banking Company and the British and American Banking Company are both adopting preliminary measures to commence business in this city. Subscriptions to the capital stock of the former corporation have been made in London to the full extent of their proposed requirements for the present.

This important increase to the banking capital of San Francisco is regarded with much satisfaction by all classes.

The Money market exhibits no material change; there being no unusual demand except in mining stock circles. Capitalists are timid and cautious in parting with their means for this description of collateral, even at excessive rates of interest. The Stock market during the week has been more steady than for some time past, and leading shares at the close are well maintained at current quotations. A large business has been done in a number of low-priced stocks at variable rates.

Forty feet of Gould and Curry have been sold at the Stock and Exchange Board within the range of $2,900 cash, and $3,150—buyers' option sixty days — closing yesterday at $3,100. The tenor of advices from the mine would ordinarily enhance the market value of this stock, but other influences are still at work checking any favorable feature that presents itself.

Ophir has been dealt in to the extent of 25 feet, at about $800; but is now in rather less request at $780. The development of certain portions of this mine, hitherto unproductive, is progressing favorably; and it is said that within sixty days the payment of dividends may be resumed.

Savage has measurably recovered from its recent depression, and is firmly held at about $1,775. A decided improvement in the productiveness of this claim has taken place during the past ten days, and the net earnings are accumulating for the next dividend.

Potosi advanced to $925 a few days since, fell yesterday to $900, and closes at $1.000, asked.

Chollar rose to $625, buyer 30, the early part of the week, then fell to $530, advanced again to $580, and declined since to about $500. Some 170 feet in all changed hands. The pay vein in this mine has been traced south a distance of 175 feet.

Imperial steadily rose from $125, seller 30, to $155, buyer 30. Bullion advanced from $70 to $75.

North American has been actively dealt in at declining rates, and some 500 shares were sold within the range of 118, buyer 30, and 95 cash—closing at $100, b. 30.

Lady Bryan has attracted considerable attention, and nearly 2,000 shares changed hands, advancing from $31 to $40, buyer 30, and selling yesterday at about $28.

Burning Moscow fell from $42 to $35, and sold at the close at $32. Real del Monte declined from $33 to $31.

North Potosi has fluctuated but little, and closes at about $75. Nevada (J. G.) has advanced from $35 to $55.

New Coinage of Cents.—We have been shown by Mr. Swain, Superintendent of the Branch Mint in this city, a new coinage of cents—sensible to say the least of it—specimens of which he has just received from the Director of the Mint. The new pieces are of bronze, and while new and fresh bear a remarkable resemblance to gold. The one-cent pieces are of the same size and very much like the old nickel; on one side they have the head of Liberty, surrounded by the words—"United States of America," and the date; on the other side the denomination of the coin in letters, enclosed in a wreath and surmounted by the Federal shield. The two-cent pieces are the novelty. The Federal shield with arrows, a wreath, the motto "God our trust," and the date of the coin occupy one side; on the other we have the bold numeral 2 over the word cents stamped in the segment of a circle, surrounded by a wreath of waving grain, and around all "United States of America." Altogether the coins are as pretty as any that ever came from the Mint, and the only regret of the possessor will be that they are not composed of more precious metal.

One of our agricultural journals is recommending the brine of herrings as a fertilizer. Would not this be farming on a small scale? It is really wonderful how prolific of resources these theoretical agriculturists are, and it is decidedly amusing to glance through the columns of a paper, whose editor actually does not know a Hydraulic ram from a Southdown, telling practical farmers how to till their lands. The old saying about teaching one's grandmother how to suck eggs, has a pertinent application in these instances.

THINGS.

San Francisco, Saturday, June 18th, 1864.

SURELY, there is a vein for the silver and a place for gold where they fine it!

That is what a friend of mine said when he went to Reese River. On his return he said he'd been looking in vain for the silver, and that as for the gold he thought there were more places where they didn't find it than where they did.

My friend was a sage, and he had a brush with the Indians, and came back from that country in such a condition that we couldn't get anything out of him but alkalis and other lies for a month.

Why do people go to Washoe when it is so easy to stay away?

Rather than go to Washoe I think I'd owe for my washing and dine out with my friends.

Washoe certainly has some good points. It sends us bullion and bricks—mark that, and then Mark Twain. But rather than all its points, good or otherwise, give me Point Lobos.

At this latter place the other day I struck a rich ledge of seal—green seal, at that—and at once located a claim. It takes in the Cliff House, Foster, the barkeeper, the dead whale and the big seal, Ben Butler.

It was while viewing this latter possession of mine that Whittier wrote that charming and truthful couplet:

> For of all sad words of tongue or pen
> The saddest are these: It might have Ben!

In staking out my claim I got possession of the Cliff House and Foster and the whale and the barkeeper easy enough. They knew that I intended to establish a big bank and gave me a quit deed—or a notice to quit, indeed, which is the same thing—without a murmur. But not so my friend old Ben. He said he didn't care a continental for my bank, and preferred to keep out to sea as far as possible. He had as good a lay out as he wanted on that rock of his; he rocked himself to sleep there and didn't pay any rent or gas bills, and the Bensley people couldn't lay any pipes on him—not they; they couldn't steal his water.

A cute lawyer got him, though. All water runs to the sea, and brandy and water sometimes goes there to, so I took Lake out with me. He suggested that there was a gentleman on Kearny street who was very fond of newspaper men and sometimes furnished them carriages to ride in all night, and that it would be policy to engage a team of him, since, if any trouble occurred in the settlement, suit could be brought by the reporter in re Porter, which would be all right and a great moral lesson as well.

We went out there—and how do you think the Judge worked it? He simply walked with a parchment in his hand to the edge of the beach and said: Sign, seal, and deliver!

The seal signed, the thing was done, and Richard is himself again—Richard of the Sea-liou Heart, he is now.

I intend to propose my seal when the primary elections come round again for a seat at the Board of Education. And then if he doesn't know the difference between the Union as it was and the Union as it isn't, when the words are plainly printed on an invitation to a Fourth of July celebration—why, he's a fit subject for the Coroner, that's all! . . .

I'm afraid I've digressed a little. We were talking of something else. To return to our motto:

Surely if there be a place in the world where they fine not only gold but also the people who have it, that place is California.

I was fined once, but the second time they tried it they couldn't find me. I was out—left for Washoe, the boy told them, at four o'clock.

Seriously, although many profess to be puzzled about the "place for gold where they fine it," to my mind the thing is plain and simple enough. California is the place, and reference is had to the proposed tax on our mines.

Speaking of that quotation, rather a comical thing occurred when the Californian was first started. An impression of the head of the paper was taken, and though many didn't like it—for which the editor didn't care two bits, seeing that it was his own funeral—all agreed that they had never seen a head like it before:

But one of the party reading the motto over aloud, cried out—

"What does this mean? 'Surely there is a vein for the silver and a place for gold where they fine it, Van Vleck & Co.!'"

Sure enough, the name of the artist followed the quotation in regular credit order, so that with half California Van Vleck would have had the credit of that quaint verse and perhaps of the whole chapter, if a dexterous blacksmith had not been called in. A file soon took the name off from file. But it is due to Van Vleck to say that he engraved the Californian's head, though he didn't write the book of Job. . . .

I mentioned something about being on the point of starting a large bank. By reference to the advertisement in another part of the paper, it will be seen that my name doesn't appear; but this is easily explained. The fact of the matter is, I didn't want it to. For it is thought that I am concerned in starting a new paper, and this might have made people doubt the solvency of our bank, although two million dollars is paid in.

It will be seen, however, that I am interested by reading the paragraphs in the daily papers. These say "twenty of our most eminent and trustworthy citizens are concerned in the enterprise."

Now, how could you get that number together in this town without counting me in!

I reiterate that I am interested, and so is every one else that has occasion to borrow money. Before the enterprise was started I told Col. Ralston and Capt. Fretz that they might use my name if they thought it would do them any good, and they said if they had occasion to they'd let me know. So I suppose it is all right, and that by stepping up to the counter and handing in my checks on the 1st of July, I can have a jolly good time on the Fourth.

Two millions of dollars in town—only think of it!

In a slight conversation with Mr. Shotwell, the other day, I asked him how he liked the picture, and he expressed himself as very much pleased. He said he thought he'd obtain permission of the Court and draw a small check for six thousand or so immediately, for his funds were getting rather short. He was confident that either Mr. Ralston or Mr. Donohoe would cash a check for him, as they had done it once before, and he bore them no ill will for anything that subsequently happened. . . .

My chief trouble, of late, has been with Gould and Curry. Of course I don't own any, but it vexes me to think how it would have gone back on me if I did.

Suppose I had owned one hundred feet which cost me forty-five hundred dollars a foot, and which has been selling down as low as twenty-five hundred, I should have lost just two hundred thousand dollars.

It is frightful even in contemplation.

Or suppose I had two hundred and fifty feet of the stock which cost me, assessments and all—I being one of the first holders—three hundred dollars a foot. At one time I could have sold out at five thousand dollars a foot, and now the stock is selling at three.

You will readily see that my loss at the present time would be five hundred thousand dollars ($500,000.)

The whole stock cost me seventy-five thousand dollars—I might have sold out once for one million two hundred and fifty thousand, but if compelled to part with it now I could only realize some seven hundred and fifty thousand from the sale.

It is true that by holding it I would receive an interest of two per cent a month in dividends on the highest sum the stock ever touched, and that at that rate it would pay for itself clear in a very few years; but still would I not be justified in standing on the street corners and warning people that all mines were a weak invention of the enemy, something to be shunned and avoided?

Perhaps they are. My own experience has been far from encouraging to a young man who is pursuing things under difficulties. Wide West walloped me on my first arrival in the country and Daney dampened me the second week. Of course I wanted to get even with the game and quit, and allowed my friends to persuade me into other operations the results of which are yet undetermined—but as yet nothing in which I am specially interested has paid any dividends.

I'm not quite even with the game yet, but for all that I've quit it. It is a very pretty game, so far as my experience goes, and very easily played. The first thing to be learned is how to put down, and there isn't much occasion to be very expert at doing anything else. Any one can play it who knows how to ante and is possessed of one of those hopeful dispositions that are not discouraged by discovering that the more they put down the less they take up. But the game beats me, and my checks are all handed in.

I have some fortunate friends who are more than even on it—there is General Lent, for instance, who has just gone over the mountains in a balloon, making the round trip in about fifteen hours.

To my personal knowledge, he is largely interested in Gould and Curry; has more of the Savage about him than any copper-colored Indian in the sage brush; and as for Ophir, Yellow Jacket, and such little things—don't mention them.

The secret isn't generally out; but not satisfied with all this, he has gone after North Potosi. I scarcely think he'll fetch it.

North Potosi is christened after Judge North, and he's got something to say in disposing of the case. If he knew the small—the very small—interest which I personally have in the success of the suit, I'm sure he'd pronounce an opinion in its favor. It doesn't make much difference to him how he decides, but it is a matter of vital importance to me. I wonder whether he understands that.

Of very many things in life I'm an excellent judge—why can't they elect me to some such office up in Nevada. I think I'd show them a judicial wrinkle or two in a judicious way.

Voltaire said: Si j'etois roi, je voudrois etre juste! This is one of the points where Voltaire and the writer differ, much as they resemble each other in the possession of clear logical minds, keen powers of analyzation and subtlety of research, not to mention great erudition.

If a man is a King there is no necessity for him to be just; it pays much better to be the other thing. And the same remark holds good with regard to being a Judge.

Imagine Inigo on the bench; his florid yet noble countenance wearing a becoming expression of dignity mingled with that quiet repose which would naturally result from having made up his mind how to dispose of the case before he had heard a word of the evidence. This his charge to the jury:

Gentlemen of the Jury: You are assembled upon your oaths, but that isn't much matter up here in Nevada. In the case before you it is for you to decide which party can pay the best for a verdict in their favor, and it is for me to instruct you if you are wrong. You have not heard the evidence in the case and probably very few of you would have understood it if you had. In rendering your verdict you will be entirely governed by the number of feet which have been distributed among you, and you will remember that the Judge is entitled to his share. Sheriff, conduct these men into a comfortable room, furnish them with cigars and a reasonable amount of brandy and water, collecting the expenses from the party which wins the suit. And you will not permit them to have communication with any persons whatever, unless it be some one who comes to outbid all previous offers. For surely there is a vein for the silver and a place for gold where they fine it. Sheriff, do your duty, and subscribe to The Californian.

After this avowal of my sentiments and frank laying down of a platform, if Nevada doesn't pick me up, the loss is all its own. For I do think I could decide more cases in a day and make more money out of them, than any man over or under the mountains. . . .

Everybody knows that the Fourth of July is near, and everybody ought to know that it is their duty to buy fireworks and flags to celebrate the occasion with.

Will the Howler come after me if I mildly declare that I am not extravagantly fond of the Fourth of July and would willingly travel into the country to get clear of it if possible?

Just as regularly as the year comes round a certain number of men get their heads, hands or arms blown off in firing salutes; boys have their eyes put out in firing dilapitated pistols, and little girls are frightened into convulsions by squibs and rockets let off about their ears by youthful patriots.

There is a distinct remembrance in my mind of a fire-cracker having once been dropped into the corner of my left eye as I was passing down a crowded thoroughfare, hearing the hurrahs and speeches, and feeling my heart swell within me at the proud thought of being an American citizen.

The swelling of my heart has gone down, but the swelling about my eye lingers yet.

I shall try to go to Napa on the Fourth—or to Mare Island. For I don't think they have any at either of those places. There isn't quite enough Fourth to go round; and little out-of-the-way places like these don't get any—they are like the little lion that didn't get any Daniel. . . .

There were several other things I intended to say; but the same press which crowded La Comtesse Diane overboard this week, compels me to cut down my overflowing imagination to the limits of the paper.

In taking leave of my friends until another week rolls round, I do not say: Be virtuous and you will be happy, since there be those who "allow" that the proposition involved in that sentiment admits of doubt; but I do say: Try it on and see how it will work!

It has contributed much to the happiness of Inigo.

ANECDOTES.

A CORRESPONDENT sends us all the way from Sacramento the following batch of little stories, mostly of little people. They have a subdued flavor of that ever open and never shutting "Drawer" in a popular magazine where "little four-year olds" are always laid up in lavender. Without intending to infringe on the Harper's patent we print these, as our correspondent declares that they have never been published before, and pledges his word that everything happened as narrated. This first one on the list has got point:

At a soiree lately there was a little fellow about twelve years old, whom we knew very well by sight, but did not know any more than his first name. He appeared to be rather backward, and when dancing commenced had no partner. Seeing a young Miss of our acquaintance apparently disengaged, at the opposite end of the room, we offered to introduce him to her "No," said he, "I'd rather not be introduced to her." "Why not?" said we; "she's a very nice girl." "No, not to her; I'd rather be introduced to somebody else." The peculiar emphasis he placed upon her induced us to ask him, "Why not to her; what objection have you got?" The little fellow looked at us with as roguish a twinkle as ever shone out of two eyes, and said, "She's my sister." That let us out.

A tea meeting was on the tapis at our church lately. Little Lizzie and her brother Arthur were discussing the matter one day. Lizzie was eager to go, and anxiously waiting for the auspicious occasion; Arthur, however, did not appear to anticipate any pleasure from the affair. After talking a little while, Arthur asked: "Who's going to be there?" "Oh," answered Lizzie, "Mr. B. is going to be there; Miss K., Johnny W., and—Jesus is going to be there!" Let us hope that the Saviour's spirit, at least, was present on the occasion.

The presiding genius at our restaurant is not an adept in orthography. Among the delicacies included in our bill of fare the other day was "Stewed Hair." Though this article is frequently cooked in all manner of ways in such places, it is not generally put down in the bill of fare.

A friend of ours received the following letter lately from his partner, who had gone to Nevada with a quantity of goods to sell for their mutual benefit:

"Virginia City April —, 1864.

Dear Sir: I have just recovered from a spree. Goods all sold; money all gone; no credit; awful state of society. Please lend me $50. Yours, John W."

WURDS OF GREETIN'.

BY A FELLOE FROM THE HUB.

THET'S jest the way it ollers happ'ns—
I never c'n tel, but shure sumhow
Ez I start out sum other cap'ns
Nu craft goes sailin' 'cross my bow.

This time I hedu't really started,
But I wuz ser'ously thinkin' of it,
Wen this nu weakly 'fore me darted,
With "CALIFORNIAN" writ above it.

Better a darned site to forgiv him,
Thinks I, cz I wuz kind o' late;
Ef a feller's mad, it don't releeve him
Tu go tu chewin' the cud o' Hate.

A weakly sheet of rime an' reasonin',
Is wut the peeple want, I think;
Nut tu much sarse but lots o' seasonin'
Will sarve like holesome vittles & drink.

I like the growin' of other peeple;
There's folks must live besides myself;
An' I carn't 'ford on you to heap ill
Who'll soon be layin' me on the shelf.

So joy go with ye in the teachin'
O' folks some things they all don't know;
I b'lieve you'll never fall to preachin',
Nor think you'll reap ware you don't sow.

'Taint pol'ticks folks are ollers after;
'Taint morals either, shure's you live—
I ruther guess the devil 'd laff to Read thru sech sermons ez you'd give.

It aint all principles thet peeples'
Thorts want to feed on an' digest,
Nor 'taint wat's taught beneath the steeples
Thet's ollers healthiest & best.

It's jest a pleasant kind o' salad,
A leetle o' this an' sum o' that,
A leetle prose, then say a ballad—
A salmagundi o' lean an' fat.

An' mix in the milky human kindness
Thet runs rite thru some good folks' days,
Thet cures a deal of others' blindness,
And whitens up folks' blackened ways.

It sumtimes gits a sort o' sprinkled
Intu the politicks men talk;
Then morals, that before looked rinkled,
Git smoothed an' look ez white ez chalk.

Sometimes it gits in a parson's sermon,
Au' takes the crinks out o' the creeds,
Makes the black surplus wite as ermine,
An' faith no 'count without the deeds.

It clears the way for pleasant dealin's,
And gives a thunderiu' sight o' grace;
It takes the sting out of the feelin's,
An' gives Old Nick an angel's face.

Then t'other thing—the tone keeps ringin',
An' in the air the flag I see;
Its burden paytriot hearts keep singin',
Singin', "My country, 'tis o' thee."

Our country! May the good God bless her!
You won't forgit her stripes an' stars,
And may we find her wrongs' redresser
In Grant, who's on the field of Mars.

He sees that from our constellation
Some wanderin' stars have fallen thru;
He's huntin' 'em thru all creation,
An' he, God willin', 'll find 'em tu.

THE SANITARY COMMISSION.

GROUNDLESSNESS OF THE CHARGES PREFERRED AGAINST IT.

OUR readers are aware that from time to time there have been rumors of frauds discovered in the administration of the Sanitary Fund; in the most cases vague rumors merely, but narrowing down occasionally to specific allegations which assumed a color of plausibility, if not of truth. And this has been the favorite excuse with those who were too niggardly to subscribe to the Fund: "Very little of the money finds its way to the soldiers." All familiar with the economy of the Sanitary Commission are aware that by the system of checks and counter-checks which is kept up it would be almost impossible for a fraud to be perpetrated without instant detection; but there are others who seem to imagine that the money contributed is kept in a great bag, into which all connected with the Commission are permitted to plunge their hands and help themselves at pleasure. The Rev. H. C. Badger—in a discourse from Dr. Bellows' pulpit on Sunday last—gave some illustrations of the unreliability of public rumor and the readiness, if not eagerness, of the multitude to receive false impressions, so pertinent and striking that we make copious extracts therefrom. Some of these illustrations belong to the history of the Sanitary Commission and so have a peculiar interest to Californians at present.

Remarking upon the specific statements which in some cases are testified to by "reliable witnesses," Mr. Badger said:

In truth, there are no reliable witnesses. No testimony can be received till the cross-examination has sifted it. The deceitfulness of evidence, the unreliability of testimony, passes belief. False inference is far more common than false statement. And men blend inference with observation; they testify not to what they saw, but to what they inferred; their eyes were good, but their logic was bad. All who have seen anything of legal testimony know how nearly impossible it is to induce witnesses to testify to what they saw—not to what they thought they saw.

Our public affairs continually bring us instances of this error. What scandal we heard all the winter of 1863, concerning the chief statesman of our present National Administration, the Secretary of State! The air of the Midland and the East was full of the rumor that he was intemperate, that he was a sot, that, not to put too fine a point upon it, he was habitually, publicly drunk. In vain did you resist the rumor, in vain did you point to the admirable conduct of his department, to his state papers so able, so lucid, so calm, coming from none but a cool and clear head. You were confronted with any amount of direct testimony from men who had been to Washington and seen with their own eyes.

But when their statements were scrutinized, what was it that men saw? They saw the Secretary, while taking his luncheon at his public desk, drinking an amber-colored fluid from a wine-glass, which was repeatedly filled from a decanter by his side! Could anything be plainer? Should not men trust their eyes? Could one drink that amount and not be a sot? Could this be aught but brandy or wine? For, how should they know that, for convenience' sake, the Secretary had his tea sent to the Capitol in a bottle and drank it from a glass! A friend gave the Secretary a hint; a tea-pot took the place of the decanter, and the rumor died away.

This war gives birth to a monstrous amount of misrepresentation. It saddens the homes and discourages the charities of the land. That great charity of the war—the noblest of any age, the embodiment of Christianity, in whose labors the generous land of California has been honorably conspicuous—the Sanitary Commission, has not escaped the all-assailing blight of calumny. Several times the streams of charity flowing into its ample coffers have been slackened, and its contributors made heart-sick by stories of waste and fraud.

The stories seemed true; they were well authenticated; the witnesses were honest and able; they were on the ground; they testified, apparently, only to what their eyes had seen.

One of these cruel rumors was that faithless agents of the Commission had fraudulently sold to the paper-mill tons of lint and linen bandages which the tireless hands of our Northern women had gathered. The tale seemed true. A mill in Massachusetts had the articles. They were bought in Baltimore, or, as was alleged, of an agent of the Sanitary Commission. Dr. Bellows followed the story up, found the man who made the sale, and found that he had no connection whatever with the Sanitary Commission. He found, moreover, that the transaction was in no respect a criminal one. A "State Relief Association," having more of these things than were used, had sold them to procure other things, for want of which the soldiers from their State were dying on their hands. Though that necessity was unfortunate, the transaction was not, but praiseworthy. Nor was it in any way the act of the Commission, though both the Commission and the soldiers had to suffer therefor. It gave an excuse for not giving; and men are so proue to seize a pretext for shutting the purse! I have met many who had heard that rumor, but had never heard the truth.

There was another case more striking still:

A soldier appeared who had bought garments bearing the Sanitary Commission mark. It seemed that five thousand soldiers had done the same. There was no mistake here. Here were the soldiers wearing the garments; here was the Commission's mark, on the garments themselves. Five thousand pairs of stockings, which the hands of generous affection had sent for the hospitals, had been sold, by somebody, to well soldiers in active service. How faithless or inefficient the Commission must be to permit such frauds!

The President of the Commission, with his usual tireless diligence, sent at once to investigate, and lo! it appeared that an excellent quartermaster, Col. Ingalls, not being able to clothe his barefoot men, and being unwilling to see them suffer, had borrowed of the Sanitary Commission these five thousand pairs of stockings, to repay them when the Government supplies came on. They were sold to the soldiers, as all extra clothing is.

Now, the transaction was honorable and praiseworthy. The quartermaster and the Commission agent deserved somebody's thanks. It was one of the many cases where the Commission has been able to prevent as well as cure disease, thus reinforcing our armies. Yet how like fraud it looked! Every one of those five thousand soldiers could prove to all who would trust their eyes that wrong had been done. He had but to show the garments bearing the Commission's mark, and to allege that he, a well soldier, bought what should have been given to the convalescent or the sick. And out of that one transaction what thousands of reports could go to every corner of the land to discourage donations and shake the public faith! When we remember how rumors go as they fly, and that every man who repeats the story seems to remember a little more of it, we may see the need, in all such cases, of taking heed how we hear.

As to the prevalent belief that the coffers of the Commission are bursting with fullness, Mr. Badger said:

Let that report never be credited while there is a single soldier under arms! Let it be remembered that the Commission has never been able, and never can be able, to do all that needs to be done! And let it not be forgotten that this summer brings greater demands than ever before. Just now the expenses must be enormous. The great conflicts in Georgia and north and south of Richmond—disaster and the malarious summer in Louisiana—create a demand which cannot be satisfied. The great battle, running through May, and reaching from Fredericksburg down to Richmond, involves fearful expense. Besides the regular Sanitary Commission corps, which always accompanies the Army of the Potomac, and is large enough for ordinary emergencies, they have sent a special body of sixty nurses, and twenty-five relief agents, with nine great wagons and forty horses, while three steamers (to load one of which with vegetables for Butler's army costs $13,000) are kept busy, at an aggregate expense of not less than $500 per day. Then such items as $500 soldiers' postage on descriptive lists from Chattanooga; $4,000 for condensed milk; $6,000 for cordials; $1,000 cash to New Orleans; $10,000 to Washington, and $10,000 to the West, for current expenses in either region—such items, voted at a single session of the Executive Committee in May, and constituting but a small part of the monthly expenditure, show the incredible magnitude of the work the Commission is carrying on. That treasury can never be full. Nor can that treasure be fraudulently drawn when every check must be voted by the Committee of New York's most trustworthy men. Heed no rumor of overabundance or of fraud; when such stories are heard, take heed how ye hear!

THE USE OF BODILY PAIN.

A DEBATE recently occurred in the House of Lords, on a bill for altering the punishment of rape. It had been proposed, and it appears probable that the proposal will become law, to superadd the punishment of flogging—as often, if the Judge thinks proper, as three times—to that which is already inflicted for this crime; and the House of Lords not only adopted this view, but, by substituting the word "shall" for the word "may," rendered it compulsory to pass this sentence. Lord Cramworth observed that instead of legislating for crimes he should "much prefer a more general view of the question." The Saturday Review takes the affirmative, and thinks that the bill in question, together with that which inflicts the same punishment on garroters, shows that the public is at last beginning to open its eyes to the fact that the indulgence of a nervous horror at the infliction of sharp bodily pain is at once a pernicious and an expensive luxury. All fashions are said to "come round" in a certain term of years, and it certainly looks now as though the fashion of flogging would come into vogue again. Discussing the subject further, the Saturday Review says:

The true reason why violent, impressive, emphatic punishments are so effective is, that they show that the public have a strong decisive feeling upon the crimes for which they are inflicted. They are meant to gratify the desire of vengeance—a lawful, natural, and most useful feeling, so long as it is kept within proper bounds, and one which daunts and cows (as no doubt it was intended to cow) offenders against morals and good order. Let any one who doubts this recall his own experiences as a schoolboy. Why did we dread a punishment felt as disgraceful, and so intended? Not for the sake of the pain, but because it was an appropriate expression of that disgust and indignation which every one fears, and ought to fear when it is just. The greatest rogue stands rebuked and abashed before an angry man who does well to be angry. The vilest of the species have consciences, and they quail and cringe before the indignation which they know to be right and good.

This shows what class of offences ought to be punished by physical pain. The infliction of such pain is the most emphatic form of expressing anger, and the most compendious and appropriate way of gratifying a lawful and healthy desire for revenge. It is, therefore, the appropriate punishment for offences which excite that feeling. There are many offences which we punish without a very lively auger against the offender. Theft and dishonesty in general, are not as a rule, and on the first offence, the result of unruly passions inimical to society at large. They are not in the nature of acts of war, which excite our hatred against the offender. They are as often as not the result of criminal weakness, or of a sort of perverted dexterity. The offences for which flogging is appropriate are, for the most part, offences against the person, offences which create personal disgust and indignation. All sexual crimes come under this head; so, as the Legislature already decided, does robbery with violence; so ought extortion by threats, one of the most hateful enormities that the mind of man can conceive; so ought assaults upon women and children for other than sexual purposes. Of crimes against property, arson is perhaps the only one for which it would be desirable to flog under any circumstances. At present, a rascally scamp who wants to be provided for gets a halfpenny box of lucifers, sets a farm-yard in a blaze, and destroys property worth thousands of pounds, smilingly gives himself up to the police, pleads guilty at the assizes, and walks off to penal servitude with the easy satisfaction of a man who has provided himself with a comfortable refuge for several years at all events. A year's (real) hard labor, and a flogging every three months, would be quite another matter. There is one other offence which deserves flogging, and probably not more than one, and that is the mutilation of animals. Payment in kind is always a good rule, and nothing is more likely to teach a cruel brute the real enormity of his guilt than a practical acquaintance with physical pain. If by a general act the punishment of flogging were extended to some or all of these offences, we should probably see a considerable diminution in the worst class of crimes, and, at all events, we should have the satisfaction of knowing that those who committed them were really and emphatically punished. We should also gain the point of introducing something like a classification according to the guilt of the acts punished, into our criminal system.

HEAT OF TEMPER.—It sometimes happens that a character generally amiable is marred by a certain fieryness of temper which tends to lead its possessor into painful relations towards his fellow-creatures. The ordinary demeanor of such persons may be calculated to conciliate the greatest esteem; he may be remarkable for benevolent acts, incapable of any show of jealous or invidious feeling, and free from all the degrading vices, Yet, being at the same time prone to sudden and violent anger, and unable when in that state to control his actions, all these good qualities will go in a great measure for nothing, or only cause his fatal infirmity to be the more lamented. It is generally to be said in favor of such persons, that their passion, as it is easily induced, so it passes quickly, and that the moment it is passed their usual benevolent feelings regain the mastery. They are even remarkable as a class for the ability to show a thorough and heartwarm forgiveness. But these circumstances, while pleading for a gentle judgment, do not save the man of hot temper from the natural consequences of such a peculiarity. It is not one of the least of these that such a man can rarely enjoy a steady and confiding friendship. The uncertainty of his demeanor—the chance of sunshine being in one moment, for no good cause, changed into gloom and thunder—makes it impossible for any one to be on perfectly cordial terms with him. Thus his own habitual feelings of social kindness are constantly exposed to disappointment and the vexation of unrequited affection, and it can rarely be that he gets through life without sinking more or less deeply into the sordid mire of a misanthrope. Yet it is comparatively well for the irascible man if no worse befall him. Too often, under a moment's transient impetuosity, does he commit acts at which his better nature shudders, and which blight all the remainder of life.

Good morals may not always be good politics, but bad morals can never be.

AFTER THE WAR—WHAT THEN?

In speculating upon the changes which the end of the war will involve in the conditions of society, our modes of thought and the structure of our government, the Round Table says:

One of the most obvious changes will be that which the creation of a great national debt will effect in the conditions of the people. We must expect, as a matter of course, that the results which followed the accumulation of national indebtedness in Europe will be manifested in this country, though under somewhat different conditions, and, perhaps, modified form. It is clear that the actual wealth of the nation will be dimmished but little if at all, by this debt. The productive power of Europe has never been greater than since the time that great national debts were incurred. Indeed, industry seems to have thriven more rapidly and yielded richer returns than when such obligations were unknown. Under the stimulus of taxation and the stern necessities begotten of a desire to discharge these obligations, labor has been organized and economized. So far, then, as the productive industry of the country is concerned, we may feel assured that as much, nay, more, wealth will be created than ever existed before. In addition to our agricultural products, from which we have heretofore derived the largest part of our national revenue, we may expect that our mineral resources will be developed in a far greater degree then ever. Mines of coal, iron, lead, copper, silver and gold will be worked as they never have been, because under the pressure of a debt which the nation will be bound to pay. Our manufacturing interests also will keep pace with the development of mineral resources, and will add to the wealth of the country. Invention will be stimulated, as it was in England after the close of the great wars with Napoleon, which imposed so great a load upon the nation, and which it has borne so nobly.

Another change, and one not so pleasant to contemplate, is almost certain to follow upon the creation of an enormous national debt, and that is, the concentration of wealth. The great fortunes of Europe, the houses distinguished for monetary strength, have been brought into existence simultaneously with the accumulation of government indebtedness. The Rothschilds, the Barings, the Browns, the Hopes, all attained to their position by this means. These houses first made made money by their transactions with the governments of Europe, and then added to their possessions by being the media through which such governments have borrowed money of the industry of their subjects. The same process is going on here before our eyes. Those who know the history of the various houses in Wall street can point out the men who are destined to be to America what the houses just mentioned are to the governments of Europe. By legitimate transactions Mr. Chase has made Mr. Jay Cooke, and through him scores of others, immensely wealthy. Henceforth America will be as distinguished for its rich men as it has heretofore been for its traders of moderate wealth. There will be the same wealth in the country, but it will be in fewer hands; we shall have fewer traders, but more merchant princes and princely bankers. This concentration of business began, in fact, before the opening of the war. The advantage of this will be that there will be fewer non-producers and more consumers, and business, by being done by the wholesale, so to speak, will be at a less cost to the industry of the nation.

As a matter of course, this concentration of great wealth will make the mass of the people poorer than has been the case with us. No matter how ingeniously taxation may be levied, the burden must fall at last upon land and labor, for from these two sources come all wealth. The man who tills the ground and he who fabricates the manufactured article will, in the end, be called upon to pay both principal and interest of the national debt, to which must be added the waste which is always incident to the collection of taxes, and the profit of their labor will be just so much less.

In speculating as to the effect of the military struggle in which we are now engaged, upon the national character, a hopeful picture is presented as follows:

Heretofore we have been governed by lawyers, by men who are fond of talk, but averse to decided action. The soldier, however, is a doer and not a talker, and soldiers will hereafter form a political class that will wield great influence. In conjunction with the advent of the military element in our current politics there will be manifested a higher sense of honor, which obtains in camps more than in courts, and a disposition to refrain from boasting, that sin of which we, as a nation, stand guilty before the world. The very campaign in which we are now engaged and which gives such encouraging promise of a victorious issue, affords a pertinent illustration of this point. At no time since the war began has there been so little of that over-confidence or of that cheap courage which is made up of words rather than deeds. The comments of the press, the daily talk of the people, are cautious. Every heart swells with devout gratitude to God for the measure of success attained, but outward demonstration is withheld until assurance of the glad tidings be made doubly sure. A skirmish is no longer a battle, nor a reconnoissance a campaign, nor a draw contest a victory; but each receives its proper name, and each is viewed in its bearings upon ultimate results. It is this spirit, we believe, which will permeate more and more the body politic. Though begotten of disappointment again and again repeated, it will prove a blessing in the end, not alone as regards our standing as a people in the eyes of other nations, but in its effects upon the national character itself. And the sentiment of honor which a soldier's life begets will have its influence upon the nation. To loose notions on this subject may be traced the origin of much of our present trouble. A bright day will it be when our party politics are purged of this disgraceful element; when neither orator nor newspaper will dare make charges against the name of any man, be it never so vile, which cannot be substantiated before a competent tribunal, to say nothing of the use of low, scurrilous language which is so common with partisan orators and partisan presses.

Herr Venedey has followed up his Life of Washington by one of Franklin, in which he gives an excellent sketch of the character and labors of our greatest American philosopher. "Washington and Franklin," he says, "were men of wholly different character. The one was a type of the magnanimity of the knight, the other of the prudence of the citizen. From the first day of his life to the last, Washington was virtue itself in action. Franklin's life, on the other hand, shows the way by which virtue may be attained, and is therefore of infinite use as an example."

NOTRE DAME DE PARIS.

A new opera by William H. Fry, for many years musical critic of the New York Tribune, has lately been produced in Philadelphia. "Figaro," a theatrical critic who was present at the first representation, says that on attempting to find where the opera was to be produced he had some difficulty, every one having heard of Notre Dame, but evidently supposing that it was a hotel or a church, or something of that sort, in Paris. Of the opera he says that it "abounds in delicious melodics which set every heart to music; with grand choral and instrumental effect which swept over the house like a storm; and with thrilling musical and dramatic situations which held the audience, at times. breathless with suspense. The following is an abstract of the plot of the opera—the libretto, by J. R. Fry, being written, says our critic, with so much ability as—rarest of exertions—to be positively readable.

The era of the story (which is based on Victor Hugo's celebrated romance) is during the reign of Louis XI. of France, in the year 1482. It opens during a festival, by which the Court and City of Paris welcome Margaret of Flanders as the bride elect of the King's eldest son; and on a morning when the populace of the city and neighborhood are engaged in celebrating the day of the King-of-Fools. Esmeralda, a girl belonging to a strange band of gipsies, and a great favorite, as a singer and daneer, with the people, gratifies them by taking part in their extravagant merriment. She has previously been kindly noticed by Capt. de Chateaupers, a young an noble officer of the royal guard; and has also become an object of unlawful interest to Dom Frollo, one of the ecclesiastics of the Cathedral of Notre Dame, and Astrologer to the King; the latter character, in that age, being held in special reverence equally by the highest and the most ignorant classes of the civilized world generally. A half-crazed lady, a stranger in Paris and known as Gudule, has passed a number of years seeking a daughter stolen in infancy from her, by gipsies. She is encountered by de Chateaupers, whose interest in Esmeralda is quickened by the suspicion, that the girl may be of gentle birth, and that Gudule may be her mother.

While the revelry of the holiday is in progress, Quasimodo is brought to the great square in front of the Cathedral, attired as the King-of-Fools, and hailed with extravagant delight by the crowd. Quasimodo is deformed and ill-favored; a nameless foundling, picked up in his infancy and taken eare of by Dom Frollo, who has secured him the post of chief bell-ringer of Notre Dame. Frollo is indignant that his servant should court the burlesque homage of the people, drags him from his mock throne, and then only escapes the consequences of interference with their amusement, through the awe inspired by his mysterious profession. He is even more incensed at Chateaupers, whose presence has interrupted his passionate advances to Esmeralda. Hopeless afterwards of success by persuasion, he obtains the professed consent of Quasimodo, to aid him in abducting the girl from her humble and lonely home on the rural banks of the Seine—the hunchback intending however to protect her, though seeming to share in his patron's plot. They arrive near the house in the evening, at a moment when Chateaupers has preceded them, and when declaring his love, he is assured of Esmeralda's in return. She exhibits to him a dagger and an amulet, keepsakes from her childhood. Frollo, witnessing the love-scene through an open casement, in the sudden rage of his disappointment and jealousy, blows out a lamp near the window, and snatching the dagger, stabs Chateaupers unseen by any of the parties. Chateaupers falls insensible and Esmeralda faints.

Frollo, while endeavoring to bear her off, is interrupted by the lieutenant and soldiers of Chateaupers coming to the house. Quasimodo and Frollo hasten away at the moment when the girl, recovering her senses, is encountered by the soldiers. They seize her as the assassin. She is imprisoned, and Frollo adds to their accusation the charge that she had, by her sorceries, bewitched himself and Chateaupers. According to the laws of France she is, for this cause, condemned to death. Chateaupers proves to have been only wounded, and he and Gudule, whose relationship to Esmeralda is proved by the amulet in her possession, seek the King to obtain a pardon. At the same time she is secretly visited by Frollo in prison, who in vain offers to rescue her if she will surrender to his protection. She is taken out to be executed: the pardon is obtained, but too late to save her. As the bier with the body of Esmeralda is borne along, Quasimodo, who had cherished an honest and untold love for her, meets Frollo, and publicly proclaims him her false accuser and wanton murderer. Frollo, maddened with shame and remorse, rushes on him with a drawn dagger, is disarmed by Chateaupers, and, in the struggle, is killed by Quasimodo, who then falls himself, a suicide, beside the corpse of Esmeralda.

GEORGE SAND'S "MARQUIS OF VILLEMER."

The Paris correspondent of the Publisher's Circular, writing from Paris under date of March 18th, says that the last four teen days presented a most stirring fortnight. Among the excitements were the production of the younger Dumas' new play, l'Ami des femmes, and the dramatization of George Sands' Le Marquis de Villemer, by the authoress. And this, according to the correspondent, is the way the novel came to be dramatized:

Last year M. de La Rounat went to Nohant, Mme. George Sand's country seat; he was uninvited, and as he entered the drawing-room where the eminent authoress was seated with her son, M. Maurice Sand (whom you saw in America, in the suite of Prince Napoleon,) and his wife, who is a daughter of Calamatta, the well-known engraver, and her daughter, who is the wife of M. Clesinger, the sculptor, and with M. Alex. Dumas the younger, who was at Nohant on a visit, he (M. de Rounat) said: "Can you imagine, madame, why I quitted Paris to visit Nohant?" "Indeed I cannot." "It is to beg you to dramatize Le Marquis de Villemer, and give it to the Odeon." "Would it have any chance of success?" "I'll guarantee it a long career of success." "Very well, then, it shall be done. Alexandre, (she turned to the younger Dumas as she spoke,) would you like to join me in writing the piece?" "Yes, indeed; but let me read again the novel, and I'll give you a definite reply to-morrow." The next day M. Dumas declined taking part in the piece, and it was written by the authoress alone. There is scarcely anything changed in the novel except that Peyraque's family disappears for a Protestant body-servant, who makes somewhat the same figure the traditional Quaker cuts in English farce. It was thought that an energetic effort would be made to hiss the piece off the stage. Mme. George Saud's last novel, Mlle. de La Quintinie, raised a great many enemies, and it was said that they would damn the play, for they are most virulent. The square in front of the Odeon was filled from an early hour of the day with a dense crowd, and the wooden barriers, in which the early part of the audience are cooped here, were choke-full before noon, although the day was particularly disagreeable from a fine rain and cold wind which blew the falling spray to the very marrow of one's bones. The curtain was to rise at 8 o'clock, P. M. Admire the patience of this impatient nation, content to stand eight hours to see a play! As daylight declined the crowd became denser, and it was an arduous task for the police and soldiers to clear the way for the Emperor and Empress when they came about 8 o'clock. The play met with a most enthusiastic reception. After it ended, the audience, or rather the pit (which was chiefly composed of students from the great schools) went in a body to Mme. George Sand's town residence (she has long kept two small rooms for lodgings when she comes up to town; they are situated in No. 3 Rue Racine, a street immediately adjoining the Odeon,) and cheered lustily for her. After the vivats had lasted an hour, a figure in female clothes poked a night-capped head out of one of the higher windows, an appearance which brought down "one cheer more," after which the crowd proceeded to groan at the door of some of Mme. Sand's enemies. It came out next day that Mme. Sand had taken the cars for home after the performance, and that the honored night-gown covered an old crone who slept in the garret of the house, and who, hearing the uproars suspected her roof to be on fire, and thrust her head out of the window to ascertain on what ground her fears stood. Messrs. Michel Levy Freres announce the play in book form for publication next week; and although it is to appear in octavo form (plays are commonly published here in small duodecimo) and to cost 4f., they have already been obliged to double the number originally ordered and expect to see the first edition exhausted in less than a week. M. Nadar has just taken a noble photograph of Mme. Sand. Never before did a woman of sixty look so young; for Mme. Sand is sixty years old: she was born in 1804.

HOW BOOKS SHOULD BE WRITTEN.

In criticising Thomas Bulfinch's Age of Fable and Age of Chivalry, the Saturday Review indulges in some very sensible remarks as to how books should be written, by which it is designed to convey information to the people or to children. After pointing out the defects of Mr. Bulfinch's books, the critic says:

It is clear that Mr. Bulfinch has no idea whatever that mythology is a science. No doubt he would tell us that he does not wish to deal with mythology in any scientific aspect. All his object is, as he says, to "popularize" it, to teach people to understand the mythological allusions which they meet with in modern poets, "in polite conversation," and—an odd place, one would have thought, to hit upon—in the Edinburgh and Quarterly Reviews. He wishes "to teach mythology, not as a study, but as a relaxation from study; to give his work the charm of a story-book, yet by means of it to impart a knowledge of an important branch of education." We say nothing against all this; only we say that Mr. Bulfinch's object is in no way inconsistent with a scientific treatment of the subject; or rather that by a scientific treatment of the subject he would promote his own object more effectually. Half-educated people have always a notion that the accurate and scientific treatment of a subject is necessarily harder than what is supposed to be the popular treatment. Yet in truth it is just as easy to give a child who is beginning the study of language, history, or any other subject, accurate notions to start with as inaccurate ones. What you teach a child must be very imperfect and inadequate, but it may be, and ought to be, thoroughly and scientific as far as it goes. The pupil, as he grows older, must have a great deal to learn, but he ought to have nothing to unlearn. He will have to build on his foundation, but he ought not to have to root up the foundation itself. No doubt the processes by which scientific results have been obtained are above a child's understanding, but the results themselves are not. In fact they are far simpler, far more intelligible, than vague popular talk, simply because they have a meaning, while vague popular talk has none. A child who is able to read history or to learn a foreign language is quite able to understand so much of the true relations of nations and languages to one another as may form the groundwork of a more complete understanding of them afterward. A child may, from the beginning, be made to understand the difference between history and myth—between stories which are certainly true, possibly true, and certainly untrue.

Why People Live so Long in Europe.—A Paris correspondent expatiates on the longevity of human life in Europe, and thinks it is because the people there drink no water. Hear him:

How green old age is in Europe! There is M. Guizot, though past seventy, still full of youthful fire: M. Berryer is nigh upon eighty, with unchilled fervor: M. Theirs is seventy, and in his latest efforts there is no sign of age, except great experience of books, and men, and business; M. Dupin, Sr., is above eighty, and only last week he published Guy-Coquille's Commentaries, with vigorous notes; M. Sainte-Beuve has passed sixty, and his Monday's criticisms in Le Constitutionnel are reckoned more brilliant than ever; M. Villemain cannot be far from eighty, and he is as indefatigable as ever in the discharge of the onerous duties of Perpetual Secretary of the French Academy. I may have exhausted your patience, but I am very far from having exhausted my litany. You cannot match it in America, for you live too fast or too slow; you drink ardent spirits, or cold water, or German beer and never take holidays. People here never drink pure water, they drink wine, and for a month or two months every year they throw books aside and rest. If you would banish water from your table, and drink the English porters or ales (which are the only potable liquors suited to our dry climate) and turn rustic two months a year, you would think green old age no marvel.

BRIEF MENTION.

CITY AND STATE.

William M. Lent, of this city, and his party, made the trip from Sacramento to Virginia City on Monday last in 15 hours and 45 minutes, travelling by the Pioneer line. This shows that neither the people along the roads nor the roads themselves are keeping Lent. Hard to beat!

The opposition steamboat, the Washoe, resumes her regular trips between this city and Sacramento on Monday next.

Dr. Bellows is to deliver the Fourth of July oration in this city.

A prize fight occurred in the vicinity of North Beach, in this city, on Monday evening. It lasted two hours. We have heard of no arrests being made.

A little girl five years old, daughter of J. M. Collins, was run over by the Folsom street cars, Thursday, and instantly killed. The driver was arrested.

A monument is to be erected to the memory of George H. Hossefross, once Chief Engineer of the Fire Department. Monumental Engine Company and the Exempt Fire Company have subscribed $300 to defray the cost.

The plains of Butte and Colusa counties are said to be entirely destitute of feed for stock or even sheep at present. Unless they have very early rains, what little stock remains in those valleys will be starved to death. This has been brought about more by overstocking the range during the last three years than by the drought.

Joseph W. Ellis was robbed on the highway between Marysville and Nevada on Monday last. Denying that he had any money, the robber fired at him, inflicting a severe wound, when Ellis gave up a check for $75 and $10 in cash.

One of Green's stages was stopped two miles from Camptonville, on the 14th inst., and Langton's Express box broken open and robbed of $1,600.

Of the "California Hundred," only twenty-five men are left. J. Sewell Reed, Captain of the company, was killed in battle about three months ago.

Nine deaths occurred in Sacramento last week. The diseases were debility, complaint of the liver, paralysis, peritonitis, croup and cerebral congestion.

Lizzie Ann Dougherty, a child five years old, was burned to death in Sacramento on Tuesday afternoon.

The daughter of Catherine Clark, a girl nearly fifteen years old, was persuaded away while on her road to Sabbath School, in Sacramento, on Monday last by Charles Lotthammer, and has not been heard of since.

Over 10,000 sheep have passed through Nevada City for Nevada Territory during the past three weeks.

Hiram Miller, a boatman, was drowned in the San Joaquin river on the afternoon of the 12th inst.

The fruit-growers in Alameda county deny the story that there are worms in raspberries, and allege that the fruit this year is precisely the same that it has been every year, and is just as it grows wild in New England.

Three men have been arrested said to be implicated in the robbery of the Centreville stage on the 30th ult.

Another fast horse is en route for California—Norfolk, bought at the Laclede races, recently held in St. Louis, by a resident of this State, for the sum of $15,000.

The Mountain Messenger says that Downieville is building up again, and that all traces of the disastrous conflagration will have disappeared by the end of summer.

Great preparations are being made, the country through, for a celebration on the 4th of July. The usual programme will, of course, be the order—fireworks and speeches.

A butcher named Joseph Pellejuini was murdered, June 5th, at the Enriquita mines, by unknown parties. On the 6th, José Rodriguez was killed at the same place.

No clue has been found to the whereabouts of Mrs. Walthour's child, forcibly abducted from her mother's residence at Poverty Ridge lately.

NEVADA.

They had a prize fight up Washoewards on June 4th. The combatants were named Patsey Daley and Bill Davis. Daley got whipped, but unfortunately neither was seriously injured. The Gold Hill News says that "everything passed off decidedly pleasant to those who attended—there being not less than perhaps 3,000 people on the ground." "Decidedly pleasant" is good in such a connection.

Gold Hill had a fall of snow on the night of June 10th. A June snow-storm in a latitude of 40° north is scarcely tempting to emigrants. Virginia City also came in for an inch of snow, and given that inch did not ask for an ell.

The Virginia Union tells us that the remains of an Indian have been found near Salt Lake, embedded in rock salt four feet below the surface. Pickled Indian must be something rare even on the Plains.

The howitzer abandoned by Fremont in the mountains in his early explorations was lately used in Virginia City in celebrating the nomination of Lincoln and Johnson.

The streets of Gold Hill are crowded with teams, loaded with every conceivable article of merchandise and traffic, arriving from California.

The Aurora Union rejoices that families are now arriving at that place, and says that the increase of women and children gives the town a more civilized and home-like appearance.

It is stated that Lake Tahoe is being rapidly depleted of fish by persons who spear them for market.

John Haube found a bag containing $2,000 lying around loose on the streets in Virginia lately, and returned it the owner.

Judge North is still ill at Santa Clara. Judge Locke will probably take his place and open Court at Virginia City.

Nevada City was visited by a severe frost on Saturday night last.

According the Grass Valley National, a petrified bee-tree, with bees, honey and comb, was lately found in diggings on Buckeye Hill, seventy-five feet below the surface.

John Campbell was killed in a saloon at Aurora by H. T. Parlin, on the evening of the 6th inst. The jury found that the killing was done in self-defence.

The Esmeralda County Sanitary Association has donated two silver bricks, weighing a little over 1,542 ounces and valued at $1,517, to the United States Sanitary Commission.

Aurora has been visited by plentiful rains lately, which must have been very good and comfortable for the sage brush. A little of that water a few weeks ago for our grain crops would have been gratefully received.

A new line of stages has been started on the new route from Folsom to Markleville. It is said that the new route saves forty-five miles of tedious travel.

A wrestling match in Cornish style is going on in Virginia City; the 17th, 18th and 19th of June are the days of this protracted meeting.

Four lines of daily stages are now run from Carson to Placerville by the Pioneer Stage Company.

People are returning from Nevada Territory to this State, and many of them trudge it home on foot.

The grog-shops at Reese River are competing with the river itself. The price of liquors is reduced to 12½ cents a drink.

The Dutch Flat and Donner Lake wagon road is open for travel to Washoe.

A new paper is to be started in Virginia City, called the Washoe Evening Express.

Hay in Virginia City sells at $70 a ton.

THE EAST.

"The American Literary Fund Association" has been incorporated in New York. One hundred incorporators are named, and among them are leading publishers, authors and journalists. The object is to make provision for sick and needy authors, and the widows and orphans of those who give knowledge to the world but can bequeath to their families only want.

Cyrus W. Brown, brother of "Artemus Ward," died in Waterford lately.

John G. Saxe, the poet, is seriously ill at his residence in Albany.

Mrs. Hoey, so long at Wallack's Theatre, has retired from the stage.

A resolution has been introduced and passed in Congress which will result in an investigation of the Vanderbilt steamers plying from New York to Aspinwall.

ABROAD.

The late G. P. R. James left a posthumous novel, which is now in the press. It is entitled Bernard Marsh.

Edmund About's new book is entitled Le Progrès. It will be a stout octavo volume; price 7f. 50c. Nobody seems to know whether it will be a novel or a treatise.

There are three fun-making journals now published in London—Punch, Fun, and the Comic News. A fourth, called Mr. Merryman, has appeared.

The daughter of the late Dr. Richard Whately, Archbishop of Dublin, has edited and will immediately publish Miscellaneous Remains from his Commonplace Book.

There is a movement for founding a Professorship of the Celtic Language in the University of Edinburgh.

Rowland Hill, who established the penny-postage system, has retired from the secretaryship of the London Post-office, on account of ill health. The lords of the treasury, in consideration of the service he has rendered to the world, have granted him a pension of $10,000, his full salary, for life, and will continue his pension to Lady Hill, should she survive him.

Franz Liszt, the pianist and composer, has lately written two oratorios—Elizabeth and Christ—and is busy with a third, founded upon the legends of Francis of Assissi. He will return to Germany as soon as he has finished this last work.

The highest price given for any of Mr. Thackeray's pictures at the late sale in London was $130. It is said that his little collection in New York or Philadelphia would have realized at least five times as much as it obtained in London, even with his friends as bidders.

It is thought that the interesting article on Thackeray in the North British Review was written by Dr. John Brown, the author of Rab and his Friends.

M. Alexandre Dumas' (the younger) new piece, L' ami des Femmes, is full of digressions on all sorts of subjects—love, marriage, friendship, riches; in fine, almost all the topics of the day except Renan's Life of Jesus. The piece is regarded with horror even in Paris, where vice has a licentious charter. It is brilliant but cold, and a great deal of the wit is in wretched taste.

Eight thousand school-houses have been erected in Russia since the emancipation of the serfs took place.

The great Sheffield flood washed and injured 4,000 houses. The total damage to property, exclusive of tenants' and proprietors' claims, is to the amount of $1,250,000.

All Paris seems to be gambling in stocks. Several suicides have occurred in high circles, of late, caused by the indulgence of this fatal passion; and the Duchess de Berry is said to be almost bankrupted by the immense losses which her husband, the Count de Lucchesi Palli, has met at the stock exchange.

A work on America, lately published in Berlin, says that the annual emigration from Germany to the United States amounts now to 30,000 or 40,000, more than one-half of the whole emigration of Germany. Sonora and California, the author thinks, present the greatest inducements to German emigrants.

Petroleum is said to have been discovered in the southern provinces of Russia over a large extent of country.

A. Porchat, the translator of Goethe's collected works into French, is dead. His age was 64. He had devoted ten years to his translation of Goethe.

A new cure for hydrophobia has been discovered in England, in the common nitrate of silver. It is said to decompose the saliva and neutralize the virus.

MINING MENTION.

WASHOE.

The receipts of bullion from the Gould and Curry, last month, amounted to $550,000. The Superintendent writes that the mine never looked better than now.

The Crown Point Company suspended work on its claim on the 10th. It is evident that, with what machinery it now has, it will not be able to take the water out rapidly enough to keep it below the drift. The mill is not running now, but will be started in a few days, as soon as repairs are completed.

The Uncle Sam Company are preparing their pump for work, which looks as if operations are soon to be resumed again.

The Pride of America Company have got their main shaft down to the depth of 229 feet, and have commenced drifting toward their lead.

The Midas Company have their shaft down to the depth of 359 feet. It is at present perfectly dry.

The Belcher Company is building a stone wall along in front of its mining works for the foundation to a new dump.

The Scott Consolidated Company has got its tunnel in about 250 feet.

The Overman Company has nearly completed its hoisting works, and they probably will be started the first of next week.

The Knickerbocker Company has been running a drift to its ledge, and is said to be now very near it.

It is reported that the Empress Company struck some very rich rock on the 10th inst.

The Nelson Consolidated Company will shortly erect powerful hoisting machinery on their claim, near American Flat.

ESMERALDA.

The Aurora Union is informed that the Del Monte Company has struck it rich in the old Lexington shaft. The lead is said to be about three and a half feet thick, and sparkling with gold.

A correspondent of the Sacramento Union, writing from Aurora June 9th, says:

Our mines continue to make more favorable returns, the shipment of bullion being largely on the increase. The mills are in full operation. The Young America Company are taking out from twelve to fifteen tons rich rock per day and carting it to Winter's mill. The Empire Company are carting rock to the Durand mill. Gregory's mill has been crushing for the Liberty Company. The Utah and the Cortez have their ledges well opened and are taking out rich rock. The Luzerne Company have a shaft about sixty feet deep, with a ledge four feet wide, and taking out good rock. The Esmeralda Company are doing better and now taking out rich rock. Wells, Fargo & Co. shipped $15,600 this morning, making $50,000 for eight days of this month.

CALIFORNIA.

Since last December, between $250,000 and $300,000 in gold have been taken out of the diggings at Howland Flat.

The Alsop Company at Alleghany will, it is said, soon recommence work on their ledges, and employ quite a number of hands.

A ledge of fine quartz has been struck at Franklin Hill, in Plumas county, about eight miles from La Porte, specimens from which show rich in gold.

A new ledge has been opened at Purp Flat Sierra county, the rock of which looks rich, much resembling those ledges which bear fine gold.

WAR MENTION.

The telegraph having been down the greater part of the week, our war news, in consequence, is very meagre. Great anxiety has prevailed on all sides to hear from the opposing armies, especially those which confront each other in Virginia. We had an installment of news on Thursday evening, but the lead gave out before Friday morning, and the wires were again down.

The news that Johnson, commanding in the Valley, was defeated by Hunter, near Mount Crawford, on Sunday the 5th, and retreated to Waynesboro, is confirmed by Southern papers.

Morgan has been marauding in Kentucky, which he entered at Round Gap, with a force of about 3,000 men. Gen. Burbridge fought him successfully at Mount Sterling on the 9th.

Morgan, with about 3,000 men, attacked the 168th and 171st Ohio regiments, under Hobson, at Cynthiana, on the 11th, and after a severe fight compelled Hobson to surrender. Our loss was fifteen killed, fifty wounded, and 1,200 or 1,500 prisoners.

On the 12th, Gen. Burbridge, who left Paris the night before, fell upon Morgan while his men were at breakfast, and after a severe fight, completely defeated him, scattering his forces in all directions. About 150 prisoners were taken, including 20 officers. Gen. Burbridge, at last advices, was closely following the rebels.

An ordnance train from Frankfort was attacked near Bagdad by Jenkins's guerrillas, and Mr. Sparks, the Union member of the Kentucky Legislature, was killed.

Frankfort was under martial law during its recent siege. On the 12th the rebels raised the siege and fled.

Sherman, in North Georgia, moved for Altoona on the 22d ult.; had several encounters with the enemy, in which he was successful; and on the 2d of this month entered Dallas. On the 8th our army was at Resaca, near Ackworth. Hardee commanded the rebel right, Polk the left, and Hood the centre. On the 11th our lines were within 400 and 500 yards of the enemy, but no fighting had taken place.

The army about Richmond is comparatively quiet. A detachment from Butler's command made a demonstration on Petersburg, a sort of a reconnoissance, but did not effect much. The rebels think they have reason to believe that Grant's purpose is to make a new base of supplies on the James River, and note that he is erecting a strong line of entrenchments at White House. The Examiner thinks that he will attempt to take Richmond from the north side, but prophecies a failure for him.

The Confederate Treasury is represented to be empty, for the first time during the war, and the soldiers are not at all inspirited by that fact.

President Lincoln has recommended the repeal of the $300 exemption clause.

Marmaduke's blockading force on the Mississippi has destroyed three steamers and captured their cargoes.

The Coming Horse.—The St. Louis Republican gives the following particulars about the horse Norfolk, purchased at the Laclede Races lately, by a gentleman of California, and now on his way out here:

We noticed in our report of the races of Monday the remarkable performance of Norfolk, a Lexington three-year old, brought here by Alexander from his stables in Kentucky. The surprising power and speed of the colt, resembling in those qualities, as well as in general appearance, his unrivalled and unequalled sire, occasioned much talk and speculation among horsemen, and among them one determined to become the owner of the splendid fellow if money would buy him. Alexander was willing, and Norfolk passed from his ownership to that of Winter, of California, for the sum of $15,001. Some curiosity was manifested to know why that one dollar, in excess of $15,000, was exacted. It was explained by the statement that Alexander, when he paid $15,000 for Lexington, then blind, was badgered by some people for paying so large a sum for a blind horse. He was determined to have it to say that one of his colts sold for more money than his sire, and so Norfolk brought back to his owner the sum paid for his sire, and one dollar more. We understand that this is the largest sum ever paid for a racing horse in America. Glencoe, we believe, cost the purchaser $30,000; but he was bought in England.

"THE CALIFORNIAN."

WHAT THE PRESS SAYS OF IT.

The following are the notices which appear in our city cotemporaries:

THE CALIFORNIAN.—This new literary weekly presents itself to the public with the modest hut easy air and address of a well-hred gentleman making his entrée into a drawing-room. Since the decease of the short-lived California Home Journal, which was a compromise betweeu a belles lettres publiention and the common type of American "literary" journals, we have had no weekly on this coast that exhihited any of the higher features that cbaracterize such papers as the London Spectator, Saturday Review, etc., or the New York Round Table, which is modelled upon them. The new paper furnisbes evidence, in every department, of precisely the kind of ability required in such an enterprise. Its typographical appearance is excellent, with the exception of the "head," wbich is not in keeping, and strikes us as being more appropriate for a sporting than a literary journal. The first two numbers contain several graceful and lively articles on the lighter topics of the fashions and the minor conventionalities, which evidently emanate from some accomplished female pen.—News Letter, June 11th.

THE CALIFORNIAN.—The first number of a new weekly bearing the above sententious title was laid upon our desk last Saturday. Its editor and proprietor is C. H. Webb, the "Inigo" of the Golden Era, and the late local editor of one of our permanent dailies. We have read its contents with considerable pleasure, for its originality and versatility are alike commendahle. It will supply a void in literary circles, which has long been felt in the community, and should its existence be prolonged, unlike many of its predecessors, we shall look for a healthier tone to home-made literary merit. It has our best wishes for its success.—Police Gazette.

THE CALIFORNIAN.—We have carefnlly looked over the first uumber of this literary weekly, and can say unqualifiedly that we like it. To make use of a trite comparison, newspapers, like individuals, have a certain character, apparent in a degree at first sigbt, and becoming more positive in proportion as acquaintance increases. The CALIFORNIAN impresses us as would a refined, well-hred man of the world. The style is that of charming repose, easy address and delicacy of perception. Tbere are many original thoughts scattered throughout its columns; but the chief merit of the paper lies not so much in this as in tbe thoroughly graceful manner in which they are conveyed to the reader. If a really creditable weekly journal has been, as some suppose, a want in this community, there can be no reason to doubt that by the CALIFORNIAN it is supplied. If its success be equal to its deserving, the projector will soon find bimself floating on the tide spoken of by Shakspeare; a tide whieb, alas! hut rarely makes for journalists. Daily Morning Call, May 29th.

THE NEW WEEKLY REVIEW.—The weekly journal we have already announced made its appearance yesterday. The CALIFORNIAN (such is its title) contains an immense quantity of matter, selected with an exquisite taste, worthy of the distinguished literary man who has conceived this work, Mr. C. H. Webb.

This compilation will be sought after by those of our compatriots who wish to become familiar with English literature, and read at tbe same time writings varied, instructive, amusing and always wortby of attentiou.

The modesty of the editor equals his merit, and in order to give a proof of this we translate the lines in which he presents tbis journal to the public:

"This is the first number of the CALIFORNIAN. Little has been said about it through advertisements, no prospectus has been published, not from motives of economy, but simply because tbe proprietor thought that the best advertisement and prospectus of a paper that can be published is the paper itself. Such we now offer."

We wish the CALIFORNIAN every success. It is published in sixteen pages, priuted in three wide columns. The price is 50 cents a month, and $5 a year. The office is No. 728 Montgomery street, San Francisco.—Echo du Pacifique.

THE CALIFORNIAN.—A new candidate for public favor, in the sbape of a Saturday literary sheet, made its appearance yesterday under the above title. It is a handsomely printed paper of sixteen pages, and the issue before us gives an earnest of the capacity of Mr. C. H. Webb to conduct such a journal with oredit to himself and the literary progress of California. It will be found a welcome visitor in every house, and we wish it success. It is readable and interesting, and cannot fai' making friends.—Daily Alta, May 29th.

THE CALIFORNIAN.—The first number of Mr. Charles H. Webb's new paper—the CALIFORNIAN—has been received. It contains sixteen pages, and forty-eight columns of reading matter. Its general appearance is similar to the New Nation and the Round Table; which means that the mechanical department is unsurpassed in elegance and neatness. Mr. Webb is very modest in his salutatory—only occupying five lines and a balf, to tell the public about the CALIFORNIAN. Ho thinks, and very correctly too, tbat "the best advertisement and prospectus of a paper that can be published is the paper itself." We doubt not that the CALIFORNIAN will be liberally supported—it is certainly worthy of it in every respect. We bid it all hail and welcome.—Daily Democratic Press, May 30th.

CALIFORNIA literature has been enriched by a new weekly paper, tbe CALIFORNIAN, publisbed under the direction of Mr. C. H. Webb, who has already known how to make his capacities as a distinguished writer appreciated. This new organ is consecrated to the propagation of literature and scientific works, and merits a kind reception.—Franco-American Union, June 1st

THE CALIFORNIAN.—We have been favored with a copy of the CALIFORNIAN, a new literary paper, which will make its first appearance to-day. The columns, in measure and style, are similar to those of the Round Table, published in New York, and its typographical face is very pleasing. Mr. Charles H. Webb, a gentleman of acknowledged literary attainments, and at one time one of the editors of the Bulletin, is its editor and proprietor. Mr. Webb's articles in the Golden Era, over the signature of "Inigo," were a great addition to that journal, and were eagerly sought for and read. We notice that "Inigo" is one of the features of the new publication. That the new issue will be a meritorious one there cannot be a doubt, and we wish Mr. Webb every success in his enterprise.—Spirit of the Times, May 28th.

THE CALIFORNIAN.—This new Saturday newspaper, owned and edited by Mr. C. H. Webb, who has become well known to the public under the nom de plume of "Inigo," made its first forward step on the threshold of existence yesterday. It contains sixteen pages of matter, and promises to be conducted with ability. We are sincere in wishing tbe proprietor all sorts and sizes of good luck.—Sunday Mercury, May 29th.

THE first number of the CALIFORNIAN, a weekly paper, was published in this city last Saturday. Mr. C. H. Webb, recently one of the editors of the Evening Bulletin, is editor and proprietor. The CALIFORNIAN contains sixteen pages, is conducted with marked ability, grace and dignity, and presents a remarkably handsome appearance. It promises to become one of the best literary journals published in the country.—Monitor, June 4th

THE CALIFORNIAN, a new literary jonrnal, C. H. Webb, editor and proprietor, made its first appearance Saturday morning, May 28th. Mr. Webb is widely known as the writer of "Things," in the Golden Era. He has also been connected editorially with the Bulletin. His paper (16 pages) presents an elegant and uttractive appearance.—Golden Era, May 29th.

And tbe following we clip from the exchanges which have reached us:

THE CALIFORNIAN.—We bave received the second number of the new hebdomadal literary sheet recently started in San Francisco by C. H. Webb, under the above title. This new enterprise seems to be receiving golden opinions from the press in all parts of the State, and from the specimen before us we are satisfied they are well deserved. The high literary reputation of its publisher, the taste and judgment displayed in its selections, and its neat typographical exeention, give assurance that our new cotemporary is destined to fill a high place in the ranks of journalism on the Pacific coast.—Sonoma County Democrat.

THE CALIFORNIAN is the title of a large and neatly priuted weekly literary paper that has made its appearance in San Francisco. It is edited by Mr. C. H. Webb, a graceful writer and experienced journalist. Some person with more taste in literature than honesty "nipped" the first number from our table before we had examined it; the second number, however, is before us, and we find it filled with reading matter, orginal and selected, of the bighest order. We shall hereafter treat our readers to some of the articles of our new cotemporary, and feel assured tbat tbey will indorse our judgment as to their merit.—Mountain Messenger, June 11th.

THE CALIFORNIAN.—This is tbe title of a new weekly literary journal which has just made its appearance in San Francisco, the first number of whicb has found a place on our table. It is got up in very fine style, and edited by C. H. Webb, a gentleman of considerable newspapor experience. From what we have seen of its contents, we believe the CALIFORNIAN will be a welcome visitor to the family fireside. Its editorials appear to be of a high-toned, liberal and finished order, while the selections are of such a character as should have a place in a respectable literary journal. It is not of the wishy-washy, sentimental, sickly order of publications, hnt one which we hope Californians will be proud to recognize as one of the productions of our coast.—Marysville Express, June 1st.

THE CALIFORNIAN.—The first number of this new literary weekly is on our table. It presents a beautiful typographical appearance, and we may safely say is the neatest printed paper in Califoruia. C. H. Webb, who has gained a local literary reputation under the nom de plume of "Inigo," is its editor. The CALIFORNIAN promises to be a popular and successful publication, and we add our quota of recommendation most cheerfully to this end.—Marysville Appeal, June 1st.

THE CALIFORNIAN.—This new weekly paper, published in San Francisco by Charles H. Webb, has been handed us for perusal. It is a literary paper of the highest order of merit, and deserves success. It contains, among other things, a highly humorous rhyme—The Ballad of the Emeu. Charles A. Carolan is agent for this city.—Sacramento Evening Star, May 30th.

THE CALIFORNIAN.—This is the name of a new literary paper in San Francisco, published by C. H. Webb, a literary gentleman of considerable ability. It is the best looking paper ever printed in the State, and well filled with good reading matter. Carolan is the agent for this city.—Sacramento Daily Bee, May 30th.

THE CALIFORNIAN.—The first number of a literary paper (weekly), bearing this title, has been received from the Sacramento agent, C. A. Carolan. In size and general appearance it resembles the New York Round Table. The contents of this nnmber, original and selected, establish the presence of editorial taste and the command of intellectnal resources to insure a literary success, at least. To render the CALIFORNIAN neceptable to the State at large, however, San Francisco, the locality of its publication, should not occupy too much space in its columns. C. H. Webb, a gentleman of considerable journalistic experience, and a facile, lively, piquant writer, is responsible for the advent of this publication.—Sacramento Daily Union, May 30th.

THE CALIFORNIAN.—This new weekly candidate for literery honors and public patronage made its best how on the perilous stage of newspaperdom last Saturday. It is published by Mr. C. H. Webb, late local editor of the Bulletin. Its general appearance is good, and its sixteen pages are prolific with amusing reading matter. Long may it keep its bead above water.—Daily Despatch, May 30th.

THE CALIFORNIAN.—This is the title of the new literary hebdomedal which made its appearance in San Francisco last Saturday. It is edited by C. H. Webb, formerly of the Bulletin, a gentleman of rare scholarly attainments and ripe judgment in conducting a newspaper. Tbe journal is beautifully gotten up after the English style of literary papers, and is by far the handsomest journal of its character on the Pacific coast. The people of California are in need of just such a paper as the CALIFORNIAN appears to be, and if the publisher will send us his jonrnal in exchange for ours we will wish him the success he merits.—Napa County Reporter, June 4th.

We have received from Bradshaw the first number of THE CALIFORNIAN, a literary weekly published by C. H. Webb, the "Inigo" of the Golden Era. It is neat and plain in typography, and gives evidence of the best of editorial talent.—Placerville Weekly News.

THE CALIFORNIAN is the name of a new weekly literary paper which is to make its début in San Francisco to-day. C. H. Webb is editor and proprietor. Mr. Webb is a gentleman of education, fine fancy, and sound common sense. If he has the tact to manage the business affairs of his journal properly, it is sure to succeed, for in other respects he will have no rival.—Stockton Independent, June 3d.

THE CALIFORNIAN.—This is the name of a new literary weekly published at San Francisco, the first number of which has reached us. The best compliment we can give our new cotemporary is tbat if it holds up to the standard of its specimen number, it is bound to be a success. It is substantial.—Gold Hill Daily News.

THE CALIFORNIAN.—This is the title of a new candidate for literary honors, the first number of which appeared on Saturday. It is published weekly in San Francisco, by C. H. Webb, a gentleman who has obtained some celebrity as a writer. As a specimen of beautiful typography the CALIFORNIAN is unexcelled. It is in octavo form, and therefore convenient for binding, and we conclude the editor will endeavor to make its contents sufficiently valuable for preservation.—Territorial Enterprise, June 3d.

FLORENCE SEWING MACHINE.—This new and elegant candidate for favor among the sewing fraternity of this State, is an ingenious productiou and finished specimen of mechanism, such as we always look upon with favor. It must be seen to be appreciated. From viewing its operations, we can say the Florence readily performs the service claimed for it with singular ease and grace. Mining and Scientific Press.

THE EUREKA BILLIARD SALOON—over the Eureka Theatre, on Montgomery street, between California and Pine—is the most superbly fitted-up establishment on tbe Pacific Coast. It contains seven of Jacob Strahle's tables, unequalled by any other in elegance of style and finish. Messrs. Fiteb & Wetherbee are the gentlemanly proprietors, and so conduct their establishment as to merit and maintain the leading patronage of gentlemanly knights of the cue, of tbe city and State. jn18

CENTRAL RAILROAD COMPANY OFFICE, No. 229 Bush street, San Francisco: Location, City and County of San Francisco, State of California.—Notice is hereby given, tbat at a meeting of the Directors of said Company, beld on the 8th day of June, 1864, an assessment of Five Dollars ($5) per share was levied upon the Capital Stock of the said Company, payable immediately in United States gold coin, to the Secretary of said Company, at the office of said Company, in the city of San Francisco. Any stock upon which said assessment shall remain unpaid on the TENTH DAY OF JULY, 1864, will be advertised on that day as delinquent, and unless payment shall be made before, will be sold on the Twenty-third day of July, 1864, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with costs of advertising and expenses of the sale. By order of the Board of Directors. JAS. T. HOYT, Secretary.
ju18 Office, 229 Bush street.

MEETING OF THE STOCKHOLDERS OF THE Central Railroad Co.—Office Central Railroad Company, June 13th, 1864.—Notice is bereby given that tbe annual meeting of the Stockholders of the Central Railroad Company, for the election of nine Directors of the Company, to serve for the ensuing year, will be held at the office of the Company, No. 229 Bush street, San Francisco, on TUESDAY, July 5th, 1864. The polls for the election of Directors will open at 12 o'clock M., and close at 3 o'clock P. M. of that day. Every Stockholder present, in person or by proxy, will have one vote for each share of stock which be may have owned for ten days next preceding such election. JAMES T. HOYT, je18-td Sec'y Central Railroad Company.

OFFICE OF THE OMNIBUS RAILROAD CO., San Francisco, June 13th, 1864.—Notice is hereby given, that tbe annual meeting of stockbolders of the Omnibus Railroad Company will be holden at the office of the Company, (Howard street, between Third and Fourth streets,) on MONDAY, July 4, 1864, at 12 o'clock, for the election of seven Directors for the ensuing year, and the transaction of such other business as may be properly brougbt before them. By order of the Board.
je18 JAMES O'NEILL, Secretary.

THE MOST EXTENSIVE,

BEST SELECTED, CHEAPEST,

—AND—

LATEST STYLES

—OF—

Furniture.

GOODWIN & CO.,

No. 528 Washington street,

Are constantly receiving, and have on hand a large assortment of FINE ROSEWOOD, MAHOGANY, and BLACK WALNUT PARLOR, LIBRARY and CHAMBER SUITS, with DINING ROOM SUITS TO ORDER.

☞ We guarantee both Price and Quality satisfactory to our Patrons.

GOODWIN & CO.,
Jn18 No. 528 Washington street.

WONDERFUL TRIUMPH

IN AMERICAN DENTISTRY.

DR. BEERS & CO.,

617 Clay street,

ARE NOW MANUFACTURING THE NEW style of ARTIFICIAL TEETH so highly approved at the East, and which to be appreciated only requires to be seen. The Teeth, Gums and Plate are made of one entire piece of Porcelain without seam or joint, combining great strength and beauty with absolute purity and freedom from any metallic taste, while the coloring of the gums and the interior of the mouth are so perfect as to almost defy detection. All interested in the progress of the Arts are invited to examine samples of this work.

Superior Gold and Vulcanite Work also manufactured as usual, but at greatly reduced prices. ju18

REMOVAL.—DR. H. J. PAINE,

DENTIST,

No. 522 CALIFORNIA STREET,

Room No. 19, Second Floor,

BETWEEN MONTGOMERY AND KEARNY STREETS,

Four doors west of Wells, Fargo & Co.,

je4 San Francisco.

THE CALIFORNIAN.

A PAPER FOR THE TIMES.

Devoted to Live Topics,

AND THE

BEST INTERESTS OF CALIFORNIA.

Is published

EVERY SATURDAY MORNING,

AT

728 MONTGOMERY STREET.

Nothing will be spared that will enable THE CALIFORNIAN to appeal to the Public for support, not only as the

BEST JOURNAL ON THE PACIFIC COAST,

But also as being

THE EQUAL OF ANY ON THIS CONTINENT!

Imperial paper, of a quality and weight never before brought to this market, is ordered from the East

EXPRESSLY FOR THE CALIFORNIAN,

And will arrive here as soon as it can be brought by Isthmus transportation.

THE BEST TALENT OF THE STATE

Is employed upon the CALIFORNIAN, and arrangements have been made with contributors abroad for

EASTERN AND FOREIGN CORRESPONDENCE.

THE TERMS OF THE CALIFORNIAN are $5 per year by mail to subscribers, invariably in advance; 50 cents per month, served by carriers.

All communications and correspondence must be addressed to

C. H. WEBB,
Editor and Proprietor CALIFORNIAN,
728 Montgomery street.

McRUER & MERRILL,

WHOLESALE AUCTION HOUSE,

204 and 206 California street.

Regular Sale Days - - - WEDNESDAYS and SATURDAYS.
(Advances on Consignments.)

NOTICE!

From this date Mr. A. P. EVERETT has an interest in our business. McRUER & MERRILL.
San Francisco, October 20, 1862.

A. P. EVERETT, - - - - - - - - - Auctioneer.
ju11-3m

DISSOLUTION OF COPARTNERSHIP

The Copartnership heretofore existing under the name and style of H. WEBSTER & CO., have been dissolved by mutual consent.

H. WEBSTER,
A. D. NUDD,
S. L. STANLEY,
C. S. LORD.

NUDD, STANLEY & CO.,

Importers and Wholesale

LIQUOR MERCHANTS,

No. 410 FRONT STREET,

Successors to

H. WEBSTER & CO.,

Having purchased the entire interest of H. Webster, in the house of H. WEBSTER & Co., the undersigned will continue the business under the name and style.

ASA D. NUDD,
SAM'L L. STANLEY,
CHAS. S. LORD.

San Francisco, June 1st, 1864. je4

R. G. SNEATH,

408 FRONT STREET, SAN FRANCISCO,

Importer and Wholesale Dealer in

GROCERIES, PROVISIONS, FLOUR, RICE,

TOBACCOS, LIQUORS, ETC.

Branch House, - - SNEATH & BOARMAN, - - Rod Bluff.

Forwarding Agent, D. W. EARL, Sacramento, who will receive and fill orders for all kinds of Goods on my account, and keep a large stock of Flour, Barley, Potatoes, Ground Feed, etc., etc. No charge for forwarding.

ALMADEN QUICKSILVER!

Orders for Goods not in my line furnished customers without extra charge. Orders for Goods in the Eastern markets attended to promptly. Daily Prices Current furnished when desired.

Orders respectfully solicited. jn11-1m

THE UNIVERSAL CLOTHES WRINGER!

☞ WITH COG WHEELS. ☜

BUY NO OTHER!

This Wringer is warranted in every particular. It was pronounced superior to all others at the World's Fair at London, in 1862, and has always taken the First Premium at every State and County Fair, when exhibited in competition with other machines.

No other Wringer has the cog-wheel, without which the rubber on the rolls will get torn, and the strain on the cloth is such as to wear it out.

A liberal discount made to dealers.

WM. FAULKNER & SONS, Agents,
je4 411 Clay street, San Francisco

PILES! PILES!! PILES!!!

Not piles of Gold nor yet of Silver so much coveted by all men, but the bleeding, blind, or external Piles can be easily and speedily cured by the use of

WOOD'S SUB-POSITORY.

It is a preparation totally distinct from anything heretofore offered as a remedy for this painful and often fatal complaint. The Sub-Positocy is neither a pill, powder, wash or salve, and yet it has proved to be a certain remedy for the Piles. Do not doubt this assertion, nor delay testing the truth of it if you are troubled with the Piles—you will not be deceived in it.

Sold wholesale and retail by W. NEWELL, jn11 No. 530 Merchant street.

ELECTRICITY AS A REMEDIAL AGENT.

When it was promulgated that disease could be entirely eradicated from the system without the use of poisonous drugs, the unthinking, or those who do not look deeply into cause and effect, scouted the assertion as chimerical, and adduced strong evidence of its utter impossibility. Long articles, replete with arguments, seemingly unanswerable, of the position that only through the digestive system could the blood be purged of the accumulation of the poisons which constitute disease. A great cry went up from the interested in the continued supremacy of the old system of one poison to cure another, that electricity, as a curative agent, had been tried and proved to be of but little if any value—thinking, poor souls, the world of science stood at the same point it occupied one hundred years ago. That were wrong, while those old fogies were content if they cured one in every five patients, there were those who were diving into the science of electricity, and finally it was discovered that the trouble was in the instruments used. From that time to the present improvements have rapidly advanced, until every disease in the catalogue of human ills have been either cured altogether or checked so as to enable the sufferer to seek those changes of climate which ultimately perform a perfect cure. Diseases hitherto considered incurable have been cured, and those diseases which took months, and even years, to cure by medical process, are now cured in a few weeks; and all by the Improved Instruments of Dr. J. H. Josselyn, Resident Physician at the Electropathic Institute, 645 Washington street, San Francisco. It is astonishing to see the number of patients and diversity of diseases that have been relieved by the electropathic system. From early morn till late at night his instrument is engaged imparting strength and health to all who have the good fortune to obtain his services.

The charges, too, are not as heavy as by the old system; besides there is no medicine to pay for, let alone the unpleasantness of swallowing the nauseous stuff. During the time the Institute has been in operation there has been more benefit to the human family derived from the system than from all other systems combined during the same period. Among the most troublesome diseases to which Californians have been exposed is Rheumatism. None have given the honorable practitioner more trouble to relieve, and none have pretended to cure (if we except known empirics) permanently. But this subtle disease gives way before the Electropathic System in a very short time, enabling the sufferer to go about his business without pain or the fear and dread of a relapse. And so with most other diseases considered incurable. We mention Rheumatism because of its abundance, but we could enumerate many other diseases fully as troublesome, and some far more fatal in their results.

Connected with this system are the renowned Electro-Magnetic Baths. Here let us caution the public against the numerous impostors in the bathing line. The pure magnetic bath is one of the most effective aids in the removal of disease from the system; but if given at the wrong time is likely to aggravate trouble, and cases have been known where the patient has been injured so badly as to require months to remove the injury. Persons in quest of this bath should be careful and not apply to a place where there is no physician to judge of the necessity of the remedy. In fact, the only place where they can be obtained, in all their purity, is at the Institute, where the Resident Physician will always be happy to examine and see that they are not unseasonably administered, and if not necessary, advise the requisite remedy.

To FEMALES, the Directors would say, Electropathy is particularly applicable to your delicate and fragile systems, and to the numerous troublesome and painful diseases to which you are liable; should you be irregular, a few treatments will restore the functions to the proper state without pain or inconvenience; should you be weak and enfeebled, either general or local, this system imparts strength and vitality, making the recipients feel buoyant and youthful where before they were languid and unable to enjoy the pleasures of life. One great blessing connected with Electropathy is, it purifies the system so thoroughly that it beautifies the complexion, making the coarse and freckled skin as pure and fair as possible, giving the patient a fresh and healthful look.

To the nervous the Directors would say, that you can be entirely removed from those dreadful feelings of evil foreboding, and your system strengthened so that nothing can disturb the current of your life. Several cases of insanity, arising from a disarrangement of the nervous system, have been permanently cured by this system. The Directors, in issuing this pamphlet, do it in the hope that it may be the means of awakening the public who have not studied into such things, to a sense of their duties, and if possible prevent those who have the care of a rising generation from poisoning their young charges with vile drugs, thereby entailing upon them troubles which, after life, may cause them to curse the origin. Also, that those in need of remedial agents may know where they can find them without resorting to taking the thousand-and-one poisonous nostrums that are continually being palmed off as sovereign panaceas for all the ills of humanity. Avoid them all—they are snares set to rob you, and do you bodily injury at the same time.

The Electropathic Institute was started amid the cry of interested charlatans, who used all the power their riches and the prejudices of the public gave them to prevent its success. It has risen to a position that is beyond their baffled malice, and will be honored in the scientific world when they are forgotten, or only remembered for their crimes and impositions. A thinking public are fast consigning them to that oblivion their works merit. Let them go, they will not be missed.

Persons seeking remedial assistance may wish to know something of the system by which diseases are so rapidly removed from the body. Electricity is a fluid of so subtle a nature, that it can only be studied by its results. We know by its action it forces everything of a foreign nature in the body from the centre to the surface, by its energy, while the vitality which it imparts fills up the vacuum, preventing thereby the subtle poisons from returning to the hitherto diseased parts—and here let it be understood, that the Bath should never be administered until the disease has been forced to the surface—except, perhaps, in cases of cold where fever has not set in. Its action upon mercurial disease is peculiar. The best authorities are of opinion that it liquifies the mercury—which, when in a liquid state, by its own specific gravity forces itself out of the body. This result has been arrived at by testing the water after an Electro-Magnetic Bath. After such tests have been found in the water, the patient is not troubled any more with those pains peculiar to the diseases. In all other cases it forces to the surface and is washed off by the bath. The whole system in its application is a luxury—there being no pain or inconvenience attending upon it; but the reverse is the case—being one continued pleasure all the time. Try it you that are suffering either from disease or the injudicious use of poisonous drugs, and you will be made to rejoice that you have had the courage to strike out from the beaten path.

Below are a few certificates from patients that have been cured at the Institute:

CERTIFICATES OF CURES.

San Francisco, April 18th, 1860.

This is to certify that I have been under the treatment of Dr. Josselyn, at the Electropathic Institute, and that he has cured me. My disease was mercurial, accompanied with chills. I applied to him on the 11th day of this month. I recommend all afflicted to employ him. He has cured me without medicine, by the use of his Electropathic Instrument. JOHN CALLAGHAN.

State of California, City and County of San Francisco—ss.
Subscribed and sworn to before me this eighteenth day of April, A. D. 1860. P. BARRY, Notary Public.

The undersigned takes this method of acknowledging publicly the benefits he received from the treatment applied to him at the Electropathic Institute while, suffering under a terrible infliction.

This is to certify that I have been under Electropathic treatment at the Electropathic Institute, 645 Washington street. When I applied to Dr. Josselyn I was cramped up with rheumatism, and also had the coast ague. So bad was I that, without relief, I don't think I could have lived more than one week. The Doctor, with his instrument relieved me the first treatment from all pain, and perfectly cured me of all disease in twenty treatments, without the use of medicines. I cordially recommend all afflicted to patronize the Institute, for it is truly a blessing to the afflicted, and the operation is very pleasant. I wish to publicly thank Dr. Josselyn for his care and sympathy. JOSEPH SEGER, of Bolinas Bay.

September 19, 1860.

State of California, City and County of San Francisco—ss.
Subscribed and sworn to before me this 19th day of September, A.D. 1860. P. BARRY, Notary Public.

Sacramento, October 19th, 1860.

DR. JOSSELYN—Dear and Honored Sir:—You requested me to let you know how I felt after being at home three weeks. Well, sir, I have now been here little over two weeks, and there is no return of that very unpleasant trouble. My sleep is sound, and there is no disturbance of the regular laws of nature. I feel as strong as I ever did before bad habits had weakened my system. Not only is the general debility entirely disappeared, but the local trouble is gone. I feel so strong that there is no fear of its return. Considering that you only took one month to cure a disorder of seven years' standing, I think your system almost miraculous. Accept my sincere thanks, and publish this, if you please. I have sworn to it, as you see. C. BOWMAN.

State of California, County of Sacramento—ss.
Subscribed and sworn to before me this tenth day of October, A.D. 1860. CHAS. HART, Notary Public.

Hornitos, November 1st, 1860.

Well, Doctor, I am not home and have been to work in the water for several days, and there is no return of the Rheumatism, as I call it; and Mercurial pains, as you stated them to be. I feel as gay as a lark, no pain or bad feelings, no stiffness, but perfectly well, and all done by you in three weeks, without one drop of medicine. You had hard work to make me believe before you commenced, that you would cure me, but now I find it very easy to believe. Although my friends look rather incredulous, they cannot doubt my sober earnestness. Doctor, you have my thanks, and I will benefit you all I can, by spreading your fame up in these parts. Respectfully yours, GEO. PERKINS, JR.

To J. M. Josselyn, M.D., Resident Physician, at the Electropathic Institute.

Nevada, November. 8th, 1860.

DEAR DOCTOR.—Pursuant to agreement, upon my arrival, I sit down to pen you a few lines in acknowledgment of the great service you have rendered me, in relieving me of that painful case of neuralgia and rheumatism. When I look back and see the gallons of medicine I have swallowed to no purpose, and then to think how soon you cured me, I am astonished. You were only twelve days performing a cure of the trouble for which I had taken medicine over six months. Dear Doctor, if you could see the wonder exhibited by my friends, who can hardly believe that a cure was performed without medicine; but here I have been cured, and I have not taken a drop of medicine from you nor from any one else while being treated by your splendid Instrument. I shall try to show my gratitude by sending every sick man I come across to you.

Yours, till death, FRANCIS GARLAND,

To J. H. Josselyn, M. D., Resident Physician Electropathic Institute.

State of California, County of Nevada—ss.
Subscribed and sworn to before me this eighth day of November, A. D. 1860. F. SPAULDING, Notary Public.

Yreka, November 10th, 1860.

DR. JOSSELYN—Dear Sir: Your letter dated October 16th is before me. You wish to know how my bronchial troubles are. Now, Doctor, that looks a great deal like a joke. I once had such an affection, of several years' standing, but thanks to your natural mode of treating disease, it has gone to be numbered with the things of the past. Since my return I have not felt the slightest trouble from it. When you pronounced me well I did not expect to ever hear from it again. Any one who sits under treatment of that Improved Instrument of yours will have the same feelings. It imparts vitality to the system so rapidly that confidence is at once established. I have to thank you that you did not refuse to treat me because I could not pay you the whole of your reasonable charge; enclosed is the balance due you, and God bless you for the kind treatment I received at your hands.

Yours, ever grateful, WM. GARDNER.

State of California, County of Siskiyou—ss.
Subscribed and sworn to before me this tenth day of November, A. D. 1860.
B. F. WELLITS, Notary Public.

This is to certify that I, the undersigned, was troubled with dumb ague, accompanied with rheumatism, very badly. My disease was taken in Washoe. After having exhausted medicines without benefit I applied to Dr. Josselyn, at the Electropathic Institute, on the first day of November. After taking twenty treatments with his Improved Electropathic Instrument, I am perfectly cured, having been entirely relieved of all pain or inconvenience. I feel as strong as I ever did when in the best of health. I cheerfully recommend all afflicted to his care, as being the best physician I ever became acquainted with. One great advantage, he uses no medicines, but cures by a process which is perfectly natural. The time occupied in my case was thirteen days. D. O. HARRA.

November 14th, 1860.

State of California, City and County of San Francisco—ss.
Personally appeared before me, D. O. Harra, and subscribed and sworn to the above certificate, on this 14th day of November, A. D. 1860. P. BARRY, Notary Public.

San Francisco, August 3d, 1861.

To the Directors and Resident Physician of the Electropathic Institute: SIRS—You requested of me a certificate of the cure you performed in my case. Below I append it:

This is to certify that I was troubled with a swelling which commenced in my ankles, and gradually extended upward until it affected my whole body. I sought the best medical aid in New York and Boston, and they all pronounced it dropsy. Hoping to retrieve my health I visited California in February last. I consulted the Resident Physician at the Electropathic Institute, and now, after five months of treatment, and waiting to see its effects, I am pronounced well by competent judges. It did not take but three months of treatment to cure me, but I waited to see that it did not return. I feel perfectly assured, from what I saw while under treatment, that Electricity, as applied at this Institute, will cure any disease to which the human family is liable.

Now, gentlemen, you can make what use you please of this certificate. With my thanks to the Resident Physician for his kind attention, I subscribe myself,

Your thankful patient,
MRS. C. A. CARLTON.

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.

The advantages of electricity as a remedial agent are universally admitted by the medical and scientific world. It requires, however, experienced skill to apply this remedy efficiently, and this skill of application is possessed in an eminent degree by Dr. J. H. Josselyn, of the San Francisco Electropathic Institute. The Doctor is well known to us as a scientific gentleman, and an ardent devotee to his profession. He is no pretender, but has conferred incalculable benefit to those who were so fortunate as to seek relief at his hands. For those who desire speedy and permanent relief from the rheumatic pains so prevalent in this region, we can recommend no surer remedy than a visit to Dr. Josselyn, at his rooms in San Francisco, No. 645 Washington street.—Placerville Republican.

ARE YOU SICK?—We wish to say a word to those that are sick. We have in this city an institution known as the Electropathic Institute, situated at 645 Washington street. The establishment is under the care of Dr. J. H. Josselyn, a physician who has no superior in the city. He has been in charge of the Electropathic Institute for several years, and has been uniformly successful in his treatment of the numerous patients that have placed themselves under his charge. The electric treatment will cure many diseases that cannot be reached by any other mode. Dr. Josselyn gives his personal attention to all of his patients, and is always ready to give advice to those that may call upon him. His charges are very moderate; and we cannot do the sick a greater favor than to recommend them to call on him before placing themselves in charge of another.—San Francisco Daily Journal.

We call the attention of our readers to the advertisement of Dr. Josselyn's Electropathic Institute. Voluntarily and unsolicited, we make the following statement, proving its great beneficial effects, particularly in rheumatic cases. Some months since we were on an editorial trip, visiting the mountains. The stage upset and landed all the passengers including the writer, below in the valley, where the Deer Creek overflowed by receiving the additional material, extraneous to its usual contents. For some hours exposed in our wet clothes to night wind and weather, we soon felt the effects of the accident, in the mountains—pains in the back, hip, and legs; so much so that for weeks we hardly could walk. Treatments of all kinds were applied, but without avail, until our attention was called to the Electro-Galvanic Baths and appliances of the above Institute. Thank God, after two weeks, we have been fully restored, and enjoy now the free use of our limbs and body, as fully as previous to our involuntary bath in Deer Creek.—DR. H. BIRS, Ed. True Pacific Messenger.

ELECTROPATHY.—Electricity has long been classed among the most effective medical agents. It possesses great advantages over the system of theropentics hitherto relied upon, as it reaches more certainly the seat of disease, especially in nervous or rheumatic complaints. The Electropathic Institute, No. 645 Washington street, under the charge of its able Resident Physician, Dr. J. H. Josselyn, has attained a well merited celebrity for the many cures which have resulted from the skilful application of this invaluable remedy.—Daily Morning Star.

☞ All letters answered with promptness and pleasure. Office open from 9 A. M. to 9 P. M. Advice gratis.

J. H. JOSSELYN, M. D.,
Jn4 Resident Physician.

R. H. McDONALD & CO.,
R. H. McDONALD.) (J. C. SPENCER.
IMPORTING
Wholesale Druggists,
Corner of Sansome and Pine streets,
SAN FRANCISCO,
—AND—
J STREET, SACRAMENTO.

We respectfully beg leave to inform our customers and the public generally that we have opened a House in the city of San Francisco, where we will be pleased to see as many of our old friends and customers as can make it convenient to call upon us. We shall keep at both places a large and well selected stock of

DRUGS AND MEDICINES, SURGICAL INSTRUMENTS,
Dental Goods, Fancy Articles, Brushes and Combs,
SHOULDER AND BODY BRACES,
Ladies' Bandages and Supporters,
GUM ELASTIC STOCKINGS, TRUSSES,
Paints and Oils,
PATENT MEDICINES, HERBS AND EXTRACTS,
Brewers' and Soda Stocks,
CORKS (LARGE VARIETY), ASSAYERS' MATERIAL,
Burning Oils and Fluids,

Together with a large and complete assortment of all goods kept in a well supplied Wholesale Drug Store,

We respectfully solicit those dealing in our line to examine and price our stock before purchasing elsewhere.

R. H. McDONALD & CO.,
Sacramento and San Francisco.

R. H. McDONALD & CO.,
IMPORTING DRUGGISTS,
J STREET, SACRAMENTO,
AND
CORNER OF PINE AND SANSOME STREETS,
SAN FRANCISCO, CALIFORNIA.

IMPORTERS OF
DENTAL AND SURGICAL INSTRUMENTS,
TEETH, GOLD FOIL.
VULCANITE MATERIAL.

Vulcanizers, Vulcanite Base, and Impression Gutta Percha. A large variety of VULCANITE MATERIAL, Scrapers and Packers; together with a large and complete assortment of all articles of the latest and most approved styles of Vulcanite work.

DENTAL BOOKS.

We keep constantly on hand a supply of all the most approved Standard Works on DENTISTRY. Our efforts will be to keep a large and well selected stock of all Dental Material, where the Dental Profession may confidently rely upon having their orders filled in the best possible manner.

R. H. McDONALD & CO.,
Sacramento, 139 J street,
my28 San Francisco, cor. Pine and Sansome sts.

REMOVAL.
HASKELL & CO.,
CANTON TEA STORE. | ESTABLISHED IN 1858.
Wholesale and Retail Dealers in
JAPAN AND CHINA TEAS, AND GROCERIES,
515 Market street,
And 15 Sutter street, three doors below Metropolitan Market, between Montgomery and Sansome streets.

It is the LARGEST STORE OF THE KIND in San Francisco my28

NEW YORK AGENCY.—$15 PER DAY MADE EASY, by selling our great "Original and only genuine"
PRIZE AND STATIONERY PACKAGES.
Each one contains more real valuable articles than any half dozen packages ever sold. They contain
FINE STATIONERY,
PENS,
PENCILS,
ENVELOPES,
AND A
GIFT OF JEWELRY IN EACH PACKAGE.

The whole worth several dollars if bought separate. Price, 50 cents. Wholesale rates to Agents low. Agents wanted in every town and camp on the Pacific coast. Send for our New Circular with inducements. Mailed free. Address J. B. WILLMAN & CO.,
my28 502 Montgomery street, San Francisco

OCCIDENTAL HOTEL—Corner Montgomery and Bush streets, San Francisco.

This House possesses all the requirements of a FIRST CLASS HOTEL, its spacious READING ROOM, with large MINERAL CABINET and extensive COLLECTION OF SPECIMENS from the different Mining Regions of the Pacific Coast—BRANCH TELEGRAPH OFFICE connecting with Lines throughout the country—and NEWS STAND—all contributing to make it the Headquarters and Home for the Californian business man and tourist.

The TABLE of this House shall not be excelled by any.

BOARD, THREE DOLLARS PER DAY.
LEWIS LELAND & CO.,
my28 Proprietors.

G. FORREST WALTER & CO.,
EXCELSIOR
PIONEER MERCHANT TAILOR
OF THE PACIFIC.
ESTABLISHED, 1849.
NO. 611 SACRAMENTO STREET,
Three doors above Montgomery,
my28 San Francisco.

COMMERCIAL STEAM PRINTING HOUSE.
FRANCIS, VALENTINE & CO.,
517 CLAY and 514 COMMERCIAL STREETS.

Every description of BOOK, JOB and POSTER PRINTING done in the best style and at the lowest rates.
BOOK-BINDING and RULING done to order.

STERETT'S
STEAM
PRINTING HOUSE,
533
CLAY STREET.

W. P. HARRISON & CO.,
PRINTERS,
ENGRAVERS AND ELECTROTYPERS,
PRINTERS' WAREHOUSE,
417 Clay Street. my28

NO HOME SHOULD BE WITHOUT
ONE OF
MASON & HAMLIN'S
Cabinet Organs.

The cost is trifling, while its good effects in the education and good training of a family are beyond computation.

DO NOT DELAY, but send for an Illustrated Catalogue at once.

Address,
A. KOHLER,
my28 Music Dealer, San Francisco.

J. R. MEAD & CO.,
HAVE OPENED WITH
☞ AN ENTIRE NEW STOCK ☜
OF
FINE CLOTHING!
AND
GENTS' FURNISHING GOODS.
Corner of Montgomery and Bush streets, San Francisco.
my28

BILLIARD TABLES.
NOTICE!

Phelan & Collender have sold all their stock and disposed of their business on this Coast to MATHEW E. HUGHES, who will in future have Billiard Tables with PHELAN'S PATENT IMPROVED COMBINATION CUSHIONS for sale in this market.

While returning thanks to the Public for the patronage bestowed upon them, Phelan & Collender desire to recommend Mr. HUGHES as their SUCCESSOR, to those desirous to provide themselves with Billiard Tables with Phelan's Unequalled Patent Cushions, which Mr. HUGHES will always be prepared to supply, as received direct from the undersigned, sole proprietors and manufacturers.

PHELAN & COLLENDER,
By GEORGE E. PHELAN, Attorney.
San Francisco, May 26, 1864.

Referring to the above, the undersigned takes pleasure in calling the attention of PRIVATE GENTLEMEN and SALOON KEEPERS to his fine stock of BILLIARD TABLES and CUSHIONS. Just received, an assortment of the
NEW STANDARD AMERICAN BILLIARD TABLES, WITH PHELAN'S LATEST IMPROVED CUSHIONS.

These Tables have just been adopted by all the leading Professional as well as Amateur Players in the East—over Six Hundred having been sold to private families alone in the last nine months.

BILLIARD BALLS AND TRIMMINGS

Of all kinds on hand. Orders for Repairing of Tables, and everything in connection with the business, promptly attended to, at the Office, 724 and 726 Montgomery street, opposite the Metropolitan Theatre.
my28 M. E. HUGHES, Sole Agent.

REDINGTON & CO.'S ESSENCE OF Jamaica Ginger!

This valuable compound, which is now regarded as one of the most popular remedies in the domestic practice for various complaints of the digestive organs, such as Dyspepsia, Nausea, etc., is prepared solely from the WHITE JAMAICA GINGER, which is the best of all the varieties in use. In the preparation of

REDINGTON & CO.'S

ESSENCE OF JAMAICA GINGER,

Great care is taken to have none but select Root, and to manufacture it in air-tight vessels, thus preventing the evaporation of its delicate essential oil, and preserving the true aroma of the Ginger. It thereby contains in its concentrated form all the valuable properties of the Jamaica Ginger, and is guaranteed to be free from any impurities whatever

It is a grateful stimulant and carminative, giving warmth and tone to the stomach equal to Brandy, without any of its injurious effects.

It will cure Nausea, caused by riding in railroad cars, or from sea-sickness, or other causes.

Miners and others who are exposed to the heat of the Sun often whilst working in cold water, should never be without

REDINGTON & CO.'s

ESSENCE OF JAMAICA GINGER,

As by taking it as a tonic two or three times a day, it is almost a sure preventive to Chills and Fever; and to those who are farming the rich bottom lands of California it is likewise invaluable as a tonic, and should invariably be taken in the early morning before going to the fields, at the mid-day lunch, and before leaving off work at night.

Ask for REDINGTON & CO.'S ESSENCE OF JAMAICA GINGER, and take no other, if you would always have a Pure and Reliable article.

An excellent external application for Gout, Rheumatism, Neuralgia, &c.

REDINGTON & CO., Proprietors,
416 and 418 Front street,
my28 San Francisco.

RAREY'S CONDITION POWDERS.

THE MOST POWERFUL AND BENEFICIAL AGENT known on the Stomach, Blood, Lungs and Bowels of

HORSES, MULES, CATTLE, AND STOCK

of all descriptions.

GREAT BENEFIT TO HARD-WORKING HORSES.

All diseased Stock SPEEDILY and CERTAINLY CURED; healthy Stock will be brought into the very HIGHEST STATE of PERFECTION by giving them a SPOONFULL, weekly.

NO LIVERY STABLE SHOULD BE WITHOUT

RAREY'S
CELEBRATED CONDITION POWDERS!

All FARMERS and RANCHMEN should use constantly

RAREY'S
CELEBRATED CONDITION POWDERS!

TEAMSTERS and STAGE COMPANIES everywhere should keep constantly on hand and freely use

RAREY'S
CELEBRATED CONDITION POWDERS!

They are equal to a Life Insurance on all Stock, as will be fully appreciated on trial by all True Economists.

REDINGTON & CO., Sole Agents,
my28 416 and 418 Front Street, San Francisco.

STOP THAT COUGHING.

Some of you can't and we pity you. You have tried every remedy but the ONE destined by its intrinsic merit to supercede all similar preparations. It is not surprising you should be reluctant to try something else after the many experiments you have made of the trashy compounds foisted on the public as a certain cure; but

NEWELL'S PULMONARY SYRUP.

It is really the best remedy ever compounded, for the cure of coughs, colds, sore throat, asthma, whooping cough, bronchitis, and consumption. Thousands of people in California have been already benefitted by the surprising curative powers of

NEWELL'S PULMONARY SYRUP,

And with one accord give it their unqualified approbation. We now address ourselves to all who are unacquainted with this, the greatest panacea of the age, for the healing of all diseases of the throat and lungs, assuring you that

NEWELL'S PULMONARY SYRUP

Has cured thousands, and it will cure you if you try it.

This invaluable medicine is pleasant to the taste; soothing, healing and strengthening in its effects; entirely free from all poisonous or deleterious drugs, and perfectly harmless under all circumstances. Among others it is indorsed by the following gentlemen, all of them well-known in San Francisco as respectable citizens: E. S. WOOLEY, grocer, 358 Stockton street; H. P. HUBBARD, merchant, Sansome street near Clay; Capt. DAVID VAN PELT; JAMES PRATT, at Harrison & Co., printers, Clay street, and hundreds of other residents in San Francisco.

REDINGTON & CO., Sole Agents, 416 and 418 Front street, San Francisco, and for sale by all Druggists. my28

PACIFIC MAIL STEAMSHIP COMPANY.

The following Steamships will be dispatched in the month of JUNE, 1864:

June 13—CONSTITUTION, J. T. Watkins, Commander.
June 23—GOLDEN AGE, W. F. Lapidge, Commander.

From Folsom-street Wharf, at nine o'clock A. M., punctually,

FOR PANAMA

Passengers will be conveyed from Panama to Aspinwall by the PANAMA RAILROAD COMPANY, and from Aspinwall to New York by the ATLANTIC AND PACIFIC STEAMSHIP COMPANY.

A. B. FORBES, Agent P. M. S. Co.,
my28 Cor. Sacramento and Leidesdorff sts.

FORTY-FOUR FIRST PREMIUMS IN 1863!

THERE IS BUT ONE
FIRST
PREMIUM SEWING MACHINE.

The GROVER & BAKER SEWING MACHINE has been awarded Twenty-three First Premiums at State Fairs, and Twenty-one at City and County Fairs, in 1863, making Forty-four in all.

R. G. BROWN, Agent.
my28 329 Montgomery Street.

WHEELER & WILSONS Family Sewing Machines.

OFFICE:

CORNER MONTGOMERY AND SACRAMENTO STREETS.

J. H. HAYDEN, Agent.

A full assortment of the best quality of MACHINE SILK and THREAD, for the TRADE, constantly on hand. my28

WHAT IS A CABINET ORGAN?

A NEW REED INSTRUMENT,

Made by

MASON & HAMLIN,

The famous Melodeon Manufacturers.

ASK

GOTTSCHALK,

MASON,

STRAKOSCH.

Or any other eminent Musician.

They know what it is, having publicly acknowledged it to be the best instrument of the kind in the World.

Send for an Illustrated Catalogue,

To

A. KOHLER,

Music Dealer,
my28 San Francisco.

A. ROMAN & CO., BOOKSELLERS,

PUBLISHERS, IMPORTERS, Nos. 417 and 418 Montgomery street, desire to invite the special attention of the BOOK TRADE on the Pacific Coast to their superb and complete assortment of STANDARD AND MISCELLANEOUS BOOKS, embracing works in every department of Literature; also Medical, Military, Scientific, Theological and School Books of every description. Constantly in receipt of all the late publications by every steamer. Special inducements offered to LIBRARIES. All orders will be promptly filled, and upon the most reasonable terms—wholesale and retail.

A. ROMAN & CO.,
my28 San Francisco.

"KUSTEL'S PROCESSES OF SILVER AND GOLD EXTRACTION."

—The January number of the "American Journal of Science and Arts" conducted by Professors Silliman and Dana—probably the best Scientific authority in our country—says of this valuable work: "The book is written and arranged with from by one who evidently understands his subject; and care, our examination of it, we should think it to be well adapted for the purpose for which it has been prepared."

Price—post paid—Cloth, $6; Sheep, $7.

A. ROMAN & Co.,
Booksellers, Importers and Publishers,
417 and 419 Montgomery street,
my28 San Francisco.

JONES, WOOLL & SUTHERLAND,

Manufacturers for the Trade

OF

SQUARE, OVAL AND ARCH-TOP MIRRORS, WINDOW CORNICES, AND PIER TABLES,

Of any Size or Pattern.

PORTRAIT AND PICTURE FRAMES

Of all Styles.

IMPORTERS OF

Fine Engravings and Artists' Materials.

312 MONTGOMERY STREET.

FACTORY—Market street, between Seventh and Eighth, opposite Yerba Buena Park. my28

LAWRENCE & HOUSEWORTH,

OPTICIANS,

IMPORTERS OF OPTICAL, MATHEMATICAL AND PHILOSOPHICAL INSTRUMENTS,

STEREOSCOPIC GOODS,

PHOTOGRAPHIC ALBUMS,

CARTES DE VISITE,

AND

JOSEPH RODGERS & SON'S

SUPERIOR CUTLERY,

No. 637 CLAY STREET,

SAN FRANCISCO,

(ESTABLISHED IN 1851,)

HAVE FOR SALE THE LARGEST STOCK ON THE PACIFIC COAST, consisting in part as follows:

720 dozen SPECTACLES, in Gold, Silver, Steel and Plated Frames
305 dozen EYE GLASSES, in Gold, Silver, Steel, Horn, Shell and Rubber Frames.
150 dozen WIRE GAUZE GOGGLES.
300 dozen SPECTACLE GLASSES and BRAZILIAN PEBBLES.
350 dozen SPECTACLE and EYE GLASS CASES.

395 Opera and Marine Glasses.	20,500 Card Photographs,
75 Telescope and Spy Glasses,	Photographic Albums,
178 dozen Magnifying Glasses,	600 Album Pictures—in oil colors,
80 doz. Pocket Compasses,	50 doz. Union Card Frames,
325 Hand Stereoscopes,	Joseph Rodgers & Son's CUTLERY,
74 Revolving Stereoscopes	100 doz. Table Knives,
1025 doz. Stereoscopic Views	260 doz. Pocket Knives,
Drawing Instruments in German Silver and Brass,	120 doz. Razors,
Boxwood and Ivory Scales,	50 doz. Razor Strops,
Microscopes in every Style,	130 doz. Scissors,
25 Magnetic Machines for Medical purposes,	SCISSORS, in Cases,
Aneroid Barometers,	100 doz. Gyroscope Tops,
	169 doz. Thermometers,
	25 doz. Hydrometers,
	Galvanic Batteries.

☞COUNTRY TRADERS will consult their own interest by examining our Stock and Prices before purchasing elsewhere.

 ORDERS FROM THE COUNTRY promptly executed.

☞CATALOGUES sent to any address FREE.

Address

LAWRENCE & HOUSEWORTH,
OPTICIANS,
637 CLAY STREET,
my28 SAN FRANCISCO.

PACIFIC INSURANCE COMPANY.

436 CALIFORNIA STREET,

SAN FRANCISCO.

Insure against loss or damage by fire, on Buildings, Merchandise, Wares, and other Personal Property.

CAPITAL STOCK - - - - - - - - $750,000

The largest sum at present to be taken on any one risk is $30,000. All Losses payable in United States Gold Coin. The Personal Liability of Stockholders, under the Law of this State, recognized.

The following List of Directors is a sufficient guarantee of the stability and responsibility of the Company:

Louis McLean,	Lloyd Tevis,
W. C. Ralston,	H. F. Teschemacher,
Frederick Billings,	Geo. H Howard,
H. Carlton, Jr.,	A.B. Forbes,
Wm. M. Lent,	A. L. Tubbs,
J. G. Kittle,	Jonathan Hunt,
J. B. Thomas,	J. B. Newton,
J. G. Bray,	John O. Earl,
Asa T. Lawton,	S. J. Hensley,
J. Whitney, Jr.,	John Wightman,
Edward Martin,	L. Sachs,
L. B. Benchly,	Jas. DeFremery,
A. Seligman,	J. G. Kellogg,
Wm. Sherman,	G. W. Beaver,
Wm. Alvord,	Elie Lazard,
Charles Mayne,	William Sharon,
Erwin Davis,	Adam Grant,
P. L. Weaver,	Alpheus Bull,
Samuel C. Bigelow,	A. G. Stiles,
Herman Michels,	M. P. Jones,
H. L. Dodge,	D. Stern,
H L. Goldstein,	S. M. Wilson,
H. Haussmann,	D. J. Oliver,
Morton Cheesman,	Jabez Howes,
H. M. Newhall,	F. W. Brooks,
W. Norris,	I. Lehman, Sacramento.
Edgar Mills, Sacramento.	T. R Anthony, Stockton.
C. T. Wheeler, Sacramento.	D. W. C. Rice, Marysville.
J. H Jewett, Marysville.	W. S. Ladd, Portland (O.)
J. C. Ainsworth, Portland (O.)

J. HUNT, President.
A. J. RALSTON, Secretary. my28

BOYS! BOYS! BOYS!

NOW IS THE TIME!

H. M. LOCKWOOD & CO.,

Now No. 624) CLAY STREET, (Old No. 176

Have received a Large Stock of

GENTS' AND BOYS' CLOTHING

—AND—

FURNISHING GOODS,

Which they are selling

AT VERY LOW PRICES.

Every Garment warranted. All are invited to call and examine our goods.

H. M. LOCKWOOD & CO.,
my28 624 Clay street, San Francisco.

GREAT TRIUMPH!!

STEINWAY & SONS

Were awarded the FIRST PRIZE MEDAL at the late great INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITION AT LONDON, over the two hundred and sixty-nine Pianos entered for competition from all parts of the world.

The Special Correspondent of the New York Times says: "Messrs. Steinway & Sons' indorsement by the Jurors is emphatic, and stronger and more to the point than that of any European maker."

A constant supply of the above superior instruments can be found at the Agent's,

M. GRAY, 613 Clay street.

PIANO TUNING done by a first-class Workman, from Steinway & Son's Factory, New York. my28

CARPETS, OIL CLOTHS,

UPHOLSTERY GOODS,

PAPER HANGINGS.

THE LARGEST

—AND—

BEST ASSORTED STOCK IN THE STATE,

And everything to be found in a well-conducted

Carpet Warehouse,

For Sale at the Lowest Rates.

WM. M. HIXON'S

CARPET WAREHOUSE,

NOS. 606 AND 608 CLAY STREET.

One Door above Montgomery street. my28

FEET! FEET! FEET!

Listen all ye that deal in feet and are barefooted:

GOOD TIMES COME AT LAST!

No Assessments to Pay, but Dividends Secured at Once!

FOR SIXTY DAYS

We will dispose of our IMMENSE STOCK

AT UNPRECEDENTED LOW PRICES.

We have in store and arriving, upwards of

$150,000 WORTH

OF

BOOTS, SHOES AND GAITERS,

Which we are determined to give the public, and all our customers, for cash,

25 PER CENT. BELOW NEW YORK COST.

5,000 PAIRS LADIES' BUTTON, LACE AND CONGRESS GAITERS,

Suitable for House Shoes, Regardless of any Cost,

ON ACCOUNT OF HIGH PREMIUM ON GOLD.

We solicit a call to convince, then send along your friends, to the largest RETAIL SHOE STORE in the State.

HOLCOMBE BROTHERS,

PIONEER SHOE STORE,
Corner Washington and Kearny streets.
my28

WM. SHEW'S PHOTOGRAPHIC GALLERY!

☞IS NOT REMOVED!☜

As many persons have erroneously supposed, but remains at the same place where it has been all the time for the last eight years,

NO. 423 MONTGOMERY STREET,

And is the best place in the world to obtain a good likeness and a durable picture. my28

REMOVAL.

J. K. PRIOR,

Importer and Dealer in

GAS FIXTURES AND PLUMBING MATERIALS,

Has removed to 730 MONTGOMERY STREET, near Jackson, opposite Metropolitan Theatre. Just received, an extensive assortment of plain and ornamental Gas Fixtures, of entire new patterns. Being constantly in receipt of new goods by every steamer, the attention of the public is invited.

FOR SALE:

IRON PIPE,	LEAD PIPE,
SHEET LEAD,	SHEET ZINC,

As low as any importing house in the State. my28

DINNER SETS.—We have just received,

ex Gisconrs, several extremely fine

FRENCH CHINA DINNER SETS,

WITH TEA SET, COMPLETE.

A SUPERIOR ARTICLE to anything ever offered in this market.

Connoisseurs will find great pleasure in examining our stock of VERY RARE CHINA, and

ELEGANT GLASS SETS,

FRENCH BRONZE STATUARY,

Comprising some very fine pieces.

PARIAN STATUARY, ELEGANT VASES, ETC., ETC.

HAYNES & LAWTON,

516 and 518 Sansome street, corner Merchant,
my28 San Francisco.

SQUARZA'S PUNCH.—First Premium,

Sacramento, 1862.

First Premium at San Francisco District Fair, 1863.

First Special Premium, Sacramento, 1863.

Wholesale and Retail.

my28 44 Leidesdorff street, San Francisco.

EDWARD BOSQUI & CO.,

517

CLAY STREET, SAN FRANCISCO.

BOOKBINDERS, PAPER-RULERS, AND

ACCOUNT-BOOK MANUFACTURERS.

Blanks of all kinds printed and ruled to any desired pattern. my28

NOTICE.

THE Copartnership in the Banking business heretofore existing hetweeu Eugene Kelly of the city of New York, and Joseph A. Donohoe, Wm. C. Ralston and Ralph S. Fretz of San Francisco, under the firm name of EUGENE KELLY & CO., New York, and DONOHOE, RALSTON & CO., San Francisco, will cease on the first (1st) day of July, 1864—Eugene Kelly and J. A. Donohoe withdrawing from the copartnership.

The business will he settled in New York hy Eugene Kelly, and in San Francisco by Wm. C. Ralston and R. S. Fretz.

Depositors are requested to hand in their hooks for settlement at the banking-house of Donohoe, Ralston & Co.

EUGENE KELLY,
(Per J. A. Donohoe, Attorney.)
J. A. DONOHOE,
W. C. RALSTON,
R. S. FRETZ.

San Francisco, June 13, 1864.

THE Undersigned have formed a copartnership for the transaction of a general Banking and Exchange business, under the firm names of DONOHOE, KELLY & CO., in San Francisco, and EUGENE KELLY & CO., in New York, commencing July 1, 1864. Their Banking House in this city will he at the southeast coaner of Montgomery and Sacramento streets.

EUGENE KELLY.
JOSEPH A. DONOHOE.

San Francisco, June 15, 1864. jul8

NOTICE.

THE Copartnership in the Banking business heretofore existing between Eugene Kelly of the city of New York, and Joseph A. Donohoe, Wm. C. Ralston and Ralph S. Fretz, of San Francisco, under the firm name of EUGENE KELLY & CO., New York, and DONOHOE, RALSTON & CO., San Francisco, will cease on the first day of July, 1864, Eugene Kelly and Joseph A. Donohoe withdrawing from the copartnership.

The business will he settled in New York hy Eugene Kelly, and in San Francisco hy Wm. C. Ralston and R. S. Fretz.

Depositors are requested to hand in their hooks for settlement at the Banking House of Donohoe, Ralston & Co.

EUGENE KELLY,
(Per J. A. Donohoe, Attorney.)
JOSEPH A. DONOHOE,
WM. C. RALSTON,
R. S. FRETZ.

San Francisco, June 13, 1864.

THE Undersigned, calling attention to the above card, give notice that on and after the first day of July next, they will coutinue the business of the above copartnership without interruption, at the old hanking-house of Donohoe, Ralston & Co., in this city under the firm name of FRETZ & RALSTON, and in New York, through the agency of Messrs. LEES & WALLER, No 33 Pine street: and that on and after the 5th of July next, they together with Messrs. D. O. Mills, J. B. Thomas, Louis McLane, Asa T. Lawton, Wm. E. Barron, Thomas Bell, Jno. O. Earl, Wm. Norris, J. Whitney, Jr., O. F. Giffin, A. J. Pope, Herman Michels, Frederick Billings, Geo. H. Howard, H. F. Teschemacher, A. Hayward, Moses Ellis, A. B. McCreery, R. M. Jessup, Samuel Knight, A. C. Henry, J. C. Wilmerding aud Wm. Alvord of San Francisco, and Jacob Kamm, of Portland, Oregon, having become duly incorporated under the laws of this State, will carry on the husiness of Banking in all its various hranches, at the same place and through the same agency, and upon the hasis of a Gold and Silver Curreucy, under the name of

THE BANK OF CALIFORNIA.

D. O. MILLS and WM. C. RALSTON will be charged with the management of the business of the Corporation.

WM. C. RALSTON,
R. S. FRETZ.

San Francisco, Jnne 15, 1864.

SUMMER ARRANGEMENT.

BETWEEN SANTA CLARA, SAN JOSE, WARM SPRINGS AND SAN FRANCISCO.

THROUGH IN THREE HOURS!

The Swift and Elegant Steamer

SOPHIE McLANE,

CHARLES THORN, - - - - - - - Captain.

Having been placed in perfect order, and furnished with new boilers, commenced making regular daily trips (Sundays excepted) on TUESDAY, Juue 14th, 1864.

Leaving San Jose and Santa Clara at 7 o'clock, A. M. Returning, leave San Francisco at 3 o'clock, P. M. On arrival of the steamer at Alviso, Stages will he in readiness to couvey passengers to

WARM SPRINGS.

Fare to Alviso, Santa Clara and San Jose	$1 00
Freight to Alviso, per ton	50
Wheat and Flour, do., per ton	1 00
Fruit, at reduced rates.

jul8 J. WHITNEY, Jr.

DR. CHARLES E. ZOAH,

OFFICE, No. 621 CALIFORNIA STREET,
Between Dupont and Kearny, South side, San Francisco.

A CURE WITHOUT THE USE OF MEDICINE.

NO PAIN GIVEN.

Dr. ZOAH will cure without the use of medicine. His treatment of the following diseases is short, decisive and pleasant. Entire satisfaction given in every case.

Rheumatism, Neuralgia, Pleurisy, Dyspepsia, Lumbago, Sore Throat, and all Spinal Complaints; the most violent Toothache, Headache or Earache cured in a few seconds!

All pains or aches, no matter where located, can he removed in a short time, and charges reasonable. The poor unfortunate cured without price.

The Doctor's mode of treatment is the oldest science known for the treatment of diseases afflicting the human body, and at present is practised very exteusively in the East with every success.

Dr. ZOAH will be in attendance at all hours, day and evening, at his office, 621 California street.

All letters strictly attended to. Consultations free.

jul8

METROPOLITAN THEATRE.

Montgomery street.

Under the Joint Management of
JULIA DEAN HAYNE AND ANNETTE INCE.

JULIA DEAN HAYNE,
MISS ANNETTE INCE,
MRS. EMILY JORDAN,
MR. J. H. TAYLOR,
MR. HARRY COURTAINE,
MR. FRANK LAWLOR.

AFTERNOON PERFORMANCE TO-DAY AT 2 P. M., AT HALF-PRICES.

ROMEO AND JULIET.

Romeo	Julia Dean Hayne
Juliet	Miss Annette Ince
Mercutio	Harry Courtaine

SATURDAY EVENING, JUNE 18TH,
JANE SHORE.

Jane Shore	Miss Annetto Ince
Alicia	Julia Dean Hayne
Duke of Gloster	J. H. Taylor
Earl of Hastings	Harry Courtaine
Belmour	Frank Lawlor

To conclude with the Grand Spectacular Drama of LADY OF THE LAKE.

Blanche of Devon	Julia Dean Hayne
Lady Heleu	Mrs. Emily Jordan
Fitz James	Harry Courtaine
Rhoderick Dhu	Frank Lawlor

Dress Circle and Orchestra	$1
Parquette	50 cents
Gallery	25 cents
Private Boxes	$5 and $10

Doors opeu at 7 o'clock. Performance commences at 8 o'clock.

NEW BOOKS.

FOR SALE BY

A. Roman & Co.,

417 and 419 MONTGOMERY STREET,

SAN FRANCISCO.

Discovery of the Source of the Nile, hy Capt. Speke.
The Small Horse at Allington, by Anthony Trollope.
The Natioual Almanac for 1864.
The Annual of Scientific Discovery for 1864.
Family Pride, by the author of "Pique."
Woman's Ransom, hy F. W. Robinson.
America and Her Commentators, hy Henry T. Tuckerman.
Man and Natnre, hy George P. Marsh.
Woman and her Era, hy Mrs. Farnham.
Renan's Religious History nnd Criticism.
European Mosaic, hy Howard Payson Arnold.
Marshall's Christian Missions.
Father Mathew, hy J. F. Maguire, M. P.
Vigor. A Novel, by Washington Bartlett, clerk.
Counsel and Comfort, hy "The Country Parson."
Life and Correspondence of Theodore Parker, by Weiss.
Gen. Butler in New Orleans, hy Parton.
The Campaner, Thal, etc., by Jean Paul Richter.
Industrial Biography, hy Samuel Smiles.
Ten Acres Enough.
Robertson's Sermons, Volume V.
Mainstone's Housekeeper. An English story.
The Federalist, (new edition,) by Hamilton.

A full and well-assorted stock of BOOKS in every department of Literature and Science always on hand.

☞ New Publications received by every steamer.

BOOKS IMPORTED TO ORDER

On the shortest notice.

Call and examine our stock and replenish your libraries cheaper than you can at any other establishment on this Coast.

jnl8 A. ROMAN & CO.

FOURTH OF JULY.

THE UNDERSIGNED, having been named hy the General Committee selected at the late meeting of the citizens of San Francisco as Grand Marshal of the day for the approaching Anniversary of our National Independence, respectfully notifies all civic and military organizations of this city nnd its neighborhood, of the strong desire entertained hy that Committee that each and all of them should, in fullest strength, take part in the pageant of the day. It is earnestly hoped, therefore, that every Company and Association will join heartily in the effort to make the coming celebration one worthy its great occasion.

In due time special invitations will he sent to all here notified—this advertisement being intended principally to give them ample time for preparation.

B. A. SHELDON,
jel8 Grand Marshal.

WANTED—The Dashaway Employment Office, 513 Kearney street, near California, can supply families, hotels, restaurants, farmers, ships, steamers and coasters with every description of male and female help, free of charge. Orders from the country for women must be accompanied with their passage money, as hundreds of poor girls are unable to pay their own passage. Orders promptly filled at the Dashaway Employment Office. jul1

MAGUIRE'S OPERA HOUSE.

T. MAGUIRE - - - - - - - - - PROPRIETOR.
C. L. GRAVES - - - - - - - - STAGE MANAGER.
W. STEVENSON - - - - - - - - TREASURER.

AFTERNOON PERFORMANCE TO-DAY,

FOR LADIES AND CHILDREN,

At HALF PRICES,

Commencing at 2 o'clock,

The Grand Operatic Spectacle of

SATANELLA,

Witb MISS CAROLINE RICHINGS, and the full strength of the OPERATIC,

DRAMATIC, and

BALLET Compaufes'

Forming the most expensive and gorgeous representation ever produced on the California stage,

Will be presented on

SATURDAY AFTERNOON AND EVENING,

AND PERFORMED EVERY NIGHT,

Until further notice.

PRICES OF ADMISSION:—Dress Circle and Orchestra Seats $1; Parquet $1; Gallery 50c; Reserved seats, extra 50c. Private Boxes, $10 and $5.

Doors open at 7 o'clock. Performances will commence at a quarter before 8. jul8

GILBERT'S MUSEUM,

Market street, opposito Second street, over the Occidental Market.

F. GILBERT - - - - - - - - - Proprietor
J. M. HUDSON - - - - - - - Superintendent

OPEN EVERY DAY AND EVENING.

THE LIGHTNING CALCULATOR!

THE GIANT BOY,

Eighteen years old, and eight feet in Height!

THE MUSICAL ANOMALY, THE TYROLEAN WARBLER,

Whose remarkable skill in performing upon THREE WIND INSTRUMENTS AT ONCE, and whose wonderful conversion of a common COFFEE POT into a fountain of harmony, have astounded all who have seen him.

THE GREAT CEROPLASTIC

GROUP OF LIFE-LIKE FIGURES.

THE LITTLE NORTH CAROLINA SLAVE,

The smallest woman in the world,

And upwards of two thousand Curiosities.

Also, a beautiful set of Cosmoramic Views, illustrating the PRINCIPAL CITIES OF AMERICA. There is also an Aquaria Garden attached to the Museum.

The admission to the entire Exhibition is only 25 cents; Children 15 cents. jul1-tf

WILSON & ZOYARA'S
Great Circus!

THIS MAMMOTH NEW HIPPOTHEATRON

Will exhibit throughout

THE INTERIOR OF THE STATE

During the present season.

Performances will be given during the coming week at the towns in the

NAPA AND SONOMA VALLEYS.

THE NEW AND SPLENDID COMPANY, brought by Mr. Wilson from New York and Havana at immense cost, have a world-wide reputation, enabling the management to produce all the ELEGANT, SENSATIONAL, THRILLING, COMIC, and ENTERTAINING NOVELTIES OF THE DAY. At the head of the Equestrian Department is the world-renowned

ELLA ZOYARA,

MLLE. ELOUISE,

And a number of elegant and daring Riders, whilst

MESSRS. ROSS AND CARLO
Head the Acrobatic Corps;

MESSRS. DURAND AND PAINTER
The Gymnastic;

MESSRS. AYMAR AND WILLIAMS
The Comic Department.

The Ring is under the supervision of MR VINCENT; with TRAINED and PERFORMING HORSES, PONIES and MULES—being the most complete Company that has ever appeared in the State.

KIDD'S CELEBRATED BRASS BAND accompanies the entertainment. WILSON & ZOYARA, Proprietors.

HEALTH
AND AMUSEMENT,
COMBINED!

C. J. ROBINSON'S SELECT CLASSES,

In Dr. Dio Lewis's System of

LIGHT GYMNASTICS

At MISS ALDRICH'S ACADEMY, Stevenson street,

Near corner of Market and Second streets, San Francisco,

For Scientific Physical Training and Recreative Exercise, in classes, by persons of all ages and conditions of health, and by both sexes, with light and movable apparatus, and an invariable and appropriate musical accompaniment. While the Exercises of the Light Gymnastics impart strength, graco, activity nnd symmetry to the persou, they at the same time furnish an exhaustless fund of social enjoyment and mental recreation.

Mr. ROBINSON has recently been employed to teach this system in all the public schools of this city.

CLASSES FOR LADIES AND GENTLEMEN meet on Mondays and Thursdays at 8 P. M. For Ladies, Lads nnd Misses, on Tuesdays and Fridays at 4 P. M. For admission or further information, apply at the Academy.

Mr. ROBINSON will give instruction, on application to classes and private pupils, in VOCAL CULTURE and ELOCUTION, as taught by the best masters in the East.

jy11 1m

OPPOSITION STEAMER DAY
JUNE 23D.

THE OPPOSITION STEAMSHIP

MOSES TAYLOR,

J. L. BLETHEN - - - - - - - Commander,

Will he dispatched for Panama,

ON THURSDAY - - - - - - JUNE 23D,

From Mission street Wharf, at 9 o'clock, A. M.,

Connecting at Aspinwall, via Panama Railroad, with the magnificent new Steamship

GOLDEN RULE,

3,500 TONS, FOR NEW YORK.

☞ The GOLDEN RULE is the largest, fastest, and and most elegant steamship on the Atlantic Ocean.

For information or passage, apply to

I. K. ROBERTS, Agent,
Northwest corner Battery and Pine streets,
je4 Up stairs, San Francisco.

CALISTOGA SPRINGS,
NAPA VALLEY,

The great watering place of the Pacific, not excelled in Europe or America.

BATHS OF EVERY DESCRIPTION,

GRAND HOT MINERAL SWIMMING BATH,

STEAM BATH,

From the Natural Springs—a sure cure for the Rheumatism, Gout, Sore Eyes, and Pulmonary Complaints, being impregnated with Sulphur, Iron and Magnesia.

CELEBRATED HOT MUD BATH,

The same as used hy the Romans in Italy two thousand years ago.

An elegant TROTTING PARK, one mile in length.

The best TROUT FISHING nnd SHOOTING within one mile.

Seven hours from San Francisco, by Steamboat and Stage, four hours hy boat and three hours hy stage—starting at 9 o'clock every morning. Fare hy steamer and stage, five dollars.

Thirty miles from the Geysers, stages running every day.

Telegraph line connecting with all parts of the State.

 No finer public accommodations on the continent.

jul1-1m F. B. GILMORE, Landlord.

REOPENED FOR THE SEASON.

THE CRYSTAL SPRINGS HOTEL,

Situated four miles from the San Mateo Railroad depot, in a most splendid valley, surrounded with large, beautiful, natural trees, is now open for the public. The road from San Mateo to the house has been recently macadamized, making it the finest drive in California. The House and Cottages have been refitted and thoroughly renovated. New spring beds and every modern improvement have been added to the sleeping department. The larder, as usual, contains all the delicacies of the season. Stages leave San Mateo depot on the arrival of the trains for Crystal Springs.

A fine stable is now opened at San Mateo by Messrs. Byrnes & Ames, who will furnish horses nnd carriages, or saddle horses, at low rates, to the public. Parties wishing rooms or meals, on arrival, can engage them by telegraph, via San Mateo, jul1-tf TONY OAKES, Proprietor.

AUSTIN & SCHMITT, Importers and

Deniers in

FRENCH, ENGLISH AND DOMESTIC DRY GOODS,

Offer for sale the best assortment nf the above goods to be found in the city, consisting in part of

SILKS,
SHAWLS,
MANTILLAS,
LACES,
DRESS GOODS,

Of every description. Best quality of

MOURNING GOODS,
HOSIERY,
EMBROIDERIES,

Together with a complete assortment of

HOUSEKEEPING GOODS.

247 Montgomery street,
Between Sacramento and California streets.

SAN FRANCISCO AND SAN JOSE
RAILROAD.

CHANGE OF TIME.

On and after MARCH 1st, 1864, Trains will leave the Depot on Brannan street, between Third and Fourth, for San Jose and Way Stations, as follows:

Leave San Francisco at 8 A. M. and 4:30 P. M.
Leave San Jose at 7:30 A. M. and 4 P. M.

SUNDAYS.

On Sundays, Three Trains will he run, as follows:

Leave San Francisco at 8 1-2 and 10 1-2 A. M., and 4 1-2 P. M.
Leave San Jose at 8 A. M. and 4 and 7 P. M.

Passengers can reach the Depot by either the Third or Fourth street lines of city cars.

A. H. HOUSTON,
my28 General Superintendent.

MARKET STREET RAILROAD.

CHANGE OF TIME TABLE.

ON AND AFTER APRIL 1, 1864, Trains will start from the City and the Mission as follows:

Between the hours of 8:30 A. M. and 6 P. M., every 40 minutes, instead of, as heretofore, every 30 minutes, thus:

FROM THE MISSION.

9:40	10:20	11:00	11:40

FROM THE CITY.

10:00	10:40	11:20	12:00

And so on till 6 o'clock.

Before 9 A. M. and after 6 P. M., the running will be the same as before.

my28 {F. McCOPPIN, Superintendent.

The California.

"SURELY THERE IS A VEIN FOR THE SILVER AND A PLACE FOR GOLD WHERE THEY FINE IT."

VOL. I.--NO. 5. SAN FRANCISCO, JUNE 25, 1864. TERMS { $5 a Year, by Mail, in Advance. 50 Cents a Month, by Carrier.

CONTENTS:

ORIGINAL ARTICLES:

Things—by Inigo.
The Legend of Devil's Point.
The Omens. Thackeray. } Poetry.
An Enigma.
Portuguese English.
THE COUNTESS DIANA—A Translation.

SELECTED SKETCHES, STORIES, etc.

Annie and her Master.
About Thackeray.
Gloverson the Mormon — By Artemus Ward.
Somnambulism.
English Women.

EDITORIALS:

Military History of the Week—The Situation, (with a Map.)
How to advance the Interests of the Union Party.
Financial Affairs, Stocks, etc.
Unbecoming Weather.

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS:

Minor Topics as They suggest Themselves.

MISCELLANEOUS PARAGRAPHS:

Interesting Items from Exchanges.

STORIES OF THE SUPERNATURAL:

The Haunted Man at Loosely Hall.
The Dead Body and the Boat Cloak.

BRIEF MENTION:

The News of the Day at Home and Abroad, in Nutshells.

DRAMATIC AND MUSICAL:

A review of the Drama and Lyric Stage.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

THE OMEN.

Beneath the mellowing Autumn sky,
We walked the shore, my wife and I:
The tints October's woods that dyed,
The sigh of the retiring tide,
The sun just sinking in the West,
Roused the old longing in her breast—
"Which first shall Death to glory hear?
Which, lonely, weep and wander here?"

Two scallop shells arrest my eye:
"With these will I the omens try;
Conjoined they grew beneath the sea,
Paired and complete and one as we;
That, white and fair, is thine alone,
This, brown and rugged, is my own;
I launch them thus upon the tide,—
Which first shall sink, let Fate decide!"

Thus, half in terror, half in mirth,
I launched the graceful shallops forth.
The wimpling tide retiring bore
Them further, further, from the shore—
While she pressed closer to my arm,
Hushed breath and heart in sweet alarm;
And cried, as either disappeared,
"Ah, thine is gone: 'twas that I feared!"

But still, along the dimpled sea,
Tilted our life-boats buoyantly,
Till, side by side, beyond our sight,
They floated forth into the night.
Then, baffled, awed, rebuked and still,
We stood; and my rebellious will
Felt, mid the hush on sea and shore,
A Presence all unfelt before.

Forgive, O God! Forgive! I cried,
That we have sought what Thou dost hide!
Thy secret purpose we would scan,
Distrustful of thy love to man.
Led by thy love our life hath been
By waters still, through pastures green:
Led by thy love our life shall be;
We trust, O God! that life to Thee!

ENIGMA.

I am a word of letters eight,
Whose sibilants preponderate.
My first five letters are a race,
To whom I'm a familiar face.
My final three—as students know—
A Latin preposition show:
My whole, O reader, maybe thou
Art in its situation now!

[Answer next week.]

The extreme youth of some of our volunteers hereaway excites considerable surprise. No matter what arm of the service they may belong to, one could only class some of the companies as infantry. A lady at a late drill, sympathizing with the fatigue they were called on to undergo, inquired of a veteran colonel who stood near if he thought it right that such young people should be kept in arms. "Madam," he replied, 'it is their proper place!"

THE LEGEND OF DEVIL'S POINT.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "NEIGHBORHOODS I HAVE MOVED FROM."

On the northerly shore of San Francisco Bay, at a point where the Golden Gate broadens into the Pacific, stands a bluff promontory. It affords shelter from the prevailing winds to a semicircular bay on the East. Around this bay the hillside is bleak and barren, but there are traces of former habitation in a weather-beaten cabin and deserted corral. It is said that these were originally built by an enterprising squatter who for some unaccountable reason abandoned them shortly after. The "jumper" who succeeded him disappeared one day quite as mysteriously. The third tenant, who seems to have been a man of sanguine, hopeful temperament, divided the property into building lots, staked off the hill-side, and projected the map of a new metropolis. Failing, however, to convince the citizens of San Francisco that they had mistaken the site of their city, he presently fell into dissipation and despondency. He was frequently observed haunting the narrow strip of beach at low tide, or perched upon the cliff at high-water. In this latter position a sheep-tender one day found him, cold and pulseless, with a map of his property in his hand, and his face turned toward the distant sea.

Perhaps these circumstances gave the locality its infelicitous reputation. Vague rumors were bruited of a supernatural influence that had been exercised on the tenants. Strange stories were circulated of the origin of the diabolical title by which the promontory was known. By some it was believed to be haunted by the spirit of one of Sir Francis Drake's sailors who had deserted his ship in consequence of stories told by the Indians of gold discoveries, but who had perished by starvation on the rocks. A vaquero who had once passed a night in the ruined cabin, related how a strangely-dressed and emaciated figure had knocked at the door at midnight and demanded food. Other story-tellers, of more historical accuracy, roundly asserted that Sir Francis himself had been little better than a pirate, and had chosen this spot to conceal quantities of ill-gotten booty, taken from neutral bottoms, and had protected his hiding-place by the orthodox means of hellish incantation and diabolic agencies. On moonlight nights a shadowy ship was sometimes seen standing off-and-on, or when fogs encompassed sea and shore, the noise of oars rising and falling in their row-locks could be heard muffled and indistinctly during the night. Whatever foundation there might have been for these stories, it was certain that a more weird and desolate-looking spot could not have been selected for their theatre. High hills, verdureless and enfiladed with dark cañadas, cast their gaunt shadows on the tide. During a greater portion of the day the wind, which blew furiously and incessantly, seemed possessed with a spirit of fierce disquiet and unrest. Towards nightfall the sea-fog crept with soft step through the portals of the Golden Gate, or stole in noiseless marches down the hillside, tenderly soothing the wind-buffetted face of the cliff, until sea and sky were hid together. At such times the populous city beyond and the nearer settlement seemed removed to an infinite distance. An immeasurable loneliness settled upon the cliff. The creaking of a windlass, or the monotonous chant of sailors on some unseen, outlying ship, came faint and far, and full of mystic suggestion.

About a year ago, a well-to-do, middle-aged broker of San Francisco found himself at night-fall the sole occupant of a "plunger," encompassed in a dense fog, and drifting toward the Golden Gate. This unexpected termination of an afternoon's sail was partly attributable to his want of nautical skill, and partly to the effect of his usually sanguine nature. Having given up the guidance of his boat to the wind and tide, he had trusted too implicitly for that reaction which his business experience assured him was certain to occur in all affairs, aquatic as well as terrestrial. "The tide will turn soon," said the broker, confidently, "or something will happen." He had scarcely settled himself back again in the stern sheets, before the bow of the plunger, obeying some mysterious impulse, veered slowly around and a dark object loomed up before him. A gentle eddy carried the boat further in shore, until at last it was completely embayed under the lee of a rocky point now faintly discernable through the fog. He looked around him in the vain hope of recognizing some familiar headland. The tops of the high hills which rose on either side were hidden in the fog. As the boat swung round, he succeeded in fastening a line to the rocks, and sat down again with a feeling of renewed confidence and security.

It was very cold. The insidious fog penetrated his tightly-buttoned coat, and set his teeth to chattering in spite of the aid he sometimes drew from a pocket-flask. His clothes were wet and the stern-sheets were covered with spray. The comforts of fire and shelter continually rose before his fancy as he gazed wistfully on the rocks. In sheer despair he finally drew the boat toward the most accessible part of the cliff and essayed to ascend. This was less difficult than it appeared, and in a few moments he had gained the hill above. A dark object at a little distance attracted his attention and on approaching it proved to be a deserted cabin. The story goes on to say, that having built a roaring fire of stakes pulled from the adjoining corral, with the aid of a flask of excellent brandy, he managed to pass the early part of the evening with comparative comfort.

There was no door in the cabin, and the windows were simply square openings, which freely admitted the searching fog. But in spite of these discomforts—being a man of cheerful, sanguine temperament—he amused himself by poking the fire, and watching the ruddy glow which the flames threw on the fog from the open door. In this innocent occupation a great weariness overcame him, and he fell asleep.

He was awakened at midnight by a loud "halloo" which seemed to proceed directly from the sea. Thinking it might be the cry of some boatman lost in the fog, he walked to the edge of the cliff, but the thick veil that covered sea and land rendered all objects at the distance of a few feet indistinguishable. He heard, however, the regular strokes of oars rising and falling on the water. The halloo was repeated. He was clearing his throat to reply, when to his surprise an answer came apparently from the very cabin he had quitted. Hastily retracing his steps, he was the more amazed, on reaching the open door, to find a stranger warming himself by the fire. Stepping back far enough to conceal his own person, he took a good look at the intruder.

He was a man of about forty, with a cadaverous face. But the oddity of his dress attracted the broker's attention more than his lugubrious physiognomy. His legs were hid in enormously wide trowsers descending to his knee, where they met long boots of seal-skin. A pea jacket with exaggerated cuffs almost as large as the breeches covered his chest, and around his waist a monstrous belt with a buckle like a dentist's sign supported two trumpet-mouthed pistols and a curved hanger. He wore a long queue which depended half way down his back. As the fire-light fell on his ingenuous countenance the broker observed with some concern that this queue was formed entirely of a kind of tobacco, known as pig-tail or twist. Its effect, the broker remarked, was much heightened when in a moment of thoughtful abstraction the apparition bit off a portion of it, and rolled it as a quid into the cavernous recesses of his jaws.

Meanwhile, the nearer splash of oars indicated the approach of the unseen boat. The broker had barely time to conceal himself behind the cabin before a number of uncouth-looking figures clambered up the hill towards the ruined rendezvous. They were dressed like the previous comer, who, as they passed through the open door, exchanged greetings with each in antique phrascology, bestowing at the same time some familiar nickname. Flash-in-the-Pan, Spitter-of-Frogs, Malmsey Butt, Latheyard-Will, and Mark-the-Pinker, were the few soubriquets the broker remembered. Whether these titles were given to express some peculiarity of their owner he could not tell, for a silence followed as they slowly ranged themselves upon the floor of the cabin in a semi-circle around their cadaverous host.

At length Malmsey Butt, a spherical-bodied man-of-war's-man with a rubicund nose, got on his legs somewhat unsteadily, and addressed himself to the company. They had met that evening, said the speaker, in accordance with a time-honored custom. This was simply to relieve that one of their number who for fifty years had kept watch and ward over the locality where certain treasures had been buried. At this point the broker pricked up his ears. "If so be, camarados and brothers all," he continued, "ye are ready to receive the report of our excellent and well-beloved brother, Master Slit-the-Weazand, touching his search for this treasure, why, marry, to't and begin."

A murmur of assent went round the circle as the speaker resumed his seat. Master Slit-the-Weazand, slowly opening his lantern jaws, then began. He had spent much of his time in determining the exact location of the treasure. He believed—nay, he could state positively—that its position was now settled. It was true he had done some trifling little business outside. Modesty forbade his mentioning the particulars, bnt he would simply state that of the three tenants who had occupied that cabin during the past ten years, none were now alive. [Applause, and cries of "Go to! thou wast always a all fellow!" and the like.]

Mark-the-Pinker next arose. Before proceeding to business, he had a duty to perform in the sacred name of Friendship. It ill became him to pass an eulogy upon the qualities of the speaker who had preceded him, for he had known him from "boyhood's hour." Side by side they had wrought together in the Spanish war. For a neat hand with a toledo he challenged his equal, while how nobly and beautifully he had won his present title of Slit-the-Weazand, all could testify. The speaker, with some show of emotion, asked to be pardoned if he dwelt too freely on passages of their early companionship; he then detailed, with a fine touch of humor, his comrade's peculiar manner of slitting the ears and lips of a refractory Jew, who had been captured in one of their previous voyages. He would not weary the patience of his hearers, but would briefly propose that the report of Slit-the-Weazand be accepted, and that the thanks of the company be tendered him.

A breaker of strong spirits was then rolled into the hut, and cans of grog were circulated freely from hand to hand. The health of Slit-the-Weazand was proposed in a neat speech by Mark-the-Pinker, and responded to by the former gentlemen in a manner that drew tears to the eyes of all present. To the broker, in his concealment, this momentary diversion from the real business of the meeting, occasioned much anxiety. As yet nothing had been said to indicate the exact locality of the treasure to which they had mysteriously alluded. Fear restrained him from open inquiry, and curiosity kept him from making good his escape during the orgies which followed.

But his situation was beginniug to become critical. Flash-in-the-Pan, who seemed to have been a man of choleric humor, taking fire during some hotly-contested argument, discharged both his pistols at the breast of his opponent. The balls passed through on each side immediately below his arm-pits, making a clean hole, through which the horrified broker could see the fire-light behind him. The wounded man, without betraying any concern, created the laughter of the company, by jocosely putting his arms akimbo, and inserting his thumbs iuto the orifices of the wounds, as if they had been arm-holes. This having in a measure restored good humor, the party joined hands and formed a circle preparatory to dancing. The dance was commenced by some monotonous stanzas hummed in a very high key by one of the party, the rest joining in the following chorus which seemed to present a familiar sound to the broker's ear.

Her Majestie is very sicke,
Lord Essex hath ye measles,
Our Admiral hath licked ye French—
Poppe! saith ye weasel!

At the regular recurrence of the last line, the party discharged their loaded pistols in all directions, rendering the position of the unhappy broker one of extreme peril and perplexity.

When the tumult had partially subsided, Flash-in-the-Pan called the meeting to order, and most of the revellers returned to their places, Malmsey Butt, however, insisting upon another chorus, and singing at the top of his voice:

"I am ycleped J. Keyser—I was born at Spring, hys Garden,
My father toe make me ane clerke erst did essaye,
But a fico for ye offis—I spurn ye losels offeire;
For I fain would be ane butcher by'r ladykin alwaye."

Flash-in-the-Pan then drew a pistol from his belt and bidding some one gag Malmsey Butt with the stock of it, procceded to read from a portentons roll of parchment that he held in his hand. It was a semi-legal document, clothed in the qnaint phraseology of a by-gone period. After a long preamble, asserting their loyalty as lieges of Her most bonntiful Majesty and Sovereign Lady the Queen, the document declared that they then and there took possession of the promontory, and all the treasure trove therein contained, formerly buried by Her Majesty's most faithful and devoted Admiral, Sir Francis Drake, with the right to search, discover and appropriate the same; and for the purpose thereof they did then and there form a guild or corporation to so discover, search for and disclose said treasures, and by virtue thereof they solemnly subscribed their names. But at this moment the readiug of the parchment was arrested by an exclamation from the assembly, and the broker was seen frantically struggling at the door in the strong arms of Mark-the-Pinker.

"Let me go!" he cried as he made a desperate attempt to reach the side of Master Flash-in-the-Pan. "Let me go! I tell you, gentlemen, that document is not worth the parchment it is written on. The laws of the State—the customs of the country—the mining ordinances—are all against it. Don't, by all that's sacred, throw away such a capital investment through ignorance and informality. Let me go! I assure you gentlemen, professionally, that you have a big thing—a remarkably big thing, and even if I ain't in it, I'm not going to see it fall through. Don't, for God's sake, gentlemen, I implore you, put your names to such a ridiculous paper. There isn't a notary—"

He ceased. The figures around him, which were beginning to grow fainter and more indistinct, as he went on, swam before his eyes, flickered, re-appeared again and finally went out. He rubbed his eyes and gazed around him. The cabin was deserted. On the hearth the red embers of his fire were fading away in the bright beams of the morning sun that looked aslant through the open window. He ran out to the cliff. The sturdy sea-breeze fanned his feverish cheeks, and tossed the white caps of waves that beat in pleasant music on the beach below. A stately merchantman with snowy canvas was entering the Gate. The voices of sailors came cheerfully from a bark at anchor below the point. The muskets of the sentries gleamed brightly on Alcatraz, and the rolling of drums swelled on the breeze. Farther on, the hills of San Francisco, cottage-crowned and bordered with wharves and warehouses, met his longing eye.

—

Such is the Legend of Devil's Point. Any objections to its reliability may be met with the statement that the broker who tells the story has since incorporated a company under the title of "Flash-in-the-Pan Gold and Silver Treasure Mining Company," and that its shares are already held at a stiff figure. A copy of the original document is said to be on record in the office of the company, and on any clear day, the locality of the claim may be distinctly seen from the hills of San Francisco.

THE COUNTESS DIANA.

[TRANSLATED FROM THE FRENCH OF MARIO UCHARD.]

VI.

FOR some weeks following, each morning brought me a prize. My existence near Diana was so sweet that I no longer felt the despotism of the Count. Forgetful of my anger, and of my great projects of independence, I thought no more but with annoyance of the time, lately so much desired, when I should attain my majority, after which I could not prolong, without indiscretion, my sojourn at Maufert, with a miserly guardian, to whom my way of living already seemed ruinous, though he paid for it with my own money. This, however, was only a cloud in the clear blue of my heaven. Every lover lives in the present. I saw Diana every moment of the day; I was near her, and like the unknown cavalier of the legend, who sowed violets in the path of his Princess to remind her of the country from which she was exiled, I was proud to spread secretly round her that atmosphere of love which her heart craved, and to redress the wrongs which Fate inflicted. What else could I wish? Was I not the favorite of her soul, which only outpoured itself to me? I was the only confidant of her sadnesses and of her joys. We were both isolated in the world, and we had only our mutual affection to console ourselves in the void which Death had made around us. We were both bowed down under the rudeness of a man, suspicious, jealous of all youth and beauty.

However, after breakfast the Count invariably went out with M. Placide. One could but have noticed the sigh of relief which swelled our breasts and the light that shone in our faces. . . . We escaped into the garden, now gay and sportive as scholars in their vacation, anon melancholy and pensive as lovers reading some romance of the day or some poem of other times, and our hearts beat. . . .

In truth, we had only one soul, and sometimes I feared that Diana would be apprised of it.

But an unexpected visit came soon and rudely interfered with our cherished liberty, and bound its wings. One morning in July the Baroness de Jonval, an aunt of Diana, arrived at the castle. She had received her as an orphan, and made for the sad child a life so devoid of tenderness, that the day when the marriage with the Count de Maufert was proposed, my godmother hailed it as a deliverance. Madame the Baroness, canoness of a high Chapter of Germany, was a lady of noble air, joining to the graces of the old school aristocratic humilities which betrayed a Christian of proud lineage. There was between her and the Count de Maufert a community of feeling; both were miserly, but with that avarice which obeys, not without regret, the imperious obligations of sustaiuing a great name. They agreed wonderfully in everythiug. I had little sympathy with this imposing person, who came almost every year to spoil my Autumn, and I must acknowledge that she plentifully returned my want of sympathy. So I was much surprised when, alighting from the carriage, she came towards me with open arms and a cordiality which made me very suspicious. Behind her was a young girl who I did not at first recognize.

"Well! André," said the lady, "yon don't shake hands with Madelaine, your little friend of former times?"

Madelaine was the daughter of a pastor of Fribourg in Brisgau, the residence of Mme. de Jonval. She was a charming child, whom her parents were happy to place under the charge of the noble canoness without considering too scrupulously the difference of religious belief. She came several times and spent some days at the castle; but I had left her a child, and now I found her a young lady.

"What, is it you?" cried I, with naivelé

She blushed in reaching out her hand to me, for my astouishment flattered the pride of her seventeen years.

The way in which I received her protested sufficiently against every appearance of forgetfulness; a friendship had united us for a long while, and her presence seemed to me at least a pleasant compensation for the vexatious arrival of the Baroness.

However, I must acknowledge that I felt a great annoyance at this sudden invasion of my Eden. I was obliged to give up my excursions with my godmother—that dear solitude a deux which had become so full of mysterious delights for my heart. On the first day of her arrival, this majestical aunt made arrangements as for a long stay and Diana, condemned to doing the honors of her house, belonged no more to herself. During a whole week we had scarcely an opportunity for an hour's liberty, with Madelaine as a third person, in the shade of the park. The Baroness followed all our movements; we met her everywhere. At last, however, we agreed on a plan to escape this inconvenience. The canoness, in spite of her severe devotion, devoted long hours to her toilet before breakfast, and rising at daybreak we all three would walk in the garden.

Madelaine was one of those slightly humorous natures to which German sentimentalism adds an exquisite grace. Raised amid family tenderness, she had purified her soul by contact with poverty; her ingenuous and cultivated mind mingled the courage of conscious innocence with a precocious judgment. She had not a pretty face, and she knew it; but she exhaled snch a freshness of youth, that her charm was felt without looking at her.

She reminded one at the same time, of Shakspeare's "Puck," and Goethe's "Marguerite."

Thus we lived, all three, in these alternations of joy and vexation, when one day Mme. de Jonval, who was surprisingly gracious to me, hinted to me, under the form of pleasantry at first, a very strange project—this was neither more nor less than to marry me with Miss Hermanegilde de Jonval, daughter of a brother of the canoness, who was colonel in the service of the Grand Duke of Baden. I had never seen this fiancée who dropped from the skies, and it may be judged how welcome she was in the state my heart was then in. My age sufficiently defended me against this premature matrimonial solicitude, but I had to deal with one of those obstinate females who yield, but never give up. By insensible degrees, that which appeared only a pleasantry, became soon a serious theme; my guardian himself interfered at last with a mildness entirely new, which showed a preconcerted plan between the two friends.

This perfect understanding was not of such a nature as to inspire me with confidence, but I felt myself too much master of the situation to resist the pleasure of mystifying my tyrants. To their thinking I was content with the plan for some days; but one evening, under the elms of the park, I drew the Baroness into a little ambuscade of confidence, while she explained to me the great happiness which would result to me from this alliance.

"For you are rich enough," said she, "to follow only the dictates of the heart—a pleasure to which noble souls cannot always abandon themselves."

"Indeed, madam," replied I, "noble souls are sometimes constrained to painful calculations when it comes to uniting two hearts that are irresistibly drawn together. . . . Mlle. de Jonval has no dot, if I have understood rightly."

"Her father is not rich, bnt advantages may be secured to her."

"Fie, madam, let these miseries alone. It is sufficient to me that Mlle. de Jonval adores me, which is the most flattering conquest of which a young man who has never seen his fiancée may dream. I hope you will not do me the injury to suppose that my disinterestedness is not equal to yours and hers. . . . Apropos, is she a blonde or a brunette?"

The Baroness was a little disconcerted by my easy manner. "She is a brunette," replied she, scrutinizing my thoughts.

"Ah, mon Dieu, madame—the poor young lady! what will become of her? I confess an adoration for blondes.

It was impossible for her longer to mistake my irony. Mme. de Jonval looked daggers at me and left the place without a word.

I was charmed with my trick; however, I do not know what presentiment informed me that the sentence of my future had just been pronounced.

—

VII.

I EXPECTED next morning to find sullen brows, and was very much surprised to meet with equal benevolence in the faces of M. de Maufert and the Canoness. One would have thought that nothing had disturbed our pleasant relations; however, my escapade had been spoken about, because my godmother reprimanded me.

"What!" said I, "do you reproach me for having rebelled against ridiculous obsessions, for not having allowed myself to be taken in by those fits of sudden tenderness which pretend to dispose of my life and push me into the trap of a wedding with a Badoise, whom I do not know and whom I hate in advance?"

"My friend, I stop yon right here. To refuse from principle to marry at your age is a triumphant reason. I do not plead the cause of my cousin, Mlle. de Jonval; but you have been wrong to make her a party to the suit, in declaring that you detest without ever having seen her. It was wounding the feelings, first, of the Baroness,—then," added she, smiling, "you were speaking like a madcap; who knows if you may not adore her?"

"Never! never!" said I, with vehemence; "were she as pretty and as pure as the three Graces! were she gifted by the nine Muses!"

"What an inaccessible heart," said Diana smiling; "if you are so strongly breast-plated, I shall be very much impeded when I take a notion to marry you."

"I shall never marry."

"Is it a vow?" said she, finally, "or is it a great love already existing which prevents you? Ah, you blush. Fi! the naughty prudent man. I, who am so fond of confidences! Is she pretty?"

Her words threw me into such embarrassment that I did not have the strength to answer. I trembled through fear that I might betray myself, and I was suffering at the thought that she could believe me infatuated with another.

"Ah, decidedly there is a secret," said she, "be careful. I shall find it out!"

Fortunately the arrival of Madelaine affected a diversion in my favor. I hastened to engage her in conversation under the first pretext; but the animation of my voice betrayed, in spite of myself, a desire to conceal a deep pre-occupation. I was conscious of my awkwardness as I could see in the eyes of Diana mischievious lightnings that went through me. Madelaine herself did not take pains to disguise her surprise.

"Seigneur!" said she, "what an overflow of enthusiasm! André, wings are growing to you."

"Precisely," answered my godmother "but do not be afraid; he will not take his flight to heaven. There is somewhere in this world a little haunt of which he is enamored and which retains him by a thread on our poor earth."

"Fly away, brown-bug," sang Madelaine, accompanying her song with a playful gesture, as though she held me by a thread.

"Madelaine," said Diana, "we must ravish from him the name of the fair princess for whom his heart sighs so much."

"Is she fair? Then it is me," said the charming ugly-one, with a pleasant mimicry of self-conceit.

Their laughter restored my self-possession; then taking Madelaine at her word, I threw myself in full madrigal and concluded like a hero of l'Astrée by the most bombastic declaration.

I was, however, too much in love to remain impenetrable; my two pretty Arguses could every day find out some indications which revealed my love—distraction, a certain languidness which I could not disguise; and their jokes never ceased. I thought myself very happy to get rid of them at that price, when I thought I could discover that my godmother had become anxious; her smile was restrained if the froliesome Madelaine was bantering me on my secret passion. I could see in her looks a sort of compassion. I was afraid to penetrate her thoughts.

"André," said she one morning, "whilst we are here alone, we have considerable to talk about, my friend. I have grave matters to speak about."

"Speak, my dear godmother, I listen to you. Shall I be solemn?"

"Be sincere," replied she, laughingly. "Sit down there; this bench represents a tribunal."

"Will you be my judge?" said I, somewhat alarmed, in spite of my assured air.

"I shall be your confessor—take care—and I shall scold you," added she, almost in a tone of reproach, "because you lower a little our friendship."

"Mon Dieu! what do you say? I, that never had a thought that was not for you——"

"Do you dare say that there is not one that you keep from me?" replied she, looking me right in the eyes.

I turned my eyes away and felt myself blushing:

"Well, here we have come back to that famous passion which I am accused of nursing in the dark. But it is nothing but child's play—a folly."

"Friend," said she, gravely, "give me your word that you do not love. and I will believe you."

I dared not speak; her look penetrated me.

"Your silence is already a confession," said she, "but I know how to read the depths of your heart, and I know the name you are not willing to speak."

"You know it—you?"

"I would not be a woman if I did not know it by this time," answered she, with a smile which threw me into confusion. "Here—follow the end of my parasol—I will trace on the sand this magical word which you would fear to hear repeated by the reeds if I were to pronounce it."

I followed her hand, anxious as if I were going to see appear another Mane, Thécil Phares. I at first could not decipher the first letters; then the fatidical word completed:

"Madelaine?" I exclaimed, relieved of a great weight.

"Thou hast called her by name," said Diana.

"What, seriously, do you believe it is Madelaine that I love?"

"And who should it be, I beg of you, beau tenebreux?"

"I swear to you—"

"Do not swear, because everything betrays you. It is from the day when Madelaine arrived that this change of humor, which you dare not deny, has become apparent. Besides, in this pleasant desert there is no one but her whom you could love. . . . Unless, however," added she, in an ironical tone, "unless you sigh after the pretty eyes of Madame the Cauoness."

"Oh, mercy! mercy!" cried I, anxiously.

"You see it," said she, "I shall continue: another important fact is acquired for the examination. When my aunt spoke for the first time about marrying you to a young lady of no fortune, you did not protest. It is evident that you believed that she had reference to Madelaine, because you did not rebel until the day that she mentioned the name of Mlle. de Jonval. Let me finish, my friend; if I do violence this way to a reserve of feeling that I cannot blame, it is because I fear to see you form hopes that cannot be realized. You would suffer from a love without hope. and I will put you on your guard against your illusions. Madelaine cannot love you; she is engaged to one of her cousins, a friend of her childhood, without fortune, like herself, who is devoted to her with all his soul. Nothing is waited for in their marriage but his obtaining the title of professor in the college of Fribourg."

"And he must pass his examination in the month of September," interrupted I. "But I know all that, dear godmother, and I have even thought, in order to contribute to their happiness, of begging you to dispense a little of my fortune to constitute Madelaine a small dowry of 20,000 francs, which neither he nor she would be willing to accept at my hands."

"What do you say?" she exclaimed, in the height of her surprise.

"I say, my godmother, that nothing escapes your perspicacity. I like Madelaine, and my dearest wish is to see her soon married and happy with the one she has chosen."

"André, my child," said Diana, grasping my hands, "you frighten me; if you do not love Madelaine, who, then, do you love? Because you do love—I feel it, I see it!"

At the emotion I read in her face I was on the point of falling at her feet. I could see myself discovered, lost, obliged to fly from her presence, forever. The excess, even, of my terror suggested to me the idea of affecting a vulgar love, to divert her suspicions.

"My godmother," said I, at last, trying to compose my voice, "there are weaknesses of my age, that I should entrust to a brother, but which I cannot to you? Do not exert yourself, I beg of you, to penetrate a prosaic secret, at which I should blush before you."

Diana made a gesture of surprise when she heard me confess a passion which I could not declare. She grew pale, her face became cold, and her hand dropped mine.

"Pardon, pardon! I have offended you."

"No," replied she, agitated. but trying to compose herself. "My pride is somewhat wounded by such a mistake; only, André, let me hope that the 'prosaic secret' as you call it, will not make you forget what you owe to your name.

GLOVERSON, THE MORMON.—A ROMANCE.

BY ARTEMUS WARD.

Chapter I.—The Mormon's Departure.

The morning on which Reginald Gloverson was to leave Great Salt Lake City with a mule-train, dawned beautifully.

Reginald Gloverson was a young and thrifty Mormon, with an interesting family of twenty young and handsome wives. His unions had never been blessed with children. As often as once a year he used to go to Omaha, in Nebraska, with a mule-train, for goods; but although he had performed the rather perilous journey many times with entire safety, his heart was strangely sad on this particular morning and filled with gloomy forebodings.

The time for his departure had arrived. The high-spirited mules were at the door, impatiently champing their bits. The Mormon stood sadly among his weeping wives.

"Dearest ones," he said, "I am singularly sad at heart, this morning, but do not let this depress you. The journey is a perilous one, but—pshaw! I have always come back heretofore, and why should I fear? Besides, I know that every night, as I lie down on the broad, starlit prairie, your bright faces will come to me in my dreams, and make my slumbers sweet and gentle. You, Emily, with your mild blue eyes; and you, Henrietta, with your splendid black hair; and you, Nelly, with your hair so brightly, beautifully golden; and you, Mollie, with your cheeks so downy; and you, Betsy, with your wine-red lips—far more delicious, though, than any wine I ever tasted; and you, Maria, with your winsome voice; and you, Susan, with your—with your—that is to say, Susan, with your———and the other thirteen of you, each so good and beautiful, will come to me in sweet dreams; will you not, dearestists?"

"Our own," they lovingly chimed, "we will!"

"And so farewell!" cried Reginald. "Come to my arms, my own!" he said, "that is, as many of you as can do it conveniently, at once, for I must away."

He folded several of them to his throbbing breast and drove sadly away.

But he had not gone far when the traces of the off-hind mule became unhitched. Dismounting, he essayed to adjust the trace; but ere he had fairly commenced the task, the mule, a singularly refractory animal, snorted wildly and kicked Reginald frightfully in the stomach. He arose with difficulty and tottered feebly toward his mother's house, which was near by, falling dead in her yard, with the remark: "Dear mother, I've come to die!"

"So I see," she said; "where's the mules?"

Alas! Reginald Gloverson could give no answer. In vain the heart-stricken mother threw herself upon his inanimate form, crying: "Oh, my son—my son! only say where the mules is, and then you may die if you want to!" In vain—in vain!

Reginald had passed on.

Chapter II.—Funeral Trappings.

The mules were never found.

Reginald's heart-broken mother took the body home to her unfortunate son's widows. But before her arrival she discreetly sent a boy to bust the news gently to the afflicted wives, which he did by informing them in a hoarse whisper that their "old man had gone in."

The wives felt very badly indeed.

"He was devoted to me," sobbed Emily.

"And to me," said Maria.

"Yes," said Emily, "he thought considerably of you, but not so much as he did of me."

"I say he did!"

"And I say he didn't!"

"He did!"

"Don't look at me with your squint eyes!"

"Don't shake your red head at me!"

"Sisters!" said the black-haired Henrietta, "cease this unseemly wrangling. I, as Reginald's first wife, shall strew flowers on his grave!"

"No you won't," said Susan, "I, as his last wife, shall strew flowers on his grave. It is my business to strew!"

"You shan't; so there!" said Henrietta.

"You bet I will!" said Susan, with a tear-suffused cheek.

"Well, as for me," said the practical Betsey, "I ain't on the strew much, but I shall ride at the head of the funeral procession!"

"Not if I've ever been introduced to myself, you won't," said the golden-haired Nelly; "that is my position. You bet your bonnet-strings it is."

"Children," said Reginald's mother, "you must do some crying, you know, on the day of the funeral; and how many pocket-handkerchiefs will it take to go round? Betsey, you and Nelly ought to make one do between you."

"I'll tear her eyes out if she perpetrates a sob on my handkerchief," said Nelly.

"Dear daughters-in-law," said Reginald's mother, "how unseemly is this anger! Mules is five hundred dollars a span, and every identucal mule my poor boy had has been gobbled up by the red man. I knew when my Reginald staggered into the door-yard that he was on the die; but if I'd only thunk to ask him about them mules ere his gentle spirit took flight it would have been four thousand dollars in our pockets and no mistake. Excuse these real tears, but you've never felt a parent's feelins."

"It's an oversight," sobbed Maria. "Don't blame us!"

Chaptrr III.—Dust to Dust.

The funeral passed off in a very pleasant manner, nothing occurring to mar the harmony of the occasion. By a happy thought of Reginald's mother, the wives walked to the grave twenty abreast, which rendered that part of the ceremony thoroughly impartial. * * * * * * *

That night the twenty wives with heavy hearts sought their twenty respective couches—Reginald would nevermore linger all night in blissful repose in those twenty respective couches—Reginald's head would never more press the twenty respective pillows of those twenty respective couches—never, nevermore. * * * * * * * * * *

In another house, not many leagues from the House of Mourning, a gray-haired woman was weeping passionately. "He died," she cried, "he died, without sigerfyiu', in any respect, where them mules went to!"

Chapter IV.—Married again.

Two years are supposed to have elapsed between the third and fourth chapters of this original American romance.

A manly Mormon, one evening, as the sun was preparing to set among a select apartment of gold and crimson clouds in the western horizon—although for that matter, the sun has a right to "set" where it wants to, and so, I may add, has a hen—a manly Mormon, I say, tapped gently at the door of the mansion of the late Reginald Gloverson.

The door was opened by Mrs. Susan Gloverson.

"Is this the house of the widow Gloverson?"

"It is," said Susan.

"And how many is there of she?" inquired the Mormon.

"There is about twenty of her, including me," courteously returned the fair Susan.

"Can I see her?"

"You can."

"Madam," he softly said, addressing the twenty disconsolate widows, "I have seen part of you before! And although I have already twenty-five wives whom I respect and care for I can truly say that I never felt love's holy thrill till I saw thee! Be mine—be mine!" he enthusiastically cried, and we will show the world a striking illustration of the beauty and truth of the noble lines, only a good deal more so—

"Twenty-one souls with a single thought,
Twenty-one hearts that beat as one."

They were united, they were!

Gentle reader, does not the moral of this romance show that—does it not, in fact, show that however many there may be of a young widow woman, or rather does it not show that whatever number of persons one woman may consist of—well never mind what it shows. Only this writing Mormon romances is confusing to the intellect. You try and see.

A Chinese Dish.—When our party of six had seated themselves at the centre table, my attention was attracted by a covered dish, something unusual at a Chinese meal. On a certain signal the cover was removed, and presently the face of the table was covered with juvenile crabs, which made their exodus from the dish with all possible rapidity. The crablets had been thrown into a plate of vinegar just as the company sat down—such an immersion making them more brisk and lively than usual. But the sprightly sport of the infant crabs were soon checked by each guest seizing which he could, dashing it into his mouth, crushing it between his teeth, and swallowing the whole morsel without ceremony. Determined to do as the Chinese did, I tried this novelty also with one—with two. I succeeded, finding the shell soft and gelatinous; for they were tiny creatures, not more than a day or two old. But I was compelled to give in to a third which had resolved to take vengeance, and gave my lower lip a nip so sharp and severe as to make me relinquish my hold.—Life in China.

FINANCIAL AFFAIRS, STOCKS, ETC.

THE very stringent provisions of the last Gold bill passed by Congress are exciting a little uneasiness in certain circles. Telegraphic advices state that the bill interdicts contracts for the purchase or sale of gold, unless accompanied by delivery on the same day, and expressly requires the contractor for sale and delivery to be in actual possession. "It prohibits all loans of coin and all time contracts for the sale of exchange beyond ten days. It interdicts transactions in gold save at the ordinary places of business of the parties, and declares all contracts made in violation of the act absolutely void, imposing also heavy fines and imprisonment."

This arbitrary measure is not designed for these latitudes, and will doubtless not apply to the Specific Contract law of California. It is aimed at the dealers in gold on Wall street, and is intended to effectually check transactions, or to restrict the operations of the brokers to as limited a sphere as possible—driving gold out of the market as a speculative commodity. The clause prohibiting all loans of coin is obscure and unintelligible; it should probably read upon coin, and not of coin. It has long been the custom of the private bankers, bullion brokers, and others on Wall street, to deposit their gold and silver with regular Banks, the par value of this gold as a special deposit being placed to their credit in currency. These deposits, until very recently, composed a large portion of the Bank reserve of gold. The Banks were glad to facilitate such operations, and in their weekly general average would count this specie as their own, when in reality it belonged to depositors who were permitted to check for any portion of it whenever they wished to sell it. Before gold commanded a premium in New York, the dealers in foreign gold and silver, (doubloons, sovereigns, napoleons, Mexican and Spanish dollars, etc.,) all kept such accounts with the Banks; and no interest was charged, for the reason that it was always thought desirable to swell the amount of specie in the vaults of Banks as much as possible. Sometimes these deposits would scarcely remain twenty-four hours in Bank; yet in the weekly average made up at the clearing-house they would be counted. The stringent loan feature in the new law is to reach these transactions, and that it will effectually do so is quite clear. No other reasonable interpretation can, we think, be placed upon it, and the apprehension felt here with regard to its application to our Special Contract act is without force. There can be no doubt of the determination of the Government to rigidly enforce this law in other localities. A late decision of Judge Wylie, of the Supreme Court of New York, is germane to the subject. A suit was brought before his Honor under the operations of the old law prohibiting contracts in gold beyond a certain time. He held that such operations are contrary to public policy, and the plaintiff in such suits can neither recover profits made on former gold speculations and remaining in the hands of defendants, or money deposited with them as a margin or collateral security under contracts for the purchase of gold. This is the first decision of the kind, and will of course be appealed to a higher tribunal.

The Trustees of the Bank of California issued their circular a few days since and operations are to commence, as previously announced, on the 5th proximo. The available means of the Bank will, it is supposed, reach three million dollars, including the funds of depositors. The establishment of a monster National Bank by Eastern parties is seriously talked of, and it is said that measures are now on foot to perfect a preliminary organization. Other Banking institutions are projected, and before the close of the present year we are likely to have all the capital required for legitimate purposes. Every interest will feel the stimulating influence of so important an accession of means, and the rates of interest now current are almost certain to decline.

The money market is easier, the demand fair but not pressing. The prevailing rate in Bank is 1½ per cent., on the street, in the open market 2 to 3 per cent is freely paid.

Receipts of treasure from the interior during the past ten days amount to $2,000,000. The Branch Mint has taken some $800,000. The Bullion Fund of $1,000,000 granted the Mint to insure prompt payments to depositors is regarded with much satisfaction. In future there will be little or no delay in obtaining returns, and the business of the community will be much facilitated.

Legal Tender Notes are languid and dull under the recent advance in Gold, and are current at 50 and 51. Latest telegrams received quote Gold in New York at 200 and upwards.

The Stock market has exhibited much less strength this week, and some leading shares are lower. Low-priced stocks have also declined slightly, and are inactive. The failure of a prominent member of the Stock and Exchange Board has created a little commotion, and unfavorably influences the market for the moment. Gould and Curry rose from $3,180 to $3,225, declining to $3,150—sellers' option—rallying to $3,260, then receding to $3,100, and closing yesterday at about $2,640. 96 feet have been sold since last Saturday. The yield of the mine and the development of the lode from the lower level continues to prove satisfactory.

Ophir was in fair demand early in the week, and rose to $860, since declining to about $800 and $750.

Potosi continues to be strongly held at $1,200. The late developments in this mine below the 360 feet level are very promising, and indicate the presence of a valuable lode of first-class ore.

Savage rose to $1,830 and $1,850, and is now less firmly held at $1,800. Advices from the mine are said to be of the most encouraging character.

Chollar has been inactive and dull this week at $500 to $515. The ore from this claim is now yielding about $42 to $43 per ton. Yellow Jacket was sold at $750.

North American declined from $90 to $85, rose yesterday to $94, buyer 30, and was sold to-day at $90—some 200 feet changing hands.

Imperial has continued to advance, and rose steadily from $147½, buyer 30, to $165, buyer 30. 125 feet were sold within this range.

Lady Bryan declined from $27½ to $20½; rose to $25, then fell to $23½, and closed yesterday at $23. 1,000 shares were sold.

Bullion has been steady at $70. North Potosi fell to $55, rallied to $70, buyer 30, and was sold at the close at $59.

Nevada (J. G.) fell to $46; Independent rose to $30; Utah sold at $30; Real Del Monte at $29 to $32, and Pride of the West at $5 to $6.

DRAMATIC AND MUSICAL.

LAST week we censured the mutilation of Il Trovatore, as recently presented at Maguire's Opera House, and asked why the opera's patrons could not have the scores of Italian operas fully and more faithfully rendered. We are happy to learn that Miss Richings was guiltless in the matter, and that the mutilation was neither in compliance with her request or her desire—even her absence from the stage when Di quella pira was sung being in accordance with the wishes of another performer. Justice to the young artiste demands that this explanation be made, as our last week's notice of Il Trovatore, might otherwise be construed to reflect blame where it does not belong. That the practice of barbarously cutting down the scores—often without regard to the plot or sense of the opera—exists, is a palpable fact. A reformation in this respect should be asked for, and, if it be refused, the public should enforce the demand. Think of cutting that magnificent duo out from Lucia di Lammermoor, and the barbarism being tamely submitted to by our opera-goers.

So far as Miss Richings is concerned, she is able and willing to sing her part through in any opera which she undertakes. Her musical education has been thorough, and she has that devotion to her art which would impel her to protest against any tampering with the scores, if she followed the dictates of her own feelings. Coming among us at a time when people are looking to the necessity of retrenching their expenses, Miss Richings has not obtained that pecuniary recognition which she so richly merits; but as an artiste her success is undoubted, and she has won friends on all sides. A few particulars relative to her career will be gratifying to these—and they constitute the entire public: Early educated as a pianist, after arduous study she appeared and played with marked ability, at the concerts of several musical societies at the East, the works of such composers as Thalberg, Lizt, Chopin and others. Possessed of enthusiasm for her profession and indomitable energy, and aspiring to a broader and more profitable field of action, although then very young, she was placed by her father under the musical instruction of Signor Perelli, once a popular Tenor of the "La Scala" at Milan, the "San Carlos" at Naples, and, subsequently, at the "Tacon" in Havana. Visiting New York and Philadelphia, this artist became the instructor of several private citizens as well as some noted professionals, among whom may be ranked Miss Richings, and the Miss Herons—now playing under the Italian name of "Natalie." After four years of close application under this master, and with tutors in the French and Italian languages, Miss Richings made her début in the full English opera of The Daughter of the Regiment. The other rôles were sustained by Bishop, Seguin, etc. The performance resulted in an enthusiastic success, and was followed by the production of l'Elisir d'Amore, La Sonnambula, Linda di Chamounix and Norma, in which, the papers say, our young artiste achieved a "brilliant triumph." Subsequently she joined Maretzek's Italian Opera Company at the new Academy of Music in Philadelphia, which was opened with great eclat in the beginning of the year 1857. Brignoli and Amodio were in the company, as well as Signora Gazzaniga and Miss Adelaide Phillips. During that memorable season of eight months, Miss Richings appeared as "Amina" in La Sonnambula, "Adelgisa" in Norma, "Elvira" in Masaniello, and in other rôles. In all, she added fresh laurels to her already-established reputation; but the well-remembered monetary depression of the latter part of that year, which emptied so many purses, forced her to seek her fortune in brief engagements. For seven years she has been very successful, and has become popular and celebrated by the production of dramatized operatic specialities, such as The Enchantress, Satanella, The Daughter of the Regiment, Night Dancers, La Circassienne, L'Etoile du Noir, Fairy of the Roses, etc. The two former of these pieces have been produced in this city, last Saturday witnessing the advent of Satanella.

It is only justice to the management to say that Satanella is admirably put upon the stage. One of the principal claims of the piece lies in scenic effect, and this was attended to with a fidelity and care eminently worthy of praise. The sudden disappearances and miraculous transformations reminded one of Niblo's when the Ravels were in full revel there. Miss Richings, who of course has the leading rôle, sings with her proverbial precision and care, astonishing the echoes of the house by her wonderful trills. Her acting is characterized by that quiet grace and dignity to which we have before alluded; there is no posturing for applause, there are no bids to the gallery, no baits thrown to the parquet, the morale of the profession being, on the contrary, rigidly upheld, and a trust manifested in winning the critical appreciation of the audience, without a resort to stage tricks—a resort pleasant to see, if not always deserved. The piece does not afford much scope to the members of the regular company, but Mesdames Edwin and Perry made all out of their parts that could be made—the latter bringing all her plumpness and coquetry into play for the occasion. Mr. O'Neil was very funny as the inevitable negro of the piece—so funny as to suggest that some time, in accordance with the rapidly growing taste of the day, he will perhaps abandon his Irish domain and carry the war into Africa. Barry did as well as he could, but he evidently cannot help being Barry in everything. Mr. Thorne, as the gallant lover of the piece, was very good; he was well dressed, looked his part well, and brought into play a faculty which he possesses—not in common, unfortunately, with all members of the profession who essay to play the parts of gentlemen—of being able to enter a suppositious parlor without stumbling over the canvas threshold, of demeaning himself with average good breeding while in it, and of leaving the room without tripping himself up by getting his own sword between his legs. Satanella was performed last evening for the last time, and the red fiend took his departure from the stage with his usual smell of brimstone matches and glare of ruddy lights.

To-day, Mr. Wheatleigh takes his place at the Opera House, Miss Richings and the opera company being transferred by a whisk of the Manager's wand to the Academy of Music, where Lucia di Lammermoor will be given on Monday night. We like this change, for the Academy is better fitted for Italian opera than for the Ethiopian school, though the latter is full of melody. If the minstrels at the Academy did not realize the simile of "a jewel in an Ethiop's ear," they were at least Ethiops in that 'ere jewel of a theatre, and the "eternal fitness of things" was not at all preserved. We love to go and laugh with them at the snug little Eureka, but the style of their entertainment is not up to the elegance of the beautiful Academy. The Italian company that opens the house on Monday night contains, besides Miss Richings, Signora Bianchi and Mme. Simonson, Mr. Bianchi, Signor Gregg, M. Roncovieri and M. Charles. Lucia will be sung through with the duo which it has hitherto been the custom to omit. Mr. Wheatleigh at the Opera House commences his engagement with A Bull in a China Shop and Rachel the Reaper. We predict a successful season for Mr. Wheatleigh, but we wonder a little at Mr. Maguire's running two such houses, each crowned by a special star, at the same time. Will not people be puzzled to decide which place of amusement to attend?

Nobody who went to the Metropolitan Theatre on Tuesday evening last regretted having gone. Under the tasteful direction of Mrs. Hayne and Miss Ince, Sheridan's admirable comedy, The School for Scandal, was produced in a most acceptable manner. Wit and wisdom never grow old and wearisome, nor do the plays of Sheridan, so replete with both. The new managers of the Metropolitan are selecting for the people's entertainment the choicest works of English dramatic literature, and certainly their worthy efforts in educating the popular taste, guided by a knowledge of what is acceptable to polite audiences—and San Francisco knows no other audiences—should ensure them success. Besides the resolve to erect a substantial structure of the legitimate drama, the lady managers happily have an indispensable adjunct in the excellent stock company under their control. The School for Scandal, though rather a long lesson for the present brief days, was well cast, and skillfully sustained throughout. There was, of course, the usual error of an evident consciousness of their own personalities on the part of some of the company, which had always better be left in the green-room. One scarcely cares to see on the stage the same individual we are accustomed to meet outside the theatre. If an actor is to take the part of the king for our entertainment, should he display the same traits which he shows on the streets? Were it not better to be the king, in whose presence we all are "most loyal subjects?" Should not players suffer us to get, from the hour with them, what we go to the theatre to gather—amusement, edification, or instruction, as the case may be—some moral lesson which we might doze over were it inculcated in a sermon, or a worldly truth, which it were dull to learn in the street? Sheridan is wise in his wit, and in the social circle of "Lady Sneerwell," melodious with the scandal and gossip of the town, in the rollicking wildness of Mr. Taylor's "Charles Surface," the happy misery of Mr. Leman's "Sir Peter Teazle," the mellow hypocrisy of Mr. Lawlor's "Joseph Surface," and the majesty of a renewed conscience as shown in Miss Ince's "Lady Teazle"—in all these we have "great moral lessons." Mrs. Jordan, who is nothing if not pretty, made a most charming "Maria," and Mrs. Stewart, as "Lady Candor," succeeded in showing how great a nuisance in society those professedly candid people always are. The good old comedy of Old Heads and Young Hearts was produced on Thursday evening to a fair house. The piece was well cast, and the performance throughout was creditable. As "Lady Alice," Mrs. Hayne had an opportunity of displaying those parlor graces in which she particularly excels. Mrs. Jordan made a sparkling "Miss Rocket"—and it can truly be said that there was scarcely a "stick" among all the performers. Mr. Leman was "truly rural" as "Jesse," and portrayed the simple-minded, honest-hearted old gentleman most naturally and pleasantly. The brothers Coke were spiritedly rendered by Mr. Taylor and Mr. Lawlor, while Mr. Franks as "Bob," found a capital opportunity of displaying a quiet, quaint vein of humor especially his own. Without further individualizing, we can fairly generalize by saying that the piece throughout was excellently played. The audience entered into the spirit of the comedy, and that they were interested was evidenced by their sympathetic faces and amused smiles. There was one fault apparent, however, during the conduct of the comedy, which can only be pardoned in consideration of the jovial good humor in which the company, as well as those who sat outside that magical ring, the footlights, seemed to be. A great deal of by-play was indulged in on the stage, which had nothing to do with the play itself and distracted attention from it. During some of the most interesting situations—serious ones, we might say—when the heart strings of those immediately concerned were supposed to be strained almost to snapping, like violin strings, pretty faces that should have looked grave were mirthful as school girls' in recess time, and frolic was seen where sadness should have sat. This is all wrong. Doubtlessly to be cutting around on a cheap carpet, in a sort of tin-foil drawing-room, speaking all manner of fine sentiments which no one feels, and heaving sighs that almost require a bridge to enable the heaver to bring them safely over, provokes in the players' minds so strong a sense of the ridiculous that they can scarcely help but laugh. Those more than Barmecidal repasts, where they sit down to break imitation bread, discuss painted deserts, and raise paper goblets jollily to their lips—all this must seem very funny to the players and move them to laugh in their wide and ruffled sleeves. This they may do, but they should not laugh outright when seriousness is demanded by the spirit of the piece. They should not permit the audience at such times to see them "swelling visibly"—as Mr. Weller has it—with laughter; for under such conditions the illusion is destroyed, and one of the principal charms of the stage vanishes at once. After this little sermon for the benefit of the buskin, we have only to remark that one going out for an evening's amusement could scarcely go amiss in taking a miss to the Metropolitan.

The bill for this afternoon and evening consists of Boucicault's four-act play The Pope of Rome, to be followed in the evening by The Eton Boy. Julia Dean Hayne, Miss Ince, Mrs. Stewart, and Messrs. Taylor, Lawlor, and Leman appear in the piece. The cast alone should be sufficient to fill the house, even were the attraction of a sensation drama not prescnted.

Gilbert's Museum entertains a multitude of visitors, as usual. The Lightning Calculator is there yet, and the little black woman, the wax figures and the snakes and monkeys, still amuse and entertain the public. We shall devote an hour or two to this institution, some day, and tell all its wonders.

The Wilson-Zoyara troupe are still starring it through the country. It may be wrong to call Sacramento the country, but at this latter village they perform on Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday evenings, next week. The interior papers are loud in their praises, and the editors seem yet in doubt as to the Zoyara's sex. Is Zoyara destined to go down to posterity as the Pope Joan of the present period?

Our thanks are due to the Alta and Call for kind and excellent notices of the Californian in their issues of Sunday last. They are so hearty and warm that we could not resist the temptation of reproducing them in another part of the paper. The Alta makes a slight mistake, however, in classing the Californian as a quarto, inasmuch as it is a very good-sized octavo. There was an opportunity for a cockneyish pun, slightly at the expense of truth, if the Alta, in saying "If the Californian is not equal to Holmes or Saxe in verse," had added, "but it is Whittier!"

By advertisement in another column, a call is issued for a Union State Convention to be held at Sacramento on the 30th of August, for the nomination of Presidential Electors. A list of the number of delegates to which each county is entitled is given, and the rules which will govern in the election of delegates.

We have received from the publishers a map of Virginia City and its surroundings, drawn by Grafton T. Brown. The map is large and comprehensive, and furnishes an excellent view of the flourishing city which has blossomed out from the wilderness of Washoe. One of the most valuable and interesting features of the map is found in the mines, mills and machineries of the great companies, by which one is enabled to arrive at a very good idea of the gold and silver country without running the risk of breaking his neck in going to it, and to have some conception of shafts tunnels and the interior economy of mines without dragging one's self over valuable but jagged ore. The map is excellently engraved, and tinted, and is accompanied by a descriptive key containing a brief sketch of the history of the Territory It is contemplated to continue the series with a View of Gold Hill. We hope the enterprising young publisher—he is the author, as well—will send copies of his work to the East. They would draw a crowd of curious gazers around them if exhibited in the hotels or other public places.

PORTUGUESE ENGLISH.

LUDICROUS blunders are often as amusing as the most brilliant wit. Who has not laughed at the mistakes of foreigners trying to speak our language? We have been fortunate enough to discover a mine of just such blunders. It is a book entitled O Novo Guia da Conversacao em Portuguez e Inglez, ("New Guide to Conversation in Portuguese and English,") published in Paris in 1855. The main purpose is to assist Portuguese and Brazilians to learn English. In the preface the two authors, Jose da Fonseca and Pedro Carolino, say that they had examined many books published for the same purpose but all were full of imperfections, and typographical errors, and were written by persons who did not understand English; and their book is recommended for scrupulous exactness, typographical "correction" and adherence to the spirit of both languages. We quote the preface entire and then give some quotations from the English column; the Portuguese translation occupies a parallel column. In some places, we have thought it necessary to translate the English of Fonseca and Carolina into comuon English, putting our translation in brackets. In more places than one we have been unable to ascertain the meaning of a sentence until we had read the Portuguese.

PREFACE.

A choice of familiar dialogues, clean of gallicisms, and despoiled phrases, it was missing yet to studious portuguese and brazilian Youth; and also to persons of other nations, that wish to know the portuguese language. We sought all we may do, to correct that want, composing and divising the present little work in two parts. The first includes a greatest vocabulary proper names by alphabetical order; and the second fourty three Dialogues adapted to the usual precisions of the life. For that reason we did put, with a scrupulous exactness, a great variety own expressions to english and portuguese idioms; without to attach us selves (as make some others) almost at a literal translation; translation what only will be for to accustom the portuguese pupils, or-foreign, to speak very bad any of the mentioned idioms.

We were increasing this second edition with a phraseology, in the first part, and some familiar letters, anecdotes, idiotisms, proverbs, and to second a coin's index.

The Works which we were confering for this labour, fond use us for nothing; but those what were publishing to Portugal, or out, they were almost all composed for some foreign, or for some national little aquainted in the spirit of both languages. It was resulting from that corelessness to rest these Works fill of imperfections, and anomolies of style: in spite of the infinite typographical faults which some times, invert the sense of the periods. It increase not to contain any of those Works the figured pronunciation of the english words, nor the prosodical accent in the portuguese: indispensable object whom wish to speak the english and portuguese languages correctly.

We expect then, who the little book (for the care what we wrote him, and for her typographical correction) that may be worth the acceptation of the studious persons, and especialy of the Youth, at which we dedicate him particularly.

DIALOGUES. LEARNING FRENCH.

How is that gentleman who you did speak by and by? [Who is the gentlemau to whom you spoke just now?]

Tough he is a German, he speaks so much well italyan, french, spanish and english that among the Italyans they believe him Italyan, he speak the frenche as the frenches himselves. The Spanishesmen believe him Spanishing, and the Englishes, Englisman.

It is difficult to enjoy well so much several languages. [It is difficult to know so many languages well.]

How is the french? are you too learned now?

No too much; i know almost nothing.

Speak always right or bad.

I apprehend to make some faults. [I am afraid of blundering.]

Not apprehend you; the french language is not difficult.

I know it and she have a great deal of agreeableness. Who [how] happy i would be, if I was know it!

How is called your master?

It is called "N—"

I know him, it is long; he has teached a many of my friends.

TAKING A WALK.

Will you and take a walk with me?

Wait for that the warm be out.

How will you that we may go it? in the coach or on foot?

Go through that meadow. Who the country is beautiful! Who the trees are thick!

Take the bloom's perfume. [Enjoy the perfume of the flowers.]

Do you know these ladies who came from our side? [towards us.]

It seems me who they look where to sit down one's.

You hear the bird's gurgling. [singing.]

Which pleasure! which charm! [How pleasant! How charming!]

The field has by [for] me a thousand charms.

TRAVELLING.

Here is a horse who have bad looks. Give me another; i will not that. He not sall know to march; he is purscy, he is foundered. Don't yon are ashamed to give me a jade as like. He is unshoed, he is with nails up; it want to lead to the farrier. He go limp, he is disable, he is blind. That saddle shall hurt me.

Your pistol are its loads?

No. Go.us more fast; never was i seen a so much bad beast; she will not nor to bring forward neither put back.

Strek him the bridle; hold him the reins shorters; piquo strongly; make to march him.

I can't to make march him.

Go down; I shall make march.

Have you already arrested [engaged] a coach?

You may to prepare all for to-morrow; we shall start at the coolness [in the cool of the morning].

At which inn shall stop us?

GOING TO THE THEATRE.

Were you go to the theatre yesterday?

Yes, sir; I won't to see the new play in which did owed to play and actress which has not appeared on any theatre.

How you think her?

She has very much grace in the deeds, [gestures,] great deal of exactness in the declamation, a constitution [face] very agreeable, and a delightful voice.

It was a drama; it was whistled to [hissed at] the third scene of last act.

Because that? [why?]

It want the vehicle, [it had no plot,] and the intrigue it was bad conducted.

So that they won't waited even the upshot? [So the public would not hear it out.]

No it was divined. In the meantime them did deliver justiee to the players which generally have play very well. [They did right, yet they did justice to the good actors.]

Have yon seen already the new tragedy? They praise her very much.

This actor he make very well her part.

IDIOTISMS AND PROVERBS.

The Necessity don't know the law.

Few, few the bird make her nest. [Little by little the bird builds its nest.]

So many heads, so much opinions.

Which love well no forget to. [Who loves well does not forget.]

Nothing some money, nothing of Swiss. [No money, no Swiss.]

He throw the dust to eyes. [He throws dust in their eyes.]

That make to come water in the mouth. [That makes one's mouth water.]

It is better to do envy that pity. [Better cause envy than pity.]

To dig of fire and to fall on small coals. [To jump out of the frying pan into the fire.]

Take out the live coals with the hand of the cat. [To draw out embers with a cat's paw.]

Which looks for, find. [Who seeks, finds.]

Take the occasion for the hairs. [Take opportunity by the forelock.]

To do a wink to somebody. [To wink at a person.]

To make from a stone two blows. [To kill two birds with one stone.]

It want to beat the iron during it is hot. [Strike while the iron's hot.]

He is more in debt but he weigh. [He owes more than he weighs.]

He is not so devil as he is black. [The devil is not so black as he is painted.]

It is better be single as a bad company. [Better alone than in bad company.]

Which not tell a word consent. [Silence gives consent.]

Which not risk nothing has anything. [Nothing venture, nothing have.]

The stone as roll not to heap up not foam. [A rolling stone gathers no moss.].

ANECDOTES.

A day came a man consult this philosopher for to know at o'clock it was owe to eat. "If thou art rich, told him eat when you shall wish; if you are poor, when you may do." [A man asked a philosopher what was the best time to eat. He answered that a rich man should eat when he would, and a poor man when he could.]

One eyed was layed against a man which had good eyes that he saw better than him. The party was accepted. "I had gain, over said the one-eyed; why I see you two eyes, and you do not look me who one." [A one eyed man bet that he could see more than a man with two eyes; and, to prove it, he said that he could see two eyes in the head of the other who could see only one in his.]

A duchess accused of magic being interrogated for a commissary extremely unhandsome, this was beg himselve one she had look the devil. "Yes sir, i did see him, was answer the duchess, and he was like you as two water drops." [A duchess accused of witchcraft was tried before a very ugly commissioner, who asked whether she had ever seen the devil. "Yes sir," said she, "and he is as like you as one drop of water is like another."]

An exchange tells us that a young man named Henry Carpenter in Ohio lately committed suicide by shooting himself through the head with a rifle. The rash act—and it certainly seems one—was committed because he was in love with a young lady and could n't afford to get married. It would puzzle a philosopher to discover how he helped the matter in this instance. And taking up another paper we learn that a man in Pennsylvania shot himself because he couldn't get a divorce from his wife. So they go—some kill themselves because they are married, and others because "they can't make the riffle." As a Frenchman would say: Nobody shall be satsfied and everybody will kill himself.

The couplet of Halleck's—

None knew thee but to love thee,
None named thee but to praise, has often been borrowed, stolen and quoted. But a provincial paper, in eulogizing a political and personal favorite, improves upon the original, thus:

None speak of him but praise him,
None know him but to love him.

A lecturer is going through the country lecturing on the density of air. There is no need for him to come here. Every one in this city knows by experience of late how hard it is to raise the wind.

Smith has adopted an efficacious plan of getting his name in print—he simply lets his letters lie in the post-office till they are advertised in the usual list.

The English military authorities are said to be in favor of bringing home the two battalions of Guards now stationed in Canada.

He who lives with a good wife becomes better thereby, as those who lay down among violets arise with the perfume upon their garments.

ANNIE AND HER MASTER.

CHAPTER I.

Frau von Heilmann, mother of Gottfried von Heilmann musician and composer, a prophet not without honor in his native place of Wustestadt, knitted as deftly and as constantly as do all the homely and old-fashioned among her country-women.

On the morning when we first look in upon her, the easy-chair Frau von Heilmann occupies is placed in its fine-weather position, that is, the estrade in front of the centre window of a handsome and comfortable room on the bel étage of a house situated on the outskirt of a frequented public garden—a garden which is no garden as we English understand the word, but something between a wood and a park; a wood with no sylvan wildness, a park with no lawny slopes or turf expanse; in reality, it is the remnant of an ancient forest, cleared here and there to make place for a statue or a piece of water, and intersected in all directions by carriage-drives and narrower paths, making a sheltered and pleasant enough resort for the idle and fashionable among the inhabitants of Wustestadt.

Frau von Heilmann smiled to herself, over her knitting, as the autumn sunshine fell upon her. She was a handsome snowy-haired old woman, with bushy brows overhanging dark eyes that kept in them much of the fire of youth. She made a striking and pleasant picture, sitting as she did in a sort of indoor bower; ivy festooned the inside of the window, and was trained over the lattice-work which edged two sides of the estrade; behind her chair was a little thicket formed by her great India-rubber plants, and a few pots of blossoming shrubs and sweet-scented flowers placed at their feet.

Outside the sky seemed to be blown into a more and more burning blue, and the sunshine into a fiercer brightness, by the keen wind that was merrily, madly whirling about the red and brown leaves it had torn, somewhat untimely, from the trees in the great garden. The light that fell on this indoor picture was wonderfully clear and sharp.

Frau von Heilmann was a little deaf; when the door at the end of the room, on which she had her back turned, opened, she did not look round. Presently she started, for there fell into her lap a heavy drop, which proved to be first of a perfect shower of bon-bons—chocolate a la creme which she loved right well—rained down upon her from a hand above her head. The shower ceasing, two arms were clasped round her neck, and a soft cheek placed against hers.

"I was expecting you, Annchen Tochterchen," the old lady said. She laid down her knitting and tried to return the caresses lavished upon her, but she could not get at her assailant.

"Come round in front of me, my child. Take care of my plants! Come round where I can see you. You must tell me all about it."

"If you won't look at me, Mutterchen, perhaps I can. Knit, knit, knit! look only at your needles, like a good, kind, Mutterchen, as you are."

Annchen (or rather Annie, for she was an English girl,) carefully pushed her way through the thicket—only her head and arms had penetrated it until now—and knelt down at the old lady's feet. She put the abandoned knitting into the old hands with a little shy, beseeching smile; then, when she heard the familiar and friendly click-click of the needles, she laid her head down on those motherly knees, and by-and-by began to cry—at first very quietly; and at first Frau von Heilmann only noticed this crying by now and then, when she came to a point in her knitting at which she had to shift her needles, laying her hand caressingly on the bright brown hair that was scattered over her lap. Generally at the same time—that is to say, in the same pause of her industry—she put one of her pet bon-bons into her mouth, showing that these tears shed upon her knees caused her little uneasiness, not even fear that they might induce a more acute attack of her chronic complaint, rheumatism.

But when five, ten, fifteen minutes passed, and the head was not raised, and the sobbing had become violent, Frau von Heilmann laid her knitting and her bon-bons away on the little table that stood at her elbow, and lifted up the girl's face.

A quarter of an hour's hearty crying does not make a pretty face prettier, though undeniably it makes a plain one plainer. In spite of the temporary disfigurement, however, this face that Frau von Heilmann took between her kind brown hands was a sweet, bewitching, lovable little face. In the eyes there was a tender, gentle, and yet wild look—wild in the sense of untamed; the pretty mouth had a passionate but refined fulness; the delicate nostril a sensitive curve; the soft clear skin let every change of mood shine through, betrayed by the flushing and retreating blood.

Holding this face between her strong old hands, Frau von Heilmann tried to read it.

"More tears than enough, Annchen. What ails thee, my child?"

"Everything, Mutterchen."

"Then I think we shall prove that it is nothing."

"It is one or the other—either everything or nothing. It sounds silly to say so, but truly, Mutterchen, I hardly know which. Either I am too happy—happier than any girl ever was before, or will be after"—here a sparkling light broke over her face—"or I am miserable, too miserable. There is something here"—clasping both hands tightly over her heart, and drawing a long breath—"that I cannot understand—a heavy weight that I cannot move. Ought not happiness to make the heart light, Mutterchen?—light as a feather, gay as a bird, bright as the sunshine?" Her voice, as she asked this, had a lark-like carol in its tones; but then the tears rushed blindingly into her eyes, and she murmured—"It is not so with me—

'Meine Ruh' ist hin
Mein Herz ist schwer;
Ich finde sie nimmer
Und nimmermehr.'

Why do I feel like this, Mutterchen?"

"Ech!" ejaculated Frau von Heilmann, and her hands dropped and folded themselves in her lap, while her eyes grew dim and retrospective.

"I think this is how it is," she said, presently. "A great happiness coming to us suddenly, seems more than we can hold; a great blessing falling upon us all at once, seems more than we can bear. We feel burdened, weighed down, till we have found our way to the good God's feet, and asked His blessing upon His gift. When I was a girl, my heart would be light and dance in me because the sun shone, because a bird sang—nay, even for a ball or a ball-dress; but when I was a woman, and Gottfried my husband, my only and ever-beloved, was given me—and again, when Gottfried my son, the true and noble heart, was born to me—it was not thus. Is it that your heart is heavy with its unpraised happiness, Annchen, my child?"

The young girl flushed deeply beneath the searching eyes at the solemn question.

"I do not know, my mother." Then, after a long pause, the truthful tongue said, tremulously:

"Suppose, suppose, Mutterchen, that my heart sinks and fails me for fear that I do not love him enough?"

"It can hardly be that you do not love him, child! For 'enough,' leave that to time; you will go on loving him more and more, better and better, through all your life."

"Suppose, then, Mutterchen," and the voice was more tremulous yet, and very low—"suppose that I fear, with fear that makes my heart sicken and shrink till I feel as if I should sicken and die, that he does not love me, not more than a very little, not so much as he pities me—that he does not love me enough—not enough to satisfy my greedy heart, so starved for love—not enough to make it for his happiness that I should be his wife."

Frau von Heilmann smiled.

"It cannot be that he does not love you a good deal, Annchen; or why should he, who has found his old mother enough till now, want you for a wife? For 'enough,' be good, wise and loving, Tochterchen; strive to grow more and more worthy."

"But, Mutterchen, I am not good, not wise—I am so childish, so hot, so hasty; and he, your son, is always—no," she smiled and blushed as she corrected herself, "almost always—so calm, so wise, so perfect. Yes," she added, with a vivid and proud kindling of the whole aspect, "he is so perfect—that is the greatest fault I can find with him; and though it is no fault in him, your noble son, it may be a misfortune, even a misery, for poor me."

"Your heart tells you how false that is before your tongue has made an end of saying it," returned Frau von Heilmann. "My Gottfried is not perfect, I know, though I could not easily put my finger upon the speck or flaw. He lives towards perfection, as we all should do, striving towards the fulfilling of the command, 'Darum sollt ihr vollkommen sein;' but he is not perfect. If he were—we grow towards the standard of what we love, Tochterchen—if we set our hearts high, our lives will not be grovelling. No woman's misery ever came to her through the perfectness, or approach towards it, of him she loved." Frau von Heilmann had noted and rightly understood that proud kindling of the sweet young face. She sealed the pure brow with a kiss, and said:

"Now tell me how it happened, Annchen. I, his old mother, was quite in the dark. Much as he talks of you—much for a man who talks so little about anything—and always with pity and grave kindness, I did not guess that he loved you."

"And does he? Oh, does he? Is it not a mistake? All pity and grave kindness—only such love as a father feels for a foolish little daughter?"

"Last night, when he told me what he had done, I was satisfied that it was otherwise than that with him. But I, an old woman, cannot make love for a man, Annchen mein. Ask him—let him speak for himself. I love a love story as if I were a young girl still, though. Will you not tell me yours?"

For a moment Annie hid her blushing face. Frau von Heilmann could feel how the full heart beat against her knee.

"What can be told at all is soon told," Annie began, when she looked up again: having said which, she paused—long enough to have difficulty in breaking the silence. "You know, Mutterchen, I am not happy at Fraulein Gruppe's. She is very hard and cold, and lately she has been almost cruel. Some of the little ones love the 'English teacher,' or I should not be able to bear it. Yesterday all things seemed bitter and black. Do you know, Mutterchen, that as we took our dull walk by the dismal canal I gazed down upon it longingly; and if I had been alone, and it had not looked so ugly and slimy——"

"Child! Don't let Gottfried hear you talk like that!"

"Would he be angry?"

"Hurt—grieved."

"Oh, Mutterchen!" Annie cried. "Suppose it is like that often!—that I often hurt and grieve him! You will come to hate me, and I shall be more miserable than ever, for I shall know that I am making you two miserable. I cannot rule my tongue or myself always: I must be free sometimes—have some liberty: this often gets me into trouble at the school. But what a little fool I am! Is it likely I shall talk like that when I am happy? Already I cannot feel as I did yesterday. It is not like the same world. Yesterday the creeping water, the clinging fog—to-day! Is it the same world, mother?"

"No—not for you, little one. And she doubts if she loves him enough," said Frau von Heilmann to herself.

"I was wicked yesterday, I know," Annie continued, "but it seemed as if there was nothing left to me. It was not bitter to struggle and to bear while there was some one else to keep and care for. I did not complain then, my mother; but just for one's poor little self, when one is miserable, you can fancy that sometimes it does not seem worth while to take such pains to keep alive. Well, when I went home from that walk yesterday (it was yesterday, though it seems long ago!) chilled through and through, and very wretched, Frau'ein Gruppe met me with a scolding. 'I had kept the girls out too long,' she said. 'Herr von Heilmann was waiting, and his precious time could not be wasted.' Do you know," Annie inserted in laughing parenthesis, "I shall lead a harder life than ever now, when she knows, I fancy. But what shall I care? Oh, I will be so good—so good! Yesterday it was scold, scold, scold—I do not know what she said to me. And then she sent me straight into the music-room to take my lesson first, that the young ladies might have time to warm their hands. I felt sure that Herr von Heilmann had heard all that had passed, and I was ashamed to be scolded like a naughty child in his hearing—afraid he would believe that I deserved it all; but I was obliged to go to my lesson at once. When I went into the room he only bowed to me, just as usual, looking as tall and grand as he always does. He set my chair, arranged my music, standing until I was seated, as he always does." There Annie paused, a little proud and tender smile curving her lips. "I dashed at my music with my eyes full of stinging tears and my hands stiff with cold. I played frightfully, and did not stop myself for the wrong notes, and he did not stop me. Generally he is strict—half a wrong note doesn't escape him. I could not tell what this meant—it frightened me more than a scolding. I stopped suddenly and looked into his face. It had a strange expression; the corners of his mouth were twitching and his eyes were contracted and——"

"Yes, yes—I know the look," nodded the mother. "His father used to look so when he was deeply moved."

"I felt obliged to say something, Mutterchen, for I couldn't bear his silence; so I said, rudely and pettishly, 'you do not think me worthy of correction to-day, mein Herr. Why don't you send me away, and throw my music after me—treat me as Herr Steinwitz treats such pupils.' You see, mother, I was grieved, really, though I wouldn't show it. I had hoped to please him that day; it was his own music, and I had studied industriously. How do you think he answered me? He smiled, rather grimly—I know he must have been all on edge with my false playing—and took my hands, saying, 'The little hands are cold; mine are hot: I will warm them, and afterwards my Fraulein will play quite otherwise.' Then he began to chafe my hands. I did not think anything of that; he had done it for me before, and I had seen him do it for two or three of the quite little children. He always treated me as if I too were quite a child. But that he should be so kind and patient when I had been so rude and naughty—I could not bear that. If he had scolded, I should perhaps have been as hard as iron; but at his goodness I burst out crying, and felt as if my heart were breaking. It is awkward to cry when one has no hand to hide one's face with, nowhere to lean one's head, Mutterchen——"

"Yes, yes," nodded the old mother. "Go on, my child. What happened next?"

"Your son felt my difficulty, I suppose. He did not give me my hands—he held them fast in one of his; but he drew me to him closer and closer, till my head leant against his breast. Now, Mutterchen, what right had he to know that I should not be very angry?" Annie flashed up a shy smile into the listening face. "But somehow I did not seem to mind it—it did not seem strange to me to rest there. I did not try to get away; it seemed well with me there, and quite natural. Then, mother mine, while he held me against his heart, and bent his face down upon my head, he said—the words entered my soul without passing through my ears—I cannot tell what he said. I did not move, I did not speak. I left off crying and felt as if I had gone to heaven, or heaven had come down upon me. I was no more abashed than if I had been in my own dead mother's arms. Presently he put me from him, gently, but quickly; he placed my hands upon the keys, and turned the pages of my music. Fraulein Gruppe entered; he had heard her coming. He would not compromise me, for I had not spoken! Mutterchen, I feel I would trust him with all—myself, my life, my happiness, my honor. I know he would guard them ten thousand times better than I could or would myself, and yet——"

"And yet—speak, Annchen."

The bright, proud face clouded, the clear voice lost all its ring of truth and delight, as the girl murmured—

"And yet I cannot feel sure that I love him."

"At your peril let Gottfried hear you say that," the mother remonstrated, with a severe smile. "He is humble in his noble simplicity: he will believe you."

"Would it not perhaps be well for him, my mother, that he should believe that I do not love him?—not in the one way of loving."

The door opened, and Herr von Heilmann came up the room towards the estrade. A tall and stately man, not young, and of a soldierly bearing; naturally fair, but browned to the brown fit for a soldier's cheek. The high brow was a little bald, but the beard and moustache, which did not quite hide a handsome resolute mouth, were strong and tawny. The eyes had for habitual expression a look of introspective and concentrated thought; because they did not concern themselves constantly with the common things of that outward world, they passed with some for "dreamy," but their glance could be keen and trenchant. They were the eyes of a wise enthusiast and a long-suffering patriot. The face was deeply lined, seeming to tell of things that had been; the whole aspect was noble and calm; the bearing and manner stiff rather than flexible. No wonder that a young girl, like Annie Gresham, looking upon this man, should find it hard to realize that, otherwise than from "pity and grave kindness," a half-chivalrous, half-paternal yearning to take a weak and friendless thing home to his protection, should he desire to make her his wife.

It was this that she did find it hard to realize; this was the real difficulty which grieved and vexed a proud and sensitive young heart.

Annie sprang up from her kneeling attitude when Herr von Heilmann entered the room and stood behind his mother, one hand resting on her chair; her eyes were on the ground, and so she lost the sight that would have gladdened her poor little heart—the warm lighting-up of the grave face when Herr von Heilmann caught sight of her. As she stood there in shy and troubled happiness, she was wondering to herself how he would address her, what sort of notice he would take of her. They had not met since ——, and then she blushed overpoweringly, and rather scoffed at her own heart, and said to it, "It is nothing to him; he will call you 'highly-respected Fraulein,' very likely."

Herr von Heilmann was on the estrade now; he bent over his mother, and kissed her hand and her cheek; then, with a face of doubt and inquiry, he turned to Annie.

"She cannot feel sure that she loves you, she says," spoke Frau von Heilmann, rather maliciously. She was a little annoyed that Annie should have repeated that statement, and meant to string her to an acknowledgment of its falsehood.

Herr von Heilmann bowed over the hand he had taken in his own, and relinquished it. Annie had no. looked into his face while that brief glow overspread it, but she now saw its eold gravity.

"Be seatcd, Fraulein," he said, setting a chair for her as he spoke. Then he looked at his watch—"I have ten minutes; the time will suffice for my explanation and apology." But he paused, and a shade of embarrassment crossed his brow. "Explain to her mother," he resumed—"you women understand each other—that though yesterday I was surprised iuto a departure from my usual respectful attitude, she was quite blameless. I was wrong; my conduct was hasty, ill-considered, for her compromising. While I now offer her my most earnest apology, I wish her to feel assured that in no way will I presume upon her goodness. How should she know if she can love me? Let her have time to question her heart. I will wait as long as shc pleases; till she pleases to have them changed, things shall be between us as they have always been."

"Annchen! have you nothing to say, child?" asked the mother, uneasy now at what she had done.

"Nothing, dear Frau," answered poor Annie, who felt as if the bounding life-currcnt were freezing perceptibly within her.

"Gottfried, my son, you are too scrupulous, too punctilious, too formal; you misrepresent yourself, and——"

"Excuse me, my mother. In such a matter a man cannot be too scrupulous. Yesterday I was rash and wrong. Had the Fraulein Gruppe entered one moment sooner, consider in what a position my indiscretion would have placed the dear ehild here."

As he finished, recalled the scene, and allowed himself to use so tenderly-familiar an epithet, a momentary passionateness shone from his eyes. Annie, had she seen that look, might have followed what would surely have been the bidding of her heart, and, running to him, laid her head again where it had so fearlessly rested yesterday; but she did not see it; she sat still in her place, giving no sign.

The day had changed—cruelly.

"True, true, true," said the mother, "but Fraulein Gruppe did not enter, and Annchen forgives you. Is it not so, Anuchen?" she turned upon the girl somewhat impatiently.

"Herr von Heilmann may think me too forgiving if I do," she answered. "Surely if he finds so much of which to repent, there must be something for me to regret. My conduct yesterday must have appeared to him bold, unmaidenly."

She spoke with a burning blush and a stinging sense of humiliatiou.

"Your conduct was admirable—in the purity of childlike simplicity," he answercd—"a simplicity which no man of honor would abuse or presume upon."

Annie hardly heeded his words. She was seized by the impulse to escape, to breathe freely, to be alone. She hurried by, caught up her shawl and bonnet, and, discovering all at once that she had exceeded the time of her leave of absence, she declared that she must go immediately.

Throwing her arms round Frau von Heilmann, putting her burning cheek to hers, she kissed her passionately. As she did so, she whispered, "Liebe Frau, you have been a little cruel; but it is best so." Then, with a quick shy look and a hurried gesture of farewell, she passed Herr von Heilmann and left the room.

As she took her way through the crisped leaves lying thick in the great garden, she felt her heart waiting and listening for a following footstep while her feet hurried her along.

Pausing to look back when she gained the door of her prison-house, she half faucied she saw the stately figure of Herr von Hcilmann in the distance; if so, he had made no effort to overtake her. She might have known that he would not—that what he did not say to her when she was under the protection of his mother's presence he was not likely to try to say to her in a public walk, aud so expose her agitation to the remark of any chance passer-by. She did not think of this; she only recognized that the day was cruelly changed.

FRERE AND THE RAG PICKER.—One of the great occasions in Paris is "Palm Sunday;" you meet on that day every oue—coachmen, carters, old and young, high and low, all with their sprigs of palm, and all feel a certain respect if not veneration for it. The last Palm Sunday occurred ten weeks ago, when Frere visited the city. Iu passing to the railroad on his way home he saw a poor chiffonier wending his weary way with a huge basket on his back, who was arrested by encountering a sprig of palm which some one had dropped. Stopping at once, disencumbering himself of his burden, and balancing it with one hand on a stepping-stone by the gutter, with the other he picked up the sacred sprig and carefully fixed it upon the top of his basket; and whilst regarding it with veneration, Frere passed, touched him upon the shoulder, and gave him some sous to stand a few minutes while he made a little sketch of him on an envelope; and for fear it might uot be sufficiently fixed in his mind he went directly to his studio, where he made a larger sketch in oil. It will make a beautiful subject. Frere was delighted, for he was deeply interested in the subject himself, and is now looking for a model to paint a picture.

A NEW LIFE OF ROUSSEAU.—The first volume of a new life of Jean Jacques Rousseau by F. Brockerhoff, has recently appeared in Germany. It carries the biography, however, only as far as Rousseau's residence at Montmorency, thus leaving the most important period of his life to be treated in two additional volumes which are promised. The author does not write an apotheosis. His object is to present Rousscau's life in its early errors as well as in its later achievements, as the development of a singular and aspiring nature. Bacon is still the great philosopher, in spite of the vulgar corruptions to which he yielded; Voltaire is still the great thinker, in spite of his love of money, which led him sometimes, as Carlyle has shown in so masterly a way in the last volume of his Life of Frederick the Great, even to perjury and forgery; so Rousseau, though he did send his own children to a foundling hospital, will remain one of the most original of modern political reformers. Brockerhoff's life of him is at once historical and psychological, showing how out of what one may call the negative Rousseau, wayward and dissolute, grew the positive Roussean, led by experience to a certain puritanical clearness and obstinacy of thought; to the contemplating of an ideal world from which the existing abuses of human society should be forever banished.

SOMNAMBULISM.

BY A FRENCH DETECTIVE.*

For the last twenty years and more, a new trade—a charlatanism which seduces a man by its attraction to the marvellous—has attained a very great extension. Somnambulism is one more method among the great number already existing for working upon the good faith of credulous persons. All our newspapers have been frequently filled with puffs, in letters half an inch high, proclaiming Mlle. X—— or Mlle. G—— the most lucid somnambulist that ever appeared, and yet these puffs eontained a frightful amount of falsehood, seduction and decception! I do not attempt to discuss here the greater or lcss amount of lucidity of the mind under the influence of the magnetic sleep; but as regards the pretended miracles and phenomena so often taken advantage of by swindlers, I think it useful to mention several facts which will teach how much confidence ought to be granted to the somnambulist oracles.

A female came to my office one day and told me that she was portress to a house ncar the Bourse, and that very morning, during a momentary absencc, a bank note for 1,000 francs and some other articles had been stolen from her table-drawer.

"And just imaginc, sir," she continued, "that when I returned home I met on my door-step a young man who lives ou the fifth floor of our house—a good-for-nothing scamp, who calls himself a lawyer's clerk out of work, who was pretending to be calm, though I feel sure that he was trembling with fear. At that moment I did not know any thiug; but when I discovered the robbery, I straightway called to mind my tenant's hang-dog look. I at once said to myself, 'I am certain he is the thief,' and then as I do not like to act lightly, instead of making a disturbance, I went at once to a famous somnambulist, who said, while seeing me, though he was asleep, 'Well you were robbed this morning by a young man who lives on the fifth floor of your house, who was formerly in an office, but is now doing uothing.' Then my somnambulist described everything that was in the room addiug that the window faced the door. That was certainly evident proof, and so I have come to ask you to arrest him at once and put him in prison. I have beeu to the police commissioner, but he refused to arrest the rascal aud sent me to you."

"He acted rightly, madame, and you will permit me to tell you that I have so often been deceived by the statements of somnambulists that I set no faith in them."

"Still, sir, the somnambulist described him exactly before I mentioned my suspicions, and he described the room of the thief, though he has never seen it. There cau be no doubt but that he has spoken the truth."

"Whatever you may say, I repeat that I am not allowed to arrest a man on such weak evidence. Watch your tenant; do not let him out of sight, so that he may be easily found when the moment arrives, and do not trouble yourself any more about the matter, as I shall take it in hand."

The portress went off greatly dissatisfied, saying that she did not understaud why the police did not at once arrest a thief who was pointed out to them. I went to M. Carlier's office to speak to him about this affair.

"Very good," said the prefect; "but as ignorance at times renders people stupid, in order to prevent this good woman from declaring everywhere that the police are in league with thieves, I will issue a search warrant, and thus prove that the lost objects are not in this young man's possession.

During this time the portress still went on. She had left my office in a fury; her walk heightened her agitation, and on rcaching her house she hastened to tell her neighbors of the result of her visit to the chief of the detectives. At this moment M. B——, a banker, residing in the house, passed the lodge. He was a gossiping and very curious gentleman. The portress told him of the robbery and the revelations which the somnambulist had made to her. M. B——, amazed, wished to hear the supernatural revelation with his own ears, and ere long banker and portress proceeded side by side to the clairvoyant sleeper. The latter repeated the story which he had originally told the portress, and M. B——, more and more amazed, hurried to my office and wished to know why I had not arrested the individual suspected. One circumstance had wonderfully heightened the banker's faith: a list of names was handed to the somnambulist, in which that of the young clerk was purposely omitted, and he exclaimed, "Your thief is not in that, for his name is X——!"

Unfortunately for the convictions of the banker and the portress, the search warrant was handed me at this very moment. I sent it off at once, and not the slightest trace of the stolen effects was found in X——'s room. Some time afterwards, in consequence of delicate inquiries, suspicion rested on a portress in the same street; the house was searched, and it led not only to the discovery of the articles stolen from the complainant, but also of some jewelry filched from the same banker, who accused me of arbitrary conduct when I did not have the young lawyer's clerk, pointed out by the somnambulist, arrested.

A girl of very respectable family, of the name of Virginie, disappearcd from her parents' house, and a worthy magistrate, whom I had known for some time, made me an official report in the following terms:

"Virginie is fair, young and remarkably pretty; her character is wonderfully angelic, and it is impossible to exaggerate her personal charms. Moreover, she is a somnambulist, and possesses truly astounding powers. I have been present at several family experiments, in which she said so many surprising things that if I had not heard them with my own ears I could not have believed them. Since her disappearance her parents have learned that whenever she went out, whether alone or with a servant, a gentleman who was not exactly old or young, constantly followed her, and after accompanying her thus did not leave her till she returned home. It is apprehended, not without reason, that this individual may have employed violence towards the young lady, in order to get her to a country house which he has at the village of B——, ten leagues from here. That which would seem to corroborate this alarm is that he has not been seen again since Virginie's departure."

"Surely," I said, "a very simple way of making certain of this gentleman's culpability is to send to that village some clever fellow, to learn whether the young lady is with him."

This was done, and the person entrusted with the affair declared that the suspected individual was quite alone at his country house. The parents, not knowing to what saint to appeal, now went to a somnambulist. He answered that their daughter had been carried off by a gentleman who had hired a room in a grocer's house in the Rue Compoise, at St. Denis; that at eleven o'clock the next morning a porter of the name of C—— would be at the Porte St. Denis with a trunk; the ravisher would join him there, and the couple would have a hackney coach and proceed to join the young lady at St. Denis.

The worthy magistrate came to tell me of this oracle with such an air of conviction, that, out of politeness to him, I sent two agents to the Porte St. Denis and two others to the Rue Compoise, with orders to arrest lover, mistress and porter, and bring them to the prefecture. The former, after watching from 9 A. M. till 4 P. M., returned without seeing anybody, and their comrades very needlessly explored all the houses iu the Rue Compoise. A few days after I saw the respectable magistrate again enter my office.

"Well," I asked him, "have you any news?"

"Yes, the young lady has returned to the paternal mansion."

"Ah, indeed! how so?"

"Well, some passers-by found her at La Villette, seated on the bank of the canal, with her feet hanging in the water. She was iu a perfect state of somnambulism; and when she woke up she was takeu home."

"But what had happened to her?"

"She is ignorant, and declares that she can remember nothing that occurred during her absence."

M. D——, a manufacturer of brouzes, living in the Marais, had a delightful country villa close to the gates of Paris, where he went every Sunday through the summer with his family, leaving his woman-servant to take charge of the shop and rooms. One day this guardianship proved inefficient, for his place was entered by means of false keys, and a cousiderable robbery was effected. On being informed of this occurrence, M. D—— at once returned home, and after making an investigation, was convinced that his servant had given her lover, a journeyman hatter, the means to commit the robbery. In spite of his conviction, he thought it his duty to consult a somnambulist, who confirmed his suspicions. Feeling uow quite certain that he was not mistaken, he came to me and denounced his servant and the hatter, about whom I made inquiries, which proved most favorable. At the same time I had the hatter's room searched, but uot one of the stolen articles was found. The affair ended here, and M. D—— was obliged to content himself with discharging his maid-servant, while remaining convinced that the robbery was committed at her instigation.

Six months later, I learned that a notorious robber was living in the Rue Traversiere. I had him at once arrested, and in the search made at his domicile some knives were found bearing the trade-mark of the bronze manufacturer. When questioned as to these articles, the convict declared that they were the proceeds of a robbery that he had committed by the aid of false keys, in the shop of a tradesman in the Marais. And yet the somnambulist had declared that the robbers were the maid-servant and her lover!

I could quote at least fifty affairs, all alike, with but slight variations; but what should I prove? That somnambulism, so far as concerns the predictiou of the future and the revelation of things unknowu, is, as I stated at the outset, a trade, a charlatanism, and that the somnambulist, like the flatterer in the fable, lives at the expense of the person who listens to him; but this is, I think, sufficiently demonstrated. At that period magnetism was not merely fashionable, but was a fury, a rage. The smallest meeting of friends must have its somnambulist experimenting, and it was an epidemic!

In the porter's lodge, in the student's garret, in the banker's drawing-room, everybody indulged in studies of secoud-sight; all wished to be lucid; and all over Paris there were only somnambulists, magnetizers and credulous proselytes; in this way was prepared the reign of turning hats, speaking tables and rapping spirits.

Naturally, the confidence in a quasi-supernatural power led all the persons who suffered from a robbery to have recourse to somnambulism in order to discover the thieves. Now all, or nearly all, presented themselves to this oracle of a new description, with a fixed idea of suspicion directed to an individual. So soon as a robbery is committed in a house, the persou robbed does not fail to suspect a lodger, or onc of the servants, in consequence of the reasouing, that in order to plunder a suite of rooms the thieves must be acquainted with the habits of the man who occupies them, in order to take advantage of his absence to commit the crime. But how can such doubts be exclusive when we are aware of the behavior of the professional burglar, who plans an affair for several months beforehand, and that onc of them does uot take his eyes off the victim, so that he may warn the thievcs of the unexpected return of the lodger! Or, take again the case of a daring thief, a Renaud for instance, who taps softly at a door, then taps louder, and lastly, on receiving no answer, opens the door with a false key, and after carrying off everything that is in the room, goes off as noiselessly as he has come.

Hence, nearly all these poor people, victims of more or less adroit robbers, came to lay siege to me, and I was daily compelled to listen to depositions, all referring to robberies of a more or less important nature, and indicating the name and address of the robber, dictated by the somnambulist. Daily, after receiving these charges, I was compelled to disillusionize the complainants, which was not always easy, aud send them away excessively dissatisfied, for they had come with the settled conviction that the police only needed to lay hands upon the malefactors who were so explicitly pointed out to them.

IF a few civil words will render a man happy, he must be a wretch indeed who will not give them to him. Let another man light his candle by yours, and yours loses none of its brilliancy by what his gains.

COVETOUSNESS.—The covetous man is as muc deprived of what he has, as of what he has not; for he enjoys neither.

* Autobiography of a French Detective from 1818 to 1858. Comprising the most Curious Revelations of the French Detective Police System By M. Canler (Ancien Chef du Service de Sûreté.)

NOTICE

The publication of "The Californian" takes place on Saturday mornings, and copies may be obtained in the City at all News-stands, and of our News-agents through the country. It will also be served by carriers on the morning of publication.

* Correspondents will address all communicotions, business and otherwise, to C. H. WEBB, Office of "The Californian," 728 Montgomery street, San Francisco.*

THE CALIFORNIAN.

SAN FRANCISCO, SATURDAY, JUNE 25, 1864.

The non-arrival of the Panama steamer prevents us from giving the conclusion of that magnificent historical story, Mary Stuart and Chastelar, the first part of which was published in last week's paper. We trust, however, to have it in time for our next issue. In the meanwhile the story of The Countess Diana goes on, and an original story, (The Legend of Point Diablo,) and an exquisite little poem written by a pen new to this coast, will be found on the first page. The present number also contains some stirring and vigorous lines apropos of Thackeray's death, and the commencement of an excellent story—Annie and her Master—which will run through three or four numbers. It is singularly well written, and those familiar with the literature of the age will recognize in the style one of the great masters of fiction.

MILITARY HISTORY OF THE WEEK—THE SITUATION.

IT was on the Chickahominy, and within the past few days, that there was played one of the greatest games of war which history, from the days of Alexander down to the present time, anywhere records. Lee, by forced marches—by urging his weary and foot-sore legions—had at length succeeded in ranging his forces on the north bank of the Chickahominy, to bar the way to Richmond against his wily and able antagonist. We may very well imagine the joy which the rebel chieftain felt when he surveyed the new line which he had formed.

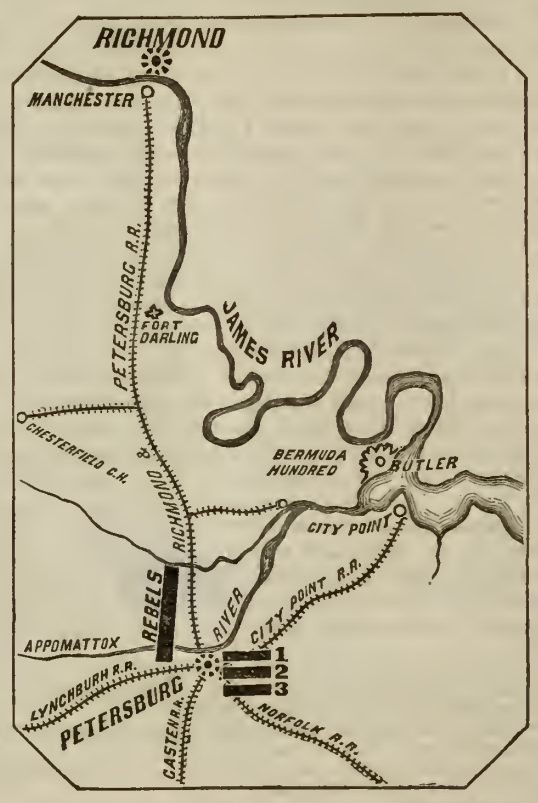
The country north of the Chickahominy at this place is hilly, and offers great advantage to an army acting on the defensive. New, Sumner's and Bottom's bridges, by the construction of earthworks, could be rendered almost impregnable. Behind the Chickahominy, about a mile, rises a high hill, crowned with a strong work called Fort Johnston. This hill was right behind Lee's centre, and its guns commanded the Chickahominy and its fords for a distance of over three miles. If it was to assail such a position as this that Grant had fought a passage through the Wilderness and out-generalled his antagonist all the way from the line of the Po to the Pamunkey, the chances were that all his labors and losses would go for nothing.

To rebel observation it was clear that Grant really meant to attack them on the Chickahominy, in the strong position where their army was drawn up. Were they not aware of the fact that Gen. Baldie Smith had been transferred from Butler to Grant with a full corps? It was so announced in the Northern papers, and the Northern papers by some unknown route reach the rebel capital almost as speedily as in the days of peace and political unity; besides, the rebels had stronger evidence than all this of the reinforcement of Grant: they had fought with Baldie Smith in the vicinity of the great White Oak Swamp, and had been whipped. Why should Smith be sent around from Butler to Grant, unless it was the intention of the latter to march on Richmond from the northeast? In fact, to all appearances, the only question undetermined was whether Grant would strike from the right or the left—whether he would endeavor to force Lee into the White Oak Swamp and get between him and Richmond, or drive him through the White Oak Swamp into the rebel capital. Now Grant was fighting desperately on the right—now on the left. We can well imagine what marching and countermarching the rebel army had to perform so as to be able to present the strongest front where the real attack should be made. In a day or two, however, it became evident, from the fact that White House had become Grant's base, that the grand assault would come from the left.

Lee, accordingly, began to prepare for the onslaught. Bottom's and Sumner's bridges were immediately fortified; but what is this news which reaches the rebel headquarters just when the work is nearly completed? Orderlies and couriers are being despatched in all directions in hot haste. Intelligence has just reached Lee that Grant has taken up the rails on the York River railroad, and put them in barges. Ah, then, he is abandoning White House as his base! He is going to fall back upon his old base at Acquia Creek, and the grand assault will come from the right.

Due west the heads of the rebel columns are now moving, and night finds them well on the way to take a position across the two lines of railroad which form a loop north of Richmond, at the apex of which is Hanover Junction. But what dull continuous sounds are those which are heard from the East? They do not reach the rebel army hastening west to oppose Grant, but they are the rumble of artillery, and the tramp of infantry and cavalry. Across the Peninsula, by the battlefields of Fair Oaks and Malvern Hill, Grant is moving swiftly to the James. The vast host which Lee thought was wheeling over to the right, is marching by Richmond far on the left. But what does he mean? Certainly to flank Fort Darling and enter Richmond on the southeast. Orders are again issued for another change, but this time the faces of Lees troops are turned due south. Through Richmond they are pouring night and day. The sounds of their march echo through the threatened city. But Grant is not marching on them from the southeast. He has crossed the James, formed a junction with Butler, and is laying close siege to Petersburg. The map which we give below, in a sort of rough way, exhibits the military "situation." It is not complete, but only for the reason that the news upon which it is based is not as full as could be wished. The location of Gilmore's and Wright's corps are not given, because no mention is made of them in the telegrams. They are probably with Butler at Bermuda Hundreds:

THE SITUATION JUNE 18TH.



It will be seen that Butler is intrenched, holding a strong position at Bermuda Hundreds. The Richmond and Petersburg railroad is open to his raids, and the communication between the rebel cities is by no means free and uninterrupted. Grant's army is lying encamped before Petersburg, Hancock occupying the centre, Smith (Baldie) holding the right wing, and Burnside the left. Smith's division on the map is marked 1, Hancock's 2, and Burnside's, 3. The rebels hold the city; we are ignorant as to the precise position of their main army, but it is supposed to be encamped somewhat as shown on the map, in the rear of Petersburg, and the right wing stretching across the Appomattox. We give the above illustration, hoping to make the situation plain to our readers, as the pencil very often flashes an impression upon the mind at once, which the pen might long labor to convey in vain.

HOW TO ADVANCE THE INTERESTS OF THE UNION PARTY.

WE have discovered a plan for advancing the interests of the Union party of California, and shall explain it in this article. The party should establish a proper organ in this city. All the leading men of the party—the Governor, and the chief United States Senator, the principal Federal officers, the State Central Committee—should contribute their money to establish and sustain the paper, and thus acquire the right of claiming for the party the credit for the judgment and firmness shown in the management of the journal.

It is not necessary that the new organ should be a newspaper. The people do not demand news. They do not care to know the events of the war in the East or of business at home. The paper can thrive without telegraphic despatches or local items. It is not necessary to have any intelligent comment on the news, any study of the resources of the State, any consideration for the interests of the city. The chief reliance of the organ for its success should be its political articles, and these should be distinguished not by elegance of composition, nor force of logic nor knowledge of the usages of the party, but by bombast, violence of language, and virulence of abuse. The people of San Francisco delight in that kind of writing They have no appreciation for the amenities of literature. They would be astonished at an editor who should have any regard for the decencies of life. Respectability may be becoming in some men, but it is not expected in the proprietor of a political newspaper.

The new organ should endeavor to excite all low prejudices and petty quarrels. If it has an enemy who is a Jew, it should accuse all Jews of being Copperheads. If it takes a spite at a Catholic, it should denounce the Catholic religion. If an Irishman excites its ire, it should assert that all natives of the Emerald Isle in America are traitors at heart. The Jews, Catholics, and Irishmen are not wanted in the Union party; or, if they insist on coming in, they should first be taught to act with becoming humility and be made to feel as though they had no right to be there. It is bad policy in politics to attempt to conciliate any class. Severity and insult are the best means of obtaining converts. The old native prejudices are not yet entirely dead, and they should be called into play, for the purpose of sustaining the influence of our leading Senator, who happens to be a Catholic and an Irishman. The journal should be a champion of evangelical religion as against Jews and Catholics, and of God as against infidels and atheists. This championship may not appear altogether consistent if the editor should be a notorious scamp, but the public do not care for the consistency of newspapers.

The old Republicans need to be repressed also. Some of them are entirely too much given to thinking for themselves. A. A. Sargent, it is said, has actually dared to give his opinion in regard to the time and place when and where the Congressional Convention of his district should be held. Such impertinence must not be tolerated. Mr. Sargent and his friends should be told by the "organ of the Union party" that if they do not like the party they can leave it.

It is important, also, that the new organ should give a lesson to the People's party of San Francisco. There are only 6,500 People's voters, all of them disorganizers, and they ought to be driven into the harness or out of the party. A man who will not sustain the organization through all its ramifications ought not to be recognized in any way. The Union ticket does not need their help. They are all Copperheads at heart, and they do not deserve a particle of consideration for their pretended Unionism—or for their contributions to the Sanitary Fund. The Alta and Bulletin hoped that there would be no war, and did their best, previous to the assault on Sumter, to keep the people quiet; and all their articles since then have been hypocritical. They have not done any good to the Union party, and the party ought to denounce them as disloyal. The new organ, for the purpose of advancing its own interests, ought to try to stab every other Union paper in the back.

If the new journal dare not come out editorially openly against the financial customs and interests of the country and city, it may at least print communications and copy articles from other papers. If it cannot call directly for the exclusion of gold for the currency, it can accuse the bankers and merchants of disloyalty and Copperheadism. It should contain an article, every day, abusing the Overland Telegraph Company because the Eastern Associated Press will not give their despatches for nothing to a paper without enterprise, character or credit. Such conduct on the part of a telegraph company was never heard of before. The organ should strike out a new path, and be particular to create a sensation, without stopping to care about truth or decency.

If the State Central Committee and the other authorities of the Union party will but maintain such an organ in San Francisco during the coming campaign, they will contribute wonderfully to the harmony and strength of the organization, to the credit of the community and to the refinement of literature. Such a journal would attain a circulation of at least two hundred and fifty copies in San Francisco, and in rare cases, even merchants, bankers, and business men might see specimens of it. It would be an excellent place for investing money permanently, and for printing advertisements which nobody wants to see.

UNBECOMING WEATHER.—A few years ago, it would have been considered "flat perjury" to have said anything derogatory to the climate of San Francisco. In those tranquil days, newspaper reporters climbed Telegraph Hill to view the charming landscape, and compared the heavens to the "skies of Italy." The breezes were "invigorating and healthy." Even the fog was poetically considered as the "damp breath" of the sea, and was supposed to possess sanitary qualities. But of late, people have exhibited a tendency to growl at and criticize the climate, and editors are getting tired of throwing bouquets and receiving nothing but sand in return. When the hills of the city were a little higher, and before the streets had been literally degraded into their present superiority, some ingenious observer called attention to the legs of our rising generation as exhibiting a development of muscle highly gratifying to the paternal eye, which he asserted to be the result of climbing those objectionable eminences. To apply this subtle reasoning to our summer winds, is to arrive at an alarming conclusion. Everybody who faces one of our afternoon gales, contracts his or her features into an expression not particularly lovely or amiable. Every afternoon a perpetual frown runs down Montgomery street, looking out equally from prettily framed bonnets or elegant castors. In place of poetry of motion and graceful carriage, our pedestrians of either sex assume that position in walking best calculated to resist the fury of the winds, with an eye to preserving gravity rather than grace. What will be the ultimate effect? Are we to become a frowning, round-shouldered community—or if not affected in this generation—how many years will it take of such weather to entail these peculiarities upon our descendants. Or, independent of the physical effect, what will be the moral results of the pettishness, combativeness and ill-temper produced by these gentle zephyrs? The subject is one of fearful magnitude.

AN exchange says that the Democratic party lies at the point of death. Is this another instance of the strength of the ruling passion?

THINGS.

San Francisco, Saturday, June 25th, 1864.

HAVING spent most of the past week between the Cliff House and Maguire's Opera House, it is not to be expected that I should know much about the gayeties of the town.

Clementina has been my constant companion on these occasions. For the benefit of that large and influential division of society which is always so anxious to know all the particulars about everything which is not at all its business. I will here state that Clementina is a pretty girl and wears curls.

To enumerate her virtues would require more space than this page affords; the only positively bad trait in her character may be summed up in one sentence:

She bites her nails!

Friends have remonstrated with her on this detestable practice. but in vain. Woman may smile, and smile, but be a biter still! Clementina is not a back-biter, however, and this is one bit of consolation which remains to her friends when everything else is said.

Clementina has a weakness for the Cliff. It matters little to her how she goes so long as she gets there. If no gallant and estimable young man is at hand with a buggy and pair, she has been known to ride out in a stage. Were there no other means of conveyance I fancy she would go out in a dog-cart. A friend who knows her by sight and admires her from a distance, tells me that once while the lips of the morning were yet wetted with dew, he saw her in a Lone Mountain car, her face turned sea and sealwards.

Whence this infatuation comes it is impossible to discover. Although fond of the ocean she is not extravagantly so. In one of our late excursions I pointed out to her the broad sweep of the horizon, where billow and cloud seem to meet and mingle, so deftly blending that one can scarcely tell where sea ends and sky begins. We were standing on the bold jagged cliff at the time, and down below our feet the waters broke, dashing in upon the sharp points of rocks and ceaselessly wailing and moaning like those poor restless souls in life which are ever impaling themselves. Dusk was creeping in, and to my mind there was a strange poetry in the scene—barring the two rather damp and limp-looking persons standing on the cliff. The opening lines of The Corsair came to my mind—you remember them, strong and musical as an ocean breeze and filling and swelling one's soul as though it were a ship's white sails—and I repeated them, asking Clementina what she thought of it all.

She said it was nice!

Probably it was. More by way of an experiment than anything else, I then called her attention to the huge seal, Ben Butler, who was practicing gymnastics in his own way on that rock to which these mammals have given a name, and asked her what she thought of him.

She clapped her hands together and cried, in a perfect paroxysm of delight, "Oh! I do think he is so nice!"

And the seal is nice, and Clementina is nice, and I hope I'm nice—and here are some nice verses about

THE FISHER'S DAUGHTER.

If you go to where the billow
Tosses on its rocky pillow
In an ever restless pain:
Where the sea, in vain atoning,
Seemeth ever to be moaning
Masses for the fishers slain,
You may see a little maiden
Waiting, watching, weary laden—
Watching all the live long day—
If she haply may discover
The light shallop of her lover,
Like a bird upon the bay.

"Maiden," said I, "fisher's daughter,
Gaze no more upon the water,
Prithee leave this mocking shore.
Know'st thou not that foam-bells swinging,
Long time since were dirges ringing,
For the one who comes no more?

"Know'st thou not that kelpies keeping
Watch above thy sailor sleeping,
Guard him from the glare of day;
And that now, if thou'dst discover
The bright shallop of thy lover,
Thou must look beyond the bay?"

But the maiden still is sitting,
And she fancies in the flitting
Of each bird upon the bay,
In each sea-gull's pinion glancing
That she sees a white sail dancing,
William on his homeward way.

And you may not chide the maiden—
Even I, with heart sad laden,
When the silent hours are nigh,
Watch and wait, and fondly dreaming,
All my fancies real seeming,
Gaze upon the changing sky.
It was through their golden portal
That there went a lovely mortal—
Angels know she did not die!

Nightly now a vigil keeping,
For my sorrow knows no sleeping,
Long I look with wistful brow,
If I may not gain some tiding,
See some silver shallop gliding,
With my Mary in the prow.

So I linger, fondly dreaming,
All my fancies real seeming,
Though the lips of Reason say:
"Cease thy longing, luckless wisher,
With the Daughter of the Fisher,
Learn to look beyond the bay.

I have already said that much of the past week has been spent—misspent, perhaps—between the Cliff House and Maguire's. Is it necessary to say that the first evening I sat in a private box and saw Sat-in-ella?

Clementina was with me.

I wish I could follow the young lady's formula, and simply say of Satanella that it is nice, because a glittering generality like that might not only save trouble but my reputation as well. As it is, I scarcely know what to say about the piece; or rather, I do not know what I might not say if I ventured to say anything at all.

Strange visions yet float in my mind of diabolical figures and flames. I have a memory of red devils who broke out from the walls every now and then, in sudden eruption, like the measles. I can yet see the pretty page waving his hat and the whole interior of Fabio's mansion undergoing a sudden change—canvas apples and pasteboard peaches, with gilt paper goblets, white cotton pound-cake and tin candlesticks suddenly popping up ready spread upon a table, and there are music and lights, and a dagger's gleam, and "a squeech and a squeam," and in comes Beelzebub, and a trap-door opens, and down goes my pretty page to Sulphur Springs which by this time should be more crowded than those of Napa or Calistoga.

Miss Richings plays the page—a virgin page, one might say—while her father plays the devil—a not unusual part for fathers to play who have good-looking daughters whom young men come to see of evenings.

Fathers and mothers, by the way, I have always viewed as the natural enemies of society. They are forever in the way, always taking an impertinent concern in what doesn't concern them. Adam and Eve, I fancy, were two much-to-be-envied people, for they had as few cares as clothes, and neither fathers, mothers nor poor relations around.

None of Eve's aunts ever came to stay with Adam a week—note that! It must have been something else that he raised Cain about.

But I digress—we were speaking of Satanella. After the disappearance of the page and the fiend, and the lapse of sufficient time for them to get comfortably warm, the curtain rises and we have an excellent view of the place where congressmen and contractors and supervisors and bulkhead-men go when they die.

I took a Russian bath once, and I thought at first the page had struck the same place.

There is a stifling steam in the apartment; green dragons with immense goggle eyes, looking for all the world like eccentric shrimps, sprawl upon the walls—everything looks strange and terrible. With a very slight exertion of the imagination one might fancy himself at Washoe.

The fiend releases the page—his name it is Julian—upon one condition. He hands him a specific contract bill, which Fabio must be made to sign within thirty days. And then comes another change.

The gorgeous East is represented. Fabio is there with his love, Leila; but this Leila isn't a lady—she's only a peasant girl. They are closing Leila out at public auction, and spirited bidding ensues between the lover and the Turk—the muff and the mufti!

The Turk goes four hundred chips. Fabio sees him and raises him a hundred; the betting gets lively. Finally Fabio, seeing that there's considerable of a blind up, and that it's worth while to make a push for the pool, goes two thousand on the girl. The Turk rakes up his postage stamps and greenbacks and raises him three thousand. Fabio raises his eyebrows, but that's all—he can't call, and his hated and high-hatted rival prepares to rake down—he's a sad old rake, that mufti, and has wives without end. Fabio looks like one who has lost his last chip and can't borrow at the bank, when suddenly Julian, the page, appears.

I had forgotten to mention that this page is a spirit—a proof spirit, probably—given to attend Fabio's footsteps, gratify all his wishes, and worry his soul out of him. Of course to fulfill such a mission they'd choose a woman. She falls in love with Fabio, but notwithstanding that she is his "familiar" he declines to be familiar with her; and this is the cause of much of the anguish and all the blue flames and pasteboard prisons of the piece. So much by way of explanation—to return:

All the ballet girls have been brought forward in their turn, but they have made no impression on the sensible old Turk, who refuses to exchange Leila for the whole ballet boodle—and this leads me to remark that at least in some respects the old Turk's head is level, because a more unattractive lot of girls it would be impossible to get together on any stage. Even Mlle. Acosta, who comes from Contra Costa, he turns away from and will not accost her, though she dances before him, and seizes the convenient opportunity of displaying all her charms to him and the audience. The old Turk stands it all like a brick, and without winking. Manifestly he is stuck after Leila.

As before said, at this moment Julian appears. Fabio appeals to him for help, and shows that he still loves Leila. At this Julian looks blank—for the moment he is a blank page. He draws the specific contract bill from his pocket, and promises to save Leila if Fabio will sign it. Fabio is in favor of the introduction of greenbacks; he knows that they would swell the finances of the country and set the wheels of trade and commerce rattling with a vigor that never stirred them before; but he can't go back on Leila at such a crisis for any cheap considerations of policy. Fabio signs, and says to Leila you are mine, which is precisely what the fiend says to Fabio.

It turns out afterwards, you see, that he has signed a sort of a thirty-day brokers' contract, all his worldly possessions, of course, and his soul, incidentally being the forfeit.

The misery of Leila on learning that her lover has got himself into this decidedly bad box is fearful to behold, and we tremble to think what a dressing down the fellow would have got at her hands, had he been actually married to her instead of only "going to be." For she would have said that she always told him what his dicing, dissipated habits would bring him to, that first he lost all his money and then had to go and gamble away his poor soul, which belonged to his wife and children. She had married him against her father's wishes and the dictates of her better judgment, and now she would go to Indiana and get a divorce—they divorce parties in that State if either can prove cold feet on the other.

Fabio having lost his soul, has to place his sole reliance in Julian, to whom an appeal is made. Julian explains that if he destroys the contract he will be thrown into a place of torment; and taking a rather sensible and practical view of the question he declines to be burned for the benefit of another woman's husband. He asks Fabio if he can't get an endorser or put up an additional margin on his contract, but Fabio explains that in the present state of the market that thing is played out.

But at last Julian relents. He burns the contract and urges the two lovers to fly, lest the fiend when he comes might nip them, all being fish that comes to his net. Before leaving, Leila hangs a rosary and cross around Julian's neck. Then comes a flash of fire, a smell of brimstone, and the fiend enters. He seizes Julian by the wrist and proposes to put him where even a safe made of chilled iron would not save him from burning, when Julian draws the cross on him and he gets as though a Paixhan gun were pointed that way. A sort of dumb-waiter descends from above, Julian gets into it and ascends to the roof and out from sight of the audience singing, "Do they miss me at home," and "No Irish need apply."

The only thing that could compare with Julian's going up was Leila's going down, which happened in the early part of the performance. A trap-door was carelessly left unlocked, and Leila in circulating around suddenly disappeared—like that dear gazelle, or the beautiful dream of the song—to the great surprise of every one, including herself.

I do not know of any other one on the stage who could fall through a trap-door as well and gracefully as the lady who personated "Leila" did on this occasion. The thing was capitally done, and it was amusing to see how gingerly the players trod the boards thereafter, as suspicious of "springes to catch woodcock" as was old Polonius' self.

The conclusion of the play does not give the end of the romance. So I will announce, for the benefit of those who take an interest in the fortunes of Fabio and Leila, that they were happily married, and opened an excellent hotel at San José, which they kept for a great number of years, finally retiring from the business and selling out to our friend Bromley, who still maintains the reputation of the old stand.

Julian found a striking exemplification of the great ethical proposition, that virtue is its own reward. The couple whose lives and souls he had saved went away and left him hanging in his hand-basket from the roof, where he would probably have been hanging to this hour, if Mrs. Perry had not cut him down with a pair of scissors.

Bianchi, who cuts down scores, was not around on this occasion.

To show how virtue is always its own reward, when Julian went to San José the hotel charged him as much as it did anybody else, and only allowed him one candle to go to bed by. Of such is life; and the way the game is played sometimes saddens

Inigo.

The Schoolmaster Abroad.—The columns of the Bulletin on Thursday would have led one to think not only that the schoolmaster was abroad, but also that he was bent on a permanent emigration from that office. The editorial and local columns were luminous with blunders on that day; a careful proof-reader has discovered seventeen errors in two columns. In a careful enforcement of the "rules" of that paper, grammatical rules certainly should not be disregarded.

The howl for "despatches" is still loud in the land. What a pity that the Howler could not receive one of those "happy despatches" which are so common in Japan. Certainly if the Howler would consent to accept it, the public would vote him one—there would be no necessity for an appeal to Congress or Conness.

We have received a copy of A Treatise on Matrimony, written by the Right Rev. Dr. Amat. The name of the author is strangely apropos to the text. Perhaps, however, a Doctor Amavit would have treated the subject differently.

THACKERAY.

It was the night of God the Saviour's birth,
And halls were hung with holly green and red;
'Twas feasting time throughout the grateful earth,
But one of God's most noble sons lay dead.

A smile upon his face, the smile of old,
Speaking in death his purity of heart—
Those dear lips, now so silent and so cold,
Can ne'er again his truth and love impart.

The morn was clear, yet seemed there was a pall,
For the sad tidings weighed on every breast,
And every prayer, from cot or stately hall,
Bore plaints for him to whom was given rest.

He was a loyal servant, and his cherished trust
Fulfilled, he loved his brother men and sought their good.
Hearts he has bettered mourn above his dust
With hearts he lightened of their weary rood.

'Twas fitting, truly, that this kind, pure man
Should leave the world on such a glorious night;
God, who smiled on him as his race he ran,
Smiles on him still, enshrined in heaven's light.

JUNE, 1864.

ABOUT THACKERAY.

THE Publisher's Journal, under the head of "Thackerayana," has an entertaining article on this late distinguished author, from which we make the following extracts:

HIS ESTATE.

Mr. Thackeray died intestate, and his two daughters have taken out letters of administration. His personal property has been sworn to amount in value to a sum not exceeding $100,000. His house in Kensington was not his freehold property. He had leased it from the crown, and for the unexpired term of eighty years Mr. Heath, a London merchant, who is also a great book-collector, has given a large sum. Perhaps as much as $30,000 to $40,000 may thus be added to what his family will receive. As his daughters succeed to his property, no legacy duty is payable in this case. Mr. Thackeray, it is understood, had not effected any insurance upon his life—that cheap and prudent way of providing for those dear relatives whom a man leaves behind him—but this was not from want of thought or parental provision, but because his state of health was such that no assurance office would issue a policy upon it, except at a rate so high as to be prohibitory. The first money, of any amount worth speaking of, that Mr. Thackeray was able to lay up, was what he realized by his lectures in the United States in 1852.

BUST OF THE DECEASED.

In the Garrick Club, which he was fond of frequenting, Mr. Thackeray's bust, executed and presented by a sculptor who knew and valued him, will henceforth remain to remind his friends that he appreciated plays and players, although his own genius, running into the didactic rather than the imaginative, was the reverse of dramatic. The Garrick Club contains a noble collection of theatrical portraits—a collection formed by Charles Matthews the elder, and sold by him, in a lot, to the Club. Among them the massive head of Thackeray hereafter will tower. Mr. Thackeray is destined, however, to have a more public testimonial than his bust in the Garrick Club. It is stated that Mr. Dickens and a committee of literary men are to wait upon Dr. Stanley, Dean of Westminster, who is himself a distinguished writer, and arrange with him for permission to place a bust of Thackeray in Westminster Abbey. The small space entitled the "Poets' Corner," in that venerable building, is somewhat crowded, but there will be space found or made for a memorial to a writer whose language was "a well of English undefiled." There is a fee (of $500, we believe,) payable to the Dean and Chapter of Westminster on the erection of any monument in the Abbey, but it is probable that in such a case as the present this claim will not be enforced.

DICKENS AND THACKERAY.

It will be remembered that some years ago, when Mr. Thackeray took umbrage with a fellow-scribe for mentioning, in his published correspondence with a prominent newspaper, that the author of Vanity Fair and Pendennis was cynical in his writings, and was a little disfigured by a broken nose, (said to have been caused "by an accident in his youth,") the offending letter-writer was by him hauled up before the Garrick Club and expelled, because he declined to apologize for the unfortunate allusion to the wit's nasal feature. Dickens, it will not be forgotten, sided with Mr. Edmund Yates, the offender, and thereby alienated Mr. Thackeray's regard. This coldness, which continued for years, happily was removed a little time before Mr. Thackeray's death. The great authors accidentally met in the cloak-room of a club, on a wet day, and, looking into each other's eyes, each put forth his hand, "with his heart in it," and they were estranged no longer.

SALE OF HIS EFFECTS.

The sale of Mr. Thackeray's effects commenced, at his new-old house in Kensington, on March 16th, and continued for three days. The Morning Star thus speaks of Thackeray's habitation: "The sale," it says, "took place in a beautiful new house in Palace Green, Kensington, which was built to gratify the taste of the late Mr. William Makepeace Thackeray. Scarcely, it may be almost said, was the house ready for the gifted owner, who planned its quaint construction, when the owner himself was taken away forever from the enjoyment of the house which he could make so happy, so hospitable and so kindly. Most people have of late become familiar with the outward aspect of the house, either from personal observation or from looking at its picture—for the house has come to have a picture of its own since the death of its master. It is in the style of good Queen Anne; the style of a period which Thackeray understood best and loved most of all the past ages; its red brick front, long and low, its sloping roof, its quaint porch and chimneys, all are of close kindred to the old palace which which stands so near, and which the novelist could see each day from his windows. It looks upon those Kensington Gardens, which may be fairly termed classic ground to the literary man; it stands in that old court suburb which Leigh Hunt has so charmingly described, and which Thackeray so peculiarly appreciated. Any one who walks a little way along the Kensington High street, after passing the turnpike, and then turns into Palace Green, comes at once and sharply on the house which Thackeray built, and where he died. For some days back its doors have stood open to all comers. Not the owner himself in his most hospitable mood, nor the good Axylus of the great old Greek poet, could have kept a house so open to the passing strangers. The auctioneer's bills, pasted on the windows invite all to enter, and take part in the sale of the household furniture and effects, wines, books, etc., of the late Mr. Thackeray.

In the same friendly vein the journalist continues: "The scene within no man now living can describe as the late humorist would have described it. Its odd, whimsical, ludicrous features; its blending of incongruities, of objects which awaken associations tender and touching, and objects, animate and inanimate, which roughly dispel them; its unutterable dreariness and pathos—these and other of its peculiarities only a pen like Thackeray's own could fittingly describe. Odd and fluffy men, generally with hooked noses, pervaded the apartments, ranging from dining-room to drawing-room, from library to bed-room, and took visitors confidentially aside and were anxious to know if there was any particular lot which said visitors desired to buy, and offered good-naturedly to buy the lot in question for them. They had catalogues, and called attention to particularly desirable articles which it struck them would exactly suit the visitor, (who perhaps only wanted a book or two with a scrap of writing, even three initials, therein,) and they dragged the visitor off to inspect curious oaken cabinets, and antique chairs, and gilded mirrors, and rare bits of china. They offered to select and buy books or pictures, or anything; and they thrust cards into the visitor's hand and admonished him to keep his eye on them. Queer-looking old ladies, outwardly of the Mrs. Gamp style—old ladies whom it was not unfair to set down as unacquainted with the interior of the house in the days of its late owner—made their way everywhere, inspected the chairs, handled the china, sounded the glass, rubbed up the plate, unrolled the carpets, doubted of the gilding, shook their heads disparagingly at the quaint and beautiful set of chessmen, and finally, when the sale was about to begin, bustled back into the principal room and secured seats in the very best places, as if they were occupying their hired stalls at the opera. Groups of children came in and out and ran up the stairs, and stood for a moment silent and awed in some deserted bedroom. Seedy-looking personages, who did not seem to have any particular business or object anywhere about the premises, beckoned to each other and whispered about the timeliness of a little 'refreshment.' There was nothing in the scene unusual to auctions in London houses. The hands of the broker may make free with the best man's furniture, and the professional bargain-buyer who haunts sales-rooms has no particular reverence for literature. But in Thackeray's house, where almost every article of furniture, every picture, every scrap of gilding or marble, every statuette, every object of curiosity or value, spoke of the refined, cultivated, and yet peculiar taste of the dead owner himself, the sight seemed specially incongruous and sad. One could not help thinking how Thackeray would himself have described such a scene; with what droll and melancholy meaning he would have invested it; how he would have smilingly moralized and sadly jested over it."

When the sale of poor Lady Blessington's effects took place at Gore House, Kensington, among those who attended was Mr. Thackeray. He had visited at the gay Irish widow's house ere she ran away to Paris to shake off the mountain of debt which had gradually accumulated to crush her, but though he may have moralized over the scene, assuredly he did not jest at it. Among all the poor woman's friends, the only man at Lady Blessington's sale who seemed affected was Mr. Thackeray—the cynic! The tears were in his eyes as he walked through what had been a sort of Paphian bower, (for a Venus who had fallen into years and flesh,) and his tender heart contrasted the sad reality of the auction with the flashing gayety which, only a very short time before, he had participated in in the same sumptuous saloon. The fashionable firm of Christie & Manson wielded the auctioneer's hammer on the occasion of the Thackeray sale. The house itself is No. 2 Palace Green, Kensington.

The Illustrated London News says:

"Many people went to see, many went to buy and to carry away a souvenir of the great satirist. The house looked lonely and comfortless enough—does not every house look so when one has a sale?—and the books, and sofas, and tables were handled and appraised by Jews and salesmen. The library was poor, selected at hap-hazard, and representing no particular study. There were many presentation copies of works, notably those of the author of Jane Eyre, who, as we know, almost worshipped this second and purer Fielding; there were some few of the essayists, and a copy or so of Addison, the facetious Tom Browne, and other of the Queen Anne worthies. The dummy books on the library doors were soberly and incongruously lettered, not Macearonic titles, as some men are wont to inscribe. Does any one remember those so wittily suggested by Hood—Lamb on Sheepfolds, Cursory Remarks on Swearing, and others? Thackeray, however, had gone grimly to work, lettering one dummy a Hortus Siccus, another Addison's Works; and placing—oh, ye Nine!—Smollett side by side with Keats and not far from Bull on the Trinity. Nor did it please one to see a dummy Virgilii Opere in the book-room of a scholar. Whilst Shakspearian scholars and lovers are groaning over the utter loss of Shakspeare's silver-gilt bowl, left by him to a friend, it struck one, too, as odd that amongst the plate should be a punch-bowl, engraved, "From the publishers to the author of Vanity Fair and Pendennis." Somebody, of course, bought this relic, over which, no doubt, Peg of Limavady and the Battle of Limerick had been trolled out in a rich bass."

SHAKSPEARE'S FORTUNE.—Shakspeare was the first man of letters who realized a fortune by literature, which speaks well of that age, for it shows appreciation. The business items of his life are as indefinite as others. Thus at twenty-three he was a partner in a theatre, and the facts as to this are given thus: "In 1589 he possessed some share in a theatre, in 1596 he had a considerable share," and ten years of well directed industry, from 1591 1601, raised him to affluence; and in another ten years he was enabled to increase his income to about £1,500 a year. In just the space of twenty years, from 1591 to 1611, were his whole dramatic creations produced.

ENGLISH WOMEN.

To say the truth, I have been holding the pen over my paper, purposing to write a descriptive paragraph or two about the throng on the principal Parade of Leamington, so arranging it as to present a sketch of the British out-of-door aspect on a morning walk of gentility, but I find no personages quite sufficiently distinct and individual in my memory to supply the materials of such a panorama. Oddly enough, the only figure that comes fairly forth to my mind's eye is that of a dowager, one of hundreds whom I used to marvel at, all over England, but who have scarcely a representative among our own ladies of autumnal life, so thin, careworn and frail as age usually make the latter. I have heard a good deal of the tenacity with which English ladies retain their personal beauty to a late period of life; but, (not to suggest that an American eye needs use and cultivation before it can quite appreciate the charm of English beauty at any age,) it strikes me that an English lady of fifty is apt to become a creature less refined and delicate, so far as her physique goes, than anything that we western people class under the name of woman. She has an awful ponderosity of frame—not pulpy, like the looser development of our few fat women, but massive with solid beef and streaky tallow; so that, (though struggling manfully against the idea,) you inevitably think of her as made up of steaks and sirloins. When she walks her advance is elephantine. When she sits down it is on a great round space of her Maker's footstool, where she looks as if nothing could ever move her. She imposes awe and respect by the muchness of her personality, to such a degree that you cannot help thinking how tremendous would be her onset if pugnaciously inclined, and how futile the effort to inflict any counter injury. She certainly looks ten-fold—nay, a hundred-fold—better able to take care of herself than our slender-framed and haggard womankind; but I have not found reason to suppose that the English dowager of fifty has actually greater courage, fortitude and strength of character, than our women of similar age, or even a tougher physical endurance than they. Morally she is strong, I suspect, only in society, and in the common routine of social affairs, and would be found powerless and timid in any exceptional strait that might call for energy outside of the conventionalities amid which she has grown up.

You can meet this figure in the street, and live, and even smile at the recollection. But conceive of her in a ball-room, with the bare brawny arms that she invariably displays there and all the other corresponding development, such as is beautiful in the maiden blossom, but a spectacle to howl at in such an overblown cabbage rose as this.

Yet somewhere in this enormous bulk there must be hidden the modest, violet-nature of a girl, whom an alien mass of earthliness has unkindly overgrown; for an English maiden in her teens, though very seldom so pretty as our own damsels, possesses, to say the truth, a certain charm of half blossom and delicately folded leaves, and tender womanhood shielded by maidenly reserves, with which, somehow or other, our American girls fail to adorn themselves during an appreciable moment. It is a pity that the English violet should grow into such an outrageously developed peony as I have attempted to describe. I wonder whether a middle-aged husband ought to be considered as legally married to all the accretions that have overgrown the slenderness of his bride since he led her to the altar, and which make her so much more than he ever bargained for. Is it not a sounder view of the case, that the matrimonial bond cannot be held to include the three-fourths of the wife that had no existence when the ceremony was performed? And as a matter of conscience and good morals, ought not an English married pair to insist upon the celebration of a Silver Wedding at the end of twenty-five years, in order to legalize and mutually appropriate that corporeal growth, of which both parties have individually come into possession since they were pronounced one flesh? —Hawthorne.

"CUDJO'S CAVE" ABROAD.—The London Athenæum criticises J. T. Trowbridge's novel, Cudjo's Cave, very severely, and deals a back cut at Uncle Tom's Cabin in the same connection:

This is one of the intolerable large family of negro novels produced in feeble imitation of Mrs. Beecher Stowe. It may be recollected that the Athenæum refrained from taking part in the chorus which stormed through Europe in proclamation of Uncle Tom's Cabin as a work in which genius, virtue and vigor had met as they had never met before. The seal set on the author by public opinion and the ovations (by her own showing, absurd in their excess) to which she was subjected by English philanthropists and lovers of "sensation," could only produce one result besides that of lucre: the production by herself of a series of tales, each one more violent or else more attenuated than its predecessor, and by imitators, who also pleaded conscience and cause, a family of novels alike coarse, absurd, and unjust. Of this family, Cudjo's Cave is a precious specimen. Fortunately its author's feebleness may prove its own undoing. His horrors are those of the Victoria Theatre; his heroism is that of Richardson's booth; his intentions to relieve horror and heroism by something that shall be very droll, are indeed drearily carried out. We cannot fancy the youngest or most omnivorous or most enthusiastically benevolent of novel readers digesting Cudjo's Cave.

IT has been found, while firing at the running-man target, at Wimbledon, England, which is scarlet on one side and gray on the other, that the scarlet dazzles the eye, and is hence the most difficult to hit, from leaving a red streak behind it which unsettles the aim. The grey side was struck seventy-four times and the red forty-two times. It is a curious fact, too, that men with grey eyes shoot better than those with other colors.

THAT theatrical kind of virtue, which requires publicity for its stage, and an applauding people for its audience, could not be depended on in the secrecy of solitude or the retirement of a desert.

STORIES OF THE SUPERNATURAL.

THE HAUNTED MAN AT LOOSELY HALL.

A LIVING ghost is no doubt a misnomer, an anomaly, an anachronism, a protest against the evident facts which Time offers to commou sense, and is, in truth, its own refutation.

Still, if tradition be true, we are bound to accept it for what it is worth, notwithstanding all inconsistencies and apparent errors—more apparent, however, to scepticism than to belief; and as our narrative, not quite a "thrilling" one this time, is based on a broad substratum of truth, it is right to give it in its entirety.

The mysteries of the supernatural will not come under the working of the exact sciences. They reject all associatiou with mesmerism and clairvoyance. Table-turning and rapping have become things so utterly beneath contempt that we class them with the Cock Lane ghost, the polter-geist of Woodstock, and the merry drummer of Tamworth—we think it is—for at this moment the name all but eludes us, and most readers will have seen his replica through the medium of Professor Pepper's ghost.

Most readers of English history, students of David Hume and Tobias Smollett, will recollect that there was, "once upon a time," a certain wife-killing king, called Henry VIII., who reigned over England, and was, in his time, a man rather to be feared than loved.

And whatever Mr. Froude, in his admirable history, may say to the contrary, our "bluff King Hal" was little better than a tiger-ape upon a large scale.

He was born a Catholic, but the wealth of the monasteries tempted him to seize pix and crosier, and set up a huge melting-pot, much after the fashion of the "fences" who affect the old vicinity of Saffron Hill and the remote precincts of the "Mint," in the Borough.

He patted Martiu Luther on the back, having first abused him, and obtained from the Pope the title of "Defender of the Faith;" he took Luther's side, snapped his fingers at Leo X., the most intelligent and illustrious, perhaps, in the long catalogue that has, apostolically or not, descended to us; and then, being well set up in the world with a mint, much royalty, plenty of jewels, some fine castles, a cardinal Prime Miuister, (Wolsey,) and an inestimable Lord Chancellor, (Sir Thomas More,) he lived in great state and splendor, and gave up his mind to marrying as many wives as he could—after—divest himself from; so that, in truth, Henry is the type of the more modern creature we shrink from under the name of Bluebeard. Only Henry's beard was red, sanguine, indicative of a disposition so wantonly cruel, that we may go back to the names of Domitian, Vitellius, Nero, and the amiable daughter-kings of Dahomey and Ashantee, who ask us, with charming blubber-lipped simplicity, if they are not "men and our brethren?"

"Am I not a man and a brother?"

To which we reply, "Certainly not."

This, however, is apart from our story, which concerns Henry VIII.; his Lord Chaucellor, Sir Thomas More; his favorite daughter, Mrs. Roper, and the ghost which made itself appear to be so some time before the body of it was dead.

Loosely Hall, then, is a stone mansion, perfectly Tudor in its style of architecture—heavy mullioned square windows, and that irregular form of frontage which is not only characteristic of the age, but which also affords withiu, above and below, so many charmiug window nooks, where a book, a lute, a pleasant gossip with a "fair young damsel," can so winningly and fitly fill up the idle hour of the day—where a look, a thoughtful mood, a "brown study," even, have their effect, and fully.

Loosely Hall was built by Sir Thomas More in his prosperous days, but he rarely dwelt in it save as a guest. He had his favorite house at Chelsea, about the termination of the present Cheyne Walk, and just across the frontage of the present pier, but of which there is no vestige now; though Erasmus, the quaint scholar and old grammarian, has left us some pleasant memoranda on the subject, which prove that the Lord Chancellor had a racy fund of ready wit, and that the somewhat straight-laced scholar could appreciate it.

Once more, then, to our narrative.

Sir Thomas More was a son of Sir John More, a Judge of the Queen's Bench, and was born in 1480.

He was educated with the family of Cardinal Mortou, then Archbishop of Canterbury, who presaged great things of him in the future, from the tact, ability, and quickness the lad betrayed from time to time.

He pursued his academical curriculum at Oxford, and about 1500 studied at New Inn, and next at Lincoln's Inn, for Chancery practice, and was thought a zealous Roman Catholic from the beginning to the end—so much so that he is said to have worn a hair-shirt; certain it is that he followed the most rigorous observances of his Church, and at the age of twenty-two was a Burgess iu Parliament, where he opposed Henry in a demand for an exorbitant sum of money to dower his eldest daughter with the King of Scotland.

Henry was a piece of sanguine wildfire at this, and imprisoned his (More's) father in the Tower for a certain arbitrary fine imposed upon him; and More himself cautiously shrank into retirement, and for three years was law-reader at Furnival's Inn, and for three years after lodged near the Charter House, where he underwent all the austerities of the Carthusians, without taking any vow.

He presently married a Miss Colt, the eldest daughter of a country gentleman of New Hall, in Essex.

He filled several public offices; as, for instance, a judgeship in the Sheriff's Court. He was employed by an association of English merchants in a negotiation, in the matter of trade and commerce, to arrange some difficulties between the citizens of London and those of Flanders.

In 1516, he accompanied the commissioners sent by Henry VIII., in order to renew the alliance between Henry and Charles, (then Archduke of Austria,) and during that time wrote his far-famed Utopia—this about the year 1516.

This latter work procured him a learned reputation, the acquaintance of Erasmus, the smiles of Cardinal Wolsey and the favor of the King; so that, in 1520, he was Treasurer to the Exchequer, and removed himself and family to Chelsea, where he had a noble house, already spoken of some paragraphs back.

In 1526, he was appointed Chancellor to the Duchy of Lancaster; and, in the following year, accompanied Cardinal Wolsey, and other high officials of the realm, on an embassy to the French King, Francis I., (the Bearnois, as he is called,) and discharged his duties with such skill and success as to elicit from Henry his warmest approbation.

By this time (1526–28) he had grown greatly in favor with the King—a favor the Chancellor trembled at—or, rather, did not tremble at—for his courage, as it turned out, was of the true order.

He knew one thing well, however.

The King's favor was death!

Whom Henry VIII. favored, he ruined or slew.

Whom the Plantaganets favored, they either ruined, or slew, or poisoued.

Whom the Stuarts favored, they usually handed over to the headsman.

"Put not your trust in princes!"

When on one occasion, Henry the Mongrel and the Magnificent called upon Sir Thomas More, at his house at Chelsea, it was remarked by his (Sir Thomas's) son-in-law that the King for a long hour walked round the garden with his "arm round his (the Chancellor's) neck."

Mr. Roper, who was there on a visit at the time, congratulating him on this kingly favor, was answered:

"Son Roper, I have no cause to be proud of it; for if my head would win him a castle in France, it would not fail to go off."

A saying too truly expressive of his ruler's trustless temper, whim or caprice.

If our readers by any chance think that we are troubling them with a biography, they will be much mistaken.

The partial story of a man's life must be told, in order to illustrate the phantasmal appearance which it is the object of this narrative to illustrate.

Henry had nous (or sense) enough to comprehend the power of this high minister of his, whom no bribes could corrupt—no official garbage, thrown in order to be thankfully picked up, would be accepted.

As the King, therefore, wished to be divorced from Catherine, in order to marry Anne Boleyn, he sounded his Chancellor on the matter of a divorce, and found no consolation thereby; the Chancellor, strenuously, though jestingly, refusiug to have any haud iu the matter.

He turned out in the plenitude of his power, did Sir Thomas More, like a good many of us. Born and bred in the Roman Catholic faith, he was intolerant to the bounds of persecution; but no such charge is brought against him, though he has admitted to his learned friend Erasmus that he would "assist the whole Popish clergy in their attempt to extirpate the Reformers."

This did not please Henry VIII.

There are certain allegations laid against this really high-minded and houest man, which are far from being to his credit unless we look at the moral force of prejudice in those prejudiced days—days which bring Smithfield burnings, the massacre of St. Bartholomew—the holocaust of the "San Benitos"—the Inquisition, and the other damned associations of bigot cruelty together—and so we forego charges we might briug agaiust him.

One fact is true—the more Henry became a Reformer, the more staunch was the Chancellor in his cause; and when the Catholic bishops of England offered him a well-filled purse of gold, in acknowledgment of zeal, faith and servitude, he utterly refused it for himself and family, under any conditions whatsoever.

His integrity was so firmly established that it was above suspicion, and no one doubted it less that the King himself. Bnt he had gone quite counter to his wishes; and now, on more occasions thau one, Heury began to feel his black, bilious blood seething within him, and the opportunity for More's overthrow and death was not far out of his reach.

As Henry relented towards the heretics, (Protestants we call them now,) so did More's antipathy—honestly founded enough, it must be admitted—rise against them. He opposed Henry, Luther, and Protestantism with all the force of a keen vigorous, clear-witted sense, and with all the powers of his soul—though this we must in some degree put to the account of something more inveterate than prejudice.

It might be—it must have been—obstinacy, for the man who laughed at Death in his very face could not be ruled by fear.

Henry's project of a divorce from his faithful wife Catherine, after a wedded life little short of twenty years, found no favor with More; and the Chancellor, being troubled with his master's importunities, desired permissiou to resigu his seals, which Henry reluctantly accepted, and, with serenity and diguity mingled, Sir Thomas More took leave of his high office.

He had proposed to himself to live iu his pleasant solitude at Chelsea, and make his humble means last him for his lifetime, for he had found but small profit in his high offiec, and his inboru honesty had closed every avenue to bribery, corruption or surreptitious forms of acquisition.

The next day, to show his equanimity, after Mass was over at Chelsea church, which he had attended with his wife, Lady More, he opened her pew door as one of his gentleman attendants had been accustomed to do, and with a comic gravity, making a low bow, said, "Madam, my lord has gone out."

Lady More could not understand this for the instant until he informed her of his resignation—a matter that, very wife-like, she disapproved of; but as Sir Thomas was neither hen-pecked nor king-ridden, he took this very little to heart.

Meantime, danger and death were fast following the happy, innocent, good man in his harmless seclusion.

The royal butcher—who never forgot. and was never known to forgive—could not condone the offence his Chancellor had offered him, and the opportunity soon offered itself.

Elizabeth Barton, proved to be a prostitute of the most unmitigable order—called, according to the monkish fashion of the day, "the Holy Maid of Kent"—Elizabeth Barton, a prostitute, a liar and a thief, entering into a confederacy with the monks, involved Sir Thomas More in their wily meshes—a fact which Henry was too happy to avail himself of.

More had, in a moment of weakness, listened to the infamous woman, and writing to her a letter, he became an accomplice in the charge against her.

The crowned wretch—the royal hound—the kingly wolf, snake, serpent—the human devil—rubbed his hands at the chance, and at once accepted it.

Consequently, not many days passed before Sir Thomas More was in the Tower.

Without question, the ex-Chancellor had committed himself and must "bide the brunt."

With a courage worthy of himself, and making Henry's shame all the more, he resisted every endeavor the King made in order to induce him to "trend" to his divorce from Catherine, his good and faithful wife—a sense that became a passion with him until he began his baptism of blood; and then the great names of the English nation represented nothing but that of cowardice, servility—meanness of the meanest order in every way, form or respect.

Losely (or Loosely) Hall was, as we have already said, a fair and handsome mansion, not far removed from Guildford, the county town of Surrey, and for walks, rides or drives, one of the most charming counties in England; for the "green lanes" of Surrey are proverbial for their attractions, and to any one who is inclined to challenge our assertion, we are willing to "do" a twenty-mile with him at any hour, day or month we may be challenged to do so.

This Hall—"Loosely Hall," built by Sir Thomas More—became by dowry his daughter's and son-in-law's property.

Mistress Roper—it was the fashion, then, to call people by their right titles and names, and a "spade" was a spade—Mistress Roper was in her garden one day, walking with her mother-in-law and some friends, when, in the full bright daylight, an Apparition looked full upon her.

It was the shadowy effigy of her father—headless—his hand pointing to his decollated trunk; and though she knew he was then alive, and living in the Tower, her womau's instinct at once told her what his fate was to be.

She was his favorite, his darling, his pet; and the love between them was mutual.

The explanation of what seems to have been a fact is not quite so difficult, if we take into consideration the force of that attraction, which—call it by the name of magnetism, electro-affinity, or any sentiment which springs out of love—constitutes that deep and indelible tie which belongs to the household, aud only breaks with death.

She was walking in the garden with her friends and relatives, when, on turning, she beheld, as above, a pale and shadowy phantom intercepting her path as it were, and with the phantom hand pointing to the headless trunk.

She knew it in a moment, and in that moment she read her father's fate.

There were half a dozen—twenty things, in fact—which Henry, determined to find his ex-Chancellor guilty, found no trouble whatever in arranging; and under the pretence, based upon a harmless letter which More had written to the arch-impostress, Elizabeth Barton, who ought, with her scoundrelly colleagues, to have been whipped in Bridewell, More was transferred from the Tower and his trial to the block.

He had been fifteen months in prison before he was finally brought to trial, and it is diffienlt to comprehend the delay which the King permitted himself to undergo between his condemuation and execution, for Henry had condemned him long before he had been tried.

At the Tower-wharf, where his daughter, Mistress Margaret Roper, was waiting to see him for the last time, having already read his fate, she exclaimed: "My father—oh, my father!"

And so, as the chronicle goes, clung round his neck in speechless anguish.

He was executed—murdered, more properly—on the 5th of July, 1535, and his last moments in every way were becoming a man who, fearing not the hideous front of Death, was willing to look npon the glorious face of God; as one who had lived without malice, and who had loved kith and kin and kind too well to have had the shadow of a sin to be atoned for. Rest be with his soul.

THE DEAD BODY AND THE BOAT-CLOAK.

On Wednesday, December 26, 1832, Captain Wilson recounted a curious anecdote that had happened in his own family. He told it in the following words:

It is now about fifteen mouths ago that Miss Marriott, a connexion of my family, went with a party of friends to a concert at the Hanover Square Rooms. She appeared there to be seized with indisposition, and, though she persisted for some time to struggle against what seemed to be a violent nervous affection, it became at last so oppressive that they were obliged to send for their carriage aud conduct her home. She was for a long time unwilling to say what was the cause of her indisposition; but, on being more earnestly questioned, she at length confessed that she had, immediately on her arriving in the concert room, been terrified by a horrible vision, which unceasingly presented itself to her sight. It seemed to her as though a naked corpse was lying ou the floor at her feet; the features of the face were partly covered by a cloth mantle, but enough was apparent to convince her that the body was that of Sir Joseph Yorke. Every effort was made by her friends at the time to tranquilize her mind by representing the folly of allowing such delusions to prey upon her spirits, and she thus retired to bed; but on the following day the family received the tidings of Sir Joseph Yorke having been drowned in Southampton River that very night, by the oversetting of his boat; aud the body was afterwards found entangled in a boat-cloak.

Hers is an authenticated case of second-sight.

THE WILDERNESS.—The "Wilderness" in which the first battle of the present campaign was fought, embraces fifteen miles of timber land, thickly studded with undergrowth, making it at some points utterly impassable. During the battles our men were often unable to see any object twenty-five feet distant from them. Of course, operations under such circumstances were attended with great disadvantage, especially as the enemy knew every nook and lurking-place, while our soldiery in loading and firing necessarily exposed themselves above the underbrush to a greater extent than would have been necessary had they been acquainted with the ground. The Wilderness is from 12 to 15 miles from Fredericksburg.

BRIEF MENTION.

AT HOME.

An earthquake happened along and gave our city a friendly shake on Wednesday evening. There were three shocks, three distinct beats of the earth's fevered pulse. No harm was done, the commotion passed away, and the city was left in quiet and as dull as before.

The question of Sunday theatricals has been again tested. Manager Maguire was brought before the Police Court to answer for the alleged offence, but the case was dismissed with very little argument. Whatever may be thought of the propriety of Sunday amusements, one thing is certain—they are rather wearing upon players, every night of the seven being a work night.

The excavations so long in progress in Broadway, between Montgomery and Kearny streets, are nearly completed. The new work is called the Broadway defile—to distinguish it, we suppose, from other streets defiled by accumulations of what Mrs. Gamp might call "rubbage and garbage."

Alcatraz Island seems to be becoming a fatal spot, dangerous to approach. Three men were capsized in a boat near there and drowned on Wednesday afternoon. Another man in a boat was shot by the the sentry of the island but a few days ago. Game being scarce on the island, citizens are shot, we suppose, in lieu of squirrels.

The mention of squirrels brings up a curious fact which is reported in our interior exchanges. The squirrels in Diablo Valley have disappeared in a body. Apprehending a scarcity, they perhaps have moved to a more promising locality—come down to San Francisco, for instance.

Some one is publishing scriptural texts in the Sacramento Union among the advertisements. It is an ingenious way of getting the Gospel before the people, but we hardly think it a proper one—the effect is certainly incongruous: "Blessed are the peacemakers," in one line, and, "Happy and content are Swimley's boarders," in another.

The Pacific Mail steamer Golden Age is nearly six days overdue. She has a large freight list and is crowded with passengers. Speculation is busy as to what causes her detention. A broken shaft is the favorite explanation.

An Irishman, named Malone, living in Nevada county, asked a Mrs. Callaghan to be his wife. She refused, and he, finding persuasion unavailing, tried what force there was in birch, changing his wooing into whipping. One proved as ineffectual as the other.

It is suggested that Gen. Grant be presented with a quantity of California grown tobacco. If a design is entertained on the General's health, perhaps life, a present of a few hampers of native champagne would do the business at once.

The will of A. J. Butler has been offered for probate in New York City. It is said that his estate is valued at $2,000,000, of which one-half is left to his brother, the Major-General.

Both the Calistoga and the White Sulphur Springs are crowded with visitors. San José also seems to be becoming a popular place of resort, the Continental Hotel being full of guests.

ABROAD

Garibaldi, while in London, had 267,000 applications for locks of hair from ladies. The calculation is that, after the complete cropping and exhaustion of the hero's own hair, including whiskers and beard, one hundred and twenty-three wigs would not have met the demand.

At the last Drawing-room the Princess of Wales wore a train of rich black silk, trimmed with crape and jet ornaments; a petticoat of black silk, covered with crape and bouillonnees of black tulle, ornamented with jet stars and butterflies. Head-dress, tiara of jet with black feathers and veil. It is said that "Mrs. Renfrew" is again in an "interesting situation."

One of the MS. poems—alas! that it should be compelled to remain MS.—sent in to the Stratford Tercentenary Committee, began—"Come, let us now tercenerate." Ingenious, is it not? From tercentenary, tercenerate, tercenerating, tercenerated, tercenerising, tercenerating, tercenerosity, tercenerамity, and so on.

In the Government of Tamboff, Russia, an officer and a young lady, his cousin, were enamoured of each other; but their relationship being an obstacle to their union, the lady begged her lover to put an end to her life, and the latter, in a moment of frenzy, only too faithfully executed her wishes.

The populace of Berlin have been having fetes in honor of Prussian successes in Slesvig. The flags and guns captured from the Danes were carried in a triumphal procession.

The Great Eastern is reported to have been sold, with all her engagements, to the French Government for nearly a quarter of a million sterling.

Prince Alfred, during his visit to the Crown Prince of Prussia, at Berlin, excited the indignation of many persons by accepting from the King the order of the Black Eagle.

The Fremdenblatt, of Vienna, declares that it is not the threats of England, but the Danish batteries in the Sound, which will prevent the Austrian squadron from entering the Baltic Sea.

The electric telegraph is working well between Bussorah and Kurrachee. It only remains to complete the section through the valley of the Euphrates to make the chain from London to Calcutta complete.

A young priest of Cipriano went out shooting with a double-barrelled gun. He was waylaid by four brigands, two of whom he shot, and then ran off, pursued by the others Loading his gun as he ran, the priest turned and shot his pursuers dead. Good gunning that, for a priest.

The French Minister of the Interior has started an evening Moniteur at a half-penny.

GOING DOWN A SHAFT.

Going down a shaft is an experience worth having. To one who has never gone down one of these highways towards the regions of Pluto, descending a shaft is a new sensation, and worth much to a man in search of excitement. We are speaking of going down a shaft in primitive style—where you put your foot into a noose at the end of a rope, and are lowered by means of a windlass—not where you step upon the platform of one of our new-fangled iron cradles with half-a-dozen friends, and are lowered by steam power. That an old woman might do. We must suppose the shaft to be at least three hundred feet deep, though a hundred feet would do nearly as well. There are two stout fellows at the windlass—one at the crank at either end. (We are sure they are stout fellows, for we examine them with especial attention to brown.) We seat ourself upon the platform which covers the mouth of the shaft. Nearly the whole of the length of the rope is wound upon the windlass. A short piece dangles over the "dark profound," with a noose in the end, into which you place your left foot. You grasp the rope with both your hands, holding a candle in your right, and allow the men at the windlass to "lower away," until you are straightened out. Here the sensation commences. You quit your seat on the platform, and trust yourself to the rope with reluctance, and cannot help setting your feet tight together, nor a feeling of goneness as you realize that you are dangling over a hole three hundred feet deep—we must insist upon that depth. Now the windlass begins to revolve, and you plunge down into the darkness like one sinking into the waters of the sea. Down, down you go—not steadily, but by short and extremely unpleasant jerks. You are utterly helpless, and you feel so. You are sensible of being wholly powerless, and at once become correspondingly demoralized. Down you go, feeling certain that you are dangling at the end of a most worn-out, rotten and unsafe rope—certain that it will break if you wink your eyes or breathe hard. Now, your feet, or at least the one in the noose, strike the wall. A sort of galvanic shock runs through your frame, and you shiver and clutch the rope much tighter than ever, as if that could prevent your swinging across the shaft and striking against the opposite wall, where you see plainly enough you are going. You would stick out your right foot and keep yourself off, but you are afraid to attempt it. Bump you go against the damp and shining wall, and start, catch your breath and start across against the opposite side. You don't like this, and making a desperate effort to prevent its recurrence, you set yourself spinning around like an orange at the end of a string. You spin around to the right a while, then you spin around to the left a while. It is very unpleasant. And all this time another motion bothers you; you are going down, down. Pretty soon, without knowing how, you get back to the old pendulum motion again, and are banging against the walls. Then, as you go darting down, by nervous and stated jerks, in sympathy with the cranks above, like some big spider letting himself down by his thread, you spin around again! Your candles flare about strangely, sometimes almost going out, and again giving out a streak of flame, apparently, to your excited imagination, several feet in length. You vote it a bore, and would drop it only that you are afraid that the rope would break should you do so. Finally, with all this whirling and thumping, you become bewildered and imagine you have descended several miles. At last, just as you are about to give up and consider yourself as one doomed to descend forever towards the centre of the earth without reaching it, your feet touch bottom. You hold tighter than ever to the rope and take a good look to be sure that it is substantial earth upon which you have landed. You continue to hold on to the rope until your foot is free from the noose—those fellows above might take a sudden notion to hoist and carry you up hanging by the foot. It is wonderful that you should think of this, yet you do. The workmen have some of them come out of the drifts to the shaft to receive you; their lights blind you, and you stagger this way and that, winking your eyes like an owl and feeling exquisitely sheepish. As you are on solid ground and may put on airs without much fear of a relapse, you try to appear unconcerned; you say "how-d'ye-do" to the miners about you in an unusually impressive and friendly way, and even attempt a sickly joke or two about your descent, but the secret wish of your soul is to be let alone—at least for a few minutes, till your wits are settled.—Gold Hill Evening News.

Queen Caroline.—We were talking one day of Queen Caroline; a doubt was expressed whether some of the blame which attaches to her character may not be removed by attributing some of her extraordinary actions to insanity, by which alone they can be accounted for. Mrs. Kemble told me she had known, at Lousanne, a man, now a landsman or magistrate, formerly an officer in the Duke of Brunswick's Guards, who told her that it was the general opinion that in early youth the Princess had shown strong symptoms of insanity, and he gave the following instance to prove his assertion: A great ball was given, to which the Duchess would not allow her daughter, then aged sixteen, to go. The ball was just begun, when a messenger came to the Duke and Duchess to inform them that the Princess Caroline was taken violently ill. Of course, they returned immediately to the Palace, all the court following them—the landsman, then on guard, being one among them. When they reached the ante-chamber of the apartment of the princess, they found she was on a bed in the next room, screaming with agony; they were told that she was black in the face, etc. The doors were all open, when the duke and duchess went up to the bed and tenderly inquired what was the matter. The doctors were not yet arrived; the princess said any attempt at dissimulation would be useless and impossible. "I am in labor, and entreat you, madam, to send for an accoucheur immediately." These words were spoken loud enough to be heard by all those who were waiting in the next room; their astonishment may be conceived. Soon after the accoucheur came; as soon as the princess saw him she jumped out of bed, wiped the livid coloring from her face, and with a loud laugh said to the Duchess: "Now, madam, you will keep me another time from a ball?" At this period, whenever she did go into public, there were persons appointed to watch that she did not give notes, etc.; but it was supposed that she found means to elude their vigilance. The idea of the unsoundness of the mind of the unfortunate Caroline is strongly confirmed by the following circumstances, related to me by Lord Redesdale in May, 1828: Having been invited to dine with the Duchess of Brunswick at Blackheath, he and Lady Redesdale, coming at the time specified, found themselves long before the rest of the company. They passed half an hour en tiers with the Duchess, who, having known him from his earliest youth, began talking very confidently and imprudently of the misconduct of her daughter, ending with saying, "But her excuse is, poor thing, that she is not right here." She struck her forehead, and burst into a violent flood of tears. By this time some guests were heard entering, and Lord and Lady Redesdale were obliged to support the poor infirm old woman to her room, and make the best story they could. He told me also, and I forget how he knew it to be true, that when the Princess was at Baden, and the Grand Duke made a partie de chasse for her, she appeared on horseback with a half-pumpkin on her head. Upon the Grand Duke's expressing astonishment, and recommending a coiffure rather less extraordinary, she only replied that the weather was hot, and nothing kept the head so cool and comfortable as a pumpkin. Surely nothing that was said by Brougham or Denman could plead so strongly in extenuation of the nudities of the Muse of History, etc., as the pumpkins.—Diaries of a Lady of Quality.

Shabby Genteel.—Among all the pitiable sights which assail the eyes, and, through them, the heart, none can bear comparison with that which exhibits the peculiar circumstance which, in common parlance, is known as shabby gentility. There is a mute development of all the aggregate of human suffering in it—a development of intolerable yet uncomplaining torments, which excites the tenderest regard in the beholder, and the most unselfish sympathy. There is something gross in bodily suffering; but mental pain is delicate in its intrinsic nature. The dignified suffering of shabby gentility is the very realization of what poets call "exquisite agony." There is something in the battered hat, the threadbare coat, and the disordered but highly lustrous boots, which the flintiest of natures cannot deny. Poverty does not always address itself to the sympathies, and seldom, if ever, in the ratio of its degree. The poor homeless vagabond in tatters and filth, the shivering mendicant whose empty pockets cannot afford him more than a mouldy crust to gnaw, extorts charity more frequently than he invites. But shabby gentility seduces the finer instincts of the charitable man, and wins upon human nature insensibly. It is not the number of tatters, or the hideous minutiæ of privations, but that which lies beneath the threadbare suit—the mental suffering, of which this is the evidence and the symbol. In this lies the vital principle on which the pathetic quality of shabby gentility is based.

Done in Haste and Repented at Leisure.—A tradesman's daughter who had been for some time engaged to a prosperous young draper in a neighboring town, heard from one whom she and her parents considered a creditable authority, that he was on the verge of bankruptcy. "Not a day was to be lost in breaking the bond by which she and her small fortune were linked to penury." A letter, strong and conclusive in its language, was at once written and posted, when the same informant called upon the young lady's friends to contradict and explain his previous statement, which had arisen out of some misunderstanding. "They rushed at once to the post-office, and no words can describe the scene; the reiterated appeals, the tears, the wringing of hands, the united entreaties of father, mother, and daughter for the restoration of the fatal letter." But the rule admitted of no exception, and the young lady had to repent at leisure of her inordinate haste.—Her Majesty's Mails: an Historical and Descriptive Account of the British Post-office.

Good but Impertinent.—The Paris correspondent of the Publishers' Circular says that the Duke of Saxe Coburg Gotha recently sent his private secretary to M. Alex. Dumas to obtain a "book" for a grand opera which the Duke proposed to compose. The author replied that he would cheerfully furnish the "book" upon condition that a reasonable sum of money should be paid him in advance. The private secretary was embarrassed by this answer, which was of a nature princes are not accustomed to receive, and he said to M. Dumas: "Surely, you do not doubt the Duke's ability to guarantee you payment of all the money the opera may produce?" "No. That is not the question. The Duke's former operas have never been successful; and if the same man is going to write the score for my book, the opera will never produce any money at all." Everybody knows that the Duke de Saxe Coburg Gotha is really the author of the music which passes under his name, but this does not diminish the impertinence of M. Dumas' sally.

Austria and the Poles.—Austria continues to give up to Russia the Poles who take refuge in Gallicia, but those extraditions no longer occur at Brody, where facts of that nature excite general indignation; the prisoners are sent off through small villages on the frontier. The Austrian authorities have been instructed not to give up the refugees directly to Russian agents; the Poles are taken to the frontier and forced to enter the kingdom, the Russians having been previously informed of the place and hour at which their prey would be thus driven into their nets.—Paris Siécle.

The Danish engineers have discovered an ingenious contrivance for keeping their opponents exposed to a heavy fire, by a sort of invisible fence, made of strong wire, supported at stated distances by timber posts inserted in the ground. It must take, at all events, some precious minutes to overcome this obstacle, during which the attacking troops would be open to a destructive fire without any shelter. The intrenchments at Duppel are surrounded by these formidable barriers

---

The good man goes not upon enmity, but rewards with kindness the very being who injures him; so the sandal-wood tree, while it is felling, imparts to the edge of the ax an aromatic flavor.

"THE CALIFORNIAN."

WHAT THE PRESS SAYS OF IT.

The following are the notices which appear in our city cotemporaries:

THE CALIFORNIAN.—The fourth number of this journal has made its appearance, and the character of the paper is established. But it is a character peculiar to itself. It is very different from any other paper. Unlike other quarto journals of its size, it would rather be entertaining than altogether original, but its selections are made with rare judgment. Here is gossip for newsmongers; there ghost stories for spiritualists and lovers of the marvellous; and again, an article that shows how our neighbors live, or how the nation is governed. But the original part of the CALIFORNIAN is the best. The novelette is probably good—as good as other novelettes. The political leaders are solid. The fashion articles are entertaining. But the wit is the spice of the paper. Webb can make fun without buffoonery or bad spelling, and apparently without effort and without end. He may not be equal to Holmes or Saxe in verse, but in prose we scarcely know where to find his equal. It is not necessary to mention the names of those who have become famous by abusing our language, but they all have been or will be forgotten. Webb, we imagine, is capable of "things" that will live. His paper is now, next to Punch, the wittiest publication known to us. The CALIFORNIAN is certainly a credit to the editor and to the State.—Alta, June 19th.

THE CALIFORNIAN.—The fourth number of this very excellent weekly journal appeared yesterday. What we said of the first number applies with equal truth to its successors. It is a paper of a manly and a gentlemanly tone, fit to be read anywhere, in one's office or parlor, and no publication among us is better suited for perusal to-day. The present number has several good papers—such as Mary Stuart and Chastelar, Things, etc.—Call, June 19th.

THE CALIFORNIAN.—We have carefully looked over the first number of this literary weekly, and can say unqualifiedly that we like it. To make use of a trite comparison, newspapers, like individuals, have a certain character, apparent in a degree at first sight, and becoming more positive in proportion as acquaintance increases. The CALIFORNIAN impresses us as would a refined, well-bred man of the world. The style is that of charming repose, easy address and delicacy of perception. There are many original thoughts scattered throughout its columns; but the chief merit of the paper lies not so much in this as in the thoroughly graceful manner in which they are conveyed to the reader. If a really creditable weekly journal has been, as some suppose, a want in this community, there can be no reason to doubt that by the CALIFORNIAN it is supplied. If its success be equal to its deserving, the projector will soon find himself floating on the tide spoken of by Shakspeare; a tide which, alas! but rarely makes for journalists. Daily Morning Call, May 29th.

THE CALIFORNIAN.—The first number of a literary paper (weekly), bearing this title, has been received from the Sacramento agent, C. A. Carolan. In size and general appearance it resembles the New York Round Table. The contents of this number, original and selected, establish the presence of editorial taste and the command of intellectual resources to insure a literary success, at least. To render the CALIFORNIAN acceptable to the State at large, however, San Francisco, the locality of its publication, should not occupy too much space in its columns. C. H. Webb, a gentleman of considerable journalistic experience, and a facile, lively, piquant writer, is responsible for the advent of this publication.—Sacramento Daily Union, May 30th.

"OLD THINGS PASS AWAY."—The advent of the Florence dates a new era in sewing mechanism. To purchase any of the old contrivances for sewing, since the introduction of this "Ne Plus Ultra" of Machines, would be as unwise as for a lady with her needle and thread to attempt to stitch a race with the imperfect sewing machines formerly used. We know positively that Mr. Hill, agent for the Florence, (office, 111 Montgomery street,) has, up to this time, been unable to supply the demand for these admirable Sewing Machines, showing conclusively that the public fully appreciate their many advantages.

THE EUREKA BILLIARD SALOON—over the Eureka Theatre, on Montgomery street, between California and Pine—is the most superbly fitted-up establishment on the Pacific Coast. It contains seven of Jacob Strahle's tables, unequalled by any other in elegance of style and finish. Messrs. Fitch & Wetherbee are the gentlemanly proprietors, and so conduct their establishment as to merit and maintain the leading patronage of gentlemanly knights of the cue, of the city and State. jul8

CENTRAL RAILROAD COMPANY OFFICE, No. 229 Bush street, San Francisco: Location, City and County of San Francisco, State of California.—Notice is hereby given, that at a meeting of the Directors of said Company, held on the 8th day of June, 1864, an assessment of Five Dollars ($5) per share was levied upon the Capital Stock of the said Company, payable immediately in United States gold coin, to the Secretary of said Company, at the office of said Company, in the city of San Francisco. Any stock upon which said assessment shall remain unpaid on the TENTH DAY OF JULY, 1864, will be advertised on that day as delinquent, and unless payment shall be made before, will be sold on the Twenty-third day of July, 1864, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with costs of advertising and expenses of the sale. By order of the Board of Directors. JAS. T. HOYT, Secretary.
jul8 Office, 229 Bush street.

MEETING OF THE STOCKHOLDERS OF THE CENTRAL RAILROAD CO.—Office Central Railroad Company, June 13th, 1864.—Notice is hereby given that the annual meeting of the Stockholders of the Central Railroad Company, for the election of nine Directors of the Company, to serve for the ensuing year, will be held at the office of the Company, No. 229 Bush street, San Francisco, on TUESDAY, July 5th, 1864. The polls for the election of Directors will open at 12 o'clock M., and close at 3 o'clock P. M. of that day. Every Stockholder present, in person or by proxy, will have one vote for each share of stock which he may have owned for ten days next preceding such election. JAMES T. HOYT, je18-td Sec'y Central Railroad Company.

OFFICE OF THE OMNIBUS RAILROAD CO., San Francisco, June 13th, 1864.—Notice is hereby given, that the annual meeting of stockholders of the Omnibus Railroad Company will be holden at the office of the Company, (Howard street, between Third and Fourth streets,) on MONDAY, July 4, 1864, at 12 o'clock, for the election of seven Directors for the ensuing year, and the transaction of such other business as may be properly brought before them. By order of the Board.
je18 JAMES O'NEILL, Secretary.

THE CALIFORNIAN.

A PAPER FOR THE TIMES.

Devoted to Live Topics,

AND THE

BEST INTERESTS OF CALIFORNIA.

Is published

EVERY SATURDAY MORNING,

AT

728 MONTGOMERY STREET.

Nothing will be spared that will enable THE CALIFORNIAN to appeal to the Public for support, not only as the

BEST JOURNAL ON THE PACIFIC COAST,

But also as being

THE EQUAL OF ANY ON THIS CONTINENT!

Imperial paper, of a quality and weight never before brought to this market, is ordered from the East

EXPRESSLY FOR THE CALIFORNIAN,

And will arrive here as soon as it can be brought by Isthmus transportation.

THE BEST TALENT OF THE STATE

Is employed upon the CALIFORNIAN, and arrangements have been made with contributors abroad for

EASTERN AND FOREIGN CORRESPONDENCE.

THE TERMS OF THE CALIFORNIAN are $5 per year by mail to subscribers, invariably in advance; 50 cents per month, served by carriers.

All communications and correspondence must be addressed to

C. H. WEBB,
Editor and Proprietor CALIFORNIAN,
728 Montgomery street.

UNION STATE AND CONGRESSIONAL DISTRICT CONVENTIONS.

THERE WILL BE HELD AT SACRAMENTO, on the 30th day of August, A. D. 1864, a Union State Convention, for the purpose of nominating Presidential Electors to be supported by the Union Party at the ensuing Presidential Election, to appoint a State Central Committee, and for the transaction of such other business as may properly come before it.

There will be held also at Sacramento, immediately after the adjournment of the State Convention, Congressional District Conventions for the First, Second and Third Congressional Districts, for the purpose of nominating Candidates for Congress for their respective Districts, and to appoint District Committees.

Each county will elect delegates in pursuance of notice of its Union County Committee, according to the following apportionment:

Alameda	8	Plumas	8
Amador	13	Sacramento	21
Alpine	6	San Bernardino	3
Butte	11	San Diego	2
Calaveras	13	San Francisco	52
Colusa	3	San Joaquin	12
Contra Costa	6	San Luis Obispo	2
Coso	5	San Mateo	5
Del Norte	2	Santa Barbara	3
El Dorado	19	Santa Clara	11
Fresno	1	Santa Cruz	6
Humboldt	4	Shasta	6
Klamath	3	Sierra	13
Lake	2	Siskiyou	7
Lassen	3	Solano	9
Los Angeles	5	Stanislaus	3
Marin	4	Sutter	5
Mariposa	6	Sonoma	10
Mendocino	4	Tehama	4
Merced	1	Trinity	6
Mono	6	Tulare	4
Monterey	4	Tuolumne	12
Napa	6	Yolo	5
Nevada	16	Yuba	11
Placer	13

In any County where the Union County Committee shall not order an Election of Delegates specially for its Congressional District Convention, or where Delegates from such District may not have been elected pursuant to notice of such County Committee, then the Delegates from such County to the State Convention shall be Delegates to the District Congressional Convention for the District in which such County may be; and when such District Conventions shall have met in Sacramento as aforesaid, each Convention will determine when and where the Convention will make its Congressional nomination. All citizens who are in favor of a vigorous prosecution of the war to the final success of the Federal Government—who endorse the platform of the Union National Convention, and who will pledge themselves to support the National, State and Congressional Nominees of the Union Party will be entitled to vote for such Delegates.

It is recommended that no Delegate be elected, unless he be a legal resident of the county whence he is chosen, and that no proxies be given by Delegates to any except citizens of the county which they shall be elected to represent.

NATHANIEL HOLLAND,
Chairman Union State Central Committee.
J. T. HOYT, Secretary. ju25

COMMERCIAL STEAM PRINTING HOUSE.

FRANCIS, VALENTINE & CO.,

517 CLAY and 514 COMMERCIAL STREETS.

Every description of BOOK, JOB and POSTER PRINTING done in the best style and at the lowest rates.
BOOK-BINDING and RULING done to order.

CALISTOGA SPRINGS,

NAPA VALLEY,

The great watering place of the Pacific, not excelled in Europe or America.

BATHS OF EVERY DESCRIPTION,

GRAND HOT MINERAL SWIMMING BATH,

STEAM BATH,

From the Natural Springs—a sure cure for the Rheumatism, Gout, Sore Eyes, and Pulmonary Complaints, being impregnated with Sulphur, Iron and Magnesia.

CELEBRATED HOT MUD BATH,

The same as used by the Romans in Italy two thousand years ago.

An elegant TROTTING PARK, one mile in length.

The best TROUT FISHING and SHOOTING within one mile.

Seven hours from San Francisco, by Steamboat and Stage, four hours by boat and three hours by stage—starting at 9 o'clock every morning. Fare by steamer and stage, five dollars.

Thirty miles from the Geysers, stages running every day.

Telegraph line connecting with all parts of the State.

 No finer public accommodations on the continent.

jul1-1m F. B. GILMORE, Landlord.

REOPENED FOR THE SEASON.

THE CRYSTAL SPRINGS HOTEL,

Situated four miles from the San Mateo Railroad depot, in a most splendid valley, surrounded with large, beautiful, natural trees, is now open for the public. The road from San Mateo to the house has been recently macadamized, making it the finest drive in California. The House and Cottages have been refitted and thoroughly renovated. New spring beds and every modern improvement have been added to the sleeping department. The larder, as usual, contains all the delicacies of the season. Stages leave San Mateo depot on the arrival of the trains for Crystal Springs.

A fine stable is now opened at San Mateo by Messrs. Byrnes & Ames, who will furnish horses and carriages, or saddle horses, at low rates, to the public. Parties wishing rooms or meals, on arrival, can engage them by telegraph, via San Mateo.

jul1-tf TONY OAKES, Proprietor.

R. G. SNEATH,

408 FRONT STREET, SAN FRANCISCO,

Importer and Wholesale Dealer in

GROCERIES, PROVISIONS, FLOUR, RICE,

TOBACCOS, LIQUORS, ETC.

Branch House, - - SNEATH & BOARMAN, - - Red Bluff.

Forwarding Agent, D. W. EARL, Sacramento, who will receive and fill orders for all kinds of Goods on my account, and keep a large stock of Flour, Barley, Potatoes, Ground Feed, etc., etc. No charge for forwarding.

ALMADEN QUICKSILVER!

Orders for Goods not in my line furnished customers without extra charge. Orders for Goods in the Eastern markets attended to promptly. Daily Prices Current furnished when desired.

Orders respectfully solicited. jul1-1m

DINNER SETS.—We have just received, ex Giscours, several extremely fine

FRENCH CHINA DINNER SETS,

WITH TEA SET, COMPLETE.

A SUPERIOR ARTICLE to anything ever offered in this market.

Connoisseurs will find great pleasure in examining our stock of VERY RARE CHINA, and

ELEGANT GLASS SETS,

FRENCH BRONZE STATUARY,

Comprising some very fine pieces.

PARIAN STATUARY, ELEGANT VASES, ETC., ETC.

HAYNES & LAWTON,

516 and 518 Sansome street, corner Merchant,
my28 San Francisco.

McRUER & MERRILL,

WHOLESALE AUCTION HOUSE,

204 and 206 California street.

Regular Sale Days - - - WEDNESDAYS and SATURDAYS
(Advances on Consignments.)

NOTICE!

From this date Mr. A. P. EVERETT has an interest in our business. McRUER & MERRILL.
San Francisco, October 20, 1862.

A. P. EVERETT, - - - - - - - - - - Auctioneer.
jul1-3m

EDWARD BOSQUI & CO.,

517

CLAY STREET, SAN FRANCISCO.

BOOKBINDERS, PAPER-RULERS, AND

ACCOUNT-BOOK MANUFACTURERS.

Blanks of all kinds printed and ruled to any desired pattern. my28

SQUARZA'S PUNCH.—First Premium,

Sacramento, 1862.

First Premium at San Francisco District Fair, 1863.

First Special Premium, Sacramento, 1863.

Wholesale and Retail.

my28 44 Leidesdorff street, San Francisco.

NEW YORK AGENCY.—$15 PER DAY MADE EASY, by selling our great "Original and only genuine"

PRIZE AND STATIONERY PACKAGES.

Each one contains more real valuable articles than any half dozen packages ever sold. They contain

FINE STATIONERY,
PENS,
PENCILS,
ENVELOPES,

AND A

GIFT OF JEWELRY IN EACH PACKAGE.

The whole worth several dollars if bought separate. Price, 50 cents. Wholesale rates to Agents low. Agents wanted in every town and camp on the Pacific coast. Send for our New Circular with inducements. Mailed free. Address J. B. WILLMAN & CO.,
my28 502 Montgomery street, San Francisco

NOTICE.

THE Copartnership in the Banking business heretofore existing between Eugene Kelly of the city of New York, and Joseph A. Donohoe, Wm. C. Ralston and Ralph S. Fretz of San Francisco, under the firm name of EUGENE KELLY & CO., New York, and DONOHOE, RALSTON & CO., San Francisco, will cease on the first (1st) day of July, 1864—Eugene Kelly and J. A. Donohoe withdrawing from the copartnership.

The business will be settled in New York by Eugene Kelly, and in San Francisco by Wm. C. Ralston and R. S. Fretz.

Depositors are requested to hand in their books for settlement at the banking-house of Donohoe, Ralston & Co. EUGENE KELLY,
(Per J. A. Donohoe, Attorney.)
J. A. DONOHOE,
W. C. RALSTON,
R. S. FRETZ.
San Francisco, June 13, 1864.

THE Undersigned have formed a copartnership for the transaction of a general Banking and Exchange business, under the firm names of DONOHOE, KELLY & CO., in San Francisco, and EUGENE KELLY & CO., in New York, commencing July 1, 1864. Their Banking House in this city will be at the southeast corner of Montgomery and Sacramento streets. EUGENE KELLY.
JOSEPH A. DONOHOE.
San Francisco, June 15, 1864. jul8

NOTICE.

THE Copartnership in the Banking business heretofore existing between Eugene Kelly of the city of New York, and Joseph A. Donohoe, Wm. C. Ralston and Ralph S. Fretz, of San Francisco, under the firm name of EUGENE KELLY & CO., New York, and DONOHOE, RALSTON & CO., San Francisco, will cease on the first day of July, 1864, Eugene Kelly and Joseph A. Donohoe withdrawing from the copartnership.

The business will be settled in New York by Eugene Kelly, and in San Francisco by Wm. C. Ralston and R. S. Fretz.

Depositors are requested to hand in their books for settlement at the Banking House of Donohoe, Ralston & Co. EUGENE KELLY,
(Per J. A. Donohoe, Attorney.)
JOSEPH A. DONOHOE,
WM. C. RALSTON,
R. S. FRETZ.
San Francisco, June 13, 1864.

THE Undersigned, calling attention to the above card, give notice that on and after the first day of July next, they will continue the business of the above copartnership without interruption, at the old banking-house of Donohoe, Ralston & Co., in this city under the firm name of FRETZ & RALSTON, and in New York, through the agency of Messrs. LEES & WALLER, No 33 Pine street: and that on and after the 5th of July next, they together with Messrs. D. O. Mills, J. B. Thomas, Louis McLane, Asa T. Lawton, Wm. E. Barron, Thomas Bell, Jno. O. Earl, Wm. Norris, J. Whitney, Jr., O. F. Giffin, A. J. Pope, Herman Michels, Frederick Billings, Geo. H. Howard, H. F. Teschemacher, A. Hayward, Moses Ellis, A. B. McCreery, R. M. Jessup, Samuel Knight, A. C. Henry, J. C. Wilmerding and Wm. Alvord of San Francisco, and Jacob Kamm, of Portland, Oregon, having become duly incorporated under the laws of this State, will carry on the business of Banking in all its various branches, at the same place and through the same agency, and upon the basis of a Gold and Silver Currency, under the name of

THE BANK OF CALIFORNIA.

D. O. MILLS and WM. C. RALSTON will be charged with the management of the business of the Corporation. WM. C. RALSTON,
R. S. FRETZ.
San Francisco, June 15, 1864.

DISSOLUTION OF COPARTNERSHIP

The Copartnership heretofore existing under the name and style of H. WEBSTER & CO., have been dissolved by mutual consent.

H. WEBSTER,
A. D. NUDD,
S. L. STANLEY,
C. S. LORD.

NUDD, STANLEY & CO.,

Importers and Wholesale

LIQUOR MERCHANTS,

No. 410 FRONT STREET,

Successors to

H. WEBSTER & CO.,

Having purchased the entire interest of H. Webster, in the house of H. WEBSTER & Co., the undersigned will continue the business under the same and style.

ASA D. NUDD,
SAM'L L. STANLEY,
CHAS. S. LORD.
San Francisco, June 1st, 1864. je4

OCCIDENTAL HOTEL—Corner Montgomery and Bush streets, San Francisco.

This House possesses all the requirements of a FIRST CLASS HOTEL, its spacious READING ROOM, with large MINERAL CABINET and extensive COLLECTION OF SPECIMENS from the different Mining Regions of the Pacific Coast—BRANCH TELEGRAPH OFFICE connecting with Lines throughout the country—and NEWS STAND—all contributing to make it the Headquarters and Home for the Californian business man and tourist.

The TABLE of this House shall not be excelled by any.

BOARD, THREE DOLLARS PER DAY.

LEWIS LELAND & CO.,
my28 Proprietors.

G. FORREST WALTER & CO.,

EXCELSIOR

PIONEER MERCHANT TAILOR

OF THE PACIFIC.

ESTABLISHED, 1849.

NO. 611 SACRAMENTO STREET,

Three doors above Montgomery,
my28 San Francisco.

ELECTRICITY AS A REMEDIAL AGENT.

When it was promulgated that disease could be entirely eradicated from the system without the use of poisonous drugs, the unthinking, or those who do not look deeply into cause and effect, scouted the assertion as chimerical, and adduced strong evidence of its utter impossibility. Long articles, replete with arguments, seemingly unanswerable, of the position that only through the digestive system could the blood be purged of the accumulation of the poisons which constitute disease. A great cry went up from the interested in the continued supremacy of the old system of one poison to cure another, that electricity, as a curative agent, had been tried and proved to be of but little if any value—thinking, poor souls, the world of science stood at the same point it occupied one hundred years ago. That were wrong, while those old fogies were content if they cured one in every five patients, there were those who were diving into the science of electricity, and finally it was discovered that the trouble was in the instruments used. From that time to the present improvements have rapidly advanced, until every disease in the catalogue of human ills have been either cured altogether or checked so as to enable the sufferer to seek those changes of climate which ultimately perform a perfect cure. Diseases hitherto considered incurable have been cured, and those diseases which took months, and even years, to cure by medical process, are now cured in a few weeks; and all by the Improved Instruments of Dr. J. H. Josselyn, Resident Physician at the Electropathic Institute, 645 Washington street, San Francisco. It is astonishing to see the number of patients and diversity of diseases that have been relieved by the electropathic system. From early morn till late at night his instrument is engaged imparting strength and health to all who have the good fortune to obtain his services.

The charges, too, are not as heavy as by the old system; besides there is no medicine to pay for, let alone the unpleasantness of swallowing the nauseous stuff. During the time the Institute has been in operation there has been more benefit to the human family derived from the system than from all other systems combined during the same period. Among the most troublesome diseases to which Californians have been exposed is Rheumatism. None have given the honorable practitioner more trouble to relieve, and none have pretended to cure (if we except known empirics) permanently. But this subtle disease gives way before the Electropathic System in a very short time, enabling the sufferer to go about his business without pain or the fear and dread of a relapse. And so with most other diseases considered incurable. We mention Rheumatism because of its abundance, but we could enumerate many other diseases fully as troublesome, and some far more fatal in their results.

Connected with this system are the renowned Electro-Magnetic Baths. Here let us caution the public against the numerous impostors in the bathing line. The pure magnetic bath is one of the most effective aids in the removal of disease from the system; but if given at the wrong time is likely to aggravate trouble, and cases have been known where the patient has been injured so badly as to require months to remove the injury. Persons in quest of this bath should be careful and not apply to a place where there is no physician to judge of the necessity of the remedy. In fact, the only place where they can be obtained, in all their purity, is at the Institute, where the Resident Physician will always be happy to examine and see that they are not unseasonably administered, and if not necessary, advise the requisite remedy.

To FEMALES, the Directors would say, Electropathy is particularly applicable to your delicate and fragile systems, and to the numerous troublesome and painful diseases to which you are liable; should you be irregular, a few treatments will restore the functions to the proper state without pain or inconvenience; should you be weak and enfeebled, either general or local, this system imparts strength and vitality, making the recipients feel buoyant and youthful where before they were languid and unable to enjoy the pleasures of life One great blessing connected with Electropathy is, it purifies the system so thoroughly that it beautifies the complexion, making the coarse and freckled skin as pure and fair as possible, giving the patient a fresh and healthful look.

To the nervous the Directors would say, that you can be entirely removed from those dreadful feelings of evil foreboding, and your system strengthened so that nothing can disturb the current of your life Several cases of insanity, arising from a disarrangement of the nervous system, have been permanently cured by this system. The Directors, in issuing this pamphlet, do it in the hope that it may be the means of awakening the public who have not studied into such things, to a sense of their duties, and if possible prevent those who have the care of a rising generation from poisoning their young charges with vile drugs, thereby entailing upon them troubles which, after life, may cause them to curse the origin. Also, that those in need of remedial agents may know where they can find them without resorting to taking the thousand-and-one poisonous nostrums that are continually being palmed off as sovereign panaceas for all the ills of humanity. Avoid them all—they are snares set to rob you, and do you bodily injury at the same time.

The Electropathic Institute was started amid the cry of interested charlatans, who used all the power their riches and the prejudices of the public gave them to prevent its success. It has risen to a position that is beyond their baffled malice, and will be honored in the scientific world when they are forgotten, or only remembered for their crimes and impositions. A thinking public are fast consigning them to that oblivion their works merit. Let them go, they will not be missed.

Persons seeking remedial assistance may wish to know something of the system by which diseases are so rapidly removed from the body. Electricity is a fluid of so subtle a nature, that it can only be studied by its results. We know by its action it forces everything of a foreign nature in the body from the centre to the surface, by its energy, while the vitality which it imparts fills up the vacuum, preventing thereby the subtle poisons from returning to the hitherto diseased parts—and here let it be understood, that the Bath should never be administered until the disease has been forced to the surface—except, perhaps, in cases of cold where fever has not set in. Its action upon mercurial disease is peculiar. The best authorities are of opinion that it liquifies the mercury—which, when in a liquid state, by its own specific gravity forces itself out of the body. This result has been arrived at by testing the water after an Electro-Magnetic Bath. After such tests have been found in the water, the patient is not troubled any more with those pains peculiar to the diseases. In all other cases it forces to the surface and is washed off by the bath. The whole system in its application is a luxury—there being no pain or inconvenience attending upon it; but the reverse is the case—being one continued pleasure all the time. Try it you that are suffering either from disease or the injudicious use of poisonous drugs, and you will be made to rejoice that you have had the courage to strike out from the beaten path.

Below are a few certificates from patients that have been cured at the Institute:

CERTIFICATES OF CURES.

San Francisco, April 18th, 1860.

This is to certify that I have been under the treatment of Dr Josselyn, at the Electropathic Institute, and that he has cured me. My disease was mercurial, accompanied with chills. I applied to him on the 11th day of this month. I recommend all afflicted to employ him. He has cured me without medicine, by the use of his Electropathic Instrument. JOHN CALLAGHAN.

State of California, City and County of San Francisco—ss.
Subscribed and sworn to before me this eighteenth day of April, A. D. 1860. P. BARRY, Notary Public.

The undersigned takes this method of acknowledging publicly the benefits he received from the treatment applied to him at the Electropatbic Institute while, suffering under a terrible infliction.

This is to certify that I have been under Electropathic treatment at the Electropathic Institute, 645 Washington street. When I applied to Dr. Josselyn I was cramped up with rheumatism, and also had the coast ague. So bad was I that, without relief, I don't think I could have lived more than one week. The Doctor, with his instrument relieved me the first treatment from all pain, and perfectly cured me of all disease in twenty treatments, without the use of medicines. I cordially recommend all afflicted to patronize the Institute, for it is truly a blessing to the afflicted, and the operation is very pleasant. I wish to publicly thank Dr. Josselyn for his care and sympathy. JOSEPH SEGER, of Bolinas Bay.

September 19, 1860.

State of California, City and County of San Francisco—ss.
Subscribed and sworn to before me this 19th day of September, A.D. 1860. P. BARRY, Notary Public.

Sacramento, October 19th, 1860.

DR. JOSSELYN—Dear and Honored Sir:—You requested me to let you know how I felt after being at home three weeks. Well, sir, I have now been here little over two weeks, and there is no return of that very unpleasant trouble My sleep is sound, and there is no disturbance of the regular laws of nature. I feel as strong as I ever did before bad babits had weakened my system. Not only is the general debility entirely disappeared, but the local trouble is gone. I feel so strong that there is no fear of its return. Considering that you only took one month to cure a disorder of seven years' standing, I think your system almost miraculous. Accept my sincere thanks, and publish this, if you please. I have sworn to it, as you see. C. BOWMAN.

State of California, County of Sacramento—ss.
Subscribed and sworn to before me this tenth day of October, A.D. 1860. CHAS. HART, Notary Public.

Hornitos, November 1st, 1860.

Well, Doctor, I am at home and have been to work in the water for several days, and there is no return of the Rheumatism, as I call it; and Mercurial pains, as you stated them to be. I feel as gay as a lark, no pain or bad feelings, no stiffness, but perfectly well, and all done by you in three weeks, without one drop of medicine. You had hard work to make me believe before you commenced, that you would cure me, but now I find it very easy to believe. Although my friends look rather incredulous, they cannot doubt my sober earnestness. Doctor, you have my thanks, and I will benefit you all I can, by spreading your fame up in these parts. Respectfully yours,

GEO. PERKINS, JR.

To J. M. Josselyn, M.D., Resident Physician, at the Electropathic Institute.

Nevada, November. 8th, 1860.

DEAR DOCTOR.—Pursuant to agreement, upon my arrival, I sit down to pen you a few lines in acknowledgment of the great service you have rendered me, in relieving me of that painful case of neuralgia and rheumatism. When I look back and see the gallons of medicine I have swallowed to no purpose, and then to think how soon you cured me, I am astonished. You were only twelve days performing a cure of the trouble for which I had taken medicine over six months. Dear Doctor, if you could see the wonder exhibited by my friends, who can hardly believe that a cure was performed without medicine; but here I have been cured, and I have not taken a drop of medicine from you nor from any one else while being treated by your splendid Instrument. I shall try to show my gratitude by sending every sick man I come across to you.

Yours, till death,
FRANCIS GARLAND,

To J. H. Josselyn, M. D., Resident Physician Electropathic Institute.

State of California, County of Nevada—ss.
Subscribed and sworn to before me this eighth day of November, A. D. 1860. F. SPAULDING, Notary Public.

Yreka, November 10th, 1860.

DR. JOSSELYN—Dear Sir: Your letter dated October 16th is before me. You wish to know how my bronchial troubles are. Now, Doctor, that looks a great deal like a joke. I once had such an affection, of several years' standing, but thanks to your natural mode of treating disease, it has gone to be numbered with the things of the past. Since my return I have not felt the slightest trouble from it. When you pronounced me well I did not expect to ever bear from it again. Any one who sits under treatment of that Improved Instrument of yours will have the same feelings. It imparts vitality to the system so rapidly that confidence is at once established. I have to thank you that you did not refuse to treat me because I could not pay you the whole of your reasonable charge; enclosed is the balance due you, and God bless you for the kind treatment I received at your hands.

Yours, ever grateful, WM. GARDNER.

State of California, County of Siskiyou—ss.
Subscribed and sworn to before me this tenth day of November, A. D. 1860.
B. F. WELLITS, Notary Public.

This is to certify that I, the undersigned, was troubled with dumb ague, accompanied with rheumatism, very badly. My disease was taken in Washoe. After having exhausted medicines without benefit I applied to Dr. Josselyn, at the Electropathic Institute, on the first day of November. After taking twenty treatments with his Improved Electropathic Instrument, I am perfectly cured, having been entirely relieved of all pain or inconvenience I feel as strong as I ever did when in the best of health. I cheerfully recommend all afflicted to his care, as being the best physician I ever became acquainted with. One great advantage, he uses no medicines, but cures by a process which is perfectly natural. The time occupied in my case was thirteen days. D. O. HARRA.

November 14th, 1860.

State of California, City and County of San Francisco—ss.
Personally appeared before me, D. O. Harra, and subscribed and sworn to the above certificate, on this 14th day of November, A. D. 1860. P. BARRY, Notary Public.

San Francisco, August 31, 1861.

To the Directors and Resident Physician of the Electropathic Institute: Sirs—You requested of me a certificate of the cure you performed in my case. Below I append it:

This is to certify that I was troubled with a swelling which commenced in my ankles, and gradually extended upward until it affected my whole body. I sought the best medical aid in New York and Boston, and they all pronounced it dropsy Hoping to retrieve my health I visited California in February last. I consulted the Resident Physician at the Electropathic Institute, and now, after five months of treatment, and waiting to see its effects, I am pronounced well by competent judges. It did not take but three months of treatment to cure me, but I waited to see that it did not return. I feel perfectly assured, from what I saw while under treatment, that Electricity, as applied at this Institute, will cure any disease to which the human family is liable.

Now, gentlemen, you can make what use you please of this certificate. With my thanks to the Resident Physician for his kind attention, I subscribe myself,

Your thankful patient,
MRS. C. A. CARLTON.

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.

The advantages of electricity as a remedial agent are universally admitted by the medical and scientific world. It requires, however, experienced skill to apply this remedy efficiently, and this skill of application is possessed in an eminent degree by Dr. J. H. Josselyn, of the San Francisco Electropathic Institute. The Doctor is well known to us as a scientific gentleman, and an ardent devotee to his profession. He is no pretender, but has conferred incalculable benefit to those who were so fortunate as to seek relief at his hands. For those who desire speedy and permaneut relief from the rheumatic pains so prevalent in this region, we can recommend no surer remedy than a visit to Dr. Josselyn, at his rooms in San Francisco, No. 645 Washington street.—Placerville Republican.

ARE YOU SICK?—We wish to say a word to those that are sick. We have in this city an institution known as the Electropathic Institute, situated at 645 Washington street. The establishment is under the care of Dr. J. H. Josselyn, a physician who has no superior in the city. He has been in charge of the Electropathic Institute for several years, and has been uniformly successful in his treatment of the numerous patients that have placed themselves under his charge. The electric treatment will cure many diseases that cannot be reached by any other mode. Dr. Josselyn gives his personal attention to all of his patients, and is always ready to give advice to those that may call upon him. His charges are very moderate; and we cannot do the sick a greater favor than to recommend them to call on him before placing themselves in charge of another.—San Francisco Daily Journal.

We call the attention of our readers to the advertisement of Dr. Josselyn's Electropathic Institute. Voluntarily and unsolicited, we make the following statement, proving its great beneficial effects, particularly in rheumatic cases. Some months since we were on an editorial trip, visiting the mountains. The stage upset and landed all the passengers including the writer, below in the valley, where the Deer Creek overflowed by receiving the additional material, extraneous to its usual contents For some hours exposed in our wet clothes to night wind and weather, we soon felt the effects of the accident, in the mountains—pains in the back, hip, and legs; so much so that for weeks we hardly could walk. Treatments of all kinds were applied, but without avail, until our attention was called to the Electro-Galvanic Baths and appliances of the above Institute. Thank God, after two weeks, we have been fully restored, and enjoy now the free use of our limbs and body, as fully as previous to our involuntary bath in Deer Creek.—DR. H. BIEN, Ed. True Pacific Messenger.

ELECTROPATHY.—Electricity has long been classed among the most effective medical agents. It possesses great advantages over the system of theropeutics hitherto relied upon, as it reaches more certainly the seat of disease, especially in nervous or rheumatic complaints. The Electropathic Institute, No. 645 Washington street, under the charge of its able Resident Physician, Dr. J. H. Josselyn, has attained a well merited celebrity for the many cures which have resulted from the skilful application of this invalnable remedy.—Daily Morning Star.

☞ All letters answered with promptness and pleasure. Office open from 9 A. M. to 9 P. M. Advice gratis.

J. H. JOSSELYN, M. D.,
jn4 Resident Physician.

R. H. McDONALD & CO.,
R. H. MC DONALD.) (J. C. SPENCER.
IMPORTING
Wholesale Druggists,
Corner of Sansome and Pine streets,
SAN FRANCISCO,
—AND—
J STREET, SACRAMENTO.

We respectfully beg leave to inform our customers and the public generally that we have opened a House in the city of San Francisco, where we will be pleased to see as many of our old friends and customers as can make it convenient to call upon us. We shall keep at both places a large and well selected stock of

DRUGS AND MEDICINES, SURGICAL INSTRUMENTS,
Dental Goods, Fancy Articles, Brushes and Combs,
SHOULDER AND BODY BRACES,
Ladies' Bandages and Supporters,
GUM ELASTIC STOCKINGS, TRUSSES,
Paints and Oils,
PATENT MEDICINES, HERBS AND EXTRACTS,
Brewers' and Soda Stocks,
CORKS (LARGE VARIETY), ASSAYERS' MATERIAL,
Burning Oils and Fluids,

Together with a large and completo assortment of all goods kept in a well supplied Wholesale Drug Store,
We respectfully solicit those dealing in our line to examine and price our stock before purchasing elsewhere.
R. H. McDONALD & CO.,
Sacramento and San Francisco.

R. H. McDONALD & CO.,
IMPORTING DRUGGISTS,
J STREET, SACRAMENTO,
AND
CORNER OF PINE AND SANSOME STREETS,
SAN FRANCISCO, CALIFORNIA.
IMPORTERS OF
DENTAL AND SURGICAL INSTRUMENTS,
TEETH, GOLD FOIL.
VULCANITE MATERIAL.
Vulcanizers, Vulcanite Base, and Impression Gutta Percha. A large variety of VULCANITE MATERIAL, Scrapers and Packers; together with a large and complete assortment of all articles of the latest and most approved styles of Vulcanite work.
DENTAL BOOKS.
We keep constanty on hand a supply of all the most approved Standard Works on DENTISTRY. Our efforts will be to keep a large and well selected stock of all Dental Material, where the Dental Profession may confidently rely upon having their orders filled in the best possible manner.
R. H. McDONALD & CO.,
Sacramento, 139 J street,
my28 San Francisco, cor. Pine and Sansome sts.

WONDERFUL TRIUMPH
IN AMERICAN DENTISTRY.
DR. BEERS & CO.,
617 Clay street,
ARE NOW MANUFACTURING THE NEW style of ARTIFICIAL TEETH so highly approved at the East, and which to be appreciated only requires to be seen. The Teeth, Gums and Plate are made of one entire piece of Porcelain without seam or joint, combining great strength and beauty with absolute purity and freedom from any metallic taste, while the coloring of the gums and the interior of the mouth are so perfect as to almost defy detection. All interested in the progress of the Arts are invited to examine samples of this work.
Superior Gold and Vulcanite Work also manufactured as usual, but at greatly reduced prices. jul8

PILES! PILES!! PILES!!!
Not piles of Gold nor yet of Silver so much coveted by all men, but the bleeding, blind, or external Piles can be easily and speedily cured by the use of
WOOD'S SUB-POSITORY.
It is a preparation totally distinct from anything heretofore offered as a remedy for this painful and often fatal complaint. The Sub-Positury is neither a pill, powder, wash or salve, and yet it has proved to be a certain remedy for the Piles. Do not doubt this assertion, nor delay testing the truth of it if you are troubled with the Piles—you will not be deceived in it.
Sold wholesale and retail by W. NEWELL,
jul1 No. 530 Merchant street.

THE UNIVERSAL CLOTHES WRINGER!
WITH COG WHEELS.
BUY NO OTHER!
This Wringer is warranted in every particular. It was pronounced superior to all others at the World's Fair at London, in 1862, and has always taken the First Premium at every State and County Fair, when exhibited in competition with other machines.
No other Wringer has the cog-wheel, without which the rubber on the rolls will get torn, and the strain on the cloth is such as to wear it out.
A liberal discount made to dealers.
WM. FAULKNER & SONS, Agents,
je4 411 Clay street, San Francisco

COMMERCIAL STEAM PRINTING HOUSE.
FRANCIS, VALENTINE & CO.,
517 CLAY and 514 COMMERCIAL STREETS.
Every description of BOOK, JOB and POSTER PRINTING done in the best style and at the lowest rates.
BOOK-BINDING and RULING done to order.

STERETT'S
STEAM
PRINTING HOUSE,
533
CLAY STREET.

W. P. HARRISON & CO.,
PRINTERS,
ENGRAVERS AND ELECTROTYPERS,
PRINTERS' WAREHOUSE,
417 Clay Street. my28

NO HOME SHOULD BE WITHOUT
ONE OF
MASON & HAMLIN'S
Cabinet Organs.
The cost is trifling, while its good effects in the education and good training of a family are beyond computation.
DO NOT DELAY, but send for an Illustrated Catalogue at once.
Address,
A. KOHLER,
my28 Music Dealer, San Francisco.

J. R. MEAD & CO.,
HAVE OPENED WITH
AN ENTIRE NEW STOCK
OF
FINE CLOTHING!
AND
GENTS' FURNISHING GOODS.
Corner of Montgomery and Bush streets, San Francisco.
my28

BILLIARD TABLES.
NOTICE!
Phelan & Collender have sold all their stock and disposed of their business on this Coast to MATHEW E. HUGHES, who will in future have Billiard Tables with PHELAN'S PATENT IMPROVED COMBINATION CUSHIONS for sale in this market.
While returning thanks to the Public for the patronage bestowed upon them, Phelan & Collender desire to recommend Mr. HUGHES as their SUCCESSOR, to those desirous to provide themselves with Billiard Tables with Phelan's Unequalled Patent Cushions, which Mr. HUGHES will always be prepared to supply, as received direct from the undersigned, sole proprietors and manufacturers.
PHELAN & COLLENDER,
By GEORGE E. PHELAN, Attorney.
San Francisco, May 26, 1864.
Referring to the above, the undersigned takes pleasure in calling the attention of PRIVATE GENTLEMEN and SALOON KEEPERS to his fine stock of BILLIARD TABLES and CUSHIONS. Just received, an assortment of the
NEW STANDARD AMERICAN BILLIARD TABLES WITH PHELAN'S LATEST IMPROVED CUSHIONS.
These Tables have just been adopted by all the leading Professional as well as Amateur Players in the East—over Six Hundred having been sold to private families alone in the last nine months.
BILLIARD BALLS AND TRIMMINGS
Of all kinds on hand. Orders for Repairing of Tables, and everything in connection with the business, promptly attended to, at the Office, 724 and 726 Montgomery street, opposite the Metropolitan Theatre.
my28 M. E. HUGHES, Sole Agent.

REMOVAL.—DR. H. J. PAINE,
DENTIST,
No. 522 CALIFORNIA STREET,
Room No. 19, Second Floor,
BETWEEN MONTGOMERY AND KEARNY STREETS,
Four doors west of Wells, Fargo & Co.,
je4 San Francisco.

REDINGTON & CO.'S ESSENCE OF Jamaica Ginger!

This valuable compound, which is now regarded as one of the most popular remedies in the domestic practice for various complaints of the digestive organs, such as Dyspepsia, Nausea, etc., is prepared solely from the WHITE JAMAICA GINGER, which is the best of all the varieties in use. In the preparation of

REDINGTON & CO.'S

ESSENCE OF JAMAICA GINGER,

Great care is taken to have none but select Root, and to manufacture it in air-tight vessels, thus preventing the evaporation of its delicate essential oil, and preserving the true aroma of the Ginger. It thereby contains in its concentrated form all the valuable properties of the Jamaica Ginger, and is guaranteed to be free from any impurities whatever

It is a grateful stimulant and carminative, giving warmth and tone to the stomach equal to Brandy, without any of its injurious effects.

It will cure Nausea, caused by riding in railroad cars, or from sea-sickness, or other causes.

Miners and others who are exposed to the heat of the Sun often whilst working in cold water, should never be without

REDINGTON & CO.'s

ESSENCE OF JAMAICA GINGER,

As by taking it as a tonic two or three times a day, it is almost a sure preventive to Chills and Fever; and to those who are farming the rich bottom lands of California it is likewise invaluable as a tonic, and should invariably be taken in the early morning before going to the fields, at the mid-day lunch, and before leaving off work at night.

Ask for REDINGTON & CO.'S ESSENCE OF JAMAICA GINGER, and take no other, if you would always have a Pure and Reliable article.

An excellent external application for Gout, Rheumatism, Neuralgia, &c.

REDINGTON & CO., Proprietors,
416 and 418 Front street,
my28 San Francisco.

RAREY'S CONDITION POWDERS.

THE MOST POWERFUL AND BENEFICIAL AGENT known on the Stomach, Blood, Lungs and Bowels of

HORSES, MULES, CATTLE, AND STOCK

of all descriptions.

GREAT BENEFIT TO HARD-WORKING HORSES.

All diseased Stock SPEEDILY and CERTAINLY CURED; healthy Stock will be brought into the very HIGHEST STATE of PERFECTION by giving them a SPOONFULL, weekly.

NO LIVERY STABLE SHOULD BE WITHOUT

RAREY'S
CELEBRATED CONDITION POWDERS!

All FARMERS and RANCHMEN should use constantly

RAREY'S
CELEBRATED CONDITION POWDERS!

TEAMSTERS and STAGE COMPANIES everywhere should keep constantly on hand and freely use

RAREY'S
CELEBRATED CONDITION POWDERS!

They are equal to a Life Insurance on all Stock, as will be fully appreciated on trial by all True Economists.

REDINGTON & CO., Sole Agents,
my28 416 and 418 Front Street, San Francisco.

STOP THAT COUGHING.

Some of you can't and we pity you. You have tried every remedy but the ONE destined by its intrinsic merit to supercede all similar preparations. It is not surprising you should be reluctant to try something else after the many experiments you have made of the trashy compounds foisted on the public as a certain cure; but

NEWELL'S PULMONARY SYRUP.

It is really the best remedy ever compounded, for the cure of coughs, colds, sore throat, asthma, whooping cough, bronchitis, and consumption. Thousands of people in California have been already benefitted by the surprising curative powers of

NEWELL'S PULMONARY SYRUP,

And with one accord give it their unqualified approbation. We now address ourselves to all who are unacquainted with this, the greatest panacea of the age, for the healing of all diseases of the throat and lungs, assuring you that

NEWELL'S PULMONARY SYRUP

Has cured thousands, and it will cure you if you try it.

This invaluable medicine is pleasant to the taste; soothing, healing and strengthening in its effects; entirely free from all poisonous or deleterious drugs, and perfectly harmless under all circumstances. Among others it is indorsed by the following gentlemen, all of them well-known in San Francisco as respectable citizens: E. S. WOOLEY, grocer, 358 Stockton street; H. P. HUBBARD, merchant, Sansome street near Clay; Capt. DAVID VAN PELT; JAMES PRATT, at Harrison & Co., printers, Clay street, and hundreds of other residents in San Francisco.

REDINGTON & CO., Sole Agents, 416 and 418 Front street, San Francisco, and for sale by all Druggists. my28

FORTY-FOUR FIRST PREMIUMS IN 1863!

THERE IS BUT ONE
FIRST
PREMIUM SEWING MACHINE.

The GROVER & BAKER SEWING MACHINE has been awarded Twenty-three First Premiums at State Fairs, and Twenty-one at City and County Fairs, in 1863, making Forty-four in all.

R. G. BROWN, Agent.
my28 329 Montgomery Street.

WHEELER & WILSONS Family Sewing Machines.

OFFICE:

CORNER MONTGOMERY AND SACRAMENTO STREETS.

J. H. HAYDEN, Agent.

A full assortment of the best quality of MACHINE SILK and THREAD, for the TRADE, constantly on hand. my28

WHAT IS A CABINET ORGAN?

A NEW REED INSTRUMENT,

Made by

MASON & HAMLIN,

The famous Melodeon Manufacturers.

ASK

GOTTSCHALK,

MASON,

STRAKOSCH

Or any other eminent Musician.

They know what it is, having publicly acknowledged it to be the best instrument of the kind in the World.

Send for an Illustrated Catalogue,

To

A. KOHLER,
Music Dealer,
my28 San Francisco.

A. ROMAN & CO., BOOKSELLERS,

PUBLISHERS, IMPORTERS, Nos. 417 and 418 Montgomery street, desire to invite the special attention of the BOOK TRADE on the Pacific Coast to their superb and complete assortment of STANDARD AND MISCELLANEOUS BOOKS, embracing works in every department of Literature; also Medical, Military, Scientific, Theological and School Books of every description. Constantly in receipt of all the late publications by every steamer. Special inducements offered to LIBRARIES. All orders will be promptly filled, and upon the most reasonable terms—wholesale and retail.

A. ROMAN & CO.,
my28 San Francisco.

"KUSTEL'S PROCESSES OF SILVER AND GOLD EXTRACTION." — The January number of the "American Journal of Science and Arts" conducted by Professors Silliman and Dana—probably the best Scientific authority in our country—says of this valuable work: "The book is written and arranged with from by one who evidently understands his subject; and care, our examination of it, we should think it to be well adapted for the purpose for which it has been prepared."

Price—post paid—Cloth, $6; Sheep, $7.

A. ROMAN & Co.,
Booksellers, Importers and Publishers,
417 and 419 Montgomery street,
my28 San Francisco.

JONES, WOOLL & SUTHERLAND,

Manufacturers for the Trade

OF

SQUARE, OVAL AND ARCH-TOP MIRRORS, WINDOW CORNICES, AND PIER TABLES,
Of any Size or Pattern.

PORTRAIT AND PICTURE FRAMES
Of all Styles.

IMPORTERS OF

Fine Engravings and Artists' Materials.

312 MONTGOMERY STREET.

FACTORY—Market street, between Seventh and Eighth, opposite Yerba Buena Park. my28

REMOVAL.

HASKELL & CO.,

CANTON TEA STORE. | ESTABLISHED IN 1858.

Wholesale and Retail Dealers in

JAPAN AND CHINA TEAS, AND GROCERIES,

515 Market street,

And 15 Sutter street, three doors below Metropolitan Market, between Montgomery and Sansome streets.

It is the LARGEST STORE OF THE KIND in San Francisco my28

REMOVAL.

J. K. PRIOR,

Importer and Dealer in

GAS FIXTURES AND PLUMBING MATERIALS,

Has removed to 730 MONTGOMERY STREET, near Jackson, opposite Metropolitan Theatre. Just received, an extensive assortment of plain and ornamental Gas Fixtures, of entire new patterns. Being constantly in receipt of new goods by every steamer, the attention of the public is invited.

FOR SALE:

IRON PIPE, | LEAD PIPE,
SHEET LEAD, | SHEET ZINC,

As low as any importing house in the State. my28

LAWRENCE & HOUSEWORTH,

OPTICIANS,

IMPORTERS OF OPTICAL, MATHEMATICAL AND PHILOSOPHICAL INSTRUMENTS,

STEREOSCOPIC GOODS,

PHOTOGRAPHIC ALBUMS,

CARTES DE VISITE,

AND

JOSEPH RODGERS & SON'S

SUPERIOR CUTLERY,

No. 637 CLAY STREET,

SAN FRANCISCO,

(ESTABLISHED IN 1851,)

HAVE FOR SALE THE LARGEST STOCK ON THE PACIFIC COAST, consisting in part as follows:

720 dozen SPECTACLES, in Gold, Silver, Steel and Plated Frames.
305 dozen EYE GLASSES, in Gold, Silver, Steel, Horn, Shell and Rubber Frames.
150 dozen WIRE GAUZE GOGGLES.
300 dozen SPECTACLE GLASSES and BRAZILIAN PEBBLES.
350 dozen SPECTACLE and EYE GLASS CASES.

395 Opera and Marine Glasses.	20,500 Card Photographs,
75 Telescope and Spy Glasses,	Photographic Albums,
178 dozen Magnifying Glasses,	600 Album Pictures—in oil colors,
80 doz. Pocket Compasses,	50 doz. Union Card Frames,
325 Hand Stereoscopes,	Joseph Rodgers & Son's CUTLERY,
74 Revolving Stereoscopes	100 doz. Table Knives,
1025 doz. Stereoscopic Views	260 doz. Pocket Knives,
Drawing Instruments in German Silver and Brass,	120 doz. Razors,
Boxwood and Ivory Scales,	50 doz. Razor Strops,
Microscopes in every Style,	130 doz. Scissors,
25 Magnetic Machines for Medical purposes,	SCISSORS, in Cases,
Aneroid Barometers,	100 doz. Gyroscope Tops,
	169 doz. Thermometers,
	25 doz. Hydrometers,
	Galvanic Batteries.

☞ COUNTRY TRADERS will consult their own interest by examining our Stock and Prices before purchasing elsewhere.

 ORDERS FROM THE COUNTRY promptly executed.

☞ CATALOGUES sent to any address FREE.

Address

LAWRENCE & HOUSEWORTH,
OPTICIANS,
637 CLAY STREET,
my28 SAN FRANCISCO.

PACIFIC INSURANCE COMPANY.

436 CALIFORNIA STREET,

SAN FRANCISCO.

Insure against loss or damage by fire, on Buildings, Merchandise, Wares, and other Personal Property.

CAPITAL STOCK - - - - - - - - $750,000

The largest sum at present to be taken on any one risk is $30,000. All Losses payable in United States Gold Coin.

The Personal Liability of Stockholders, under the Law of this State, recognized.

The following List of Directors is a sufficient guarantee of the stability and responsibility of the Company:

Louis McLean,	Lloyd Tevis,
W. C. Ralston,	H. F. Teschemacher,
Frederick Billings,	Geo. H Howard,
H. Carlton, Jr.,	A.B. Forbes,
Wm. M. Lent,	A. L. Tubbs,
J. G. Kittle,	Jonathan Hunt,
J. B. Thomas,	J. B. Newton,
J. G. Bray,	John O. Earl,
Asa T. Lawton,	S. J. Hensley,
J. Whitney, Jr.,	John Wightman,
Edward Martin,	L. Sachs,
L. B. Benchly,	Jas. DeFremery,
A. Seligman,	J. G. Kellogg,
Wm. Sherman,	G. W. Beaver,
Wm. Alvord,	Elie Lazard,
Charles Mayne,	William Sharon,
Erwin Davis,	Adam Grant,
P. L. Weaver,	Alpheus Bull,
Samuel C. Bigelow,	A. G. Stiles,
Herman Michels,	M. P. Jones,
H. L Dodge,	D. Stern,
H. L. Goldstein,	S. M. Wilson,
H. Haussmann,	D. J. Oliver,
Morton Cheesman,	Jahez Howes,
H. M. Newhall,	F. W. Brooks,
W. Norris,	I. Lohman, Sacramento.
Edgar Mills, Sacramento.	T. R Anthony, Stockton.
C. T. Wheeler, Sacramento.	D. W. C. Rice, Marysville.
J. H Jewett, Marysville.	W. S. Ladd, Portland (O.)
J. C. Ainsworth, Portland (O.)

A. J. RALSTON, Secretary. J. HUNT, President.
my28

BOYS! BOYS! BOYS!

NOW IS THE TIME!

H. M. LOCKWOOD & CO.,

New No. 624) CLAY STREET, (Old No. 176

Have received a Large Stock of

GENTS' AND BOYS' CLOTHING

—AND—

FURNISHING GOODS,

Which they are selling

AT VERY LOW PRICES.

Every Garment warranted. All are invited to call and examine our goods.

H. M. LOCKWOOD & CO.,
my28 624 Clay street, San Francisco.

GREAT TRIUMPH!!

STEINWAY & SONS

Were awarded the FIRST PRIZE MEDAL at the late great INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITION AT LONDON, over the two hundred and sixty-nine Pianos entered for competition from all parts of the world.

The Special Correspondent of the New York Times says: "Messrs. Steinway & Sons' indorsement by the Jurors is emphatic, and stronger and more to the point than that of any European maker."

A constant supply of the above superior instruments can be found at the Agent's,

M. GRAY, 613 Clay street.

PIANO TUNING done by a first-class Workman, from Steinway & Son's Factory, New York. my28

CARPETS, OIL CLOTHS,

UPHOLSTERY GOODS,

PAPER HANGINGS.

THE LARGEST

—AND—

BEST ASSORTED STOCK IN THE STATE,

And everything to be found in a well-conducted

Carpet Warehouse,

For Sale at the Lowest Rates.

WM. M. HIXON'S

CARPET WAREHOUSE,

NOS. 606 AND 608 CLAY STREET.

One Door above Montgomery street. my28

THE MOST EXTENSIVE,

BEST SELECTED, CHEAPEST,

—AND—

LATEST STYLES

—OF—

Furniture.

GOODWIN & CO.,

No. 528 Washington street,

Are constantly receiving, and have on hand a large assortment of FINE ROSEWOOD, MAHOGANY, and BLACK WALNUT PARLOR, LIBRARY and CHAMBER SUITS, with DINING ROOM SUITS TO ORDER.

☞ We guarantee both Price and Quality satisfactory to our Patrons.

GOODWIN & CO.,
jul8 No. 528 Washington street.

FEET! FEET! FEET!

Listen all ye that deal in feet and are barefooted!

GOOD TIMES COME AT LAST!

No Assessments to Pay, but Dividends Secured at Once!

FOR SIXTY DAYS

We will dispose of our IMMENSE STOCK

AT UNPRECEDENTED LOW PRICES.

We have in store and arriving, upwards of

$150,000 WORTH

OF

BOOTS, SHOES AND GAITERS,

Which we are determined to give the public, and all our customers, for cash,

25 PER CENT. BELOW NEW YORK COST.

5,000 PAIRS LADIES' BUTTON, LACE AND CONGRESS GAITERS,

Suitable for House Shoes, Regardless of any Cost,

ON ACCOUNT OF HIGH PREMIUM ON GOLD.

We solicit a call to convince, then send along your friends, to the largest RETAIL SHOE STORE in the State.

HOLCOMBE BROTHERS,

PIONEER SHOE STORE,
Corner Washington and Kearny streets.
my28

DR. CHARLES E. ZOAH,

OFFICE, No. 621 CALIFORNIA STREET,
Between Dupont and Kearny, South side, San Francisco.

A CURE WITHOUT THE USE OF MEDICINE.

NO PAIN GIVEN.

Dr. ZOAH will cure without the use of medicine. His treatment of the following diseases is short, decisive and pleasant. Entire satisfaction given in every case.

Rheumatism, Neuralgia, Pleurisy, Dyspepsia, Lumbago, Sore Throat, and all Spinal Complaints; the most violent Toothache, Headache or Earache cured in a few seconds!

All pains or aches, no matter where located, can be removed in a short time, and charges reasonable. The poor unfortunate cured without price.

The Doctor's mode of treatment is the oldest science known for the treatment of diseases afflicting the human body, and at present is practised very extensively in the East with every success.

Dr. ZOAH will be in attendance at all hours, day and evening, at his office, 621 California street.

All letters strictly attended to. Consultations fr

jul8

THE BANK OF CALIFORNIA.

Incorporated under the Laws of the State.

PAID UP IN GOLD COIN.

CAPITAL STOCK.....$2,000,000,

With the privilege of increasing to $5,000,000.

STOCKHOLDERS.

San Francisco.

D. O. Mills,
Wm. C. Ralston,
R. S. Fretz,
J. B. Thomas,
Louis McLane,
Asa T. Lawton,
Wm. E. Barron,
Thomas Bell,
John O. Earl,
Wm. Norris,
J. Whitney, jr.
O. F. Giffin,
A. J. Pope,
Herman Michels,
Frederick Billings,
Geo. H. Howard,
H. F. Teschemacher,
A. Hayward,
Moses Ellis,
A. B. McCreary,
R. M. Jessup,
Samuel Knight,
A. C. Henry,
J. C. Wilmerding,
Wm. Alvord.

Portland, Oregon.

Jacob Kamm.

D. O. MILLS, - - - - President,

R. C. RALSTON, Cashier.

Correspondents in New York, LEES & WALLER, No. 33 Pine street.

Correspondent in London, BANK OF LONDON.

THE UNDERSIGNED GIVE NOTICE THAT THE above named corporation has been organized for the purpose of carrying on the Banking and Exchange business in all its branches, in this city and with the interior of this State, the neighboring State and Territories, and with Mexico; also with the Atlantic cities, Europe, China and the East Indies, for which they are provided with ample facilities, and in conformity with articles of association will commence operations on the 5th day of July next, at the Banking House now occupied by Donohoe, Ralston & Co., corner of Washington and Battery streets.

With the view of giving to the business of the corporation all the efficiency and promptitude of a private banking firm, together with that confidential seclusion of private business matters so generally desired, the immediate management of its affairs is committed exclusively to D. O. Mills and William C. Ralston, as President and Cashier, respectively, to whom, or either of them, the customers of the Bank will apply in all business matters. The regular meetings of the Board of Trustees will take place monthly.

The undersigned deem it advisable to call particular attention to the following peculiarities of their organization, which are positively binding on all its members:

First—Sales of its capital stock can be effected only after due appraisement by stockholders selected for that special purpose; and the Trustees of the corporation have, in all cases, the right to become purchasers of the stock appraised at the appraisement, for the benefit of the remaining stockholders. This restriction is printed upon each certificate of stock.

Second—Loans cannot be made to stockholders, except upon collaterals other than their shares in the capital stock of this bank.

TRUSTEES.

D. O. Mills,
Louis McLane,
Wm. Norris,
Jno. O. Earl,
Herman Michels,
W. C. Ralston,
J. B. Thomas,
Thomas Bell,
A. J. Pope,
O. F. Giffin,
James Whitney, jr.

San Francisco, June 18th, 1864. ju25-1m

MANHATTAN FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY OF NEW YORK.

Cash Capital and Surplus.....$750,000
Deposit in San Francisco.....$75,000

COLUMBIA FIRE INSURANCE CO., OF NEW YORK.

Cash Capital and Surplus.....$600,000
Deposit in San Francisco.....$75,000

THE ABOVE MENTIONED WELL-KNOWN and responsible Companies, having complied with the law enacted at the last session of the Legislature, and deposited with Messrs. Donohoe, Ralston & Co.

$75,000 EACH,

As additional security to Policy-holders, will continue to insure

BUILDINGS,
MERCHANDISE,
FURNITURE,

And other property in California, Oregon and Nevada Territory, against Loss or Damage by Fire, upon the most favorable terms.

All Losses promptly paid in United States Gold Coin.

R. B. SWAIN & CO., Agents,
ju25-tf 206 Front street, corner of California.

CONTINENTAL HOTEL,

SAN JOSE.

GEORGE T. BROMLEY.....Proprietor.

As a desirable place of resort for health or recreation, the above Hotel is not surpassed in the State.

Excellent accommodations for families, by the day, week, or month, on reasonable terms.

ju25

NOTICE TO CREDITORS.—Estate of JAMES A. MOORE, deceased.

Notice is hereby given by the undersigned, Executors of the above named estate, to the creditors of and all persons having claims against JAMES A. MOORE, deceased, to exhibit the same with the necessary vouchers, within ten months from the first publication of this notice, to the undersigned at the office of Delany & Booraem, 519 Montgomery street, in the city of San Francisco.

EUGENE O'CALLAGHAN,
MICHAEL McGRATH,
Executors of the Estate of JAMES A. MOORE, deceased

Dated, San Francisco, June 22d, 1864. ju25-5t

WANTED—The Dashaway Employment Office, 513 Kearney street, near California, can supply families, hotels, restaurants, farmers, ships, steamers and coasters with every description of male and female help, free of charge. Orders from the country for women must be accompanied with their passage money, as hundreds of poor girls are unable to pay their own passage. Orders promptly filled at the Dashaway Employment Office. ju11

METROPOLITAN THEATRE.

Montgomery street.

Under the Joint Management of
JULIA DEAN HAYNE AND ANNETTE INCE.

JULIA DEAN HAYNE,
MISS ANNETTE INCE,
MRS. EMILY JORDAN,
MR. J. H. TAYLOR,
MR. HARRY COURTAINE,
MR. FRANK LAWLOR.

AFTERNOON PERFORMANCE TO-DAY AT 2 P. M., AT HALF-PRICES.

A SPLENDID BILL FOR

THIS AFTERNOON AND EVENING, JUNE 25,

Boucicault's great Play of

THE POPE OF ROME,

With the following immense cast:

The Countess Colonna.....Julia Dean Hayne
Bianca Colonna.....Miss Annette Ince
Sister Moneyne.....Mrs. E. F. Stewart
Hugo.....J. H. Taylor
Adrian Paretti.....Frank Lawlor
Cardinal Moutalto.....W. M. Leman
Fabio.....E. N. Thayer
Loreuzo.....F. Percy
Antonio.....R. G. Marsh
Bebbo.....R. F. Reueux

Dress Circle and Orchestra.....$1
Parquette.....50 cents
Gallery.....25 cents
Private Boxes.....$5 and $10

Doors open at 7 o'clock. Performance commences at 8 o'clock.

MAGUIRE'S OPERA HOUSE.

T. MAGUIRE - - - - - - - PROPRIETOR.
C. L. GRAVES - - - - - - STAGE MANAGER.
W. STEVENSON - - - - - - TREASURER.

AFTERNOON PERFORMANCE TO-DAY,

FOR LADIES AND CHILDREN,

At HALF PRICES,

Commencing at 2 o'clock,

The Grand Operatic Spectacle of

SATANELLA,

SATURDAY EVENING, JUNE 25TH,

ENGAGEMENT OF THE CELEBRATED ACTOR,

MR. CHARLES WHEATLEIGH,

SUPPORTED BY

MR. CHARLES POPE,

And the Full Strength of the Legitimate Company.

First Presentation of the 2-Act Comedy of the BULL IN A CHINA SHOP.

Bagshot.....Mr. Charles Wheatleigh
Bellamy Brownjohn.....Mr. W. O'Neil
Flitter.....Mr. C. R. Thorne, Jr
Piper.....Mr. W. Barry
Arabella.....Mrs. H. A. Perry

Previous to which the Popular Domestic Drama of

RACHEL, THE REAPER.

Corporal Patrick.....Mr. Charles Wheatleigh
Robert Hathorn.....Mr. Charles Pope
Richard Hickman.....Mr. C. R. Thorne, Jr
Rachel, the Reaper.....Mrs. Sophie Edwin
Rose Mayfield.....Mrs. H. A. Perry

PRICES OF ADMISSION—Dress Circle and Orchestra Seats $1; Parquet 50c.; Gallery 25c.

Doors open at 7 o'clock. Performances will commence at a quarter before 8. ju25

WILSON & ZOYARA'S Great Circus!

THIS MAMMOTH NEW HIPPOTHEATRON

Will exhibit throughout

THE INTERIOR OF THE STATE

During the present season.

Performances will be given during the coming week at

SACRAMENTO CITY.

THE NEW AND SPLENDID COMPANY, brought by Mr. Wilson from New York and Havana at immense cost, have a world-wide reputation, enabling the management to produce all the ELEGANT, SENSATIONAL, THRILLING, COMIC, and ENTERTAINING NOVELTIES OF THE DAY. At the head of the Equestrian Department is the world-renowned

ELLA ZOYARA,
MLLE. ELOUISE,

And a number of elegant and daring Riders, whilst

MESSRS. ROSS AND CARLO
Head the Acrobatic Corps;

MESSRS. DURAND AND PAINTER
The Gymnastic;

MESSRS. AYMAR AND WILLIAMS
The Comic Department.

The Ring is under the supervision of MR VINCENT; with TRAINED and PERFORMING HORSES, PONIES and MULES—being the most complete Company that has ever appeared in the State.

KIDD'S CELEBRATED BRASS BAND accompanies the entertainment. WILSON & ZOYARA, Proprietors.

MARKET STREET RAILROAD.

CHANGE OF TIME TABLE.

ON AND AFTER APRIL 1, 1864, Trains will start from the City and the Mission as follows:

Between the hours of 8:20 A. M. and 6 P. M., every 40 minutes, instead of, as heretofore, every 30 minutes, thus

FROM THE MISSION.

9:40 10:20 11:00 11:40

FROM THE CITY.

10:00 10:40 11:20 12:00

And so on till 6 o'clock.

Before 9 A. M. and after 6 P. M., the running will be the same as before.

my28 F. McCOPPIN, Superintendent.

MAGUIRE'S ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

THOMAS MAGUIRE begs leave respectfully to announce a short season of

Italian Opera,

To be inaugurated at this establishment, on

MONDAY EVENING NEXT, JUNE 27TH,

During which the most popular works of the day will be presented, in order to display as effectually as possible the admirable powers of

MISS CAROLINE RICHINGS.

This eminent Artiste, whose delineations in the Italian and English Lyric Drama have, since her debut in this city, achieved a truly brilliant triumph, will be supported by the established favorites,

SIGNORA BIANCHI,
MADAME SIMONSEN,
SIGNOR BIANCHI,
MR. JOHN GREGG,
SIGNOR RONCOVIERI,
MONS. CHARLES,

And by a powerful Orchestral and Choral Department, under the immediate direction of MR. GEORGE EVANS. The proprietor also feels much pleasure in announcing that

MR. PETER RICHINGS,

A time-worn and popular Manager of many Theatres in the East, has, at his solicitation, and with a view to carry out his policy, undertaken the management. The first Opera selected for the occasion is Donizetti's

LUCIA DI LAMMERMOOR!

Opera nights of the ensuing week will be MONDAY, THURSDAY and SATURDAY.

WEDNESDAY—Complimentary Matinee to MISS CAROLINE RICHINGS.

Box Office will be open on SATURDAY MORNING, at 10 o'clock, for the sale of Reserved Seats. ju25

GILBERT'S MUSEUM,

Market street, opposite Second street, over the Occidental Market.

F. GILBERT - - - - - - - - Proprietor
J. M. HUDSON - - - - - - Superintendent

OPEN EVERY DAY AND EVENING.

THE LIGHTNING CALCULATOR!

THE GIANT BOY,

Eighteen years old, and eight feet in Height!

THE MUSICAL ANOMALY, THE TYROLEAN WARBLER,

Whose remarkable skill in performing upon THREE WIND INSTRUMENTS AT ONCE, and whose wonderful conversion of a common COFFEE POT into a fountain of harmony, have astounded all who have seen him.

THE GREAT CEROPLASTIC

GROUP OF LIFE-LIKE FIGURES.

THE LITTLE NORTH CAROLINA SLAVE,

The smallest woman in the world,

And upwards of two thousand Curiosities.

Also, a beautiful set of Cosmoramic Views, illustrating the PRINCIPAL CITIES OF AMERICA. There is also an Aquaria Garden attached to the Museum.

The admission to the entire Exhibition is only 25 cents; Children 15 cents. ju11-tf

HEALTH AND AMUSEMENT, COMBINED!

C. J. ROBINSON'S SELECT CLASSES,

In Dr. Dio Lewis's System of

LIGHT GYMNASTICS!

At MISS ALDRICH'S ACADEMY, Stevenson street,

Near corner of Market and Second streets, San Francisco,

For Scientific Physical Training and Recreative Exercise, in classes, by persons of all ages and conditions of health, and by both sexes, with light and movable apparatus, and an invariable and appropriate musical accompaniment. While the Exercises of the Light Gymnastics impart strength, grace, activity and symmetry to the person, they at the same time furnish an exhaustless fund of social enjoyment and mental recreation.

Mr. ROBINSON has recently been employed to teach this system in all the public schools of this city.

CLASSES FOR LADIES AND GENTLEMEN meet on Mondays and Thursdays at 8 P. M. For Ladies, Lads and Misses, on Tuesdays and Fridays at 4 P. M. For admission or further information, apply at the Academy.

Mr. ROBINSON will give instruction, on application to classes and private pupils, in VOCAL CULTURE and ELOCUTION, as taught by the best masters in the East.

ju11-1m

SUMMER ARRANGEMENT.

BETWEEN SANTA CLARA, SAN JOSE, WARM SPRINGS AND SAN FRANCISCO.

THROUGH IN THREE HOURS!

The Swift and Elegant Steamer

SOPHIE McLANE,

CHARLES THORN, - - - - - - - Captain.

Having been placed in perfect order, and furnished with new boilers, commenced making regular daily trips (Sundays excepted) on TUESDAY, June 14th, 1864.

Leaving San Jose and Santa Clara at 7 o'clock, A. M. Returning, leave San Francisco at 3 o'clock, P. M. On arrival of the steamer at Alviso, Stages will be in readiness to convey passengers to

WARM SPRINGS.

Fare to Alviso, Santa Clara and San Jose.....$1 00
Freight to Alviso, per ton..... 50
Wheat and Flour, do., per ton..... 1 00
Fruit, at reduced rates.

ju18 J. WHITNEY, Jr.

WM. SHEW'S PHOTOGRAPHIC GALLERY!

☞ IS NOT REMOVED! ☜

As many persons have erroneously supposed, but remains at the same place where it has been all the time for the last eight years,

NO. 423 MONTGOMERY STREET,

And is the best place in the world to obtain a good likeness and a durable picture. my28

AUSTIN & SCHMITT, Importers and Dealers in

FRENCH, ENGLISH AND DOMESTIC DRY GOODS,

Offer for sale the best assortment of the above goods to be found in the city, consisting in part of

SILKS,
SHAWLS,
MANTILLAS,
LACES,
DRESS GOODS,

Of every description. Best quality of

MOURNING GOODS,
HOSIERY,
EMBROIDERIES,

Together with a complete assortment of

HOUSEKEEPING GOODS.

247 Montgomery street,
Between Sacramento and California streets.

NEW BOOKS.

FOR SALE BY

A. Roman & Co.,

417 and 419 MONTGOMERY STREET,

SAN FRANCISCO.

Discovery of the Source of the Nile, by Capt. Speke.
The Small House at Allington, by Anthony Trollope.
The National Almanac for 1864.
The Annual of Scientific Discovery for 1864.
Family Pride, by the author of "Pique."
Woman's Ransom, by F. W. Robinson.
America and Her Commentators, by Henry T. Tuckerman.
Man and Nature, by George P. Marsh.
Woman and her Era, by Mrs. Farnham.
Renan's Religious History and Criticism.
European Mosaic, by Howard Payson Arnold.
Marshall's Christian Missions.
Father Mathew, by J. F. Maguire, M. P.
Vigor. A Novel, by Washington Bartlett, clerk.
Counsel and Comfort, by "The Country Parson."
Life and Correspondence of Theodore Parker, by Weiss.
Gen. Butler in New Orleans, by Parton.
The Campaner, Thal, etc., by Jean Paul Richter.
Industrial Biography, by Samuel Smiles.
Ten Acres Enough.
Robertson's Sermons, Volume V.
Mainstone's Housekeeper. An English story.
The Federalist, (new edition,) by Hamilton.

A full and well-assorted stock of BOOKS in every department of Literature and Science always on hand.

☞ New Publications received by every steamer.

BOOKS IMPORTED TO ORDER

On the shortest notice.

Call and examine our stock and replenish your libraries cheaper than you can at any other establishment on this Coast.

jn18 A. ROMAN & CO.

SAN FRANCISCO AND SAN JOSE RAILROAD.

CHANGE OF TIME.

On and after MARCH 1st, 1864, Trains will leave the Depot on Brannan street, between Third and Fourth, for San Jose and Way Stations, as follows:-

Leave San Francisco at 8 A. M. and 4:30 P. M.
Leave San Jose at 7:30 A. M. and 4 P. M.

SUNDAYS.

On Sundays, Three Trains will be run, as follows:

Leave San Francisco at 8 1-2 and 10 1-2 A. M., and 4 1-2 P. M.
Leave San Jose at 8 A. M. and 4 and 7 P. M.

Passengers can reach the Depot by either the Third or Fourth street lines of city cars.

A. H. HOUSTON,
my28 General Superintendent.

FOURTH OF JULY.

THE UNDERSIGNED, having been named by the General Committee selected at the late meeting of the citizens of San Francisco as Grand Marshal of the day for the approaching Anniversary of our National Independence, respectfully notifies all civic and military organizations of this city and its neighborhood, of the strong desire entertained by that Committee that each and all of them should, in fullest strength, take part in the pageant of the day. It is earnestly hoped, therefore, that every Company and Association will join heartily in the effort to make the coming celebration one worthy its great occasion.

In due time special invitations will be sent to all here notified—this advertisement being intended principally to give them ample time for preparation.

B. A. SHELDON,
je18 Grand Marshal.

The California.

"SURELY THERE IS A VEIN FOR THE SILVER AND A PLACE FOR GOLD WHERE THEY FINE IT."

VOL. I.--NO. 6. SAN FRANCISCO, JULY 2, 1864. TERMS { $5 a Year, by Mail, in Advance. 50 Cents a Month, by Carrier.

"TONGUES IN TREES."

I.

The garden blossoming, the busy leaves,
The Indian palm that when transplanted grieves
For its far home, wherever it may be,
Each, all, a kind of whispered fancy weaves
As very beautiful, as songs to me.

II.

I call the fruited bough a song
That graceful quivereth in metre,
I call the fruited bough a song—
I cannot think a poem sweeter—
When glossy leaves laugh all along
The mossy limbs, and butterflies
Are gathered in a twinkling throng,
That dazzles all our charmèd eyes,
As crimson-dappled golden wings
In merry sunlight flutterings
Flash forth their splendor to the skies.
Here music is that never dies,
Sweet echo whene'er you greet her,
To warble back—in all surprise
That you should seek a song completer.

III.

I call the fruited bough a song,
Where peaches cling with velvet lips
Through all the summer sunlight long,
With clotted nectar on their tips,
To clustered branches fair and sleek
And swaying in the breath of morn,
Warm in the summer light, and each
And every bloom of every peach
Is nursed in odors summer-born,
So clinging ruddy cheek to cheek,
A fairer rhyming would you seek,
Or search a choicer, rarer sight,
Than mated peaches cheek to cheek
Slow ripening in the rosy light?

IV.

And every dewy-leavèd vine
And every waving hough fruit-laden,
To me doth seem to laugh or pine
With joys or sorrows that combine
A little breathed song of Aden,
Low whispered at the day's decline.

THINGS.

San Francisco, Saturday, July 2d, 1864.

FACES about town look brighter than they did this time last week. The missing steamer is in, and people have ceased to stand with bated breath, anxious for news, and yet dreading that it would bring them intelligence of a disaster.

The Golden Age and Golden City steamed through the Golden Gate on Wednesday afternoon, gladdening all hearts, as though they came fully freighted with mothers' blessings.

What a terrible thing it would have been had our worst fears been realized. and the Golden Age indeed been lost. The whole coast would have been wearing crape now, and this jolly city would have been a Rama.

They say there were 1,200 souls on tho steamer. I don't believe it. There may have been that number of passengers aboard; but I notice that very few people bring their souls with them when they come to California. It is sufficient to be bothered with baggage on the trip, and as for souls, people get along much better out here without them. Just at present mine is packed away with my umbrella; perhaps I shall get them both out when the rainy season sets in.

When it was first bruited about that the Golden Age was missing, I thought people meant the drop-curtain at the Academy of Music. It occurred to me that some one connected with the theatre must have gone to Rome and taken the drop-curtain with him. It would draw well there. The lamb lying down with the lion, and not inside of him, and the tiger eating farina puddings as relishingly as a Frenchman does frogs, all this would surprise and please the dark-browed people of Italy mightily.

People have been rather severe on the picture in this country—more severe, I think, than connoisseurs would be in Italy. It certainly has some merit; one can see with half an eye that the chariot is well drawn, and the merest novice in art could tell the unicorn by the horn on his nose. But then it must be remembered that our people don't go much on the Golden Age—a Gould and Curry age is the only age they care to hold or attain: it fills the bill much better.

Speaking of things in general, it perhaps is not generally known that the steamer that came in on Wednesday was loaded down to the water's edge with generals. She had three aboard—General McDowell, General Mowry and General Butterworth.

The first is a Major-General, the two latter are Miner Generals.

General McDowell came out to take command of the Military Department of the Pacific—the most pacific military department probably that can be found in the world. It is said that in his proclamation to the people he will congratulate them on having one good and reliable journal among them, and that in his first general order he will make it imperative that they subscribe to The Californian.

General Mowry has command of the Department of Arizona, where he and General Carleton are actively engaged in mining operations. They have been working a mine in company there for the past two years, but unfortunately there is not that unity of feeling between them which contributes so materially to business success where two or more parties are interested.

General Butterworth is to have charge of the Apaches. He likes that primitive people, a natural result perhaps of spending some time among them. He had an excellent opportunity of observing their customs and habits, for he saw them from a tree. He thinks that harsh measures should not be used with savages, and intends to try moral suasion on them. His book, The Apaches and their Surroundings, with Thoughts on Trees, published in Durango last winter, had a great run down there, and established the author's reputation, though there are very few copies of it now in the market.

General McDowell was disturbed by a serenade about 12 o'clock on the night of his arrival; I having subscribed with others to buy a band for the occasion.

The affair passed off pleasantly enough; he came down from his room and was introduced to Wambold and several other distinguished gentlemen and influential citizens—people's party men, mostly—who had gathered on the sidewalk in the expectation that there would be some drinking done!

And their prophetic souls did not deceive them.

The General politely invited the band to take a glass of wine with him, and they at once stopped playing, and put up their instruments. Arrived in the saloon, he must have been considerably surprised at the number of performers he saw before him, for the room was full. There were more men than music, and not a teetotaller among them. This was rough in a country where drinks are two bits each, and greenbacks are only taken at a half off. For less than half tho sum that serenade cost him, the General could have hired Mr. Bianchi and Signor Gregg—the whole opera troupe, in fact—and had a private entertainment of his own.

Wait till a small hand calliope, which is now making at the Vulcan Foundry for me, comes out here, and see if I don't then give my friends a signal proof of my es-steam. It will be music both for the mill and the million.

At present I labor under considerable difficulties in my serenades. Brass bands are played out since the Golden Age came in. So I am compelled to employ a man with a barrel organ—one would think it to be a double-barrel organ by tho noise it makes.

He grinds a "powerful sight" of music out of the thing, though. Like the mill of the gods, he "grinds slowly but exceedingly fine." In some respects, that instrument of his reminds one of the new "organ" of the Union party. It is not quite as unmusical, perhaps, but then it has as little regard for time and place as they have, and knows as little of what it is grinding about as they do. It does not aim to make quite as much discord in the city, but it succeeds in producing enough to disgust all who have any idea of harmony or decency.

The proprietor solicits quarters from the charitable, and people pay him to go away from their windows and leave them alone. By grinding away outside of a house where an entertainment is being given, he can claim to be the "organ of the party"—there is little in fact that he cannot do, except to compel a recognition of himself or his organ by the regular orchestra, or buy the wires of the Overland Telegraph on credit. . . .

I sometimes wonder whether we are to have a reproduction on this coast of the state of things which obtained in London during the Lord George Gordon riots, when, unless a man chalked "No Popery" on his door his house was stripped by one mob, while the next one that turned the corner would make the mark a pretext for tearing the house down, so that at last a man's best safety lay in chalking "No religion at all" on his doors. And I wonder how long this black-mailing ery of "You're a copperhead!" is to be permitted to go on.

The other day some man whom I never saw, do not know, and would not know for any consideration in the world, plastered me as a copperhead.

I had rather be a copperhead any day in the week than a mutton head; but I sincerely hope I am neither.

A Northern man, I should hold myself a renegade if I went back on the North by so much as a hair's line. My record is pretty well established by a long connection with loyal journals, and if ever an article fell from my pen that had not the ring of honesty and loyalty, it was the steel's fault—not mine.

At this late hour, am I to be put on trial for loyalty, to be howled at as a Copperhead, and villified as a traitor?

It is very funny, to say the least of it, not worth minding much, to make the most of it.

But I cannot help wondering how long the community will allow this sort of thing to go on, and hundreds of such sentences to be passed by a man who could not parse one correctly. . . .

The cause of the fall in Gould and Curry has been satisfactorily explained. Deep down in the lower tunnel, several hundred feet below where Mr. Lent and the ladies of his party—making diving-belles of themselves for the moment—dove down, they struck what is technically termed a "horse." (One of the ladies says she didn't see it, from which I infer that it could not have been a saw-horse.)

According to the most reliable information it was a green-bay horse.

On coming to its back the prospectors at once concluded they had struck a ledge of green-backs, and left the place in disgust. The miners didn't even stay to take their pick of it.

They have got through the horse now, and the blame of the depreciation in the stock must be saddled elsewhere. Why it keeps down in this way is the more strange from the fact that I don't own an inch of it.

Of Potosi, a stock in which I'm slightly interested, I scarcely know what to think. Had I been wise I'd have kept out of the speculation; an omen gave me fair warning enough when I first thought of buying in.

I had some money to invest on first landing here, and determined to invest it in Washoe. My friends advised me to. They told me there was more room for investment there than in all the rest of the country—that in fact there wasn't room for anything else—that one could keep investing money there forever, and it took all the trouble of taking care of it off his hands.

I make it a principle of my life, on no account whatever to invest money in a mine unless I first see it. True, I know nothing at all about a mine when I do see it; in proof of which it is sufficient to say that during my visit to Washoe they showed me a Rutabaga turnip and told mo it was a remarkably fine outcropping of the Comstock Ledge. I swallowed it. Had they called it a specimen from the Cowstock Ledge I should have still failed to see the sell.

Previous to going to Washoe, besides making my will—something which it is necessary for every traveller to make before going there—I also made a memorandum of all the mines I thought of buying interests in and which it was necessary to visit. I had written down in a hurried way: Be sure you go to Pot.—Pot, you must understand, was simply short for Potosi.

I did go to pot, and that is where every one will eventually go who thinks that he can tell anything about a mine before he sees it, or buys into it after he does.

Ah, the explosion of all these mines during the past week Talk of magnificent Hoisting works, but, Lord defend us! how they have hoisted Injoo.

THE COUNTESS DIANA.

[TRANSLATED FROM THE FRENCH OF MARIO UCHARD.]

VIII.

ALTHOUGH nothing apparently was changed in our course of life, I was not slow to regret the too complete success of my deception. I soon remarked a slight cloud of reserve in the manners of my godmother. The testimonies of her friendship, formerly so unreserved, seemed, thenceforth, efforts. I saw myself fallen from my Paradise. I could not deceive myself as to the cause of this sudden coldness, and I remained cast to the earth, the victim of my own deceit. Alas! it was too late to retrace my steps. I had voluntarily depoetized myself. I then reflected on the folly of my passion, and the avowal frightened me like a profanation.

Other cares came suddenly to weigh upon me. One day I was wandering in the park, seeking for solitude. Chance led me to a chalet belonging to the castle, called La Régie, which served as a dwelling for M. Placide. I was walking by a hedge, the enclosure of a little garden planted before the house, when some words of a conversation between the steward and a man whom I could not see, reached my ear. I heard my name pronounced :

"Monsieur le Baron André has no control over his affairs," said M. Placide, in a rude tone. "He is not in a condition to understand them, and if to-morrow you do not pay the arrears, I will have your goods seized in his name."

"But that would ruin me, M. Placide. You know that the crop has been short," answered a voice in supplication.

"That does not concern me. If I should listen to you all, you would never pay. Borrow! I have my orders."

Seigneur, where could I find two thousand francs between now and to-morrow? Monsieur le Baron André cannot be so harsh; and if you will allow me to see him ——"

"Once more, the Baron has nothing to do with it; and if you try to take advantage of his weakness of mind, Guillot, I warn you, it will not be good for you. . . . Money is money, and ———"

M. Placide remained with his mouth open. I had turned the hedge and stood before him.

"Infamous scoundrel!" said I, trembling with anger; "you must explain to me the words you have just uttered."

He rose quickly to take refuge in his house; but I seized him by the collar and threw him back to his seat on the bench.

"Sir! sir!" cried he, "do not lay hands on me."

"Down on your knees and ask pardon, or I will crush you like a viper!"

"Help! help!" exclaimed he, struggling.

In my fury I grasped his throat, and tightened my grip till he was almost strangled. Guillot quietly looked on at what I was doing.

"Mercy! mercy!" murmured the wretch.

His cowardice disarmed me. I opened my hands and let him roll on the ground. He then arose and stood before me.

"You must this instant give me a receipt for this man," resumed I, imperatively, and I made a step towards him.

"Sir, I yield to violence," said he, bewildered; "but the Count will understand this."

"I want no reply! Go into your house and I will follow. Come, Guillot."

When he reached his desk, the steward sat down, pale with rage. I presented to him a paper; he wrote with a trembling hand the required receipt.

"Is that all you have to ask of me, Guillot?" said I, to the farmer.

"Bless me! Monsieur le Baron, you are very good. My lease terminates at St. John's, and it will be soon time to renew it. The rent is now very high, and I can only keep square in good years. M. Placide speaks of increasing it still more."

"How much was your rent when my father lived?"

"Four thousand two hundred francs."

"And now?"

"Five thousand four hundred francs, besides a hundred francs for M. Placide," added Guillot, who now saw himself sustained.

"My honest steward!" added I, "write a renewal of the lease at the old rate."

"But that is impossible!"

"Ah, I advise you," said I severely. "Do not resist; do what I tell you."

"But, sir, I am not authorized to sign leases."

"That does not matter; I will sign it."

A wicked smile, which I should have mistrusted, accompanied the submission of M. Placide. He took a bundle of papers from a box, picked from them the old lease, and began, servilely, to copy it. I watched his pen for fear of fraud; and when he had finished, I signed it. Giving the deed to the farmer, "Now, Guillot," said I, "you are all right. In future, if you have any complaint to make of this rascal, come to me."

As I was going away, accompanied by the farmer, I saw the steward glide down a by-path, and make haste towards the castle, with the intention, no doubt, of informing M. de Maufert. I was not at all uneasy about this. Delighted at my act, and the punishment inflicted on the executor of the evil deeds of the Count, I thought it useless to enter into any explanation of my conduct. I had done myself justice as a man, and I would have thought it lessening to me to make any apology for it.

I did not see M. de Maufert until dinner hour. I expected a burst of anger, but there was nothing said; and I was rather surprised to find him almost kind. The canoness was quite amiable. My godmother alone appeared uneasy, and observed me with attention, as if she dreaded some imprudence on my part. She took my arm to leave the dining-room.

"What has happened between you and M. Placide?" said she to me, in a low voice.

"Nothing very serious," answered I; "I have corrected his insolence—that's all."

My tranquillity reassured her. The Count, for his part, was in a fine humor. Nothing occurred to denote his discontent at my freak.

The park was wet; it had rained that day. We remained in the saloon. Madelaine sat by a piano. My guardian and the canoness seated themselves to play a game of chess; I took a seat near Diana, who occupied herself with a piece of tapestry work.

"You are not going out?" said she to me, after a moment.

"No. Why do you ask me that question?"

"For nothing. . . . I thought you had business out of doors?" added she in a cold tone.

"Business, me? . . . But where would you that I should go, bon Dieu?"

"I do not know," replied she. "I believed that you wished to go out, that is all!"

"But I never leave you at this hour unless I have letters to write."

"I do not ask your confidence," said she emphatically.

I looked at her, surprised at her sharp accent. Bending over her work she did not raise her eyes. I did not know what trouble agitated her.

"Mon Dieu! have I displeased you?"

In her turn she was moved by my apprehension. At all events, she said with more gentleness: "I imagined that you only remained with us through courtesy . . . and I intended to give you your liberty."

She pronounced these words with sadness. I thought that some trouble irritated her nerves, and we remained silent, listening to Madelaine, who softly played the andante of the quintette in E, from Mozart.

"Ho! ho! Baroness," cried my guardian suddenly, you rudely attack my king. Behold him in a situation as desperate as that of poor Placide, encircled by a certain Baron of our acquaintance," added he, casting at me a jovial look.

I met the shock without blanching. "S'blood, mon cher!" continued the Count, smiling, "It seems to me you do not deal very gently with my agents. Poor Placide, I would have liked to see his expression."

"It was ugly, I assure you," replied I, with the most complete sang froid.

"I thought I heard the cries of a peacock when you tightened the knot of his cravat. It was the lease, above all, which cost him a sacrifice."

"He made it; it was the important thing," replied I, with a very easy air.

"Truly so; it was the important thing," replied the Count, more and more merrily."

"And he won his game."

IX.

CHARMED with having so well succeeded in my first essay of authority, I resolved to visit some of my farmers, and collect complaints which I could easily foresee. With the enthusiasm of my twenty years it seemed glorious for me to play the rôle of a redresser of wrongs, of appearing thus all of a sudden to the eyes of my tenants like a providence, to make blessed the memory of my father, who was revived in me.

Full of my project, the next morning, after breakfast, at the time when Mme. de Jonval broke our pleasure by her austere presence, I ordered my horse saddled.

"Are you going out?" said Diana to me.

"Yes, I am going for a walk in the woods, with Simon."

"I do not ask you where you are going," replied she.

I went away sadly, for I divined a reproach. It seemed as if she accused me of abandoning her to the wearisome company of her aunt; but I had a duty to fulfil, and I knew that she would pardon me when I revealed to her the reason of my absence.

I had not deceived myself in my foresight, and the farmers whom I visited apprised me that they were shamefully oppressed. I felt ashamed of my riches in thinking that, to add some thousands of crowns to the five hundred thousand livres rent from my patrimony, they had dared, despising agreements made by my family, to oppress in my name these poor people, who fed my luxury and idleness. I returned, glowing with most generous designs. I rode twelve leagues at a hunter's gallop, fearful of returning too late and of disturbing Diana. As I appeared in the room, Madelaine inquired about my ride and asked me for news of mother Simon, at whose house she had been in other times.

"I have not seen her," said I; "in going that way I changed my plan."

"You have wandered in the forest since morning?" pursued she.

"Ma foi! yes; I allowed myself to be guided by Ralph."

"He must have guided you far," said my godmother, "for you have brought him back covered with foam and almost foundered."

She had watched my return. I blushed at being caught in the very act of falsehood, and I reproached myself for having alarmed her solicitude. I reckoned on excusing myself on the morrow, when I would confide to her my secret. We waited her vainly with Madelaine; she did not appear.

One morning I was alone in the park, when I saw the farmer I had already protected against the steward running towards me. He was so pale, so distressed, that I divined some misfortune.

"What have you, Guillot?" said I to him; "speak quick!"

"Behold, sir: the other day in quitting you I went on business to Monthermé. I returned home very grateful for your goodness, when my wife showed me, weeping, a paper brought in my absence by a sheriff; it was a summons to pay within twenty-four hours the two thousand francs arrears of my lease. I reassured my wife by saying that the sheriff had without doubt come while I was here: I had in my pocket the receipt which you had given me, and I did not disturb myself, but, behold! this morning they have come, three or four, and they have seized all at my home."

"But it is impossible; you have a regular quittance."

"Read this paper that they have given me."

I took hastily a writ which he held out to me; I ran over it with my eyes, and I remained indignant; it was a judgment of seizure granted at the request of M. de Maufert, my guardian.

"My poor Guillot, do not afflict yourself," said I, mastering my anger; "to instantly pay the two thousand francs is sufficient to remove the attachment."

"But I have not that sum, sir; and before I have found where to borrow it, it will be too late!"

"You will have it! come. . . ."

And drawing him after me I ran all the way to the chateau. Arrived at my room, I rushed to a bureau where I kept my money. In opening the drawer, I stopped, startled. . . Three days before, a friend at Heidelburg had written me, asking for three thousand francs; I had sent them to him, and there hardly remained to me forty louis; I had forgotten this. Guillot looked at me with stupor; he saw himself lost.

I had the preceding week received the two thousand francs which my guardian gave me each month; however, well as I was persuaded that I risked a refusal, I decided to apply to him. I advised Guillot not to go out of the house; it was not the moment to engage in the stormy discussion with M. de Maufert which I foresaw, and of protecting him against the iniquity done in my name; the power lay with my guardian, and I knew him to be a man who would ruin without pity the unfortunates whom I had imprudently compromised by my rebellion.

I made an appeal to my courage, decided to humiliate myself to obtain an advance of my allowance, and descended in haste. I learned that the Count was on a tour of inspection with his steward, and would not return until evening. Time pressed; there remained to me no other resource than to attempt to borrow from my notary near by, who had often aided me in covering my student debts. Guillot was in despair; I told him to wait for me on the road. I had the horses put to, and we set out for Monthermé, where we arrived in about two hours. By a deplorable fatality my notary was absent. I ran to the sheriff, hoping that with a guarantee he would consent to wait for a day and raise the seizure. He replied that he was ordered to proceed without delay, and that my surety as a minor would not cover his responsibility. Furious at my helplessness, desperate at the anguish of poor Guillot, I wandered through the streets, when chance sent in my way Bastien, the smuggler, who said to me, learning my embarrassment: "Parbleu! you have only to go to Father Abraham!"

His idea seemed to me an inspiration from heaven. In my trouble I had not thought of this Jew, to whom I had already had recourse in my days of foolish dissipation, or for losses at play which my guardian knew nothing about. Ten minutes afterwards I knocked at the door of the usurer.

M. Abraham, who owed only to the memory of the Hebrew patriarch the epithet of Father bestowed on his name, had nothing about him of the traditional usurer. He was a man forty years old, cold and polite in manner. I found him in a cabinet of a Flemish neatness, where the furniture almost was heightened in effect by coquettish paintings of great value. He received me, and bade me be seated, with formal courtesy. Like all who ask for money, I began by exposing the motives which made me have recourse to him, and I concluded by asking for two thousand francs. M. Abraham heard me with a smile on his lips. When I had said all—

"Monsieur le Baron," replied he, "I am truly very sorry at not being able to be of use to you."

"What, for two miserable billets of a thousand francs?" replied I, in astonishment.

"Oh, the sum is a miserable one, in fact; sir, under other circumstances I would wish that it was a question of a hundred thousand francs."

"But you have already some bills against me?"

"Yes, for six thousand francs, payable on your majority."

"Ah, well, you will not have long to wait; I shall be of age in ten months."

"That is precisely what seems to me not very sure. . . . ."

"But I am not consumptive, I imagine; and my whole appearance should leave you the hope that I will live until that time."

"Oh, it is not that which disturbs me, Monsieur le Baron, for in that case your guardian would honor your signature; your fortune is too fine for them to dare to be niggardly about trifles."

"Then I do not understand the cause of your refusal, since you are certain if I live of being yet more surely paid by me at my majority."

"All that is very true, Monsieur le Baron, only I have room to doubt that, even in living . . . you will attain your majority."

"Ah, how! you speak in enigmas; explain yourself."

"Mon Dieu, Monsieur le Baron, in business we must use foresight; I have had some difficulties with M. de Maufert, and I am not paid for loving him much—enough, that I admire him. He is a man who knows what money is—he is very great in speculation. As proof of this, he has your guardianship. Ah, well! it is easy enough to take care of it."

"It is impossible; the law is precise."

"The law, Monsieur le Baron; but it is truly the weapon of people well endowed. Illegality only tempts fools. See, I am going to give you better than money; I am going to give you good advice. . . . Oh, accept it without scruple; I have previously deducted my interest—the satisfaction of settling my account of ill-will with your guardian in playing him a bad turn, which will at once pay me for all the vexation he has caused me."

Though I had never nourished any very tender sentiments for the Count, I felt wounded in my pride of race.

"You forget," said I, dryly, "that I am still the ward of M. le Comte de Maufert."

"No, no, I do not forget it, and it is for that reason I speak thus. If you hear me not, you are lost, for I alone am shrewd enough to have divined the projects of M. le Comte, and rich enough to laugh at his resentment. Two years ago I would not have dared it. You love him more than I do . . . You protest through custom; it is very well . . . Here is my advice; if you believe me, you will set out, even to-day, for Paris. You will surround yourself there with many of your relations, with many friendships; you will join the clubs; you will see much of the world, and, when you shall be twenty and one years old, you will come back to regulate your accounts, accompanied by two or three persons of position, whom you will have seen each day for ten months. Otherwise . . ."

"Otherwise," . . . repeated I, as he had paused.

"Otherwise you run great risk of never attaining your majority."

"And what for, I pray you?

The usurer seemed to hesitate for an instant; finally he decided on his course:

"For this reason, Monsieur le Baron: some time since your guardian began to spread the story in his neighborhood that you are foolish; this story has come even here, and as it has travelled six leagues, it is resting itself a little on its journey, from which it follows that the day of your majority, M. de Maufert will probably change your state of a minor into that of an interdict."

"Proofs, proofs!" cried I.

"Proofs? They will make them soon. . . There are some already. This morning they say that you fought Placide to force him to give to Guillot a free receipt—that you half strangled him to make him renew a lease which made you lose two thousand francs a year. . . . It is a fine action, but it is a strange one, not common in our time. . . ."

"But it is a baseness!"

"If the fact is false, so much the better. , . . It had been a bad precedent which could serve to build your interdiction upon."

This word recalled to me the terms of the writ sent to Guillot. . . . I remained an instant confounded. So many emotions had swept over me that day that it seemed to me to go in a dream. Delirium suddenly retook possession of me. It entered my mind that the Jew was perhaps, like my guardian, an instrument of Madness, and that he would deliver me over to my phantom enemy. To assure myself, I approached him and traced with my finger the sign of the cross on his face. He recoiled in affright.

"Ah, I have fathomed thee!" said I to him with contempt, "thou art a dweller in darkness, but I fear thee not. Adieu!"

"Monsieur le Baron," cried he, "I pray of you do not go out now."

And he threw himself before me.

"It is necessary that I go," I replied.

"But your horses are not rested."

He clung to my arms, and I saw that I would be forced to fight him, when Bastien, who I had left in anxiety for me, appeared at the door. M. Abraham ran to him, and I detected some furtive gestures.

"Bastien, my friend," said he, emphatically, "assist me in keeping M. le Baron."

"It is useless," cried I, in a tone which admitted of no reply; "they wait for me at Maufert. . . ."

And disengaging myself from his hands I would have passed him, but he barred the way for me as if he had determined to keep me by force. Bastien advanced towards me.

"Monsieur André," said he "I beg of you, hear me. . . . You know that I am devoted to you body and soul. It is Madame the Countess that sent me; she wants you very soon, she told me to bring you myself. . . . Come, your carriage is below."

Hardly had we crossed the threshold when I heard the doors shut themselves behind us with a great noise of bolts. I made Bastien mount near me in the carriage, I took the reins and we set out at a rapid trot. Diana awaited me.

In less than a quarter of an hour we reached the woods. I carefully eyed the underbrush that bordered the road, for the spectre could have been hidden there. Since morning I had felt myself surrounded by treason and I feared to fall into some ambush. Day declined, the forest was silent as if in the expectation of something bad, and the trees at times reproached themselves for hemming me in; but I was calm and strong. I contemplated them without fear and they shrank before my assurance. Once in a deep road some brushes stretched across the road as though to sieze me; one of them tore my cheek, I whipped my horses, and I passed them. Bastien seemed terrified, brave though he be, and looked at me distractedly.

"Fear nothing," said I to him, "do you not see that they tremble?"

We arrived at last at Maufert; it was night. Bastien wished to draw me into my apartments, saying that my godmother waited me there, but I had meditated a revenge, and climbing the steps of the stairs I walked towards the large room where I knew I would find at this hour all the guests of the chateau.

On seeing me enter Diana made a gesture of affright. I evaded meeting her look and walked straight to my guardian, seated near the canoness.

"Sir," said I coldly, "I come to demand reckoning for the indignities you have put upon me!"

At these words, uttered in a composed voice, he turned his head quickly and in his bird-of-prey eyes fixed upon me I saw an ironical gleam. All of a sudden he stepped back and ran to the chimney piece, ringing and crying: "A physician! a physician!"

"Oh, sir, what would you do?" said my godmother impressively; "call our servants!"

But without listening to her he directed his steps towards the door and opened it.

"Martin! Louis! to the rescue! to the rescue!" cried he anew.

I supposed he wished to escape or divert my anger.

"Oh! you understand me," replied I, vehemently; "I will show you the pity which you show others. . . . I come here to judge you and pronounce sentence."

My resolute attitude plunged them all into an inexpressible disorder. Diana took me in her arms, essaying to calm me, but I heard nothing. The servants were come. M. de Maufert dared not approach me.

"The unfortunate! the unfortuuate!" cried he, raising his arms to heaven. "Quick! a physician!"

"Alas!" said Mme. de Jonval, "the poor child! In this state how he resembles his mother!"

I understood. . . . The ground disappeared under my feet. I felt Diana's arms relax, and fell, as though stricken by thunder, lifeless on the carpet. I had not, however, lost the faculty of suffering. Silence and night surrouuded me, an inexplicable silence—a night thick and lugubrious, such as might be the night of the tomb, and my thought watched alone in this nothingness.

THREE SIMPLE MEN OF THE EAST.

The followiug story was heard by its present narrator in Ceylon:

In Kandy, during the days of the Kandyan kings of the Island of Ceylon, on a pleasant, cool December eveuing, three strong men were sitting in a rest-house or amblemmay—that is, a small open building raised for the benefit of travellers by some pious persou, iu accordance with the saying of Buddha that the gods reward such works of charity.

As the men sat in the glow of the sunset, a middle-aged widow, in deep mourning, came by. The men rose and bowed to her. She also made a bow to them.

"That bow was for me," said one of the men. "No," said the second, "it was mine." "No," said the third "it was to me she bowed." They quarrelled over the matter for some time, but at last agreed that it would be better to run as fast as they could after the widow, and ask her to which of them she bowed. They did so, reached her out of breath, gasped at her their question, and the only answer they got was, "To the greatest simpleton amongst you."

Then they returned to the rest-house calmly, but only to quarrel again.

"Did I not tell you," said one "that she bowed to me? I am the greatest simpleton here." "No," said each of the other two, "I am more of a simpleton than you." They quarrelled thus for some time, and from words coming to blows, they fought till they were separated by the police, who locked them up for the night in separate cells, and carried them next day, before a judge. The judge having heard the causo of dispute called upon one of the men to produco evidence for his claim to be so great a simpleton.

"My lord," said he, "when I was about 18 years old, my father and mother set eyes on a young woman whom they chose to bc my wife. They thought she would be faithful, iudustrious and thrifty. She was expected, also, to inherit a few fields. She was of tho same caste as ourselves, and of good family. Proposals, therefore, were made and accepted, and soon afterwards, according to the custom of the country, I had to visit my future mother-in-law, at whose house, though not allowed to do so by the strict rules of society, yet, by some contrived chance, my intended wife would show her face to me. I had far to travel, and starting at mid-day, arrived late in the evening, when I was most cordially received, and most kindly requested to stay for the night, and return home next day. To this I consented, with all seeming reluctance, though it had been the chief object of my journey, and I was fully persuaded that a glance at my future partner in the cool of the morning, would be better than one in the dusk of the evening. I had an excellent dinner, and slept soundly under a roof which I already regarded as my own. In the morning I awoke refreshed, and went out of doors to wash myself as usual. I found, of course, awaiting me, a brazen pot full of water for washing my face hands and feet, as well as a piece of wood charcoal for cleaning my teeth. I finished my ablutions soon, and on looking back, observed a beautiful young woman, who sat at some distance from me, washing rice for our morning meal. Her embarrassed air, and some smiles which stole over her face almost against her will, easily told me that she was my betrothed; and I, in defiance of our customs, quietly went near, and spoke to her, as there was nobody in sight. She was not so shy as to leave her work and run away, but stayed and returned short, modest answers to my questions. At length I went close to her, tapped her on the shoulder, and playfully taking up a handful of the rice she was washing, had just put it into my mouth, when, to our confusion, her mother made her appearance. I quickly removed myself to a respectful distance, but had not time to bite or swallow the rice, and so was obliged to keep it between my gums and cheek. This showed as a lump, which my mother-in-law, who was to be, most unfortunately mistook for a gum-boil.

"'Ah! how are you this morning?' said she, 'You have got a gum-boil.' 'Yes.' answered I, 'but it does not give me any pain at present, so I intend to let it alone till it forms matter.' 'You should not do that, child,' continued she, 'I shall send for a doctor.' 'No,' said I, in bitter desperation, 'we have a very good doctor practising near our village. I shall, as soon as I reach home, place myself under his care.' But my evasions and excuses could not baffle her officiousness. The doctor was sent for, and, until he came, she lectured on the evil of permitting any sickness to come to a head, and now and then she felt my gum-boil. The doctor at length arrived, and he also examined it. He pronounced it to be one of a very malignant sort, but curable. Now, during all this time, my officious mother-in-law had her eye on my cheek, and I had committed myself so far that I could not undeceive her. Shame at confession of a falsehood, as well as the fear of exposing my previous indiscretion, alike kept me silent. I sat mute with astonishment at the position to which I had reduced myself, until the doctor, who had beeu busy in the kitchen, suddenly came out, and, before I had time to avoid him, put a red-hot iron hook into my gum-boil. I howled and jumped, but he had made a deep wound and out of it came the rice I had inside. All present now saw the truth, and the doctor, picking up the rice, cried at me, 'You big simpleton, when you had only rice in your mouth, why did you not say so?' I made no answer, but took to my heels and ran home. Thus I lost a good wife and the prospect of good fortune, and have ever since believed myself the greatest simpleton yet born."

Having laughed heartily at this story, the judge turned to the second man, and asked, "What evidence have you, sir, of your right to the bow you claim?"

"My story is short," he answered, "but will show that I have as much right to the bow as any man. I married early, and tried to be happy, but found that my wife could not manage the house without help; so I married another wife—polygamy being allowed in my country—and thought that all would be well managed by the two, and I should get my rest after my day's labor in the fields. But, alas! I was mistaken. I had no more rest at home. If I spoke to one wife for a few minutes, the other complained that I did not speak to her. I was not able to bestow on one the least attentiou or kindness by deed, word, or even by a look, without suffering from the other's jealousy. Thus I lost all peace at home, and was quite miserable whenever bad weather or any other causo obliged me to stay in doors, and at uight I had no sleep; for if I tried to sleep with my face towards one wife, the other complained; if I slept on my back or with my face to the ground, both complained. I was harrassed in this manner until I lost my patience, and told them there was ouly one thing to bc done, and that was, they must take me each by a leg and pull away till they divided me between them. I had no sooner spoken than they took me at my word. They seized me by the feet and began to pull away with all their strength, each trying to out-pull the other. In this extremity I could only scream for help. The neighbors rushed in, and I was extricated; but such was the laughing, jeering and hooting at the simpleton who had thus given himself up to his wives, that I had to fly from my country, and now I am here a beggar. My countrymen have ever since, even up to this day, spoken of me as the Great Simpleton."

This story having been told, the third man, at the request of the judge, related the following:

"I married, at about the age of twenty, a rich young woman; but instead of adding to her wealth by trading, or following some lucrative life, I did nothing until our money was all gone. Then being compelled by hunger, and touched by the position and entreaties of my wife, I went to work. I labored all the day in a rich man's garden, and with my earnings bought a small quantity of rice and returned home. My wife baked three cakes of the rice, and we sat down to eat them, when a dispute arose between us as to which had a right to two. I said that I ought to get two, as I had toiled all day and earned them all; my wife maintained that she ought to get two, as she had brought with her so much money and fed me so long, and had, besides, to make and bake the cakes. Both of us were obstinate, and we would by no means consent to an equal division. At length, my wife hit upon a plan. She proposed that we should sit by the cakes, and whoever spoke first should get only one. I agreed, and so we sat up all night without speaking. About daybreak I fell asleep, quite wearied, and so did my wife; but we rose soon and looked at our cakes, and remained silent. We did not sit much longer in this manner, but both fainted. Shortly after this, our neighbors, seeing our door closed, and hearing no voice or sound of stirring within, came and knocked. As they received no answer they broke open the door, and found us lying apparently dead, but warm. So fancying us to be actually dead, they made a pile of wood and placed us on it. Fire was set to the pile, and most unfortunately just underneath me. It burnt the wood on my side of the pile so quickly that the heat roused me at once, and I jumped up with the loud cry of 'Oh!' In the next moment my wife started up and cried 'Ah! you get only one cake!' Our neighbors were surprised at this performance of the corpses; but when my wife, in great glee, boasted of her victory, and explained herself, they laughed at us uproariously, and told us that we were both of us the greatest simpletons they ever heard of."

The judge settled the claims of the three simpletons, thus: "You are really three very great simpletons, and it is not easy to decide which of you ought to get the bow. The first, however, suffered not only from his folly, but on account of his love, and because he had not observed the approach of the doctor with the red-hot iron hook. The second suffered because he committed a mistake, and his wives took unjust advantage of it. But the third suffered starvation, solely because of his foolishness, and is, therefore, the greatest simpleton. In the present quarrel, however, all three have been equal simpletons in fighting for so worthless a thing as a passing stranger's bow."

MARY STUART AND CHASTELAR.

IN THREE PARTS.

PART TWO.

From this time forward Chastelar's conduct to the Queen became so marked and unguarded in various particulars as to excite her alarm, and even to draw down upon the offender some occasional rebukes, although these were at first sufficiently gentle and remote. If we are to believe the testimony of Knox, she had encouraged his advances by behavior unbecoming the decency of an honest woman. The stern reformer especially condemns the unseemly familiarity with which the Queen danced the "purpose"* with the graceful Frenchman. "In this dance the Queen chose Chastelar, and Chastelar took the Queen. All this winter (1563) Chastelar was so familiar in the Queen's cabinet, early and late, that scarcely could any of the nobility have access unto her. The Queen would lie on Chastelar's shoulder, and sometimes privily would steal a kiss of his neck; and all this was honest enough, for it was the gentle entreatment of a stranger."

These are very artful and malicious words of the implacable Knox, and should be taken with reservation; mindful, as one ought to be, that the earnestness with which Mary engaged in these amusements, so befitting her age and disposition in the Court of Scotland—which she animated by her taste and vivacity, and adorned by her grace and charms—were considered unholy and profane by the Presbyterian ministers, and exposed her to their severest reprehension. Many times had Knox mounted his pulpit to inveigh against the prolonged festivities of that joyous Court, destined ere long to become so desolate and sad. "Princes," said he, "are more exercised in fiddling and flinging than in reading or hearing of God's most blessed word. Fiddlers and flatterers, who commonly corrupt the youth, are more precious in their eyes than men of wisdom and gravity, who, by wholesome admonition, might beat down in them some part of that vanity and pride, whereunto all are born, but in princes take roôt and strength by wicked education."† Dancing was denounced as bitterly as music by this rigid censor, who did not fail to refer, in his remarks upon it, to the tragical history of Herodias and John the Baptist.

Neither did the favoritism of the Queen nor the imprudences of the infatuated poet escape the cold, keen eye of Moray. He saw them and noted them, but took care to wear the semblance of unconsciousness. It was not his business to interrupt, by hinting suspicions, the progress of an affair which he hoped would, on some occasion or other, lead to consequences that he might turn to account. Feeling this, it was not for him to help Chastelar and the Queen to elude his vigilance and defeat his views, by discovering what he observed, and thus putting them on their guard. That was not his business; but it was his business to lie concealed and to spring out on his quarry the instant that its position invited to the effort. Coldly and sternly, therefore, he watched the motions of Chastelar and his sister; but was little satisfied to perceive nothing in the conduct of the latter regarding the former which at all spoke of the feelings he secretly desired to find. As it was impossible for the Earl personally to watch all the movements of Chastelar, he looked around him for some individual of the Queen's household whom he might bribe to perform the duties of a spy; and such a one he found among the attendants whom Mary brought with her from France, of which country he was also a native. The name of this ungrateful and despicable wretch, who undertook to betray a kind and generous mistress, was Villemont—a man of pleasing manners and address, but of low and vicious habits. Without any certain knowledge of his character, or any previous information regarding him, Moray's sinister tact and penetration at once singled him out as a likely person for his purposes. On this presumption he sent for him, and cautiously and gradually opening him up, found that he had judged correctly of his man.

"Villemont," he said, on that person being ushered into his presence, "I have good reason to think you are one in whom I may put trust; and, in this assurance, I have selected you for an especial mark of my confidence. Do you know anything of this Chastelar who has lately come to Court?"

"I do, my lord; he is a countryman of my own."

"So I understand. Well, then, I'll tell you what it is, Villemont: I believe the fellow has come here for no good; I believe, in short, that he has designs upon the Queen. Now, my good fellow, will you undertake to ascertain this for me? Will you watch their proceedings, watch them narrowly, and give me instant information of anything suspicious that may come to your knowledge? and ye shall not miss of your reward," added the Earl, now opening a little desk which stood before him, and taking from it a well-filled purse.

Villemont, with many bows and grimaces, readily undertook to play the knave; and, with still more, took the price of his knavery—the purse already alluded to, which the Earl now handed him.

Villemont again bowed low and left the apartment.

In the mean time, the gallant, accomplished, but imprudent Chastelar, hurried blindly along by the impetuosity of his passion, and altogether unsettled by the intoxicating belief that his love was returned—a belief which had now taken so fast a hold of his understanding that nothing could loosen it—proceeded from one impropriety to another, till he at length committed one which all but brought matters to a crisis; and this was avoided only by his having escaped the vigilance of Villemont, and having been compassionately concealed by the Queen herself.

On retiring one night, early in February, 1563, to her sleeping apartment, Mary and her attendants were suddenly alarmed by an extraordinary movement in a small closet or wardrobe, in which was kept the clothes the Queen was in the habit of daily using. The maids of honor would have screamed out and fled from the apartment, but were checked in both of these feminine resorts by observing the calm and collected manner of their royal mistress, in which there was not the slightest appearance of perturbation.

"Ladies, ladies!" she exclaimed, laughingly, as her attendants were about to rush out of the room, "what a pretty pair of heroines ye are! Shame! shame! Ye surely would not leave your mistress alone, in the midst of such a perilous adventure as this? Come hither," she added, at the same time stepping towards her toilet, and taking up a small silver lamp that burned on it, "and let us see who this intruder is—whether ghost or gallant."

Saying this—her ladies having returned, reassured by her intrepidity—she proceeded, with steady step, towards the suspected closet, seized the door by the handle, flung it boldly open, and discovered, to the astonished eyes of her attendants and to her own inexpressible amazement, the poet Chastelar, armed with sword and dagger. For some seconds the Queen uttered not a syllable, but a flush of indignation and insulted pride suffused her exquisitely lovely countenance.

"Chastelar," she at length said, in a tone of calm severity, and with a diguity of manner becoming her high state and lineage, "come forth and answer for this daring and atrocious conduct, this unheard-of insolence and presumption." Chastelar obeyed, and was about to throw himself at her feet, when she sternly forbade him.

"I want no apologies, presumptuous man," she said—"no craving of forgiveness. I want explanation of this infamous proceeding, and that I demand of you in the presence of my attendants here. Know ye not, sir," she went on, "that your head is forfeited by this offence, and that I have but to give the word and the forfeit will be exacted?"

"I know it, I know it," exclaimed Chastelar, persisting in throwing himself on his knees; "but the threat has no terrors for me. It is your displeasure alone—fairest, brightest of God's creatures—that I fear. It is——"

"Peace, Chastelar!" interrupted Mary, peremptorily. "What mean ye by this language, sir? Would ye cut yourself off from all hope of pardon, by adding offence upon offence? Rise, sir, and leave this apartment instantly, I command you; I will now hear neither explanation nor apology."

"Then will you forgive mê?" said Chastelar; "will you forgive a presumption of which——"

"I will hear no more, sir," again interrupted the Queen, indignantly. "Begone, sir! Remain another instant and I give the alarm. Your life depends on your obedience." And Mary placed her hand on a small silver bell, from which had she drawn the slightest sound, the poet's doom would be sealed, and she would have rung his funeral knell.

Chastelar now slowly rose from his knees, folded his arms across his breast, and with downcast look, but without uttering another word, strode out of the apartment. When he had gone, the Queen, no longer supported by the excitement occasioned by the presence of the intruder, flung herself into a chair, greatly agitated and deadly pale. Here she sat in silence for several minutes, evidently employed in endeavoring to obtain a view of the late singular occurrence in all its bearings, and in determining on the course which she herself ought to pursue regarding it.

Having seemingly satisfied herself on these points—

"Ladies," she at length said, (these ladies were two of her Marys—Mary Seton and Mary Hamilton,) "this is a most extraordinary circumstance. Rash, thoughtless, presumptuous man, how could he have been so utterly lost to every sense of propriety, and of his own peril, as to think of an act of such daring insolence?"

"Poor man, I pity him," here simply, but naturally enough perhaps, interrupted Mary Seton. "Doubtless, madam, you will report the matter instantly to the Earl?"

"Nay, Mary, I know not if I will, after all," replied the Queen. "I perhaps ought to do so, but methinks it would be hardly creditable of me, as a woman, to bring this poor thoughtless young man to the scaffold, whither, you know, my stern brother would have him instantly dragged if he knew of his offence; and, besides, ladies," went on the Queen, in whose gentle bosom the kindly feelings of her nature had now completely triumphed over those of insulted dignity and pride, "I know not how far I am myself to blame in this matter. I fear me I ought to have been more guarded in my conduct towards this infatuated young man. I should have kept him at greater distance, and been more cautious of admitting him to familiar converse, since he has evidently misconstrued our affability and condescension. There may have been error there, you see, ladies."

"Yet," said Mary Hamilton, "methinks the daring insolence of the man ought not to go altogether unpunished, madam. If he has chosen to misconstrue, it can be no fault of ours."

"Perhaps not," replied Mary. "As a queen, certes I ought to give him up to the laws, but, as a woman, I cannot. Yet shall he not go unpunished. He shall be forthwith banished from our Court and kingdom. To-morrow I shall cause it to be intimated to him that he leave our Court instantly, and Scotland within four-and-twenty hours thereafter, on pain of our highest displeasure, and peril of disclosure of his crime."

Having thus spoken, and having obtained a promise of secrecy regarding Chastelar's offence from her two attendants, Mary retired for the night, not, however, quite assured that she was pursuing the right course for her own reputation in thus screening the guilt of the poet; but, nevertheless, determined at all risks to save him, in this instance at least, from the consequences of his indiscretion. On the following morning the Queen despatched a note to Chastelar, to the purpose which we have represented her as expressing on the preceding night; and, in obedience to the command it contained, he instantly left the palace, but in a state of indescribable mental agitation and distraction; for in the determination expressed by the Queen he saw at once an end of his wild hopes, and, more unendurable still, an assurance that he had wholly mistaken the feelings with which Mary regarded him. We have said that Chastelar obeyed one of the injunctions of the Queen—that was, to leave the palace instantly. He did so; but that, unhappily, he did not conform to the other, the sequel will show.

* The "purpose" was a measure very much resembling the cotillion, and the word purpose signified confidential conversation, and might merge in flirtation, for which it gave excellent opportunity.

† Knox, vol. ii., p. 368.

SOME SURNAMES.

Looking back over history to the dimly discernable times when our forefathers had no surnames, we wonder truly how they did without those convenient handles for identification. And we can fancy how gradually such were invented by necessity, struck out from personal peculiarities, or feats of prowess, or possessions, until they came to be as much a part of a man's self as the color of his hair.

There was a Norman nobleman once with a very short nose, called thence Court-nez, (probably about the time that Duke Robert had short legs and was called Court-hoze,) and he was ancestor to all the Courtenays since. There was a Scottish knight who took charge of Robert Bruce's heart home from Spain, whither the Douglas had brought it on the way to Jerusalem, in obedience to the monarch's dying desire; and when he brought back the precious relic, he assumed the device of a heart with a lock upon it, being in memory of the silver case he had guarded so faithfully, and was called Sir Simon Lockheart ever after. There was a third son of the third Earl of Leicester, born at the manor of Hambleton, in Buckinghamshire, who, when he went to push his fortune in Scotland, about 1215, was called after his birthplace, and gave name to all the generations of Hamiltons since. These are specimens of the three most usual origins of surnames, and the list could be multiplied almost indefinitely.

In the last-mentioned county of Bucks, there was, when William the Conqueror was quartering his foreign favorites over the fair realm of England, a Saxon family named Shobington, who were not satisfied thus lightly to part with their broad acres. Hearing that the Norman Lord was coming to whom the estate had been gifted by the king, the head of the house armed his servants and tenants, preparing to do battle for his rights; he cast up works which remain to this day in grassy mounds, marking the sward of the park, and established himself behind them to await the despoiler's onset. It was the period when hundreds of herds of wild cattle roamed the forest lands of Britain; and, failing in horses, the Shobingtons collected a number of bulls, rode forth on them and routed the Normans, unused to such cavalry. William heard of the defeat, and conceived a respect for the brave men who caused it; he sent a herald with a safe-conduct to the chief Shobington, desiring to speak with him. Not many days after, came to court eight stalwart men, riding upon bulls, the father and seven sons. "If thou wilt leave me my lands, O king," said the old man, "I will serve thee faithfully as I did the dead Harold." Whereupon the Conqueror confirmed him in his ownership, but ordered the name of the family to be thenceforth, in perpetuation of the above circumstances, Bullstrode instead of Shobington.

Now, whether this legend be true or not, certain it is that traces of the earthen fortifications which checked the Normans exist in Bullstrode Park at this present writing.

It may be news to some Douglases to learn that their ancestor who first made mark in history was the chief who, in 778, came to the aid of the King of Scotland when sorely pressed by the Lord of the Isles. After the victory, the monarch desired to see his deliverer, who, coming into the presence, was pointed out by the darkness of his complexion in the Gælic words Sholto Dhu-glash ("Behold the black man,") and to him, under this name, were lands given as reward.

The Erskines are said to have a Gælic derivation of a similar sort. At some battle in the reign of Malcolm II., a Scotchman killed a Danish General, and, having cut off his head, said, Eryier skyne, signifying head and dagger; whereupon the king imposed on him the surname of Erskine, and gave him the armorial bearing of a hand wielding a dagger.

Perhaps the wide-spread and highly-descended family of Grahams may not be pleased to hear that the decidedly low-bred name of Grimes is merely an offset of their distinguished patronymic. All are alike posterity to that far-away Pict, Grumach or the Grim, who, fourteen hundred years ago, leaped scornfully over Severn's broken wall, between Forth and Clyde, thereby initiating all the highland raids upon lowlands that have since occurred. "Graham's Dyke" is the country name for the relics of the wall to this day. The descendants of the Grim inherited much of his restless ways. James VI. wrote to Queen Elizabeth, complaining that "the Grimeses"—he meant the Grahams—"had resetted," or harbored some criminals on the borders. A certain Dick Grimes or Graham defeated the Earl of Desmond, routing six hundred by sixty. And there is a letter among the state papers from Sir Henry Lee, stating, as a most marvellous piece of news, that "the Grahams are quiet." Thus we find the names Graham and Grimes merely convertible terms in old manuscripts; in fact, the latter, or least euphonious, is the older form of the surname.

All men know that the royal house of Stuart was derived from Walter, Lord High Steward of Scotland, and was named from his office, which became hereditary under Malcolm IV., confirmed by such words as these: "Granted in fee-farm and inheritance my high stewardship, to be held by him and his heirs of me and my heirs." Thus riveted in the position, the family took its title for their cognomen, and retained it when they became greater than stewards.

The fact is curious, that at the threatened invasion of England by the elder Napoleon, many descendants of French refugees changed their names for words in English bearing the same signification; they did not want to be identified with the foes of the nation which had naturalized them.

Thus, Lemaitre became Masters, Leroy was transmuted into

King, Letonnelier into Cooper, Leblane and Lenoir into White and Blaek. Yet the Huguenot element of nomenclature may still be traeed iu the highest plaees of our soeial system. Lord Eversley is a Lefevre ; the discoverer of Nineveh is a Layard ; Latouche was a great banker ; Sauriu a great lawyer and a great preacher ; Thellusson the mi lionaire made the most ee-eentric will of modern date. Flanders likewise has given us the large family name Fleming, through all its variations of spelling.

A widely-diffused series of surnames are those beginning with Mae and O, generally considered to be unmistakably indiea-tive of eountry. They are Celtie prefixes, signifying literally son and grandson, similarly to the Norman Fitz, an early form of the French fils. Now, there was a eertain abbot of King-ussie, who for state reasons proeured a dispensation from his vows, that he might become ehieftain of the elan of Chattan, whieh eame to him by the death of male heirs ; in pursuance of the same dispensation, he married, and his children were always called by the Inverness folk Mac-pherson, i. e., sons of the parson. For the prefix Mae always set forth direet descent, while O indieates eollateral relationship.

Surnames would appear to have been last of all invented in the Prineipalities ; eonsequently double duty falls on the Christian names. Who that has walked through a Welsh town but remembers the seores of Williamses, Robertses, Thomases, that met his eye and ear on every side ? The whole population seem to exist on their baptismal appellations, whieh may be attributable to the old Cambrian custom of making the father's Christian name the son's surname. Thus, the father of the pious Philip Henry was one John Henry, who, if he had lived in Wales, should have called his son Philip Johns or Jones, and whose own father was Henry Williams of Swansea.

At the present time, there seems to be a movement in favor of double surnames, sueh as Leveson-Gower, Wyndam-Quin, Beresford-Hope, Bulwer-Lytton. This may arise from family alliances in some instanees, and eertainly serves the purpose of preventing a confusion of houses. Thus it may be regarded as a symptom of thiekening population. Could it be that British society is about to be afflicted with a seareity of surnames ?—Leisure Hours.

MORE PORTUGUESE ENGLISH.

THE following are further extracts from the English phrases in The New Guide to Conversation in Portuguese and English, by Fonseea and Carolina. The words in braekets are inserted by us to explain the meaning of the Portuguese grammarians :

Assure him from mi remembranee.
Assure him upon mi friendship.
Which [to whom] do you speak ?
Have you say that.
At what is employed that ? [For what purpose is that used ?]
At what purpose have say so ?
Let us go to respire the air.
Let us go on ours feet.
Do which [whose] is that book ?
At what o'elock is to get up ?
Put your confidence at my [in me].
At what do you think ?
At whieh believe you be business ? [With whom do you intend to trade ?]
Do is so kind to tell me it.
At whieh is this hat ?
Have him some children ?
At what o'cloek dine him ?
At what is that ? [Of what nse is that ?]
Apply you at [yourself to] the study during that you are young.
Like you the soup ?
Dress your hairs.
Sing an area [air.]
That place is too mueh gracious. [That place is very agreeable.]
This trees make a beauty shade.
Thesc aprieots and these peaehes make me and to come water in the mouth.
That is sigu from good time. [That is a sign of fair weather.]
How do you can it to deny ? [How can you deny it ?]
That depend on to you.
This wine is from bad quality.
This hat go to well.
These shoes are too much narrow.
This coat go to you [fits you] very well.
That is that i have think. [That is what I thought.]
That looks me. [That concerns me.]
That is what make him angry.
That are the dishes whose you must be and to abstain. [These are dishes from which you must abstain.]
This meat ist not too over do. [This meat is not cooked enough.]
How many the earth produce. [How much does the land yield.]
Count upon my. [Count upon me.]
I understand [hear] some noise.
I will let a lodge. [I want to hire a chamber.]
I go me to get up.
It must me some ink.
Tell that you will do. [Tell what yon want.]
Of my side, i am your's. [As for me, you can depend upon me.]
Give me some good milk newly get out. [Give me some good fresh milk.]
Give me of you please a taking your's snuff. [Give me, if you please, a piuch of your snuff.]
Exculpate me by your brother's.
God consecrate you. [God bless you.]
How many time shall yon be in returning ? [When will you returu.]
And my also. [And I too.]
She do not that to talk and to eackle. [She does nothing but talk and prattle.]
Send him to look for. [Send for him.]
She take care from her house hold. [She takes care of her household.]
He have not reach the twenty years age.
She make the prude.
She have always anything whieh is it bad. [She always wears something that does not become her.]
Eight o'eloek come to strike. [It is about to strike eight.]
He will not hold one's tongue. [He will not hold his tongue.]
He shall know it nothing. [He shall know nothing of it.]
It not remember me. [I do not remember.]
He burns one's self the brains. [He blew his brains out.]
He refuse to marry one's self. [He refuses to marry.]
It want put again a glass at my wateh.
He was fighted in duel.
They fight one's self together. [They are fighting with each other.]
It must never to laugh of the unhappies. [We must never laugh at the unfortunate.]
He is commendable so mueh by one's birth that by it merit. [He is estimable for birth as well as for merit.]
He does kill him poniard's blows. [He killed him with a dagger.]
I am eatehed eold.
I not make what to cough and spit. [I do nothing but cough and spit.]
I am pressed myself. [I am in haste.]
I am very glad ones. [I am very glad.]
I answer by [for] him.
I have eroped [snuffed] the eandle.
I deeamp me there. [I shall leave this plaee.]
I oppose me at him. [I am against him.]
I do no which you are. [I do not know you.]
I do not eomplain me from nothing.
I dead myself in envy to see her. [I am dying of desire to see her.]
I diseharge me in my duty.
My head is siek.
I come not in there. [I do not agree to that.]
Have you understand they ?
The sun one's sets. [The sun sets.]
The sun glisten ? [Is the sun shining ?]
The snow melt one's. [It is thawing.]
Do you hear to strike ? [Have you heard the cloek strike ?]
The air is temperate.
The erop shall be too plentiful.
The erop [harvest] approaeh.
The summer is go out. [Summer has passed.]
The days begin to be grow.
The thunderbolt is falling down.
The loadstone attraet to himself the iron.
The things are over this ease. [The affairs are in this condition.]
The rose-trees begin to button [bud.]
The things have changed to aspeet.
The hands itch at him. [His hands iteh.]
The thing is how done. [The thing is as good as done.]
The trade do not go. [Trade has stopped.]
Sir, make me that favor.
My thirst is queneh.
Where yon go too [so] fast ?
Where tend that way ? [Whither does that road lead ?]
It knock one's the door ; go to and see who is it. [Some one is knoeking at the door ; go aud see who it is.]
Take attention to cut you self. [Take care lest you cut yourself.]
What do him ? [What is he doing ?]
What may tell ones ? [What does he say ?]
What have from the month you are to-day ? [What day of the month is this ?]
What have you on the eye ?
Return us at home. [Let us go home.]
If i was in your place, i sall do it. [I would do it if I were in your plaee.]
Every man is exposed to mistake himself.
You shall eateh eold one's. [You will eateh eold.]
You make grins. [You are grinning.]
Will you to break fast ?
Will you fat or slight ? [lean.]
Your parents does exist yet ? [Are your parents still living ?]

AN INGENIOUS AND CLEVER SWINDLE.—A well known German noble played a game of ecarte, at Hamburg, with a youug Frenchman of pleasing address, and got up in the height of fashion. The stakes were heavy, and the Frenchman having lost, handed over to the winner 10,000f. in French bank notes. The Germanic Don put up the notes in his poeket book, went back to his hotel in great spirits, and heartily enjoyed his dinner. As he was sipping his coffee and smoking his cigar afterwards, the waiter brought up to him another Frenchman, an elderly man, of decidedly military appearance, who requested a private interview. "Sir," he said, "I have called on you on a very unpleasant business. You played a game of cards this afternoon with my youug friend X——?" "Yes." "You won 10,000 francs ?" "I did." "I know it ; he paid you in Freuch notes. Well, sir, I am sorry to tell you these notes are forged. X's friends, who are in a high positiou, have discovered their relative's goings on, and have deputed me, as an old frieud of the family, to hush the matter up. Here are ten bank notes for 1,000 francs. Return to me those given you by my misguided young friend." The German immediately handed the notes he had reeeived, accepted those tendered in exchange, was profuse in his acknowledgments, and the elderly person, enjoining secreey, bowed himself out. Our German returned to the rooms next day, and the first person he met was young X——, the forger. He cut him dead. X—— insisted on an explanation. After some difficulty the German related what had taken plaee. "My dear friend," exelaimed the Frenchman, "you have been diddled. Have your notes examined." They turned out to be spurious. The elderly "friend of the family" was an ingenious swindler, who had watched the game the preceding day, and availed himself of the candor of the German to exchange photographic bank notes for the real article.

BE true to your own highest eonvictions. Intimations from our own souls, of something more perfect than otners teaeh, if faithfully followed, give a conseiousness of spiritnal force and progress never experienced by the vulgar of high life or low life, who march along as they are drilled, to the step of their tunes.

PHILOSOPHIC PARAGRAPHS.

THAT every human soul has its sacred coneerns and its divine eommunion is the simplest of thoughts, but so deep aud moving, that where it is reeeived and aeknowledged it calls up angelie virtues ; where it is insulted and deuied, it lets slip avenging fiends. Wherever it is siucerely held, it seeures that reverential feeling towards others, beneath whose spell the passions sleep and without whieh the preeept of eourtesy and the definition of rights are an ineffeetual form. Power loses its insolence and dependenee its sting, where their mutual relatiou does not carry the whole individuality with it, but stops with the limits of social and politieal convenienee, and lies under the restraining proteetion of a supreme equality before God.—Ethics of Christendom, Westminster Review, January, 1852.

THERE is indeed one true and original law, conformable to reason and to nature, diffused over all, invariable, eternal, whieh ealls to the fulfilmeut of duty and to abstinenee from injustiee, and which calls with that irresistible voiee which is felt in all its authority wherever it is heard. This law eannot be abolished nor curtailed nor affected in its sanctions by any law of man. A whole senate, a whole people eannot dispense from its paramouut obligation. It requires no eommentator to render it distinetly intelligible, nor is it different at Rome and at Athens, at the present and in ages to eome ; but in all times aud in all nations, it is and has been and will be, one and everlasting—one, as that God, its great author and promulgator, who is the common sovereign of all mankind, is himself one. No man can disobey it, without fleeing as it were from his own bosom and repudiating nature, and in this very act will inflict on himself the severest of retributious, even though he escape what is eommonly regarded as punishment.—Cicero.

NIGHTLY forbear to close thine eyes to rest
Ere thou has questioned well thy conscious breast,
What sacred duty thou hast left undone—
What act committed which thou oughtest to shun.
And as fair truth or error marks the deed,
Let sweet applause, or sharp reproach succeed ;
So shall thy steps while this great rule is thine,
Undevious lead in Virtue's paths divine.

—Pythagoras' "Golden Verses," Translated by Melmoth.

NATURE has made it delightful to man to know, disquieting him to know only imperfeetly, while anything remains in his power that can make his knowledge more aecurate or comprehensive. And she has done more than all this ; she has not waited till we have refleeted on the pleasure we are to enjoy or the pain we are to suffer. It is suffieient that there is something unknown whieh has relation to something that is known to us. We feel iustantly the desire of knowing this too. We have a desire of knowledge which nothing can abate. A desire that in some greater or less degree extends itself to everything which we are capable of knowing, and not to realities merely but to all the extravaganees of fiction.—Dr. Thomas Brown's "Lectures on the Philosophy of the Human Mind.

THE inquiry of truth, whieh is the love-making or wooing of it—the knowledge of truth, which is the presenee of it—and the behef of truth, which is the enjoying of it, is the sovereign good of human nature.—Bacon.

ONE of the chief arts of self-eulture is to unite the child-like teachableness, which gratefully welcomes light from every every human beiug who can give it, with manly resistanee of opinions, however current—of opinions, however gen erally re vered, which do not approve themselves to our deliberate judgment. You ought indeed to patiently and conscientiously strengthen your reason by other men's intelligenee, but you must not prostrate it before them ; espeeially if there springs up within you any view of God's word or universe, any sentiment or aspiration which seems to you of a higher order than what you meet abroad, give reverent heed to it ; inquire iuto it earnestly, solemnly. Do not trust it blindly, for it may be an illusion, but it may be the Divinity moving within you—a new revelation, not supernatural but still most prccious, of truth or duty ; and if after inquiry it so appear, theu let no clamor, or seorn, or desertion turu you from it. Be true to your own highest convietions. Intimations from your own souls of something more perfect than others teaeh, if faithfully followed, give us a conseiousness of spiritnal forec and progress, never experieneed by the vulgar or high life or low life, who march as they are drilled, to the step of their times. —Channing.

SOURCES OF THE NILE.—Capt. Speke has not been allowed to receive the houors of discovering the source of the Nile without challenge. Dr. Charles Beke, a high authority on African geography, maintains that the fact of the Nile flowing out of Lake N'yanza no more proves the lake to be the source of the river thau the fact of the Rhone issuing from the Lake of Geneva indicates the true origin of that river. Dr. Beke reminds seientific men, that as long ago as 1849 he had pointed out the existenee of two great lakes, and Capt. Burton had also reported to the Royal Geographical Society that the N'yanza or Kilwa Lake is altogether distinct from the "Sea of Ujiji." From information gathered from the Church Missionaries at Mombas aud from native traders, the true source of the Nile is supposed to be to the east of Lake N'yanza, next the Snow Alps of Africa. Capts. Speke and Grant had rendered it certain that the N'yanza joins the Nile, though they had not absolutely connected it with the river flowing past Gondókoro, there being 200 miles of the river's course not followed by them. There is certainly room for further exploration before the discovery ean be considered complete.

"Father," said a little fellow, after having apparently refleeted intently on something, "I shan't send you any of my wedding eake when I get married." "Why not, my son ?" was the fond parent's inquiry. "Because," answered the young hopeful, "you didn't send me any of yours !"

ANNIE AND HER MASTER.

CHAPTER II.

Herr von Heilmann's lessons at Fraulein Gruppe's "Educational Institute" were given twice a-week—on Tuesday and Friday. On Wednesday the English teacher had a few hours at her own disposal—to visit friends, if she chanced to have any, or to do any needful shopping. So Annie Gresham's week had three days in it; seeing which, she was surely not much to be pitied, there being lives that seem as if they could know neither days in the week, weeks in the month, nor months in the year. Thank heaven, not many! Please heaven, it may be that in those few the seeming show is other and worse than the reality. Nature, for most of us, does something to break up such dread monotony; even to the prisoner in the half sub-marine dungeon comes change. The sun strikes the surface of the water and the wind ruffles it, and there is a greenish and dancing shimmer reflected on the dreary wall; the shadow that stands to him for light changes with the changing hours of the day. Perhaps there has hardly been so ennning-cruel a tyrant, or so dark and deep a duugeon; but to every prisoner not doomed to death has been left open some chiuk or cranny that let in something of the outer life of the world.

We have seen how Annie Gresham had used her Wednesday holiday. With a strange mingling of dread and longing she lived towards the following Friday.

It came; and on it, at the appointed hour, came Herr von Heilmann. It went, too, and with it went Herr von Heilmann, and he and Annie had not met.

Fraulein Gruppe so contrived—how she contrived was her sceret—that Annie had no lesson that day. Herr von Heilmann left; Annie listened, as well as she could through the throbbing of her heart, to the silence following the last pupil's lesson to the opening door, the step along the passage, the closing door—and she had not been summoned to the music-room! When it was too late, Fraulein Gruppe pretended to remember and regret this On any former day Annie would uot have allowed herself to be so forgotten. On any former day she would have frankly put the question that now died on her lips—"Had he not asked for her?" To-day she choked back some bitter tears and answered nothing to Fraulein Gruppe's apology. All the more she tormented herself with that unspoken question with others of the kind. If he had not asked for her, why had he not? Was it that he thought she did not choose to come? or did he think that her petulance of the other day deserved the rebuke of his neglect?

The same thing would have happened again; but on the next occurrence, when all the lessons but Annie's had been given, and Fraulein Gruppe was about to take leave of Herr von Heilmann, he said—

"Excuse me, madam, but my most promising pupil, Miss Gresham, has not been to me. Is she ill?"

"Dear me, no—only so sadly indifferent. Always out of the way when wanted. Your time is more than up, my good sir; I will not think of detaining you longer."

"I have time for Miss Gresham," was the quiet answer. Herr von Heilmann shot one of his keenly penetrating glances into Fraulein Gruppe's handsome eyes, and she yielded at once. Reddening, and murmuring something of his too great goodness, she went to fetch Annie. Returning with her, she resumed her former seat and her knitting. Till to-day Annie had always been left alone with her master. Fraulein Gruppe was not responsible for "the teacher," and "Englishwomen are so coldly cautious, so self-reliant, so competent to take care of themselves." However, something had aroused some kiud of jealous suspicion in the Fraulein's mind. Had she, on Annie's face that day, seen traces of tears and agitation? She therefore remained on duty—the duty, however, being to herself, not to Annie.

The lesson was only a lesson. Herr von Heilmann was inscrutable, and poor Annie strove to emulate her master's coolness. The lynx-eyed Fraulein discovered nothing; she could not perceive that the master leant over Annie more, or more closely, than over other of the pupils, (in fact, it struck her that just the contrary was the case,) or that his fingers lingered upon hers when they had occasion to touch them; it was such things as these that the coarse-textured mind of the woman had expected to discover. Had she been a wiser or a purer woman she might have found cause for the confirmation of her suspicion that between Annie and her master there was "a something," in the fact that the master treated this pupil with more of distant respect than he observed towards any of the others, though two or three of them were no younger than Annie.

Poor Annie played badly; instinctively she knew that the ends of Herr von Heilmann's moustache were gnawed pitilessly, that his brow contracted with a frequent frown, and that it was no use to hope to see the quiet smile or the pleasant twinkle in the sincere eyes, with which he had been wont to praise her. Annie could not bear that he should think her careless of his pained displeasure; so she braved the grim presence of Fraulein Gruppe, which often made her dumb and said:

"I am very sorry to have played so ill, but I have had hardly any time for study." Which was the truth. He answered no otherwise than by a grave bow; but the pleasant, kindly light came into his eyes, and as he closed the piano for her he said;

"My mother much desires to see you; will you make her a visit to-morrow?"

The Fraulien Gruppe interposed:

"I am truly sorry to disappoint the most excellent Frau von Heilmann; but I propose a pleasure for my little friend to-morrow; I require her to take the young ladies to a concert at Sconhans, at which Herr Steinwitz, whom the Fraulein Gresham admires, will play."

Sudden tears gathered blindingly in Annie's eyes. She did not admire Herr Steinwitz, who was a rival and opponent of her master's; but she did not dare speak, lest her tears should fall then and there; she hurried from the room with hardly a salutation to her master and no message to her old friend, his mother. No sooner was it too late than she began to fret herself greatly at having been guilty of such ungracious discourtesy.

"Miss Gresham will never do you much credit, I fear, mein Herr," began the Fraulein; "she does not improve; how slightingly and unappreciatively she played that wonderful Andante of yours! She will never do you justice."

"To-day Miss Gresham did not do herself justice," was Herr von Heilmann's somewhat grimly-spoken reply.

"She is so uncertain! In everything I find her so flighty and unequal—sadly unfit for her position, poor thing!"

"Unfit for her position, as you say," Herr von Heilmann returned, rather absently. "You are right, madam; it strikes me so. And if you would, out of the fulness of your womanly charity, make the position a little more fit for her, it might be well; but excuse me—I presume."

"Any suggestions of Herr von Heilmann's on any subject! Is there anything of which Miss Gresham has complained?" The voice was soft and smooth enough, but the eyes were dangerous, reminding Herr von Heilmann of the impolitic imprudence of interference.

He answered more blandly, not noticing the closing question: "I would suggest, then, some arrangement that should afford Miss Gresham fair time to study for her music lessons. She has a promising enough talent, madam, I assure you, and some love of the art." With those words Herr von Heilmann accomplished his retreat.

There was no attempt after that to defraud Annie of her lessons, or of time to study for them, but Fraulein Gruppe was invariably present. Two, three, four weeks passed without there being a possibility of her seeing Frau von Heilmann. In those weeks Annie grew thinner and paler. Sometimes it seemed to her that Herr von Heilmann himself was not quite as formerly—that a shade of melancholy saddened his serious eyes—that with each lesson he was more completely than ever only her master.

The setting-in of the "Wustestadt season" showed Annie more than she had known before of Herr von Heilmann's position. She saw him in public, courted and flattered by all the music-loving beauties of the town and the neighborhood. He was "well-born"—as his father's son he was not without a certain prestige, and his own reputation was steadily on the increase; among his pupils were many blonde baronesses and fair countesses, whose passion for his art was secondary to their passion for its master, and who in public places appeared to encourage each other to flutter around him, surroundiug him with an atmosphere of flattery and fascination.

One evening Annie, hidden, as she thought, in the group of girls of whom she was in charge, watched him thus surrounded, with a sad, proud feeling at her heart of how far off he stood—sad for herself, and proud, so proud, for him! The concert had been given for a charitable object—for the benefit of an old and disabled musician. Herr von Heilmann had played grandly; now he stood, cold and courteous, tall and stately, the centre of an admiring group, paying a grave acknowledgment of just homage here, gravely pushing aside foolish flattery there, while his eyes keenly searched the crowded room. Annie did not know how much her eyes were saying when his found them. Steadily, without any show of haste, he made his way through the billowy sea of crinolined beauty to the quiet corner occupied by Fraulein Gruppe's pupils. He spoke to each of them—a word about the violinist who had played, the harpist who was about to play, a brief criticism of the various schools of music represented by the selections of the programme—then, last, he turned to Annie. There was nothing to draw attention upon her—no difference made that could be perceptible to the world at large, or even to the sharp eyes of the pupils; but there was something which Annie felt—some sunshine of kindness and encouragement, some pleased recognition and acceptance of her outspoken admiration, passed from his eyes into her soul and made tumult there.

But somebody reported or invented something about that meeting which did not please the Fraulein Gruppe's pupils—a charge she had always accepted with reluctance; for among the number were girls of her own age, who, having little womanly modesty or discretion, at times greatly vexed and annoyed her by the levity of their conduct.

CHAPTER III.

At last, a Wednesday came on which Fraulein Gruppe could find no excuse to prevent Annie from visiting her old friend, Frau von Heilmann. Not at the end of her resources, however, the Fraulein herself experienced an earnest wish to visit the dear old lady, and bade Anuie wait till she was at leisure to accompany her. By this means Annie lost two hours of her precious holiday. At last, however, she and the Fraulein Gruppe were on their way towards the Garten-Strasse. At the end of it they met Herr von Heilmann; he released Annie from her jailoress by requesting the honor of a few moments' conversation with the Fraulein on the subject of the private concert to be given shortly at her Institute—at the same time stating that, as his mother was somewhat indisposed, it would be well that the honored lady should postpone the favor of her visit.

"Will she see me? may I go on?" asked Annie, timidly.

"Will my mother see you! Certainly, Das versteht sich," (ca va sans dire.) Herr von Heilmann's tone was rather reproachful, while there was a slight twinkle of amusement in the corner of his eye. Then, from courtesy to the Fraulein ogress, (for a man must be courteous to an ogress who has more or less power to torment his heart,) he added, still addressing Annie—"My mother stands on no ceremony with you, you know. The visit of the Fraulein Gruppe being a more unwonted honor——"

Annie sped on, and Fraulein Gruppe, well pleased, turned to accompany Herr von Heilmann some distance on his way. She knew now that there was little chance of Annie's seeing her master again that day, for she knew that Herr von Heilmann's engagements would detain him till long after Annie's leave of absence would have expired. Annie sped on, but when she reached the familiar door her heart failed her; she made no sudden ascent and rapid incursion, as had been her wont; her feet faltered; she approached her old friend with shy hesitation.

Frau von Heilmann sat in her cold-weather place near the stove to-day—knitting, of course. She greeted Annie with kindliness, but there was less motherliness and some restraint in her manner. She was under orders; the one subject on which she was not to speak was ever present to her, naturally.

"More crippled than ever, my dear," she said, in answer to Annie's questions. "I'm set fast till spring now, and that seems a long time to live forward to, for at my age one cannot look for many more earthly springs. Very pretty, my child, and very warm," she said, as she drew on a pair of mittens Annie had brought her. "So you have sometimes thought of the old woman all this time—eh? You made these for her!"

"Yes; you did not think I had forgotten—would not have come to you if I could! I have been hindered and tormented: the time has been very long." The tears were in Annie's eyes.

"Poor little one! It is as Gottfried says; you are thinner and paler."

"He said so—he notices, then?"

"Why should he not? You know how kind-hearted and compassionate he is: his eyes are keen, too. Don't you remember, child, when that poor teacher at Fraulein Gruppe's fell ill, that it was my Gottfried who noticed how she drooped and withered—as it was my Gottfried who had her brought here and nursed and tended till she died—the poor old, worn-out, friendless thing!"

"I remember," sighed Annie.

"As I was saying," proceeded Frau von Heilmann, "I am set fast till spring. I do not care much to go out; from that window, where Gottfried sets me whenever the sun shines, I see plenty of life and movement. A still-contained, inward-turned existence is the most fitting for an aged woman, some think; but I don't much believe it, Annchen. While we are in this world, it seems to me more beautiful and right to live its joys and sorrows—through those of others when our own are past. The thing that does sometimes fret me is, that I cannot hear my Gottfried play in public, and see how they court and praise him. Last night, in the concert room of the Schauspielhaus, he played grandly, they tell me. Did you hear him, child?"

"No."

"He likes to play in that room; and then the concert was given for the benefit of the widows and orphans of actors and musicians. Yes, he played grandly: the Grafinn Rosalie von Thauenwald has been here this morning, brimming over with enthusiasm. She has paid me a great deal of attention lately, Annchen mein: can she fancy that the simple old mother does not see through her?" Frau von Heilmann laughed merrily, but not ill-naturedly. "Well, she is a pretty creature. I do not hold in great esteem the gay young widows of old husbands, nor, indeed, any widow whose life shows no effort to bring itself into accord with the apostle's description of that of 'eine rechte Wittwe,' 'die einsam ist, die ihre Hoffnung auf Gott stellet.' But she is a pretty creature; there are many excuses to be made for her, and she may say (through the sober-minded and pious demeanor of this German woman would sometimes flash a spark of French vivacity—"wicked-wise" she called it) that she has at any rate set her heart upon the peace of God (Gottfried.) I do not see how I can think the worse of her for that, though in my young days it was not the fashion for women, whether maidens or widows, to do the courting. Yet, undeniably, she is a charming creature, and seems to me to have more heart than most of her kind. Do you know her, Annchen?"

"By sight, only, liebe Frau."

To-day it was not Mutterchen and Tochterchen. Formerly the old, dear words had been innocently used: they could be so no longer; they must mean their meaning or not be spoken. If to-day they were uttered by chance, Annie would blush and grow confused beneath Frau von Heilmann's shrewd, inquiring look. In one of the awkward pauses ensning when this had happened, Annie turned her eyes upon the flowers filling a vase on the table which stood near, and commented on their beauty. "Yes, they are lovely; but I do not much love to see such a forcing of the fair order of nature. May lilies in November must feel themselves so not-at-homish. They came from the youug Grafinn. She sent them this moruing with the prettiest of notes, before she came herself. There lies the note, child; read it if you will: observe how neatly she compliments Gottfried in the postscript. He read it with the grimmest of faces, nevertheless. I have had many such pretty notes with neat postscripts. Eeh, Annchen, when the opera comes out, I expect I shall have a fine time of it then with bouquets and billets-doux, fruits, bon-bons, and what not! Sometimes I feel quite grieved that the pretty creatures should waste so much time and trouble: if I say so to Gottfried, he answers with one of his inwardly amused looks, 'You have the benefit, mother mine; they are not harmed, nor am I.'"

"But they must be harmed, and he too." cried Annie.

"Eeh! you think so, child. Place aux dames; we will begin with the ladies. 'They must be harmed,' you say—and why? It is no question of the true feelings of true women; it is puppet-play. Take Gottfried from them, and they will set up some less worthy idol. Is it not something that it should be a true man, and a true musician, before whom they play out their little game?"

"Perhaps."

"Where for them do you find the harm, then, of their amusement?"

"I do not know. Perhaps nowhere; yet I feel as if it were somewhere."

"As you do not know, we will pass on. You say he too must be harmed. How? Do you think this sort of thing will make my Gottfried vain?"

"No, no, no. I was not thinking that Herr von Heilmann could be made vain. But—but must it not be harmful to any man to have his notion of women brought so low?"

"It must be harmful to any man to have his notion of women brought low. Yes, child, there you are right; but on my son these things do not work thus. Even if, every day of his life, he were pained, grieved, disgusted, by seeing women so far from what he would have them, seeing their actions characterized by a want of all true humility, as by a want of all modest dignity, this would in no way affect his reverence for abstract womanhood, or lower his Ideal. I know this, not only because, when we have talked on the subject, he has said it, but also because his conduct in many instances has proved it to me. He is too through-and-through chivalrous, too wholly the soul of honor, for these things to work upon him harmfully. It seems to me that his eye pierces through the atmosphere of frivolous untruth and fashionable ugliness with which we so often surround ourselves, and reaches to the central potential truth of our being. The spiritual insight of such a nature may in the most seeming frivolous of fashionable follies detect the stirring and striving of a saving element—the blind beating of the bars, and the dazzled fluttering towards the truth—may therefore detect something not unworthy of reverence. Reverence is the inmost principle of my Gottfried's nature. I have never seen the thing bearing the shape of woman that he seemed able to scorn. With such a man a woman is safe, let her—— But I am prosiug; when I talk of Gottfried the subject sometimes runs away with me, Annehen." As she spoke she suddenly looked from her knitting full into the girl's face. "Prosing and philosophizing. I have just been reading the Herr Professor Diehmann's work."

Then, while Annie's heart was throbbing and burning to say some little word that should prove her recognition of the nobleness of such high faith and chivalry, the clever old woman began to talk with lucidity and power of the book she had just named—talk which ended in being in itself a little philosophical essay—a mental exercise for self-improvement, for she knew right well that Annie heard little and understood less of what she was sayiug.

After Annie had risen to go, Frau von Heilmann said, "The Christmas holidays cannot be very far now; you must spend them with me as you did the Midsummer. I will arrange that with the Fraulein Gruppe. You are not sold to her, body and soul, Annchen, so pluck up courage, and don't be so much afraid of her as Gottfried thinks you are, poor child. Should she send you away, I could no doubt find you a place would suit you as well. Perchance better." Here she restrained a mischievous smile, which, spite of her efforts, indicated itself. "Through the Christmas weeks I shall be alone, as I was at Midsummer," she went on. "Gottfried goes to some of his grand friends—a round of visits in the neighborhood, from one Schloss to another. I wish it, I send him. I did not desire that he should be a musician; I wished to see him a soldier, as his father was; but since he is a musician, I desire for him as great a name and as wide a fame, being a musician, as had his father, being a soldier. The more he is known, the more he is respected. The people he goes to have influence—will be useful—so I send him, my Gottfried, out into the world."

The old woman's dark eyes flashed under the bushy snow-white brows—a flash that quickened the beating of Anuie's heart.

In leave-taking to-day Annie stooped to kiss the old brown hands; they drew her down: Frau von Heilmann kissed her solemnly on both cheeks, with the words "God guide thee, child." Then, still holding the girl fast, she added, "Gottfried gave me a message. He says, Annehen, he begs of you to remember that, however your heart may decide in a certain matter, you must not flee from us and shun us; that we, he and his mother, will always be your friends. He earnestly begs of you to remember this. He says that, if you choose so, he can be to you only a friend, and yet with all his might your friend. This is true; I know it. There, I have given his message; and again I say, God guide thee, child."

Again, and more fervently, Annie kissed the old woman's hands, then she hurried away.

Outside, instead of turning towards her prison house, though she had already over-stayed her time, Annie took her way through the sodden paths and bare trees of the great garden towards the dismal banks of the black canal.

She wanted freedom, open air, space. She felt that, just then, she could not endure to be shut in between walls, surrounded by eyes and tongues

Having gained the canal-path, she hurried on and on, faster and faster, unconsciously driven by her driving thoughts, not heeding the increasing cold and darkness.

When at length she paused and turned, she was frightened to find herself alone so late in that dismal place. The lights of the town, the few she could see through the branches of the trees which interveued between her and it, looked far off; nothing seemed near but the clinging fog and the crawling water.

Presently it seemed to her that, walk swiftly as she would, a following footstep gained upon her. Betweeu her and the town, after she should have crossed the bridge, lay the desolate gardens, as dreary and deserted at this hour as any savage wilderness or wood. There came into her mind, against her will, stories she had heard about things that had happened in this neighborhood, and the steady tramp, tramp, tramp of the gaining footstep excited her wildest fears.

Reaching the bridge just as she knew by the sound that her pursuer, if such he were, was upon her, she paused there, breathless and exhausted, ready in the desperation of her fear to jump into the water—either that, or he should pass her before she entered the garden.

A figure, looking large through the fog, was at her side; it passed. She thought she had not been observed; her heart gave a great bound; then the person who was so much an object of her dread paused and turned. Annie clutched the low parapet of the bridge, and held herself ready for a spring.

"Is it possible! here alone, at this hour?" questioned the voice, which she had no doubt now was the dearest to her in all the world.

Poor Annie! she sprang to Herr von Heilmann, and clasped both little hands round his arm, beside herself with relief and gratitude for the first moment.

"You knew me. then?" was her senseless question.

"Not at first, Fraulein; and now it seems too incredible. I paused and turned because I could not let myself pass by any woman in such a place, at such an hour, without making her the offer of my protection."

Annie's hands loosed themselves and fell from off his arm. What could he think of her? She felt her soul shrink from the severe pain expressed by his voice. Would he not have cause now to believe the worst Fraulein Gruppe might choose to tell him of her insubordination and wild imprudence?

Poor Annie! It was a pity the darkness had made it impossible for her to detect the light, sudden and sweet, that had come into his face, the twinkle of the eye and twitch of the mouth, when he felt the confiding clasp of those little hands. She had once seen something like it, in the very early days of their acquaintance, when she talked his tongue with blundering difficulty. She had let a "du" slip out instead of the fit and formal "sie," and had for a moment wondered what error of hers had caused the look of repressed but pleased amusement, the transient sparkle, which she saw cross her master's grave face.

As well as she could the poor child excused herself as they walked towards the town side by side. Her longing for air and liberty had been irresistible, she told him; it was, sometimes; till the last few years, she had led such a free life. She had been thinkiug, and had not noticed how far she went or how dark it grew. She had paused on the bridge because the following footstep frightened her, and she felt safer there than in the garden.

"How could the bridge save you, my Fraulein?"

"The water might have saved me," she answered.

"Aeh Himmel!" She did not catch his exclamation, or know the inward shudder—the inward grasping clasp—with which it was breathed. He said a few strong words of the danger she had incurred, but he did not speak any personal reproof—from him to her; that he assumed no right to do.

"I will not do so any more; I will not do anything so imprudent again; I am very sorry," Annie said, with child-like simplicity and fervor of penitence. "Now, think of it no more, pray!" she added, with some dignity.

"It is not a thing to be lightly dismissed from the mind, Fraulein; but I thank you earuestly for the goodness of your promise, and we will speak of the painful subject no more."

What did they then speak of? Nothing.

Herr von Heilmann was silent—from pain and displeasure, Annie thought. In truth, he was both pained and displeased, but infinitely pitiful too; and the subject of his thoughts was how best to extricate the heedless girl from the unpleasant consequences of her imprudence. They were in the Garten Strasse by the time he had settled that matter with himself.

"It will be best that you come to my mother," he said to Annie. "She will scold you sharply, but you know how good her heart is towards you. You must sup with us, and afterwards our old Hans shall conduct you to Fraulein Gruppe's, and my mother will send with you a note, in which she will apologize for having detained you."

"You are very kind. I am much ashamed to give so much trouble. Would it not, perhaps, be better that I should return at once?"

They stood under the entrance-lamp now, and she was reassured by the kindliness of his face, as he answered, half-jestingly:

"To be sent, like a naughty child, supperless to bed. The frugal eveuing meal is long over at the Fraulein Gruppe's. No; enter with me; you are half-starved and very tired; let my mother see you rested and refreshed before you return."

So they mounted the stairs, and together entered the well warmed and lighted room where the table was already spread for the friendly eveniug meal.

Herr von Heilmann hastened to offer to his mother a few words of explanation, adding, in a lighter and more familiar tone than he had used while they were alone, and gently laying his hand on Aunie's shoulder as he spoke:

"Do not scold our poor little friend much, mother. She is tired and starved and cold, and she has promised, the good child, to be no more so imprudent."

With those words he passed through the room to his own apartment; and poor Annie, overcome by his kindness and the weakness of her own exhaustion, knelt before his mother, rested her head on her lap, and burst into tears.

But neither those tears nor Herr von Heilmann's intercession saved Annie from a sharp scolding—a stinging reproof; after which the truest motherly kindness was lavished upon her.

Annie spent two very happy hours. It was so warm, so bright, so home-like, so every way pleasant, in Frau von Heilmann's living-room at the restful, comfortful, friendly hour when the Abend-brod was eaten—the time when, the day's labor done, the mother and son drew nearest to each other. Annie—little, strange, and friendless Annie—was made to feel neither strange nor friendless, but one of the house inmates.

As by-and-by she stepped out into the bitter night, followed by the old house-servant, Hans, she drew close arouud her the soft warm shawl of Frau von Heilmann's, which her master had himself hung upon her shoulders, and said to herself:

"What do I care for the night or the cold—or her cruelty? Let the night be black and the wind biting. Let the Fraulein speak swords and look poison and daggers. It is well with me—all is warm to me—all is well with me."

This evening Annie's confidences to herself were made, not in the old home-tongue but in the tougue of the home she had just left, the home which she had been made to feel, if even she had not been told, stood ready for her, waiting to be, when she willed it, her home. Lovingly she dwelt upon some of the homely home-suggestive phrases of the friendly tongue, and she was happy, so happy, till the old doubt returned. How could he love her? How should he love her? How otherwise than with "pity and grave kindness" should such a man love a girl like her?

If so—if he loved her so, and only so, well? was not this, from him, enough for her?—for her happiness? For her—for her happiness? Yes. But for him—for his happiness? Annie believed that, through his music, she knew something of her master that obliged her to answer the last question with a fatal "no."

She was at her prison-house.

"Leben sie wohl, my most highly-honored Fraulein," old Hans was saying.

If she were sharply rated or escaped lightly, she did not know.

Thackeray in America (1853.)—I looked forward to a dull, wintry journey, and laid in a stock of newspapers to while away time; but in the gentleman's cabin of the ferry-boat, whom should I see but Thackeray! We greeted each other cordially. He was on his way to Philadelphia, to deliver a course of lectures. We took seats beside each other in the cars, and the morning passed of delightfully. He seems still to enjoy his visit to the United States exceedingly, and enters into our social life with great relish. He had made a pleasant visit to Boston; seen much of Prescott, (whom he speaks highly of,) Ticknor, Longfellow, etc. Said the Bostonians had published a smashing criticism on him; which, however, does not seem to have ruffled his temper, as I understand he cut it out of the newspaper, and inclosed it in a letter to a female friend in New York.—Life of Washington Irving.

Bear with Another's Faults.—The great secret is to learn to bear with each other's faults: not to be blind to them—that is an impossibility or a folly.

Labor is the parent of all the lasting wonders of this world whether in verse or stone, whether poetry or pyramids.

EXTENUATING CIRCUMSTANCES.

Of the strange and whimsical motives which determine French juries in the discovery of extenuatiug circumstances, les circonstances atténuantes,) very curious instances are recorded. From the generally accepted representation of the Gallic character we might have supposed that sentimental considerations would exercise great influence, and that enthusiasm or even fanaticism for religion, liberty, glory or ambition, though carried out in deplorable excesses, would find mercy tempered with justice; but on examination a different line of argument appears to be in usage, and the more horrid, unnatural and extraordinary the crime, the more attenuated is the guilt. Whether the guiding principle is that moustrous crimes are better evidence of mental aberration or irresponsibility than small ones, we cannot pretend to say, but assuredly the history of half-a-dozen cases selected at random from the records of the Freuch tribuuals would warrant such an idea.

Some years ago an innkeeper and his wife were tried for having murdered a traveller while lodging in their house, and further, for having made part of the dead body into sausages, with which they duly regaled succeeding customers. These singularly revolting accusations were clearly proved, and the jury returned a verdict of "guilty, but without premeditatiou, and under extenuatiug circumstances!" The landlord, (thoughtless, without doubt,) stabbed his guest, the wife unthinkingly cut up the body into sausages, and in a fit of absence of mind served them up to the other visitors. For such an extraordinary verdict no other explanation comes to us at this moment than that the admiration of the jury must have been unnaturally excited by the economy and thriftiness so largely manifested by the inu-keeper's wife.

In 1848 a man killed his mother, and then reduced the body to ashes in the fire-place. He was found guilty, but with "extenuating circumstanees." A bare verdict of guilty was doubtlessly reserved in case any other man should advise himself to burn his mother before she was absolutely murdered.

In 1843 a servant-girl committed several robberies on her master and mistress, who, unwilling to prosecute her, contentcd themselves with giving her notice to leave. The girl profited by her short stay to poison them both. The jury found her guilty; but considering how much she must have been irritated at the prospect of being discharged, added that it was under "extenuating circumstanees."

About the same period, a young woman, aged eighteen, who had not been married many months, happening to have had some little disagreement with her husband, was guilty of the horrible cruelty of pouring molten lead into his ear as he lay asleep. He did not die, but his sufferings were intense aud prolonged. The girl was tried for the offence; her counsel did not venture to affirm that his client had not committed the deed imputed to her, but suggested that it might have been the unhappy result of a mental aberration to which pregnant women are occasionally liable. The jury found this conceit so excellent that it extenuated the circumstances up to the point of depriving them of the semblance of guilt. They returned a verdict, recording the innocence of this interesting criminal.

Another time two women being tired of their respective husbands agreed to poison them both at the same moment. This they effected, but not without discovery. It is not to the police, however, but to the juries, that criminals must in France look for escape. They were tried and found guilty, but with extenuating circumstances. One would imagine from the rareness of an acquittal, and the frequency of les circonstances atténuantes, that the juries were in the habit of reducing to a mean the entire guilt and innocence brought before them; the result beiug an average of extenuating circumcumstances. A witty writer observed that, under such a state of things, it was a matter of wisdom to kill your wife rather than to let her be bored by you. "If you assassinate her," he says, "you are let off with the galleys; but if you bore her, she assassinates you."

A poor woman named Rosalie, unable to support her illegitimate child, and not having the courage to take it herself to the hospice for les enfans trouvés, agreed with a neighbor that he should convey it thither for a certaiu monetary consideration, to procure which the poor woman gave her last sou, and sold the remnant of her scanty wardrobe. When the day came the man expended the money in drink, and then coolly threw the child on the ground, crushed its head with the heel of his wooden sabot, and, digging a hole, buried it out of his sight. It will hardly be believed that any jury could find extenuating circumstances in this ruffianly case; but nevertheless so it was. Guilty, with the invariable addition of les circonstances atténuantes. A widow in the department of Vancluse, in 1845, was proved to have buried alive three illegitimate children in as many years. The same verdict was recorded.

Another woman, married to a brick-layer, and who it is to be presumed had at least some sentiment of hostility towards her husband, took the opportuuity, when he was working at the bottom of a well, to kill him by literally stoning him to death with her own hands. The same verdict was returned.

Another case of les circonstances atténuantes was that of a girl who stole a watch, uot, as it was clearly proved, through the pressure of poverty. A periodical, remarking on the verdict, observed that no doubt the jury had reflected that if every person iu want were to steal, robberies would become deplorably common, whereas for the caprices of the well-conditioned allowances had to be made.

At Isere a man set fire to the loft where his father, (a paralytic man upwards of eighty years of age,) slept, and fairly roasted him to death. It was remembered by witnesses that the accused had threatened his father in these words: "I would like to see thee roasted like a toad on a shovel." And he had to the best of his ability redeemed his promise. The jury, struck with admiration at the scrupulous fidelity with which the prisoner had kept his word, returned a verdict of guilty, but with extenuating circumstances.

For the eccentricity of the conclusions at which these French jurymen arrived we do not attempt to account—our own impression being that from the annals of crime it would be impossible to collect circumstances which could more justly be considered as aggravating rather than extenuating in their character. With us a jury is geuerally contented to recommend to mercy as occasion may seem to justify it; but it appertains to the judge to point ont when offences are complicated with what are specially termed aggravating circumstances, and to mark his sense of the same by a greater severity of admonition and punishment.

NOTICE

The publication of "The Californian" takes place on Saturday mornings, and copies may be obtained in the City at all News-stands, and of our News-agents through the country. It will also be served by carriers on the morning of publication.

* Correspondents will address all communications, business and otherwise, to C. H. WEBB, Office of "The Californian," 728 Montgomery street, San Francisco.*

THE CALIFORNIAN.

SAN FRANCISCO, SATURDAY, JULY 2, 1864.

HOW WELL THE CAP FITTED!

LAST week we gave a little advice to the Union party. We suggested that they should establish, in this city, a newspaper organ, which should have general charge of the policy of the party, control over its officers, and supervisiou of its members. The organ was to rely for its success not on its news or literary merits, but on its political influence. Its support was to come not from subscribers and advertisers, but from contributors who now have, or who expect to hold, State or Federal office. Subscribers and advertisers might withdraw their patronage, but contributors who feared removal or hope for appointment were to come down. Some others who did not desire office would perhaps rather contribute than be denouuced as Copperheads. Black-mailing is a power in the land.

The new organ in the name of the party was to declare that Irishmen, Catholics and Jews are naturally Copperheads. It was to counsel Union ueu to assume that every member of those classes is an enemy of his country, and to have no dealings with any one of them until his loyalty is affirmatively proved. It was to read A. A. Sargent and his frieuds out of the party. It was to speak of the State Central Committee as "weak-kneed," because the Committee would not require the Congressional nominations to be submitted to the State Convention. It was to denounce those members of the Committee who acted independently, as men whose loyalty cannot be trusted, because some of their matrimonial relatives are Irish. It was to assert that there is no sound Union paper in San Francisco except itself. It was to coutain at least half a dozen paragraphs every day maligning Uuion newspapers and Union editors. It was to say that every man who will not subscribe for it is a Copperhead. Measuring the loyalty of the merchants and storekeepers of San Francisco by their subscriptions to it, it was to say there are not more than a dozen loyal men among them. It was to hint that the contractors of the Monitor would make some part of the vessel fatally defective because they despised the new organ. In the name of the party, the new paper was to insult the People's organization of this city; and was to insinuate indirectly, if it darc not say so openly, that the citizens of San Francisco are disloyal because they make contracts payable in gold.

Such was the tenor of our article last week. We said that the establishment of an organ, which should have the pecuniary support and political influence of the leaders of the organization, and should be authorized to speak in the name of the party, and should pursue the course indicated, would have a great influence to increase the number, zeal and harmony of Union men, and would, perhaps, attain for itself a circulation of 250 copies. Bnt behold, the morning after the article appeared, the Howler—which we did not name in the article at all—came out with a declaration that our description applied to itself. If, after we have made a cap, any paper chooses to appropriate it, and put it on and say it fits—but hurts a little—surely the blame is not ours. To sum up the thing in a nutshell, we drew a fanciful picture not of a newspaper but of a nuisance, advised its establishment, and told how it might be engineered to advance in a left-handed way the interests of the Union party. Since the Daily American Howler confesses to have been pursuing the very course which we have described, we almost doubt the wisdom of our advice.

The Coming Fourth.—The Fourth is almost here, and preparations have been made to give it one of the jolliest greetings that ever met the day. Liberal subscriptions have been made to the fund, and the celebratiou promises altogether to be something memorable. The programme is given in another column, and if the procession is as long even as that, it will be a very creditable one. The precise amount of powder to be burned has not been ascertained, but as a venture we would scarcely like to have to let it off in the room where this paragraph is being written. Dr. She don, who so ably officiated as Grand Marshal of the Day last year, acts again this year. The address is to be delivered by the Rev. Dr. Bellows, and the poem by J. F. Bowman. Full particulars of what is to be done on the day and how the procession is to be formed, will be found in the programme.

A Suggestion.—They say there is an excellent opening for an inferior paper in an interior town. An "organ" is wanted at Howland Flat. Why does not the Howler go thither? The name of the locality has a singular appropriateness for the style of the "organ"—Howl and Flat!

Answer to Last Week's Enigma.—A correspondent sends 'Secessia" as the auswer to the enigma we published last week. He is wrong; although sibilants preponderate in that word, it does not at all fulfil the conditions. The answer is: Assessed.

GEN. WRIGHT'S FAREWELL.

BEFORE leaving his command on this coast Gen. Wright issues the farewell address which we print below. It will be seen that the old soldier is worried by the vituperation that has been showered on him by some portion of the press, and allows this feeling to betray itself in the document. For this we are sorry; every man in public life must expect to "walk with his head in a cloud of poisonous flies." Gen. Wright's devotion to his country has the endorsemeut of battle. It was a principle with him while those who impugn his loyalty were whispering in their cradles, and it was only necessary for him to point to his record to silence if not shame his traducers. Aside from this little exhibitiou of resentment at an annoyance which had better been passed by in silent coutempt, the paper is sensible and manly. Geu. Wright very truly says that the vindication of his course lies in the quiet and peace which prevails in the Department of which he has had military command. At this very moment, even here in an isolated State where men from every quarter of the country and of all opinions, are gathered together, more harmony obtains than exists in New York and other cities at the East where extreme measures have been resorted to. There is less disloyal feeling and more of generous, hearty Uniou sentiment among us than exists in any one of the middle or westeru States. All this might have been very different had Gen. Wright consented to be the tool of the hot-brained zealots who wished to swing him by the coat-tail as the instrument of their personal and political spites and revenges. Gen. Wright's course will have the endorsement of all prudent and sensible men, and his going will be regretted by all whose esteem is worth having:

Headquarters Department of the Pacific,
San Francisco, Cal., June 21st, 1864.

To the Loyal Citizens of the Pacific Coast:

On the eve of my being relieved from the command of the Department of the Pacific, it is deemed a proper occasion to take a retrospective view of the three years I have been in command. When I first assumed command of the Department, chbracing all the States and Territories west of the Rocky Mountains, I was not unmindful of the higb trust reposed in me by the Government; and the following communication, which I addressed to the Adjutant-General of the Army after the expiration of the first year of my command, will exhibit the course I had thought proper to pursue, and which has been persistently followed during the whole period of my administration of military affairs on this coast:

Headquarters Department of the Pacific,
San Francisco, October 27th, 1862.

Adjutant-General U. S. Army, Washington, D. C.:

Sir—I have served on the Pacific coast for ten years, the last year in command of this Department. My duties have called me to nearly every section of this great country—from the sunny plains of the South to the farthest bounds of our possessions in the North, I have been called, either to battle with our savage foes, or to aid in the preservation of this beautiful land from the borrors of civil war. During this long period I have had ample opportunities of judging of the character of the people, and the value to the Union of these remote possessions of the United States.

Previous to the war with Mexico, bnt little, comparatively, was known of this country. A few of our most adventurous people had found their way across the continent, and taken up their abode either in Oregon or California. But when peace was restored, and we acquired California, and coeval with that event, the discovery of gold mines, extensive and almost fabulous in richness, it caused a large influx in population. It was not alone from the States of our Union that they came—every quarter of the globe, as well as the Isles of the Ocean, contributed to swell the number. It will thus be seen that this country was overrun and occupied by people bringing with them, and retaining all their home prejudices, and ill calculated to establish a colony of loyal citizens, eager to promote the prosperity of the country. Time and contact have done much to harmonize and smooth down the discordant elements of this incongruous population. Yet the outbreak of a formidable rebellion in our land bud a tendency to revive those sectional sympathies and attachments, which have prompted men to glory in the fact, not that they are American citizens, but that they are from such and such a State, to which their paramount allegiance is due. Happily the number of men who thus ignore the authority of the Federal Government, and declare their fealty to the State from which they came, is small compared with that of the men who are Americans, and who love the Union, and are willing to risk their all for its preservation.

Such was the character, and such the division of sentiment on this coast, when I assumed command of the Department. I saw at once, that to overcome these threatening difficulties it was necessary to be watchful, vigilant and firm; not to create unnecessary alarm in the public mind, by hasty and ill-advised acts, but to pursue the even tenor of my way, regardless of personal consequences; and feeling assured that such a course could not fail to secure the respect of political parties of every complexion, and ultimately redound to the honor of our Government and country.

If what little I have done has contributed in the smallest degree towards preserving intact our glorious Union, and maintaining unsullied our flag, I shall feel more than repaid.

It affords me high satisfaction to inform the General-in-Chief that during all the period of my command in this Department, I have received the most cordial approval and assistance from the Governors and State officers, as well as from the most prominent citizens.

Very respectfully, your most obedient servant,
G. Wright,
Brig.-Gen. U. S. Army, Commanding.

Acting npon the principles contained in my letter above cited, I now point with pride to the happy and peaceful condition of this country. Entrusted, as I have been, with a high and responsible command, far removed from the seat of the General Government, I have during the whole period held in my hands the power of peace or war. Had I for a moment yielded to the insane demands of a radical press and its colaborers, I should have filled my forts with political prisoners, to gratify personal hatred—causing such an outburst of indignation at such a course as to render it almost certain that civil war and bloodshed would have followed.

The Union-loving people on this coast are vastly in the ascendant. They have the power and the will to maintain the integrity of the Union on these distant shores. Let every attempt to raise the standard of rebellion within your borders be crushed. Listen not to the insidious arts of a hireling, radical press, which, under the specious guise of loyalty, would not hesitate to gratify its pruriency for fame by doing all in its power to plunge your country in all the horrors of a civil war.

"Be just, and fear not;
Let all the ends thou aim'st at be thy country's,
Thy God's and truth's."

G. Wright,
Brigadier General U. S. Army, Commanding.

KILLING THE GOOSE THAT LAYS THE GOLDEN EGG.

THE old story of the man who had a goose that daily laid him an egg of gold, but who, not satisfied with the slow though sure yield, killed the goose with the idea of getting at all the eggs at once, has had a most striking illustration in the management of the Gould & Curry mine, if Professor Silliman's late report may be relied upon. This gentleman says that there has been taken from the mine monthly "about 7,000 tons, or 85,000 a year, yielding an aggregate of $6,000,000. Of this amount, $1,500,000 went to the stockholders, leaving $4,500,000 as the cost of miuing and milling, or slightly over $50 a ton. This statement makes no account of the loss in the tailings, which is probably 40 per cent. The tailings in the slime pits at the Company's mills are worth by assay over $130 per ton, only rich ores having been worked at this mill. As this Company divides the metal saved by custom mills equally with the millers, it is obvious if we put the cost of milling at $15 per ton that there has been paid out in profits to the millers more than the stockholders have received, the amount of dividends being about $17 50. This comparatively small net sum is obtained only by the exhaustion of the mine at the rate of 250 tons daily."

Think of it! Out from $6,000,000 taken from the mine in one year, only $1,500,000 find their way to the stockholders! And the ore worked at a loss of 40 per cent.! Is it any wonder that a revelation of this state of things should frighten owners and send the stock down like the mercury of a barometer when bad weather is brewing? Exhuming 250 tons of ore a day, apprehension might well arise that the mine would give out. A very few years of such disembowelling of the earth would leave little of all Washoe. Telegraph Hill couldn't stand such a drain long without going into liquidation. In the light of Professor Silliman's report, it would seem that the only object aimed at hitherto in the management of the mine has been to get out as much ore and extract as little metal from it as possible. Probably it was a development of these facts, a discovery of the gross error and extravagance in the mauagement of the mine, which has caused the stock to tumble so of late. For this there is no reason. The goose that has been laying the golden egg is not dead yet—to all intents and purposes it hangs higher than ever. The same report from which we gather these discouraging facts of the past, furnishes a hopeful promise for the future. A change has been inaugurated in the affairs of the mine. Under the new policy now being inaugurated, Professor Silliman says that a dividend of $150 per foot, and probably $200, can be made by working not over one-half the quantity of ores previously consumed. This is to be accomplished by the Company extracting no more ore than they can work at their own mill with an improved method of treatment. There is a pregnant lesson for other mines in the experience of the Gould & Curry.

Just in Time.—A neat little pamphlet has been laid upon our table, entitled The Bridegroom Extra—No. 2, containing—if the cover may be believed—"an extra despatch from the Heavenly Telegraph." The operator certainly has our thanks for his considerate kindness, and our best wishes that his wires may never be down. Another consideration occurs to us, and we cannot forbear making a suggestion. For the purpose apparently of testing how a newspaper could thrive in an intelligent community without news, a daily was, not long since, established in this city. Ever since, it has been howling for telegraphic despatches which it couldn't afford to pay for, and abusing everybody because it couldn't get them. Not being able to get dispatches, it filled its columns with diatribes. In this pamphlet we have a windfall for the proprietors, a sop which we trust will fill the mouth of the howling Cerberus and keep it quiet for a time. For here it has "despatches" which will only cost it the trivial expense of setting up the type. The line is not a State one and is under the control of no monopoly, though there is not much stock in this market. The "despatches," if we may judge by the specimens before us, are of a character that would suit the requirements even of a howling dervish. Will not the Howler avail itself of the opportunities thus offered it, abate its noisiness for a period, go peacefully to printing the despatches thus opportunely thrown in its way, and permit a wearied public to have at least a temporary peace? It is said that a howling dervish in the unfortunate countries where that sect abounds, was cured of his tantrums and dirtiness and made quite decent and respectable by the application of a galvanic battery. Electricity seems to be the only thing that will relieve the Howling Dervish, par excellence, of the Pacific, of his noisy complaint. If a "despatch" or two from the "Heavenly Telegraph" fail to work his cure, to grasp the tail of an electric eel for a few minutes might do a deal of good to the editor, but—what would become of the eel?

Byron's cynical lines:

Seek roses in December, grain in chaff,
Believe a woman or an epitaph.

have been thus altered to suit the times:

Seek roses in December, grain in chaff,
Believe a woman or the—telegraph.

Our war-steamer the Saranac missed the steamers Golden Age and Golden City, of which she went in search. We hope she'll have better luck in finding the Alabama, if ever sent out on such an errand.

FINANCIAL AFFAIRS, STOCKS, ETC.

THE most interesting financial intelligence received from the East during the past week is the announcement of the passage in the lower House of Congress of a new Loan Bill authorizing an issue of fourteen hundred million dollars in bonds of the Government. The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to dispose of any portion of these bonds in the United States or Europe. He is also empowered to issue as a part of said loan three hundred millions of a denomination not less than $10, payable at any time after three years, bearing an interest of not more than seven and three-tenths per cent., payable in lawful money at maturity. These notes or bonds are to be a legal tender for all debts. The old issue of seven-thirties, amounting to $140,000,000, matures shortly, and is redeemable in six per cent. bonds at or before maturity. The total bonded debt of the United States on the 10th of May last, was $800,000,000; the interest-bearing treasury notes in circulation amounted to $400,000,000, and the legal tender issues reached some $500,000,000—making a grand total of some $1,700,000,000—to which it is contemplated to add the $1,400,000,000 under the provisions of the new Loan Bill. The recent advance in the premium on gold at the East is partially attributable to this legislation, it not being supposed that the necessities of the Government demanded it at present. It is likely that no very large portion of this new loan will be required during the present year, and that the passage of the law at this time is merely inteuded to anticipate the requirements of the Secretary, rather than to meet any present exigency.

Latest telegraphic advices state that the new Gold Act was not meeting with the success anticipated, but was, in fact, aiding the movement to elevate the premium on Gold, because of the restrictions it imposed on operations at the Gold Board, and at the Stock and Exchange Board, which confined the transactions of speculators to a very limited sphere, and enabled them, without an open or public competition, to regulate the market to suit themselves. The wisdom of this species of financial tinkering will be readily appreciated by the simplest understanding. It is believed that unless so arbitrary and foolish a law is repealed, the evil sought to be abated will be aggravated. The apprehension felt a few days since with regard to the application of this Gold Act to our Special Contract law, is lessening somewhat; and yet it would be gratifying to positively know that Congress did not seek to interfere with our State law in this respect, but aimed solely to thwart the operations of those in other quarters.

Legal Tender notes continue to droop, and are dull at 47½ and 48½, owing to the unsettled condition of the market for Gold at the East.

The Money market here is comparatively easy, and we can learn of no pressure except among some dealers in mining stocks. It is now difficult to negotiate loans upon this description of collateral, even at wide margins and high rates of interest. In bank, the current rate is about 1½ per cent. for good paper. The Bank of California will commence business on Tuesday next, as previously announced; and there can be no doubt of its success under the guardianship of the gentlemen entrusted with the immediate management of the affairs of the Incorporation.

The Mining Share Market has been subjected to a fresh panic this week and all stocks have succumbed to its depressing influence. Much speculation is rife as to the immediate cause of this serious decline and many theories are advanced (some of which would appear plausible) in explanation of the movement.

Gould and Curry opened on Monday at $2,000, declined to $1,860, rallied to $2,250, receded steadily to 1,525, then advanced to 1,700, declined to $1,540, and was sold at the close yesterday at $1,620, buyer 10 days.

It is difficult to obtain reliable information as to the developments in the several shafts sunk from the lower level but it is believed by those who ought to be well informed that good ore is making its appearance again and that the lode is otherwise improving as depth is attained. A few days more will determine its character with more certainty.

Ophir has been rather active and in better request, advancing from $705 to $750, receding to $725 and closing at $725, some 32 feet changing hands.

Savage was largely dealt in, and 41 feet were sold, dropping from $1,550 to $1,200, rallying to $1,350, buyer 30, and selling yesterday at $1,200.

Potosi fell from $1,000 to $910 and $900 but is now firm at about $1,000 bid, $1,200 asked, some 30 feet were sold. Recent advices from this mine continue to be of the most favorable character.

Yellow Jacket has been more active than usual and 42 feet changed hands, rising from $700 to $800 declining to $750 and closing at about $800.

Imperial has been in decided request since Thursday last, and advanced from $140 to $165, and sold yesterday at $155.

North Potosi has been active, advancing from $55 to $68, and declining to about $50, at which rates some 300 feet were sold.

Lady Bryan was maintained within the range of $21 and $24, closing at about $26. Small sales were made.

North American has still further declined, and fell from $82 50 to $72 50 and $62 50.

Nevada (J. G.) declined from $60 to $50.

Golden Age and Empire fell from $31 50 to $23 50.

Burning Moscow was sold at $25. Sierra Nevada at $30. Baltimore American at $40; and Utah at $30 and $31.

DRAMATIC AND MUSICAL.

WE have had a charming week of it, in a dramatic and musical way. Mr. Wheatleigh, at Maguire's Opera House. has given us some of the most finished pieces of acting ever witnessed on those boards. The Bull in a China Shop—a dramatization from the French, of course, for nowhere but in the French could be found such a mélange of comical misapprehensions, amusing blunders and impertinent interferences—has drawn crowds and kept them shaking their sides nightly and mightily. The fun of the play turns on a genius personated by Wheatleigh, one of those people—too common, unfortunately—always minding other people's business to the neglect of their own, who drops into the family of a bosom friend and fancies he discovers that the wife is untrue, the daughter receiving surreptitious attentions, and everything going wrong generally. He attempts to set matters right, and succeeds in involving the family in troubles which would be serious if they were not so inexpressibly funny as to keep one laughing from the opening of the play to its end. Mr. Wheatleigh in his role is inimitable, displaying that humor, too fine to ever degenerate into buffoonery, which runs like a silver thread through the warp and woof of his excellent acting, Last night Mr. Wheatleigh took his first benefit, and had an average house, notwithstanding that there was Italian Opera at the Academy, the piece presented being the local sensation drama of The Upper Ten and Lower Twenty—first brought out on Thursday evening—concluding with the farce of The Model of a Wife. The Upper Ten and Lower Twenty is not a very taking piece. It will be produced this afternoon and evening, and as a Sunday entertainment. If allowed to venture a suggestion, we would hint to Mr. Thorne that when gentlemen give evening parties to their friends, they do not generally appear in the drawing room in walking dress. The Octoroon, with Mr. Wheatleigh in his capital character of "Salem Scudder," is underlined for Monday evening.

The Academy of Music was excellently filled on Monday night, Lucia di Lammermoor being the attraction. The house itself never looked more bright and beautiful, while the ladies heightened the effect by going out en grand tenue, making the dress circle look like a parterre, and the private boxes like flower vases. Lucia proved a decided success—Miss Richings, Bianchi and Gregg winning calls before the curtain at the close of the first and second acts, and the quartette just before the finale of the second act being enthusiastically encored. So great a success did it prove that it was repeated last evening, and to an excellent house. On Monday afternoon, in celebration of the Fourth, we have a a grand matinée at the Academy, by the opera troupe, with La Sonnambula on Tuesday evening, and on Wednesday a concert by Paul Julieu. We fancy that Mr. Maguire hit it precisely when he determined to make this disposition of the Academy. Three or four operas a week, with a good troupe, can be very well supported in our city, let the times set in as badly as they may and stocks go down as low as they will.

The Metropolitan, under its present management, has been producing a series of excellent plays of late, and with one of the best stock companies ever got together in this city. The managers have given us Ingomar, the Barbarian, The Hunchback and other pieces, which people never weary of seeing well put upon the stage, and which appeal in every point to the public for full houses. But play-goers seem to be rather lethargic at present, and something of a galvanic character is necessary to stir them up. Plain merit does not seem to tell much now-a-days. It is the novel and sensational that draws, and in this as in all descents it is only the first step that costs. If the lady managers were to study out and bring out something that would seize upon the popular mind with that force and tenacity of grip which belongs to most novelties, and especially to strongly sensational dramas, we fancy that their house would be filled and the man in the box office kept busy. In this category, however, we cannot include the Lightning Calculator's play, Leon Gilmore, about as wretched a lot of trash as was ever put on any stage. The Spy of the Potomac was bad enough, but this is even worse.

Aurora Floyd gave the Metropolitan a famous start, and it was brought out with a company scarcely equal to the present one. By the way, a lady who saw Mrs. Hayne play The Belle of the Faubourg, in Kentucky, requests us to ask her to repeat the performance here, emphatically declaring that as she saw the character played by Mrs. Hayne in former years, it could not fail to fill the house. This afternoon and evening we have the five-act play of Lesbia, or the Lion of St. Marc. The cast is an excellent one, and the public should show an appreciation of this effort to entertain them by going and giving the lady managers a bumper. But we have little faith in the generosity or appreciation of the public since they treated Mr. Marsh so shabbily in numbers at his benefit on Thursday night. He deserved better at their hands.

The Market Street Museum still continues its reception of visitors, who come to see how fares the Lightning Calculator and to pat the lion.

The Wilson Hippotheatronic troupe is still starring it through the country. Zoyara is surprising the folks in the rural districts, few of whom have yet made up their minds as to whether he is indeed a woman or not. Even when the troupe went away from here, some of our editors were left in doubt and darkness on this all-important point. They might obtain enlightenment easily. Zoyara knows—why don't they ask it?

BRIEF MENTION.

AT HOME.

THE Golden Age came safely into port, towed by her sister steamer, the Golden City. Her safe arrival lifted a wearisome burden from many sad hearts.

General McDowell, the new commander of this Military Department, arrived on Wednesday. He will at once enter upon the duties of his office.

A large Californian lion was lately killed in Butte county.

A woman and boy lost their lives by a fire in this city on Saturday morning last, being suffocated by the smoke.

A little girl playing the part of a fairy, in Satanella, was burned to death at Maguire's theatre on Friday night last.

The estate of the late A. J. Butler is said to amount to only $200,000, instead of $2,000,000, as first reported. One-half is left to General Butler, his brother; one-fourth to the widow of the deceased, and one-fourth to the son—the latter bequest being held in trust by General Butler until the son shall have attained his thirtieth year.

Shasta county is said not to have suffered in common with its neighbors from the drouth, its fields being green with grass and its markets furnished with excellent beef.

A farmer in Butte county has raised over 1,000 bushels of grain in 40 acres of land. Pretty good for a dry season.

There have been earthquakes and rumors of earthquakes about town during the past week but no damage done.

ABROAD.

BIERSTADT is engaged on his large picture of "Mount Hood in Oregon," which will prove, says the New York Evening Post, when completed, to be his finest work.

The world contains 1,000,000,000 of inhabitants, who speak 3,064 different languages, and are of 1,000 different forms of religion.

A book—12mo. pp. 334—entitled Kate Hamilton: an Autobiography of a Gay Life and a Love Career, has just been published by a respectable house in London. Kate H. is the most noted of London courtesans.

M. Renan is understood to be busy with the Life of St. Paul, "the founder of Christianity."

Miss Braddon's last novel, Henry Dunbar: the Story of an Outcast, is understood to be the reconstruction of a portion of a story contributed by her to the London Journal under the title of The Outcasts.

M. Michelet gave a fancy ball in Paris recently, at which all the guests appeared as historical characters—M. Michelet wearing an exact copy of the dress of Benjamin Franklin at the Court of Versailles, and his young wife as the History of France, decorated with flags.

A Mr. Banting recently published a pamphlet on Corpulency, of which ten thousand copies were sold in London alone. The office of the publisher is said to have been crowded by well-fed persons, anxious to learn how to reduce their size.

"Guy Livingstone's" new novel, Maurice Dering, was to appear in London on May 5th.

The eccentric Marquis de Boise, in a late speech in the French Senate, accused the Prince of Wales and his Queen mother of being given to drink. The reporters of the Moniteur were ordered not to reproduce the offensive remarks.

THE DANISH MONITOR.—The first trial of a Monitor in Europe took place when the Danish iron-clad turret battery Rolf Krake went to Ekensund to attempt the destruction of the Prussian bridge into Broager. The result of this trial was most satisfactory to the Monitors. The Rolf Krake was under a constant fire from the land batteries on three sides for nearly two hours, yet when she returned to Sonderborg the ship, turrets, artillery and machinery, and everything, was uninjured, and fit to go under fire again at any moment. There were about 100 marks outside her, where the shot had hit the plating, and some of the crew had been wounded by pieces of shells bursting just over the gratings in the top of the turrets. The reason why she had to return was that the water being so shallow she could not get near enough to see the bridge, which was protected by a projecting piece of land, and consequently she had to fire at the bridge at random, without being able to judge of the result. She, however, succeeded in doing considerable damage to the enemy.

Two countrymen went into a hatter's in New York to buy one of them a hat. They were delighted with the sample, inside the crown of which was inserted a looking-glass. "What is the glass for?" said one of the men. The other, impatient at such a display of rural ignorance, exclaimed, "What for? why, for the man who buys the hat to see how it fits him."

REOPENING OF THE WILLOWS.—The Willows, where the Emeu used to live, and where pleasure-seekers thronged until they got burned out one unfortunate night, has been rebuilt, and will be preliminarily reopened to-morrow—just in time for the Fourth. The grounds have been put in trim again, the theatre remodeled, and the shuffle-boards, shooting galleries, ten-pin alleys, and flying horses, made ready for the amusement of visitors. On the 1st of August, when the Willows are thoroughly completed, a grand reopening will occur, until then the proprietor, W. H. Barnard, promises those who visit the grounds ample entertainment. Murphy and Bray's Minstrels give a performance in the theatre every afternoon.

PERIODICALS RECEIVED.—White and Bauer supply us with London Fun, Punch, the Illustrated London News. Harpers' Weekly and other illustrated New York papers; Wilkes' Spirit, Worlds, Times, Tribunes, Boston and St. Louis papers, and Forney's War Press, as well as copies of the Atlantic, Godey's, Frank Leslie's, Peterson's and Arthur's Magazines. They have our thanks for their courtesy.

A LETTER from "Viator" in another column promises a great celebration of the Fourth at Calistoga Springs this first year of their development.

A SABBATH SCENE.

SCARCE had the solemn Sabbath-bell
Ceased quivering in the steeple,
Scarce had the parson to his desk
Walked stately through his people,

When down the summer shaded street
A wasted female figure,
With dusky brow and naked feet,
Came rushing wild and eager.

She saw the white spire through the trees,
She heard the sweet hymn swelling;
O, pitying Christ! a refuge give
That poor one in thy dwelling!

Like a scared fawn before the hounds,
Right up the aisle she glided,
While close behind her, whip in hand,
A lank-haired hunter strided.

She raised a keen and bitter cry,
To Heaven and Earth appealing:
Were manhood's generous pulses dead?
Had woman's heart no feeling?

A score of stout hands rose between
The hunter and the flying;
Age clenched his staff, and maiden eyes
Flashed tearful, yet defying.

"Who dares profane this house and day?"
Cried out the angry pastor.
"Why, bless your soul, the wench's a slave,
And I'm her lord and master!

"I've law and gospel on my side,
And who shall dare refuse me?'
Down came the pastor, bowing low,
"My good sir, pray excuse me!

"Of course I know your right divine
To own and work and whip her;
Quick, deacon, throw that Polyglott
Before the wench, and trip her!"

Plump dropped the holy tome, and o'er
Its sacred pages stumbling,
Bound hand and foot, a slave once more,
The hapless wretch lay trembling.

I saw the parson tie the knots,
The while his flock addressing,
The Scriptural claims of slavery
With text on text impressing.

"Although," said he, "on Sabbath day,
All secular occupations
Are deadly sins, we must fulfil
Our moral obligations:

"And this commends itself as one
To every conscience tender;
As Paul sent back Onesimus,
My Christian friends, we send her!"

Shriek rose on shriek—the Sabbath air
Her wild cries tore asunder;
I listened, with hushed breath, to hear
God answering with his thunder!

All still!—the very altar's cloth
Had smothered down her shrieking,
And, dumb, she turned from face to face,
For human pity seeking!

I saw her dragged along the aisle,
Her shackles harshly clanking;
I heard the parson, over all,
The Lord devoutly thanking!

My brain took fire: "Is this," I cried,
"The end of prayer and preaching?
Then down with pulpit, down with priest,
And give us Nature's teaching!

"Foul shame and scorn be on ye all
Who turn the good to evil,
And steal the Bible from the Lord,
To give it to the Devil!

"Than garbled text or parchment law
I own a statute higher;
And God is true, though every book
And every man's a liar!"

Just then I felt the deacon's hand
In wrath my coat-tail seize on;
I heard the priest cry "Infidel!"
The lawyer mutter "Treason!"

I started up,—where now were church,
Slave, master, priest and people?
I only heard the supper-bell,
Instead of clanging steeple.

But, on the open window's sill,
O'er which the white blooms drifted,
The pages of a good old Book
The wind of summer lifted,

And flower and vine, like angel wings
Around the Holy Mother,
Waved softly there, as if God's truth
And Mercy kissed each other.

And freely from the cherry-bough
Above the casement swinging,
With golden bosom to the sun,
The oriole was singing.

As bird and flower made plain of old
The lesson of the Teacher,
So now I heard the written Word
Interpreted by Nature!

For to mine ear methought the breeze
Bore Freedom's blessed word on;
Thus saith the Lord: Break every yoke,
Undo the heavy burden!

"FIDDLES" AND "FIDDLERS."—The colloquial terms "fiddle' and "fiddler" seem to have been in very early use, being met with in the old poets, even before Chaucer; and as the "fiddle" was formerly the chief instrument of itinerant performers at merry-makings, and "fiddlers" were frequently included among the humble retainers of the great and wealthy, the term was very frequently used as a reproach, implying low habits and servitude. Thus, in the Taming of the Shrew, "Hortensio" is made to complain of being called "rascal fiddler," and "twangling Jack," with twenty such vile terms. Even to the present day "fiddle" and "fiddler" are almost unconsciously associated with something trifling and small, and convey an impression rather of street minstrelsy than of that refinement and importance which properly attach to the violin and its modern cultivation. To apply the term "fiddler," therefore, (as is still sometimes done,) to a skilful and intelligent performer on the violin, is a solecism in taste and manners.

TURF REMINISCENCES.

"TURNING THE TABLES."

No one not "on the turf," and but few of those who are, can realize that bewildering sort of anxiety, and that alternation of hope and fear, which is experienced by the owner of a horse that is a prominent favorite for a great race. He, or rather his horse, is as it were a target for every rogue to shoot at; and constant and crafty must be the vigilance exercised to elude their aims—so well concealed and cunningly devised are the ambushes behind which danger lurks. The favorite is to the turf nobbler what the full-pursed traveller is to the footpad, and he seeks to make him safe, either for the sake of the money he can bet against him, or in order materially to improve the chance of other horses by which he stands to win, or both. To ensure success, it is not sufficient to have the best horse in the race, without you can shield yourself against the endless efforts that are made to undermine your interest; on one occasion, for instance, when every attempt to bribe those about the horse, from the trainer and jockey downwards, had failed, an act of diabolical treachery was even practised on the jockey at the risk of his life. This occurred some years since, before the Derby; the plan succeeded, but very nearly failed, as the horse was beaten by only about half a length. But it is not of successful but of unsuccessful attempts at roguery I am about to speak.

On occasions when a considerable sum of money is required to be laid out by the owner and his friends, it is usual to call in the assistance of some clever speculator to effect their investments to the best advantage with solvent men, and also to watch the movements in the market, and closely and continuously observe who are the principal opposers and supporters of the horse in which they are specially interested. In return for this care and attention, he is compensated by the fulness of the information supplied him, and the opportunity he has offered him by the owner of sharing a portion of his investments. This Argus-eyed watchfulness as to the state of the market is of the utmost importance, and to it specially may success be often attributed; at all events, such was the case in the following instances, out of many others of minor importance that occur to me:

A gentleman of large fortune, living in Scotland, but who had a considerable racing establishment in the south of England, had a horse of great merit, whom we will call Cockcrow, engaged for the Goodwood Stakes. The owner of Cockcrow felt confident that his horse could win this race; and as he was a very heavy better himself, and had also a very large circle of friends who generally stood a portion of these investments, the amount that he required to be laid out was very large indeed. The gentleman whom he generally selected as his agent and confidant on these occasions was Mr. S——, a speculator of considerable standing on the Turf Exchange; and he commissioned him, in this instance also, to lay a very heavy stake upon Cockcrow.

In the execution of this commission, S—— had called in the assistance of one of his acquaintances on whom he could depend, and on comparing notes as to the different people who had laid them the money, he found that a considerable portion of it had been laid in a certain quarter, that is, not actually by one certain individual, but by different men, who, as he well knew, from long experience in these matters, acted as agents for him. The more money S—— brought into the market to support the horse, the less of a favorite he became, and the money still coming in against him from the same quarter, he became alarmed that there might be something the matter with the horse. By sending a telegram, and receiving a reply, his fears on this head were soon set at rest, yet the opposition in the betting market still continued unabated; so, as the day of the race was fast approaching, he telegraphed to the owner, who was then in Scotland, to say he would be in Edinburgh by the mail train the following morning, and requesting him to meet him without fail on important business. The meeting took place.

"Are you certain," said S——, "that your trainer is on the square?"

"Beyond doubt," was the reply.

"Are you sure the horse is all right?" asked S——.

"I am sure of that," said the owner, "for the trainer has instructions to telegraph to me immediately if anything goes wrong with him, and I have not heard from him for two or three days."

S—— then communicated to him his suspicions, and, after some conversation, the owner finally gave him full authority to use his own discretion as to whether or not he would allow the jockey that was engaged for Cockcrow to ride him, S—— saying that he should not make up his mind till the morning of the race, and requesting the owner not to show himself at Goodwood till the day after the race.

For the benefit of the uninitiated, be it known that about half an hour before each race, the number of every horse in that race (each having a number affixed to his name on the list of the day) is exhibited on a large board, and opposite to this number is the name of the rider. At length the day arrived; Cockcrow had fallen considerably in the betting. At length the horse arrived when the race was to be run, when, on the numbers of the horses and the names of their riders being exhibited in due course on this board, the rider's name opposite to Cockcrow's number was not that of the jockey who it was generally understood would ride him, he having been changed at the last moment by that able tactician S——. The scene that now ensued beggared description; the persons who had laid so heavily against the horse were now rushing about like madmen, trying every means to back him, and imploring S—— to bet them some of their money back again, as they were anxious to "hedge;" to which he coolly replied, after his fashion: "Nay, my lads, I cannot hedge with thee; I want to back him for another thousand, and I made sure you would lay me a little more against him."

The rush to back the horse by those who had hitherto betted against him, very soon had the effect of making him first favorite, and S——, in about half an hour, had the satisfaction of despatching a message to his owner to say he had won in a canter.

Whether the horse would have been equally successful under his originally intended pilot is a problem impossible to solve. It can only be stated, as a curious fact, that his return to public favor commenced from the moment of the announcement of the change of his rider.

Some few years after these events, the great stable with which Phil Spott had been connected brought out another Derby winner, in a horse we will call New Zealander. Before this period Phil Spott had seceded from the establishment to which he had been so long allied, and had set up business on his own account, and within a year or two after his secession he had been gathered to his fathers, and others, from time to time, had been seated in the saddle he had so long and so ably filled.

New Zealander had won the Derby, was naturally a great favorite for the Doncaster St. Leger, and the owner and his friends being desirous of laying out on him a considerable sum amongst them, Mr. S—— was selected as their agent; from the suspicious circumstances which eventually surrounded the horse, a more fortunate choice of a confidant, as it turned out, could not have been made, inasmuch as, having been the general in the case above described, he was not only keenly alive to the danger he and his party had then run, and to the necessity of keeping a strict watch on all the movements in the market, and ascertaining by whom these movements were effected, but prepared for a repetition of this danger, and if it presented itself, to combat it in a masterly manner.

In this case also, as in the case of Cockcrow, S—— had the assistance of one or two friends in the execution of his commission. Time wore on, and gradually and skilfully large sums were laid out on New Zealander; but as the ground where he was trained was rather public, and telegraphic communication was within easy distance, it may be imagined that the "touts" (horse watchers) were especially on the alert in looking out for the slightest indication, however trifling, that he was not progressing as he ought; but it was so especially notorious to all these gentry that he did his daily work gallantly and well, that their constant telegrams to their various employers were to the effect that, if he went on as well as he had hitherto done, "he could not lose" the race. The effect of these messages, sent to all parts of the kingdom, and to many parts out of it, coupled with the previous public knowledge of the horse's merits, was naturally an enormous outlay of public money in addition to that which his immediate adherents were investing; and as the four months that intervene between the Derby and the Doncaster St. Leger were fast passing away, S—— & Co. were rather astonished to find the ready supply of money which still met their demand, and that New Zealander had not improved in price. Large sums were still laid out, but still was there no improvement in his position; and as the time approached, more and more was the horse "peppered at" by his opponents, and even up to the time the bell rang for saddling, this marked and determined opposition to the proved best horse of his year, notoriously known to be even in better trim than he was when he won the Derby, continued with unabated fury. So marked was it, and so unaccountable, that a great Manchester speculator who had been a strong backer of the horse, and had kept his money on him till the morning of the race, whilst one of his friends was assuring him the horse was perfectly well, and that he had seen him that morning in the stable, said: "Nay, my lad, I cannot stand this sort of betting any longer. I never saw one win yet that carried so much brass. I'll shift mine off his back, at all events, be the cost what it may; he may be well, but he will not win."

S—— and his party had been for some time perfectly satisfied in what quarter all this money was laid, and though, of course, laid through several agents to elude suspicion, the ruse failed in deceiving such acute men as had the conduct of this investment, and they, at the suggestion of S——, took careful notes of all the bets that they could hear of, that were made with others, which, added to their own, amounted to an enormous sum laid, as they had no doubt, in one quarter.

That something wrong was intended was to them very apparent, but whom to suspect they knew not. Frequent visits were paid to the training quarters, and precautions of all kinds suggested to guard against foul play. All went on, however, perfectly satisfactorily with the horse; he never missed a day's work or left an oat in his manger; and at Doncaster he arrived in his van perfectly well on the Monday—the St. Leger being on the Wednesday. All the world saw him on the Tuesday morning at exercise, and saw that he was perfectly well and in full force; yet, if possible, at the betting rooms that night, the opposition to him, from the same quarter, became more and more marked. That same evening S—— and his party held a consultation, S—— saying:

"Something must be done, or we shall be done; if the horse is all right to-morrow morning, and the trainer pronounces him so, to what conclusion can we come? If danger there is, that danger sits in the saddle;" and, to make matters more perplexing, the owner was absent. At last, S—— decided upon what course he would pursue; without resting that night, he at once set to work, through a gentleman of high standing on the Turf, to bring about an interview between himself and a nobleman of very great influence, and a proprietor of horses in the same stable as New Zealander. This interview took place. He laid before his lordship in a clear and concise manner all the facts as above stated, and on being asked what he would suggest to be done, at once advised to the following effect:

Let the trainer to-morrow morning, if the horse is all right and well, request several gentlemen of position and integrity on the Turf (the more the better) to come and see him in the stable stripped of his clothes, so that they can, one and all, testify to the fact that, if he is beat, he at least has done his duty in bringing him "fit to the post;" and then your lordship must speak to the jockey, and tell him that, although you never have had any reason to doubt his honesty, yet it is impossible to pass unnoticed the enormous sums that have been betted against the horse, especially in a very marked manner, and for a length of time, in a certain quarter; and that such bettings are wholly inconsistent with the horse's well-known superior qualities, and the notorious fact that he is fit to run, as has been testified to this very day by several leading gentlemen on the Turf; that you impute no wrong intentions to him, but if the horse is beat, whatever sum it may cost you, you are determined on that day after the races to effect a trial, if not with the actual winner of the race, with the best trial horse you can procure, and that that trial shall take place on the St. Leger course, before all the world, who shall be the judges whether or not he ought to have won the Doncaster St. Leger.

These suggestions were carried out to the letter, and New Zealander won the race with the greatest ease, ridden by the jockey to whom his lordship had spoken as above.

Success is at all times gratifying, but this was doubly so, as it completely and entirely removed from the rider all those suspicions which, owing to a strong combination of circumstances, are often very naturally entertained against an innocent and honest man; and it turned the tables upon those (if such there were) who contemplated effecting by foul means the defeat of the best horse in the race.

PRINCE HASSAN AND THE OGRE.

Easter Monday, about seventeen thousand years ago, fell on Tuesday, the 1st of April; and, on that very day, the gallant young Prince Hassan, heir-apparent of All the Cashmeres, went out with hound and horn to hunt the deer. A fine buck was soon found; but as it went away twice as fast as the dogs could run after it, and the dogs ran twice as fast as the prince could gallop, and the prince galloped twice as fast as anybody else, you will not be surprised to hear that, after three hours' hard riding, his royal highness found himself quite alone; and moreover, on looking around him, he found he was in a place where he never had been before—a dismal valley closed in with rocks, and without a trace of a road to lead him home. To complete his misfortunes, his horse—from which he had dismounted for a moment—ran away on its own account; and, after serious reflection, he was obliged to conclude that he had lost his way, and didn't know what to do.

Presently, however, he espied in the hill-side the mouth of a large cavern; and as he was exhausted with heat and thirst, he determined to enter it, in the hope of finding shelter and water. To his delight there was a cool spring rising just inside; but no sooner had he knelt down and taken a draught, than he heard a dreadful roar from the bottom of the cavern; and, looking up, he beheld a frightful ogre, who came up to him in two strides, and caught him by the waist between his finger and thumb. The monster's head was as big as a haystack; his mouth was like a great oven, with rows of grinders like immense quartern loaves; his eyes were like the red lamps that you see on railways; and as for his nose, it was such an object that there really is nothing in the world ugly enough for me to compare it to. Few ogres are handsome; but this one was so horrid and nasty, even for an ogre, that none of the other ogres would live with him, and no ogress would marry him; so he was forced to sulk by himself in this solitary bachelor cavern. His name was Uglymuggimo; but the prince didn't know that.

"I'll teach you to come into my house and drink my water, without my leave," said the ogre in a dreadful voice; "all's fish that comes to my net; and I shall swallow you as you would an oyster—if you had any in Cashmere."

So saying, he went to his cupboard and took out the pepper-castor and vinegar-cruet, each of which was the size of a sentry-box.

"I am sure I am very sorry to have offended you, sir," said the prince, (though the ogre held him so tight that he could hardly speak,) "I meant no harm; and as for swallowing me, I really think you had better not. I don't say this on my own account; but I am certain I'm not fit to eat; you will find me very nasty—you will, indeed."

"Ho, ho," said the ogre, "so much the better! The nastier things are, the more I like them. There's nothing that I can't swallow! Why, if you could bring me anything I couldn't swallow, I'd give you leave to cut off my head."

"Begging your honor's pardon," said the prince, "I think I have seen a great many things that a nice, clean, good-looking gentleman like you would never be able to swallow; and if you would just let me go home and look about me a bit, I feel sure I could bring something of the sort—and then I hope your honor would not forget what you said just now."

"Very well," said the ogre, after reflecting a little, "I don't mind letting you have a trial—indeed, as I don't happen to want you just now, it will suit me very well. I will give you leave to try four times; but mind, you must give me your word of honor to come back here every day at noon; and unless you bring me something that I can't swallow, I shall swallow yourself on the fourth day—that's all.

Now, you must understand that the ogre did not say this out of any mercy for the prince; but the fact is, he liked best the things that it would make everybody else sick even to look at; and he thought this would be an opportunity for getting a choice supply of all the dainties that he was so fond of, without any trouble; for he wanted some variety, and was tired of picking up dead dogs and robbing the pig-styes.

The prince gave his word to come back very gladly, for he thought he should have no difficulty in bringing the ogre something that even he would find too horrible to swallow; and so the giant let him go, and showed him a back-way out of the cavern, which, to his great surprise, opened on the cliffs just above his father's palace, to which he returned before he had been missed.

You may think that the ogre was rather simple for supposing that the prince would come back again to be eaten up after he had once got away; but he knew that no prince ever broke his word, you know, seventeen thousand years ago.

No sooner had he got home than Prince Hassan set about making a pudding, which he hoped the ogre would find too much for his stomach. He took fifty adders, fifty rats, a dozen old shoes, a hundred python's eggs, (addled,) and two scuttlefuls of rubbish out of the dust-hole; over these he poured six bottles of blacking, tied it all up in a beggar's old shirt, and for water to boil it in, desired the Grand Mistress of the Slop-pails to bring him the dirty soap-suds from all the basins in the palace. With this precious mess he knocked at the ogre's back-door exactly at twelve o'clock the next day.

"Well, my young gentleman, let us see what you have got here," said the monster, taking up the pudding: "it smells rather nice." And, to the dismay of the poor prince, instead of flinging it away in disgust, he popped it into his mouth and munched it up like a penny tart.

"Ho, ho," he said, "not bad—not bad! Do you call that nasty? You must bring something very different if you expect me not to swallow it. Ho! come again to-morrow."

And then he took out an old pitchfork which he used as a toothpick, and went back to his den.

The next day the prince thought he would be very cunning, and bring the giant a meal he did not expect. Since he seems so fond of nasty things, he said to himself, I will try if I can't puzzle him by a dish of something very nice.

So he went round to all the pastry-cooks in the town, and bought up all the twelfth-cakes, the gingerbread, apricot-jam and barley-sugar in their shops; and again, at twelve o'clock exactly, he knocked at Uglymuggimo's door.

When the ogre saw what was brought him he fell into a furious passion.

"How dare you bring me such disgusting rubbish?" he roared out. "Is this proper food to set before a gentleman ogre? Take it away this instant; but—no! Stop! You shan't escape me that way. I will eat it it; but if you dare to play me such a trick again, I will skin you alive and stick you in my mustard pot. I will make you envy the very frogs and flies that you used to catch when you were at school! I will!" Then, holding his nose and shutting his eyes, he thrust all the dainties between his enormous jaws, and swallowed them down with a great gulp. "Ho, ho!" he said, "you see that won't do either, my young friend. Come again to-morrow; and, remember, no more nonsense!"

This was a sad disappointment to Prince Hassan; and his only consolation was, that the expression of the giant's face raised some hopes that he was suffering from stomach-ache.

But, as he was returning home, he happened to pass the chemist's shop to which, in the days of his boyhood, his mamma used to send for black doses; for she made a rule of administering one to him the first Monday in every month, according to the ancient customs of the Court of Cashmere. The sight gave him new hopes. "I am saved!" he joyfully exclaimed; and immediately sent a herald round the town with a proclamation that all the rhubarb, all the jalap, all the castor oil, and all the senna-tea that could be found should be mixed together in a tub and brought to the palace. His orders were obeyed; and, on that happy night, no physic was taken in the whole city.

The next day at twelve o'clock exactly, the prince again went to the ogre's back door, taking his tub with him; but this time he was full of confidence.

"I have beat him this time, for certain," he said to himself; "if he were ten times an ogre he would never be able to swallow such a draught."

But, bless you! no sooner had the monster seen the horrid mixture than he tossed it off like a glass of lemonade, smacking his lips after it.

When the prince saw this he began to despair; for he felt that his last chance was gone.

"Ho, ho," said the giant, with a dreadful grin, "don't be cast down. You have one more chance, you know; try again. Why don't you bring me such a thing as a tough old woman, now? Perhaps I shouldn't be able to swallow that: ho, ho!" And then he laughed in such a violent and vulgar way that he shook down six large trees.

"No, no," said the prince; "I see it would be no use; you had better take me at once and have done with it; I give up; you can swallow anything if you could swallow what I brought you just now. Besides, where should I find an old woman who would consent to take my place?"

"As for that," said the ogre, with an odious wink, "I should have thought a stout young man like you could have managed to persuade an old woman to come this way without much trouble. And as for my being able to swallow her, I don't know—I can't say—I am a little dainty sometimes—at any rate, it is worth your while to try, I should think; for remember, to-morrow is the fourth day! Ho, ho!"

So saying, he went back into his cave; and the prince heard him sharpening his knife and cleaning his frying-pan in a way that froze his marrow.

The unhappy young man now gave himself up for lost, and went home to the palace in the worst possible spirits. "I shall go a very different road this time to-morrow," thought he. However, he concealed his feelings as well as he could, not to distress his parents; for he was a dutiful son. All night he lay awake; and as soon as it was day he got up and went out to take a last walk in the country, and while away the time till the dreadful hour of noon. After walking some time, he came to a wretched, tumble-down old cottage; and looking in through the window (which was broken) he saw within an equally wretched and tumble-down old woman, dressed in rags, shivering with cold and lean with hunger.

"How now, Goody?" said he, walking into her miserable room through the broken door. "You don't seem over-comfortable here."

"Comfortable?" said she, in a cracked and wheezy voice, "I haven't known what that word means for these twenty years. I am old, and poor, and sick; I have got the ague, and the rheumatics, and the toothache, and the earache, and oh, such dreadful corns! I have nobody in the world to care for me; and I heartily wish I was dead, for I don't know what good I am here."

When the prince heard the old woman talk in this way, the wicked thought which the ogre had put into his head came back to him, and began to tempt him. "Surely," he said to himself, "there can be no great harm in taking this poor wretched creature to the giant. Perhaps he won't like her, and then all will be well; but even if he does, of what value is her life, compared with the chance of saving mine? I am young, happy, beloved; my death will plunge my parents, my family, the whole nation into grief; and then what plans I had for doing good! How prosperous the people would have been under my reign! Surely I ought not to allow a weak scruple to deprive the world of the immense advantages which depend on my life; and this old thing, if she has any right feeling, ought to be proud of such an opportunity of making herself useful. If she could do any good here, it would be different; but she says herself—"

He was interrupted in these thoughts by a tapping at the broken window; and looking up, he saw a pretty white bird that had flown in.

"What is this?" said he to the old woman.

"Oh," said she, "it is a pigeon that I picked up with a broken leg when it was young. I brought it home and nursed it; and now it comes to me every day for such crumbs as I can give it."

The prince's heart fairly smote him.

"I take this as a lesson," he said within himself: "I see now that everybody is of some use in this world; and what right have I to take anybody away from this place, and determine he will not be missed? This worthy old soul has been able to do a kindness to a creature more helpless than herself. I have had my share of comforts, and now I will bear my misfortunes for myself like a man, and not steal the life of another in the hope of saving my own. I beg your pardon, ma'am, though you don't know what for; and pray accept my purse, for which I'm afraid I have not much further use."

Then the prince left the cottage, and as it was now near 12 o'clock, walked boldly towards the mountain. Meanwhile, the ogre was expecting him very eagerly. The fact was, as perhaps you have guessed, that an old woman was a treat that he was particularly fond of; and he made sure that the prince would take the hint he had given him and provide one, to try and escape from being eaten up himself; for he was so mean and cruel an ogre that he had no idea that anybody could do a generous action, or sacrifice himself rather than be unjust. He had eaten very little breakfast, on purpose to have a good appetite for his luncheon; and there he sat, licking his lips, and watching the path by which the prince was to come; and you may fancy his rage and disappointment when he saw him coming.

"What!" he roared out, "no old woman? I must have one. Where is she? Bring her! Quick!

"Sir," said the prince, as bravely as he could, I have brought you no old woman; but you see I have kept my word, and come back myself."

"You!" cried the ogre. "You, indeed! What is a poor tender thing like you compared to a fine, tough, bony grandmother? Why haven't you brought me one, you villain? What have you been about? Are you such a goose that you couldn't find one ever since yesterday?"

"No," said the prince. "I did find one, but I didn't choose to bring her." And then he told the ogre all he had seen at the cottage, and all he had thought, just as I have told it to you.

As he was telling his story, the giant got into such a fury that he could hardly contain himself.

"What!" he bellowed out, as soon as the prince had finished, "do you mean to tell me that you have been such a noodle, such a nincompoop, such a chicken-hearted baby, that when you had a chance of saving yourself at the expense of one poor old woman, you wouldn't do it? Nonsense! I'll not believe it! You must tell me some more likely story, for I CAN'T SWALLOW THAT!"

No sooner had he uttered these words, than there came a loud clap of thunder, and the monster turned as white as a sheet; and then there came a second clap, and the monster's knees began to tremble, and his teeth to chatter in his head; and then there came a third clap, and the roof of the cavern burst open, and the Lord Chief Baron of the Fairies came sailing in, seated on his great flying inkstand, drawn by twenty-four bats, with parchment wings and traces of red tape.

"You wicked and nasty ogre," said his lordship, in a stern and awful voice, "you have spoken your own sentence, and I have come to put it in execution. You told the prince that you would give him leave to cut off your head if he could bring you anything that you could not swallow; you have just confessed that he has; and now your hour is come!"

So saying, he drew forth the great Sword of Justice, eighteen feet long, which he always carried in his waistcoat pocket, and presented it to the prince.

"Go," he said, "meritorious youth; cut the head off that vile and hateful monster, and cast it out to the kites, wolves and foxes."

The prince took the sword with a respectful bow, and going up the ogre, who was now rolling on the floor, and blubbering like a great coward as he was, flourished the weapon thrice, and then brought it down with so fair a blow on the giant's neck, that the head rolled from the shoulders; so there was an end of Uglymuggimo.

"Young man," then said the Chief Baron of the Fairies, "I am pleased with your conduct on the whole, though you allowed one base thought to get the better of you for a moment: so if there is anything that you would like, mention it before the Court rises, and I will grant it you."

"My Lord," said the prince, again bowing respectfully, "I have more than I deserve already, and I wish for nothing further for myself; but if you could do anything to make that poor old woman more comfortable who taught me so good a lesson, I should be much obliged to you."

"Very well," said his lordship, "so be it; if you call upon her as you go home, I think you will see a change for the better."

So the prince walked cheerfully down the hill again; but when he came to the old woman's home, what do you think he saw? Instead of the wretched tumble-down old hovel that he had left, he saw the prettiest, neatest white cottage you can imagine, covered with roses and honeysuckles; and walking in, he found the old lady nicely dressed, sitting in a comfortable arm-chair, and looking as snug and happy as possible.

"Well, ma'am," said he, "how do you do, again? I hope you feel a little better than you did?"

"Oh, sir" said she, "I am sure I don't know what has come over me! All my pains are gone; the house and everything seems to have grown new and fresh again; and, if I only had some nice young companion to live with me and look after me a bit, I should not envy the Queen of Cashmere herself."

No sooner had she said this, than the door opened, and a pretty little maiden, dressed in white and walking rather lame, came in with a curtesy; and without saying a word, set about getting down the cups and saucers, and making the old lady some tea.

"Who and what are you, my dear," said the dame in astonishment, "and who sent you here?"

"Please ma'am," said the little maiden, "I am the pigeon that you were so kind to. A fine little gentleman, sitting on a flying inkstand, touched me just now with a wand, which turned me into what you see; and then he told me to come and live with you for the rest of your days; which, I am sure, I shall be most happy to do."

So the prince went home very well contented; but he ever afterwards took care not to lose his way out a-hunting.

Leap Year.—The ladies' leap year privilege took its origin in the following manner:

By an ancient Act of the Scottish Parliament, passed about the year 1228, it was "ordanit that during ye reign of her maist blessit Majestie Margaret, ilka maiden ladee of baith high and low estait, shall hae liberty to speak ye man she likes. Gif he refuses to take her to be his wife, he shall be mulct in the sum of an hundrity pundis or less, as his estait may be, except and always gif he can make it appear that he is betrothit to auither woman; then he shall be free."

THE FOURTH AT CALISTOGA.

CALISTOGA SPRINGS, June 30, 1864.

Mr. Editor.—As the Fourth of July is almost at hand, and as the numerous celebrations throughout the State will likely surpass anything of the kind that have ever been witnessed on this ever-memorable occasion—I learn from Mr. Gilmore, the worthy landlord of the Calistoga Springs, that arrangements are made to have the Fourth of July celebrated in a grand and magnificent style, which will surpass anything of the kind ever witnessed in this country. An oration will be delivered. Splendid Fire Works are prepared for the occasion, a magnificent illumination, with entirely new and elegant transpnrencies, the whole to conclude with a grand and elegant Ball.

To those who really wish to enjoy a pleasant and delightful climate, scenery of the grandest kind, I would advise them to pay a visit to Mr. Gilmore of the Calistoga Springs, where they will he entertained in a manner to suit the most fastidious taste and worthy the favored name of Calistoga.

VIATOR.

PRACTICAL DOMESTIC RECEIPTS.

Beefsteak Pie.—From two to three pounds of steak will make a good family pie. Trim off part of the fat, should there he much of it. If the beef should not appear very tender, it may be gently beaten with a paste roller until the fibre is broken; then divide into slices, and lay in a dish bordered with paste. Season with salt and pepper, and sufficient water poured in to make the gravy and keep the meat moist. Lay on the cover, join it securely to the paste which is round the rim, trim both off close to the dish, make an incision through the middle of the cover, and lay some slight ornament of paste round it. Let the pie remain in a well heated oven for nearly an hour and a half. You may season with minced onion or eschalot. Mushrooms improve all meat-pies.

To Clean Steel and Iron.—One ounce of soft soap; two ounces of emery, made into a paste; then rub the article for cleaning with wash-leather, and it will give a brilliant polish.

Sauce Piquante.—Brown lightly in an ounce and a half of butter, a tablespoonful of eschnlots; add a teaspoonful of flour when they are partially done; pour to them half a pint of gravy or of good broth, and when it boils add three chilies, a bay-leaf, and a very small bunch of thyme. Let these simmer for twenty minutes, take out the thyme and bay-leaf, add a high seasoning of black pepper, and half a wine-glassful of the best vinegar.

Soap of Turpentine.—Take of carbonate of potassa one hundred parts; oil of turpentine, one hundred parts; Venice turpentine, one hundred parts. Triturate the carbonate of potass, in a marble mortar, first with the oil and then with the Venice turpentine; when they are well mixed, grind by small portions at a time until it has acquired the consistence of hard honey, and has become homogeneous.

Sausage Rolls.—Have ready some nice sausage meat, which can always be obtained from the pork butcher's. If you wish to make it, get some nice pork-chops, cut the meat from the bones, or take two-thirds of lean free from gristle and one-third fat, chop the meat very fine and season it well with pepper, salt and spices, add a small quantity of sage or basil, use a little water in chopping the meat, or else a little soaked bread. Roll out some paste into square pieces, lay a roll of meat in the centre, lengthways; fold them so as to form long puffs, and wash them with egg before they are baked.

To Raise the Nap on Cloth.—When woollens are worn threadbare, as is often the case in the elbows, cuffs, sleeves, etc., of men's coats, the coats must be soaked in cold water for half an hour, then taken out of the water and put on a board, and the thread-bare parts of the cloth rubbed with a half-worn hatter's "card," filled with flocks or with a prickly thistle, until a sufficient nap is raised. When this is done, hang the coat up to dry, and with a hard brush lay the nap the right way.

ONE WORD TO THE LADIES.—We supposed that the ultima thule in the art had been reached months ago, when we saw, for the first time, a Grover & Baker machine in full action; but now a lady friend, well posted in all matters pertaining thereto, informs us that an important part of the performance escaped our notice, and in proof thereof, exhibits to our astonished gaze her little baby's frock embroidered with tasteful and fanciful designs, which she informs us was all done—stitching, embroidery and all—on the same machine. This is certainly remarkable, but nevertheless true, and if all the purchasers of these celebrated machines are as enthusiastic as is our friend, the proprietors must be having one continual "hymn of praise" ascending in their behalf.

THE NEW MACHINE—The Florence.—This favorite with the ladies, which was only introduced on this coast a few months since, seems to be gaining in reputation as its sale increases. We know whereof we write when we say that the "Florence" performs all that is claimed for it, as we have one in our family, and our "better half" regards it as one of the indispensables in household economy. We would say, buy a Florence.

THE EUREKA BILLIARD SALOON—over the Eureka Theatre, on Montgomery street, between California and Pine—is the most superbly fitted-up establishment on the Pacific Coast. It contains seven of Jacob Strahle's tables, unequalled by any other in elegance of style and finish. Messrs. Fitch & Wetherbee are the gentlemanly proprietors, and so conduct their establishment as to merit and maintain the leading patronage of gentlemanly knights of the cue, of the city and State. jul8

WANTED—The Dashaway Employment Office, 513 Kearney street, near California, can supply families, hotels, restaurants, farmers, ships, steamers and coasters with every description of male and female help, free of charge. Orders from the country for women must be accompanied with their passage money, as hundreds of poor girls are unable to pay their own passage. Orders promptly filled at the Dashaway Employment Office. jul1

CENTRAL RAILROAD COMPANY OFFICE,—No. 229 Bush street, San Francisco: Location, City and County of San Francisco, State of California.—Notice is hereby given, that at a meeting of the Directors of said Company, held on the 8th day of June, 1864, an assessment of Five Dollars ($5) per share was levied upon the Capital Stock of the said Company, payable immediately in United States gold coin, to the Secretary of said Company, at the office of said Company, in the city of San Francisco. Any stock upon which said assessment shall remain unpaid on the TENTH DAY OF JULY, 1864, will be advertised on that day as delinquent, and unless payment shall be made before, will be sold on the Twenty-third day of July, 1864, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with costs of advertising and expenses of the sale. By order of the Board of Directors. JAS. T. HOYT, Secretary.
jul8 Office, 229 Bush street.

MEETING OF THE STOCKHOLDERS OF THE CENTRAL Railroad Co.—Office Central Railroad Company, June 13th, 1864.—Notice is hereby given that the annual meeting of the Stockholders of the Central Railroad Company, for the election of nine Directors of the Company, to serve for the ensuing year, will be held at the office of the Company, No. 229 Bush street, San Francisco, on TUESDAY, July 5th, 1864. The polls for the election of Directors will open at 12 o'clock M., and close at 3 o'clock P. M. of that day. Every Stockholder present, in person or by proxy, will have one vote for each share of stock which he may have owned for ten days next preceding such election. JAMES T. HOYT, je18-td Sec'y Central Railroad Company.

OFFICE OF THE OMNIBUS RAILROAD CO., San Francisco, June 13th, 1864.—Notice is hereby given, that the annual meeting of stockholders of the Omnibus Railroad Company will be holden at the office of the Company, (Howard street, between Third and Fourth streets,) on MONDAY, July 4, 1864, at 12 o'clock, for the election of seven Directors for the ensuing year, and the transaction of such other business as may be properly brought before them. By order of the Board.
je18 JAMES O'NEILL, Secretary.

FOURTH OF JULY
PROGRAMME!

—FOR THE—

Celebration of the Eighty-eighth Anniversary

—OF THE—

DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE!

SAN FRANCISCO, JULY 4TH, 1864.

A Federal salute will be fired by the First California Guard at sunrise, on Portsmouth Square. It is requested that the bells in the city and harbor be rung during the firing.

The various divisions which will compose the Procession, will form under the direction of the Marshal and Assistant Marshals, in the positions assigned them, as follows:

The Divisions will form at 10 o'clock, A. M.

The military, composing the First Division, will form on Union street, the right resting on Powell.

The Second Division will form on Stockton street, the right resting on Union.

The Third, Fourth, Fifth and Sixth Divisions will form on Green, Vallejo, Broadway and Pacific streets, respectively, east of Stockton, the right resting on Stockton.

The Seventh and Eighth Divisions will form on Green and Vallejo streets, respectively, west of Stockton, the right resting on Stockton.

The head of the column will move at 10½ o'clock, A. M. precisely; and as the rear of each division shall arrive at the right of its successor, that will march into column in the order above named.

The column, when formed, will be in the following order:

THE ADVANCE:

Two Mounted Trumpeters,
Light Dragoons, Capt David Moore,
B. A. SHELDON, Grand Marshal,

With Aides as follows:

WM G BADGER, Chief Aide;

Geo W Rider,	Geo T Bohen,
John Hill,	W T Coleman,
Peter Donahue,	Wm Huefner,
Jerome Rice,	Wm Harney,
Jacob Deeth,	Wm Shear,
Wm H Lyon,	R J Tobin,

San Francisco Hussars, Capt. G. G. Brodt, as escort to Maj. Generals Allen and McDowell.

Maj. Gen. Allen and Maj. Gen. McDowell, with their respective Staffs.

FIRST DIVISION.

SECOND BRIGADE, C. M.:

Col. Joseph Wood, commanding;

First Regiment Cavalry, C. M., Col. Taylor, commanding;
Major Fennell.

Co. A Light Dragoons, Capt. Moore,
" C Jackson Dragoons, Capt. Peterson,
" H Redwood Cavalry, Capt. Bartlett,
" B San Francisco Hussars, Capt. Brodt,

First Cal. Guard, Light Battery, Capt. Bluxome.

First Regiment Infantry, C M,
Capt T B Ludlum, commanding;
Adjt Edwin Lewis;
Quartermaster, Edwin Harris;
Surgeon, Isaac Rowell.

U S Ninth Infantry Band.

Co I Sumner Guard, Lt Moyer;
D Columbia Guard, Capt McElwee;
F Light Guard " Robbins;
C National Guard, " Platt;
K Ellsworth Rifles, " Drum;
A State Guard, " Dawes;
B City Guards, " Little.

Second Regiment Infantry, C M, Col M C Smith, commanding;
Lt-Col Geo T Knox;
Major, Charles F Smyth;
Surgeon, J M Sharkey.

J Wilson's Brass Band.

Co C Shield's Guard, Capt Ryan;
K Hugh O'Neil Guard, Capt Higgins;
Mission Guards, unattached, Capt Farrell;
Co H Emmet Life Guards, " Coonan;
A Montgomery Guards, Lt Lee;
E Meagher Guards, Captain Cody;
B—MacMahon Grenadier Guards, " Heffernan;
Co D Wolfe Tone Guards, " Wasson;

Sixth Regiment Infantry, C M, Col F G E Tittle, commanding;
Lt Col Henry Hasbach;
Major, Peter Sesser;
Adj't, H Schmidt;
Quartermaster, A G Russ;
Surgeon, G H Malech.

Sixth Regiment Band.

Co B Sigel Rifles, Capt Ewald;
F San Francisco Tirailleurs, Capt Schroder;
C Ellis Guard, Capt Michaelis;
H California Musketeers, Capt Semler;
E Stephen Guard, Capt Wochatz;
G Germania Guard, " Mund;
A California Fusileers, Capt Obenauer;
D California Grenadiers, Capt Weintraut.

First Regiment Artillery, C M,
Col J W McKenzie, commanding,
Lieut-Col J Strat nan,
Major A H Pennoyer,
Junior Major H M Moore,
Adjutant H H Thrall,
Quartermaster H M Wright,
Surgeon Jas Murphy,

Cbris Andres' Band,

Company C, Oakland Guard, Capt Brown,
" F, Liberty Guard, Capt Dixon,
" K, San Francisco Cadets, Capt McDonald,
" D, Washington Guard, Capt Storer,
" B, Ellsworth Guard, Capt Lake,
" G, McClellan Guard, Capt Wilkinson,
" A, Union Guard, Capt Simmons,
" E, Franklin Guard, Capt McComb.

SECOND DIVISION.

A S Gould—Marshal,

J P Buckley and A. L. Edwards, Assistant Marshals,

Charles Schultze's Operatic Band,

President and Orator of the day in carriages,
Chaplain, Poet and Reader of the day in carriages,
Foreign Consuls in carriages,
Foreign Army and Navy Officers in carriages,
Officers of the U. S. Army in carriages,
Officers of the U. S. Navy in carriages,
Federal Officers in carriages,
Officers of the U. S. Revenue Service in carriages,
Officers of the U. S. Coast Survey in carriages,
State Officers in carriages,
Board of Supervisors in carriages.
City and County officers in carriages.

THIRD DIVISION.

Freeman B Lyle—Marshal,

M F Hutchins and Sumner W Bugbee, Assistant Marshals,

First Regiment Drum Corps,

State Board of Education,
City Board of Education,
Ex-Members Board of Education,
Guests of School Department,
High School Faculty—Principal W W Minns,
Union Grammar School—Principal T S Myrick,
Mason street Grammar School—Principal Jas Strattan,
Denman Grammar School—Principal J Denman,
Rincon Grammar School—Principal J C Pelton
Minna st Grammar School—Principal T C Leonard, Spring Valley School—Principal P Marks,
Fourth streets Primary School,
Market street Primary "
Greenwich street Primary "
Powell street Primary "
Mission street Primary "
Montgomery street Primary "

FOURTH DIVISION.

Chief Engineer, David Scannell; Marshal,
Frank Evans and Charles D Cornell, Assistant Engineers—Assistant Marshals.

San Francisco Band.

Exempt Fire Company,
Delegates from Engine Companies,
Fire Department of San Francisco.

FIFTH DIVISION.

Barny Horn—Marshal,

W O'Brien and P McCann, Assistant Marshals,

Band,

Butchers' Union Association, mounted Butchers, Ornamented cars, with buffaloes and other live stock,
Draymans' Association—mounted,
Teamsters' Association—mounted,
Cartmans' Protective and Relief Society—mounted,
Mason's brewery wagons.

SIXTH DIVISION.

W H Davis—Marshal,

Chas F Wiggin and O F Willey, Assistant Marshals

Chas Alpers' Band,

Society of California Pioneers,
Eureka Typographical Union No. 21,
Empire brewery wagons,
Wells, Fargo & Co's express wagons,
Heuston, Hastings & Co's harouche,
Lumber dealers' wagons.

SEVENTH DIVISION.

D C. McGlynn—Marshal,

Geo D Nagle and John Mason, Assistant Marshals

Walcott's Band,
Sons of Emerald Isle,
Fenian Brotherhood,
St Joseph's Benevolent Society,
Irish American Benevolent Society,
Laborers' Protective and Benevolent Society,
Waiters' Benevolent Society.

EIGHTH DIVISION.

C H Webster—Marshal,

L Keller and A A Louderback, Assistant Marshals.

Riggers and Stevedores Union Association,
Citizens Mounted,
Citizens in carriages.

COLORS.

The Grand Marshal, Purple and Gold,
The Aids to the Grand Marshal, White and Gold,
The Marshals, Dark Blue, Red and Silver.
The Assistant Marshals, Sky Blue and Silver,

The Marshals, Assistant Marshals, and Aides will assemble for orders at the Russ House at 8½ o'clock on the morning of the Fourth.

The President of the Day, the Orator, Chaplain, Poet and Reader, Foreign Consuls and Officers, Officers of the Army and Navy, Federal Officers, Officers of the Revenue Service and Coast Survey, and State and County Officers, who have accepted invitations to participate in the celebration of the coming Anniversary of our National Independence, are requested to assemble in the parlor of the Russ House, at 9 o'clock, A. M., on that day, when Marshals will be in attendance to conduct them to the carriages provided.

The Board of Education, District Teachers and Pupils of the Public Schools, will assemble at Platt's Hall at 9 o'clock.

LINE OF MARCH.

The line will form on Union street, the right resting on Powell; then march through Powell to Broadway, to Stockton, to Washington, to Montgomery, to Market, to Second, to Howard, to Third, to Folsom; countermarch on Folsom to Fourth, to Market, to Stockton, to Post, to Montgomery, to the Metropolitan Theatre, where the following exercises will take place:

EXERCISES AT THE THEATRE.

National Airs by the Bands,
Chant, the Lord's Prayer, by the Children of the Public Schools,
Prayer, by the Rev Mr Kittredge,
Reading of the Declaration of Independence, by W H L Barnes, Esq,
"The Battle-Cry of Freedom," by the Children of the Public Schools, Poem, by J F Bowman,
"The Union," by the Children of the Public Schools,
Oration, by the Rev H W Bellows,
"O wrap the flag around me, boys," by the Children,
"America(" by the Children,
Benediction.

The First California Guard will fire a National Salute at sunrise, meridian, and at sunset. It is requested that the buildings in the city and the vessels in the harbor be decorated with the National Flag during the day.

The Fireworks will be exhibited in the evening, on the corner of Fifth and Harrison streets.

jy2 B. A. SHELDON, Grand Marshal.

UNION STATE AND CONGRESSIONAL DISTRICT CONVENTIONS.

THERE WILL BE HELD AT SACRAMENTO, on the 30th day of August, A. D. 1864, a Union State Convention, for the purpose of nominating Presidential Electors to be supported by the Union Party at the ensuing Presidential Election, to appoint a State Central Committee, and for the transaction of such other business as may properly come before it.

There will be held also at Sacramento, immediately after the adjournment of the State Convention, Congressional District Conventions for the First, Second and Third Congressional Districts, for the purpose of nominating Candidates for Congress for their respective Districts, and to appoint District Committees.

Each county will elect delegates in pursuance of notice of its Union County Committee, according to the following apportionment:

Alameda	8	Plumas	8
Amador	13	Sacramento	21
Alpine	6	San Bernardino	3
Butte	11	San Diego	2
Calaveras	13	San Francisco	52
Colusa	3	San Joaquin	12
Contra Costa	6	San Luis Obispo	2
Coso	5	San Mateo	5
Del Norte	2	Santa Barbara	3
El Dorado	19	Santa Clara	11
Fresno	1	Santa Cruz	6
Humboldt	4	Shasta	6
Klamath	3	Sierra	13
Lake	2	Siskiyou	7
Lassen	3	Solano	9
Los Angeles	5	Stanislaus	3
Marin	4	Sutter	5
Mariposa	6	Sonoma	10
Mendocino	4	Tehama	4
Merced	1	Trinity	6
Mono	6	Tulare	4
Monterey	4	Tuolumne	12
Napa	6	Yolo	5
Nevada	16	Yuba	11
Placer	13

In any County where the Union County Committee shall not order an Election of Delegates specially for its Congressional District Convention, or where Delegates from such District may not have been elected pursuant to notice of such County Committee, then the Delegates from such County to the State Convention shall be Delegates to the District Congressional Convention for the District in which such County may be; and when such District Conventions shall have met in Sacramento as aforesaid, each Convention will determine when and where the Convention will make its Congressional nomination. All citizens who are in favor of a vigorous prosecution of the war to the final success of the Federal Government—who endorse the platform of the Union National Convention, and who will pledge themselves to support the National, State and Congressional Nominees of the Union Party will be entitled to vote for such Delegates.

It is recommended that no Delegate be elected, unless he be a legal resident of the county whence he is chosen, and that no proxies be given by Delegates to any except citizens of the county which they shall be elected to represent.

NATHANIEL HOLLAND,
Chairman Union State Central Committee.
J. T. HOYT, Secretary. ju25

"THE CALIFORNIAN."

WHAT THE PRESS SAYS OF IT.

The following are the notices which appear in our city cotemporaries:

THE CALIFORNIAN.—The fourth number of this journal has made its appearance, and the character of the paper is established. But it is a character peculiar to itself. It is very different from any other paper. Unlike other quarto journals of its size, it would rather be entertaining than altogether original, but its selections are made with rare judgment. Here is gossip for newsmongers; there ghost stories for spiritualists and lovers of the marvellous; and again, an article that shows how our neighbors live, or how the nation is governed. But the original part of the CALIFORNIAN is the best. The novelette is probably good—as good as other novelettes. The political leaders are solid. The fashion articles are entertaining. But the wit is the spice of the paper. Webb can make fun without buffoonery or bad spelling, and apparently without effort and without end. He may not be equal to Holmes or Saxe in verse, but in prose we scarcely know where to find his equal. It is not necessary to mention the names of those who have become famous by abusing our language, but they all have been or will be forgotten. Webb, we imagine, is capable of "things" that will live. His paper is now, next to Punch, the witticst publication known to us. The CALIFORNIAN is certainly a credit to the editor and to the State.—Alta, June 19th.

THE CALIFORNIAN.—The fourth number of this very excellent weekly journal appeared yesterday. What we said of the first number applies with equal truth to its successors. It is a paper of a manly and a gentlemanly tone, fit to be read anywhere, in one's office or parlor, and no publication among us is better suited for perusal to-day. The present number has several good papers—such as Mary Stuart and Chastelar, Things, etc.—Call, June 19th.

THE CALIFORNIAN.—We have carefully looked over the first number of this literary weekly, and can say unqualifiedly that we like it. To make use of a trite comparison, newspapers, like individuals, have a certain character, apparent in a degree at first sight, and becoming more positive in proportion as acquaintance increases. The CALIFORNIAN impresses us as would a refined, well-bred man of the world. The style is that of charming repose, easy address and delicacy of perception. There are many original thoughts scattered throughout its columns; but the chief merit of the paper lies not so much in this as in the thoroughly graceful manner in which they are conveyed to the reader. If a really creditable weekly journal has been, as some suppose, a want in this community, there can be no reason to doubt that by the CALIFORNIAN it is supplied. If its success be equal to its deserving, the projector will soon find himself floating on the tide spoken of by Shakspeare; a tide which, alas! but rarely makes for journalists. Daily Morning Call, May 29th.

THE CALIFORNIAN.—The first number of a literary paper (weekly), bearing this title, has been received from the Sacramento agent, C. A. Carolan. In size and general appearance it resembles the New York Round Table. The contents of this number, original and selected, establish the presence of editorial taste and the command of intellectual resources to insure a literary success, at least. To render the CALIFORNIAN acceptable to the State at large, however, San Francisco, the locality of its publication, should not occupy too much space in its columns. C. H. Webb, a gentleman of considerable journalistic experience, and a facile, lively, piquant writer, is responsible for the advent of this publication.—Sacramento Daily Union, May 30th.

THE CALIFORNIAN.—This new literary weekly presents itself to the public with the modest but easy air and address of a well-bred gentleman making his entrée into a drawing-room. Since the decease of the short-lived California Home Journal, which was a compromise between a belles lettres publication and the common type of American "literary" journals, we have had no weekly on this coast that exhibited any of the higher features that characterize such papers as the London Spectator, Saturday Review, etc., or the New York Round Table, which is modelled upon them. The new paper furnishes evidence, in every department, of precisely the kind of ability required in such an enterprise. Its typographical appearance is excellent, with the exception of the "head," which is not in keeping, and strikes us as being more appropriate for a sporting than a literary journal. The first two numbers contain several graceful and lively articles on the lighter topics of the fashions and the minor conventionalities, which evidently emanate from some accomplished female pen.—News Letter, June 11th.

THE CALIFORNIAN.—The first number of a new weekly bearing the above sententious title was laid upon our desk last Saturday. Its editor and proprietor is C. H. Webb, the "Inigo" of the Golden Era, and the late local editor of one of our permanent dailies. We have read its contents with considerable pleasure, for its originality and versatility are alike commendable. It will supply a void in literary circles, which has long been felt in the community, and should its existence be prolonged, unlike many of its predecessors, we shall look for a healthier tone to home-made literary merit. It has our best wishes for its success.—Police Gazette.

THE NEW WEEKLY REVIEW.—The weekly journal we have already announced made its appearance yesterday. The CALIFORNIAN (such is its title) contains an immense quantity of matter, selected with an exquisite taste, worthy of the distinguished literary man who has conceived this work, Mr. C. H. Webb.

This compilation will be sought after by those of our compatriots who wish to become familiar with English literature, and read at the same time writings varied, instructive, amusing and always worthy of attention.

The modesty of the editor equals his merit, and in order to give a proof of this we translate the lines in which he presents this journal to the public:

"This is the first number of the CALIFORNIAN. Little has been said about it through advertisements, no prospectus has been published, not from motives of economy, but simply because the proprietor thought that the best advertisement and prospectus of a paper that can be published is the paper itself. Such we now offer."

We wish the CALIFORNIAN every success. It is published in sixteen pages, printed in three wide columns. The price is 50 cents a month, and $5 a year. The office is No. 728 Montgomery street, San Francisco.—Echo du Pacifique.

THE CALIFORNIAN.—A new candidate for public favor, in the shape of a Saturday literary sheet, made its appearance yesterday under the above title. It is a handsomely printed paper of sixteen pages, and the issue before us gives an earnest of the capacity of Mr. C. H. Webb to conduct such a journal with credit to himself and the literary progress of California. It will be found a welcome visitor in every house, and we wish it success. It is readable and interesting, and cannot fail making friends.—Daily Alta, May 29th.

THE CALIFORNIAN.—The first number of Mr. Charles H. Webb's new paper—the CALIFORNIAN—has been received. It contains sixteen pages, and forty-eight columns of reading matter. Its general appearance is similar to the New Nation and the Round Table; which means that the mechanical department is unsurpassed in elegance and neatness. Mr. Webb is very modest in his salutatory—only occupying five lines and a half, to tell the public about the CALIFORNIAN. He thinks, and very correctly too, that "the best advertisement and prospectus of a paper that can be published is the paper itself." We doubt not that the CALIFORNIAN will be liberally supported—it is certainly worthy of it in every respect. We bid it all hail and welcome.—Daily Democratic Press, May 30th.

CALIFORNIA literature has been enriched by a new weekly paper, the CALIFORNIAN, published under the direction of Mr. C. H. Webb, who has already known how to make his capacities as a distinguished writer appreciated. This new organ is consecrated to the propagation of literature and scientific works, and merits a kind reception.—Franco-American Union, June 1st

THE CALIFORNIAN.—We have been favored with a copy of the CALIFORNIAN, a new literary paper, which will make its first appearance to-day. The columns, in measure and style, are similar to those of the Round Table, published in New York, and its typographical face is very pleasing. Mr. Charles H. Webb, a gentleman of acknowledged literary attainments, and at one time one of the editors of the Bulletin, is its editor and proprietor. Mr. Webb's articles in the Golden Era, over the signature of "Inigo," were a great addition to that journal, and were eagerly sought for and read. We notice that "Inigo" is one of the features of the new publication. That the new issue will be a meritorious one there cannot be a doubt, and we wish Mr. Webb every success in his enterprise.—Spirit of the Times, May 28th.

THE CALIFORNIAN.—This new Saturday newspaper, owned and edited by Mr. C. H. Webb, who has become well known to the public under the nom de plume of "Inigo," made its first forward step on the threshold of existence yesterday. It contains sixteen pages of matter, and promises to be conducted with ability. We are sincere in wishing the proprietor all sorts and sizes of good luck.—Sunday Mercury, May 29th.

THE first number of the CALIFORNIAN, a weekly paper, was published in this city last Saturday. Mr. C. H. Webb, recently one of the editors of the Evening Bulletin, is editor and proprietor. The CALIFORNIAN contains sixteen pages, is conducted with marked ability, grace and dignity, and presents a remarkably handsome appearance. It promises to become one of the best literary journals published in the country.—Monitor, June 4th

THE CALIFORNIAN, a new literary journal, C. H. Webb, editor and proprietor, made its first appearance Saturday morning, May 28th. Mr. Webb is widely known as the writer of "Things," in the Golden Era. He has also been connected editorially with the Bulletin. His paper (16 pages) presents an elegant and attractive appearance.—Golden Era, May 29th.

And the following we clip from the exchanges which have reached us:

THE CALIFORNIAN.—We have received the second number of the new behdomadal literary sheet recently started in San Francisco by C. H. Webb, under the above title. This new enterprise seems to be receiving golden opinions from the press in all parts of the State, and from the specimen before us we are satisfied they are well deserved. The high literary reputation of its publisher, the taste and judgment displayed in its selections, and its neat typographical execution, give assurance that our new cotemporary is destined to fill a high place in the ranks of journalism on the Pacific coast.—Sonoma County Democrat.

THE CALIFORNIAN is the title of a large and neatly printed weekly literary paper that has made its appearance in San Francisco. It is edited by Mr. C. H. Webb, a graceful writer and experienced journalist. Some person with more taste in literature than honesty "nipped" the first number from our table before we had examined it; the second number, however, is before us, and we find it filled with reading matter. orginal and selected, of the highest order. We shall hereafter treat our readers to some of the articles of our new cotemporary, and feel assured that they will indorse our judgment as to their merit.—Mountain Messenger, June 11th.

THE CALIFORNIAN.—This is the title of a new weekly literary journal which has just made its appearance in San Francisco, the first number of which has found a place on our table. It is got up in very fine style, and edited by C. H. Webb, a gentleman of considerable newspaper experience. From what we have seen of its contents, we believe the CALIFORNIAN will be a welcome visitor to the family fireside. Its editorials appear to be of a high-toned, liberal and finished order, while the selections are of such a character as should have a place in a respectable literary journal. It is not of the wishy-washy, sentimental, sickly order of publications, but one which we hope Californians will be proud to recognize as one of the productions of our coast.—Marysville Express, June 1st.

THE CALIFORNIAN.—The first number of this new literary weekly is on our table. It presents a beautiful typographical appearance, and we may safely say is the neatest printed paper in California. C. H. Webb, who has gained a local literary reputation under the nom de plume of "Inigo," is its editor. The CALIFORNIAN promises to be a popular and successful publication, and we add our quota of recommendation most cheerfully to this end.—Marysville Appeal, June 1st.

THE CALIFORNIAN.—This new weekly paper, published in San Francisco by Charles H. Webb, has been handed us for perusal. It is a literary paper of the highest order of merit, and deserves success. It contains, among other things, a highly humorous rhyme—The Ballad of the Emeu. Charles A. Carolan is agent for this city.—Sacramento Evening Star, May 30th.

THE CALIFORNIAN.—This is the title of the new literary hebdomedal which made its appearance in San Francisco last Saturday. It is edited by C. H. Webb, formerly of the Bulletin, a gentleman of rare scholarly attainments and ripe judgment in conducting a newspaper. The journal is beautifully gotten up after the English style of literary papers, and is by far the handsomest journal of its character on the Pacific coast. The people of California are in need of just such a paper as the CALIFORNIAN appears to be, and if the publisher will send us his journal in exchange for ours we will wish him the success he merits.—Napa County Reporter, June 4th.

THE CALIFORNIAN.

A PAPER FOR THE TIMES.

Devoted to Live Topics,

AND THE

BEST INTERESTS OF CALIFORNIA.

Is published

EVERY SATURDAY MORNING,

AT

728 MONTGOMERY STREET.

Nothing will be spared that will enable THE CALIFORNIAN to appeal to the Public for support, not only as the

BEST JOURNAL ON THE PACIFIC COAST,

But also as being

THE EQUAL OF ANY ON THIS CONTINENT!

Imperial paper, of a quality and weight never before brought to this market, is ordered from the East

EXPRESSLY FOR THE CALIFORNIAN,

And will arrive here as soon as it can be brought by Isthmus transportation.

THE BEST TALENT OF THE STATE

Is employed upon the CALIFORNIAN, and arrangements have been made with contributors abroad for

EASTERN AND FOREIGN CORRESPONDENCE.

THE TERMS OF THE CALIFORNIAN are $5 per year by mail to subscribers, invariably in advance; 50 cents per month served by carriers.

All communications and correspondence must be addressed to

C. H. WEBB,
Editor and Proprietor CALIFORNIAN,
728 Montgomery street.

CALISTOGA SPRINGS,
NAPA VALLEY,

The great watering place of the Pacific, not excelled in Europe or America.

BATHS OF EVERY DESCRIPTION,
GRAND HOT MINERAL SWIMMING BATH,

STEAM BATH,

From the Natural Springs—a sure cure for the Rheumatism, Gout, Sore Eyes, and Pulmonary Complaints, being impregnated with Sulphur, Iron and Magnesia.

CELEBRATED HOT MUD BATH,

The same as used by the Romans in Italy two thousand years ago.

An elegant TROTTING PARK, one mile in length.

The best TROUT FISHING and SHOOTING within one mile.

Seven hours from San Francisco, by Steamboat and Stage, four hours by boat and three hours by stage—starting at 9 o'clock every morning. Fare by steamer and stage, five dollars.

Thirty miles from the Geysers, stages running every day.

Telegraph line connecting with all parts of the State.

 No finer public accommodations on the continent.

jul1-1m F. B. GILMORE, Landlord.

REOPENED FOR THE SEASON.

THE CRYSTAL SPRINGS HOTEL,

Situated four miles from the San Mateo Railroad depot, in a most splendid valley, surrounded with large, beautiful, natural trees, is now open for the public. The road from San Mateo to the house has been recently macadamized, making it the finest drive in California. The House and Cottages have been refitted and thoroughly renovated. New spring beds and every modern improvement have been added to the sleeping department. The larder, as usual, contains all the delicacies of the season. Stages leave San Mateo depot on the arrival of the trains for Crystal Springs.

A fine stable is now opened at San Mateo by Messrs. Byrnes & Ames, who will furnish horses and carriages, or saddle horses, at low rates, to the public. Parties wishing rooms or meals, on arrival, can engage them by telegraph, via San Mateo.

jul1-tf TONY OAKES, Proprietor.

SAN FRANCISCO AND SAN JOSE
RAILROAD.

CHANGE OF TIME.

On and after MARCH 1st, 1864, Trains will leave the Depot on Brannan street, between Third and Fourth, for San Jose and Way Stations, as follows:

Leave San Francisco at 8 A. M. and 4:30 P. M.

Leave San Jose at 7:30 A. M. and 4 P. M.

SUNDAYS.

On Sundays, Three Trains will be run, as follows:

Leave San Francisco at 8 1-2 and 10 1-2 A. M., and 4 1-2 P. M.

Leave San Jose at 8 A. M. and 4 and 7 P. M.

Passengers can reach the Depot by either the Third or Fourth street lines of city cars.

A. H. HOUSTON,
my28 General Superintendent.

MARKET STREET RAILROAD.

CHANGE OF TIME TABLE.

ON AND AFTER APRIL 1, 1864, Trains will start from the City and the Mission as follows:

Between the hours of 8:20 A. M. and 6 P. M., every 40 minutes, instead of, as heretofore, every 30 minutes, thus

FROM THE MISSION.

9:40	10:20	11:00	11:40

FROM THE CITY.

10:00	10:40	11:20	12:00

And so on till 6 o'clock.

Before 9 A. M. and after 6 P. M., the running will be the same as before.

my28 F. McCOPPIN, Superintendent.

NOTICE.

THE Copartnership in the Banking business heretofore existing between Eugene Kelly of the city of New York, and Joseph A. Donohoe, Wm. C. Ralston and Ralph S. Fretz of San Francisco, under the firm name of EUGENE KELLY & CO., New York, and DONOHOE, RALSTON & CO., San Francisco, will cease on the first (1st) day of July, 1864—Eugene Kelly and J. A. Donohoe withdrawing from the copartnership.

The business will be settled in New York by Eugene Kelly, and in San Francisco by Wm. C. Ralston and R. S. Fretz.

Depositors are requested to hand in their books for settlement at the banking-house of Donohoe, Ralston & Co.

EUGENE KELLY,
(Per J. A. Donohoe, Attorney.
J. A. DONOHOE,
W. C. RALSTON,
R. S. FRETZ.

San Francisco, June 13, 1864.

THE Undersigned have formed a copartnership for the transaction of a general Banking and Exchange business, under the firm names of DONOHOE, KELLY & CO., in San Francisco, and EUGENE KELLY & CO., in New York, commencing July 1, 1864. Their Banking House in this city will be at the southeast corner of Montgomery and Sacramento streets.

EUGENE KELLY.
JOSEPH A. DONOHOE.

San Francisco, June 15, 1864. jul8

NOTICE.

THE Copartnership in the Banking business heretofore existing between Eugene Kelly of the city of New York, and Joseph A. Donohoe, Wm. C. Ralston and Ralph S. Fretz, of San Francisco, under the firm name of EUGENE KELLY & CO., New York, and DONOHOE, RALSTON & CO., San Francisco, will cease on the first day of July, 1864, Eugene Kelly and Joseph A. Donohoe withdrawing from the copartnership.

The business will be settled in New York by Eugene Kelly, and in San Francisco by Wm. C. Ralston and R. S. Fretz.

Depositors are requested to hand in their books for settlement at the Banking House of Donohoe Ralston & Co.

EUGENE KELLY,
(Per J. A. Donohoe, Attorney.)
JOSEPH A. DONOHOE,
WM. C. RALSTON,
R. S. FRETZ.

San Francisco, June 13, 1864.

THE Undersigned, calling attention to the above card, give notice that on and after the first day of July next, they will continue the business of the above copartnership without interruption, at the old banking-house of Donohoe, Ralston & Co., in this city under the firm name of FRETZ & RALSTON, and in New York, through the agency of Messrs. LEES & WALLER, No 33 Pine street: and that on and after the 5th of July next, they together with Messrs. D. O. Mills, J. B. Thomas, Louis McLane, Asa T. Lawton, Wm. E. Barron, Thomas Bell, Jno. O. Earl, Wm. Norris, J. Whitney, Jr., O. F. Giffin, A. J. Pope, Herman Michels, Frederick Billings, Geo. H. Howard, H. F. Teschemacher, A. Hayward, Moses Ellis, A. B. McCreery, R. M. Jessup, Samuel Knight, A. C. Henry, J. C. Wilmerding and Wm. Alvord of San Francisco, and Jacob Kamm, of Portland, Oregon, having become duly incorporated under the laws of this State, will carry on the business of Banking in all its various branches, at the same place and through the same agency, and upon the basis of a Gold and Silver Currency, under the name of

THE BANK OF CALIFORNIA.

D. O. MILLS and WM. C. RALSTON will be charged with the management of the business of the Corporation.

WM. C. RALSTON,
R. S. FRETZ.

San Francisco, June 15, 1864.

DINNER SETS.—We have just received ex Giscours, several extremely fine

FRENCH CHINA DINNER SETS,
WITH TEA SET, COMPLETE.

A SUPERIOR ARTICLE to anything ever offered in this market.

Connoisseurs will find great pleasure in examining our stock of VERY RARE CHINA, and

ELEGANT GLASS SETS,
FRENCH BRONZE STATUARY,
Comprising some very fine pieces.
PARIAN STATUARY, ELEGANT VASES, ETC., ETC.

HAYNES & LAWTON,
516 and 518 Sansome street, corner Merchant,
my28 San Francisco.

DISSOLUTION OF COPARTNERSHIP

The Copartnership heretofore existing under the name and style of H. WEBSTER & CO., have been dissolved by mutual consent.

H. WEBSTER,
A. D. NUDD,
S. L. STANLEY,
C. S. LORD.

NUDD, STANLEY & CO.,
Importers and Wholesale
LIQUOR MERCHANTS,
No. 410 FRONT STREET,
Successors to
H. WEBSTER & CO.,

Having purchased the entire interest of H. Webster, in the house of H. WEBSTER & Co., the undersigned will continue the business under the name and style.

ASA D. NUDD,
SAM'L L. STANLEY,
CHAS. S. LORD.

San Francisco, June 1st, 1864. je4

REMOVAL.—DR. H. J. PAINE,
DENTIST,
No. 522 CALIFORNIA STREET,
Room No. 19, Second Floor,
BETWEEN MONTGOMERY AND KEARNY STREETS,
Four doors west of Wells, Fargo & Co.,
je4 San Francisco.

ELECTRICITY AS A REMEDIAL AGENT.

When it was promulgated that disease could be entirely eradicated from the system without the use of poisonous drugs, the unthinking, or those who do not look deeply into cause and effect, scouted the assertion as chimerical, and adduced strong evidence of its utter impossibility. Long articles, replete with arguments, seemingly unanswerable, of the position that only through the digestive system could the blood be purged of the accumulation of the poisons which constitute disease. A great cry went up from the interested in the continued supremacy of the old system of one poison to cure another, that electricity, as a curative agent, had been tried and proved to be of but little if any value—thinking, poor souls, the world of science stood at the same point it occupied one hundred years ago. That were wrong, while those old fogies were content if they cured one in every five patients, there were those who were diving into the science of electricity, and finally it was discovered that the trouble was in the instruments used. From that time to the present improvements have rapidly advanced, until every disease in the catalogue of human ills have been either cured altogether or checked so as to enable the sufferer to seek those changes of climate which ultimately perform a perfect cure. Diseases hitherto considered incurable have been cured, and those diseases which took months, and even years, to cure by medical process, are now cured in a few weeks; and all by the Improved Instruments of Dr. J. H. Josselyn, Resident Physician at the Electropathic Institute, 645 Washington street, San Francisco. It is astonishing to see the number of patients and diversity of diseases that have been relieved by the electropathic system. From early morn till late at night his instrument is engaged imparting strength and health to all who have the good fortune to obtain his services.

The charges, too, are not as heavy as by the old system; besides there is no medicine to pay for, let alone the unpleasantness of swallowing the nauseous stuff. During the time the Institute has been in operation there has been more benefit to the human family derived from the system than from all other systems combined during the same period. Among the most troublesome diseases to which Californians have been exposed is Rheumatism. None have given the honorable practitioner more trouble to relieve, and none have pretended to cure (if we except known empirics) permanently. But this subtle disease gives way before the Electropathic System in a very short time, enabling the sufferer to go about his business without pain or the fear and dread of a relapse. And so with most other diseases considered incurable. We mention Rheumatism because of its abundance, but we could enumerate many other diseases fully as troublesome, and some far more fatal in their results.

Connected with this system are the renowned Electro-Magnetic Baths. Here let us caution the public against the numerous impostors in the bathing line. The pure magnetic bath is one of the most effective aids in the removal of disease from the system; but if given at the wrong time is likely to aggravate trouble, and cases have been known where the patient has been injured so badly as to require months to remove the injury. Persons in quest of this bath should be careful and not apply to a place where there is no physician to judge of the necessity of the remedy. In fact, the only place where they can be obtained, in all their purity, is at the Institute, where the Resident Physician will always be happy to examine and see that they are not unseasonably administered, and if not necessary, advise the requisite remedy.

To FEMALES, the Directors would say, Electropathy is particularly applicable to your delicate and fragile systems, and to the numerous troublesome and painful diseases to which you are liable; should you be irregular, a few treatments will restore the functions to the proper state without pain or inconvenience; should you be weak and enfeebled, either general or local, this system imparts strength and vitality, making the recipients feel buoyant and youthful where before they were languid and unable to enjoy the pleasures of life. One great blessing connected with Electropathy is, it purifies the system so thoroughly that it beautifies the complexion, making the coarse and freckled skin as pure and fair as possible, giving the patient a fresh and healthful look.

To the nervous the Directors would say, that you can be entirely removed from those dreadful feelings of evil foreboding, and your system strengthened so that nothing can disturb the current of your life. Several cases of insanity, arising from a disarrangement of the nervous system, have been permanently cured by this system. The Directors, in issuing this pamphlet, do it in the hope that it may be the means of awakening the public who have not studied into such things, to a sense of their duties, and if possible prevent those who have the care of a rising generation from poisoning their young charges with vile drugs, thereby entailing upon them troubles which, after life, may cause them to curse the origin. Also, that those in need of remedial agents may know where they can find them without resorting to taking the thousand-and-one poisonous nostrums that are continually being palmed off as sovereign panaceas for all the ills of humanity. Avoid them all—they are snares set to rob you, and do you bodily injury at the same time.

The Electropathic Institute was started amid the cry of interested charlatans, who used all the power their riches and the prejudices of the public gave them to prevent its success. It has risen to a position that is beyond their baffled malice, and will be honored in the scientific world when they are forgotten, or only remembered for their crimes and impositions. A thinking public are fast consigning them to that oblivion their works merit. Let them go, they will not be missed.

Persons seeking remedial assistance may wish to know something of the system by which diseases are so rapidly removed from the body. Electricity is a fluid of so subtle a nature, that it can only be studied by its results. We know by its action it forces everything of a foreign nature in the body from the centre to the surface, by its energy, while the vitality which it imparts fills up the vacuum, preventing thereby the subtle poisons from returning to the hitherto diseased parts—and here let it be understood, that the Bath should never be administered until the disease has been forced to the surface—except, perhaps, in cases of cold where fever has not set in. Its action upon mercurial disease is peculiar. The best authorities are of opinion that it liquifies the mercury—which, when in a liquid state, by its own specific gravity forces itself out of the body. This result has been arrived at by testing the water after an Electro Magnetic Bath. After such tests have been found in the water, the patient is not troubled any more with those pains peculiar to the diseases. In all other cases it forces to the surface and is washed off by the bath. The whole system in its application is a luxury—there being no pain or inconvenience attending upon it; but the reverse is the case—being one continued pleasure all the time. Try it you that are suffering either from disease or the injudicious use of poisonous drugs, and you will be made to rejoice that you have had the courage to strike out from the beaten path.

Below are a few certificates from patients that have been cured at the Institute:

CERTIFICATES OF CURES.

San Francisco, April 18th, 1860.

This is to certify that I have been under the treatment of Dr Josselyn, at the Electropathic Institute, and that he has cured me. My disease was mercurial, accompanied with chills. I applied to him on the 11th day of this month. I recommend all afflicted to employ him. He has cured me without medicine, by the use of his Electropathic Instrument. JOHN CALLAGHAN.

State of California, City and County of San Francisco—ss.
Subscribed and sworn to before me this eighteenth day of April, A. D. 1860. P. BARRY, Notary Public.

The undersigned takes this method of acknowledging publicly the benefits he received from the treatment applied to him at the Electropathic Institute while, suffering under a terrible infliction.

This is to certify that I have been under Electropathic treatment at the Electropathic Institute, 645 Washington street. When I applied to Dr. Josselyn I was cramped up with rheumatism, and also had the coast ague. So bad was I that, without relief. I don't think I could have lived more than one week. The Doctor, with his instrument relieved me the first treatment from all pain, and perfectly cured me of all disease in twenty treatments, without the use of medicines. I cordially recommend all afflicted to patronize the Institute, for it is truly a blessing to the afflicted, and the operation is very pleasant. I wish to publicly thank Dr. Josselyn for his care and sympathy. JOSEPH SEGER, of Bolinas Bay.

September 19, 1860.

State of California, City and County of San Francisco—ss.
Subscribed and sworn to before me this 19th day of September, A.D. 1860. P. BARRY, Notary Public.

Sacramento, October 19th, 1860.

DR. JOSSELYN—Dear and Honored Sir:—You requested me to let you know how I felt after being at home three weeks. Well, sir, I have now been here little over two weeks, and there is no return of that very unpleasant trouble. My sleep is sound, and there is no disturbance of the regular laws of nature. I feel as strong as I ever did before bad habits had weakened my system. Not only is the general debility entirely disappeared, but the local trouble is gone. I feel so strong that there is no fear of its return. Considering that you only took one month to cure a disorder of seven years' standing, I think your system almost miraculous. Accept my sincere thanks, and publish this, if you please. I have sworn to it, as you see.

C. BOWMAN.

State of California, County of Sacramento—ss.
Subscribed and sworn to before me this tenth day of October, A.D. 1860. CHAS. HART, Notary Public.

Hornitos, November 1st, 1860.

Well, Doctor, I am at home and have been to work in the water for several days, and there is no return of the Rheumatism, as I call it; and Mercurial pains, as you stated them to be. I feel as gay as a lark, no pain or bad feelings, no stiffness, but perfectly well, and all done by you in three weeks, without one drop of medicine. You had hard work to make me believe before you commenced, that you would cure me, but now I find it very easy to believe. Although my friends look rather incredulous, they cannot doubt my sober earnestness. Doctor, you have my thanks, and I will benefit you all I can, by spreading your fame up in these parts. Respectfully yours,

GEO. PERKINS, JR.

To J. M. Josselyn, M.D., Resident Physician, at the Electropathic Institute.

Nevada, November. 8th, 1860.

DEAR DOCTOR.—Pursuant to agreement, upon my arrival, I sit down to pen you a few lines in acknowledgment of the great service you have rendered me, in relieving me of that painful case of neuralgia and rheumatism. When I look back and see the gallons of medicine I have swallowed to no purpose, and then to think how soon you cured me, I am astonished. You were only twelve days performing a cure of the trouble for which I had taken medicine over six months. Dear Doctor, if you could see the wonder exhibited by my friends, who can hardly believe that a cure was performed without medicine; but here I have been cured, and I have not taken a drop of medicine from you nor from any one else while being treated by your splendid Instrument. I shall try to show my gratitude by sending every sick man I come across to you.

Yours, till death,
FRANCIS GARLAND,

To J. H. Josselyn, M. D., Resident Physician Electropathic Institute.

State of California, County of Nevada—ss.
Subscribed and sworn to before me this eighth day of November, A. D. 1860. F. SPAULDING, Notary Public.

Yreka, November 10th, 1860.

DR. JOSSELYN—Dear Sir: Your letter dated October 16th is before me. You wish to know how my bronchial troubles are. Now, Doctor, that looks a great deal like a joke. I once had such an affection, of several years' standing, but thanks to your natural mode of treating disease, it has gone to be numbered with the things of the past. Since my return I have not felt the slightest trouble from it. When you pronounced me well I did not expect to ever hear from it again. Any one who sits under treatment of that Improved Instrument of yours will have the same feelings. It imparts vitality to the system so rapidly that confidence is at once established. I have to thank you that you did not refuse to treat me because I could not pay you the whole of your reasonable charge; enclosed is the balance due you, and God bless you for the kind treatment I received at your hands.

Yours, ever grateful, WM. GARDNER.

State of California, County of Siskiyou—ss.
Subscribed and sworn to before me this tenth day of November, A. D. 1860.

B. F. WELLITS, Notary Public.

This is to certify that I, the undersigned, was troubled with dumb ague, accompanied with rheumatism, very badly. My disease was taken in Washoe. After having exhausted medicines without benefit I applied to Dr. Josselyn, at the Electropathic Institute, on the first day of November. After taking twenty treatments with his Improved Electropathic Instrument, I am perfectly cured, having been entirely relieved of all pain or inconvenience. I feel as strong as I ever did when in the best of health. I cheerfully recommend all afflicted to his care, as being the best physician I ever became acquainted with. One great advantage, he uses no medicines, but cures by a process which is perfectly natural. The time occupied in my case was thirteen days. D. O. HARRA.

November 14th, 1860.

State of California, City and County of San Francisco—ss.
Personally appeared before me, D. O. Harra, and subscribed and sworn to the above certificate, on this 14th day of November, A. D. 1860. P. BARRY, Notary Public.

San Francisco, August 31, 1861.

To the Directors and Resident Physician of the Electropathic Institute: Sirs—You requested of me a certificate of the cure you performed in my case. Below I append it:

This is to certify that I was troubled with a swelling which commenced in my ankles, and gradually extended upward until it affected my whole body. I sought the best medical aid in New York and Boston, and they all pronounced it dropsy. Hoping to retrieve my health I visited California in February last. I consulted the Resident Physician at the Electropathic Institute, and now, after five months of treatment, and waiting to see its effects, I am pronounced well by competent judges. It did not take but three months of treatment to cure me, but I waited to see that it did not return. I feel perfectly assured, from what I saw while under treatment, that Electricity, as applied at this Institute, will cure any disease to which the human family is liable.

Now, gentlemen, you can make what use you please of this certificate. With my thanks to the Resident Physician for his kind attention, I subscribe myself,

Your thankful patient,
MRS. C. A. CARLTON.

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.

The advantages of electricity as a remedial agent are universally admitted by the medical and scientific world. It requires, however, experienced skill to apply this remedy efficiently, and this skill of application is possessed in an eminent degree by Dr. J. H. Josselyn, of the San Francisco Electropathic Institute. The Doctor is well known to us as a scientific gentleman, and an ardent devotee to his profession. He is no pretender, but has conferred incalculable benefit to those who were so fortunate as to seek relief at his hands. For those who desire speedy and permanent relief from the rheumatic pains so prevalent in this region, we can recommend no surer remedy than a visit to Dr. Josselyn, at his rooms in San Francisco, No. 645 Washington street.—Placerville Republican.

ARE YOU SICK?—We wish to say a word to those that are sick. We have in this city an institution known as the Electropathic Institute, situated at 645 Washington street. The establishment is under the care of Dr. J. H. Josselyn, a physician who has no superior in the city. He has been in charge of the Electropathic Institute for several years, and has been uniformly successful in his treatment of the numerous patients that have placed themselves under his charge. The electric treatment will cure many diseases that cannot be reached by any other mode. Dr. Josselyn gives his personal attention to all of his patients, and is always ready to give advice to those that may call upon him. His charges are very moderate; and we cannot do the sick a greater favor than to recommend them to call on him before placing themselves in charge of another.—San Francisco Daily Journal.

We call the attention of our readers to the advertisement of Dr. Josselyn's Electropathic Institute. Voluntarily and unsolicited, we make the following statement, proving its great beneficial effects, particularly in rheumatic cases. Some months since we were on an editorial trip, visiting the mountains. The stage upset and landed all the passengers including the writer, below in the valley, where the Deer Creek overflowed by receiving the additional material, extraneous to its usual contents. For some hours exposed in our wet clothes to night wind and weather, we soon felt the effects of the accident, in the mountains—pains in the back, hip, and legs; so much so that for weeks we hardly could walk. Treatments of all kinds were applied, but without avail, until our attention was called to the Electro-Galvanic Baths and appliances of the above Institute. Thank God, after two weeks, we have been fully restored, and enjoy now the free use of our limbs and body, as fully as previous to our involuntary bath in Deer Creek.—DR. H. BIEN, Ed. True Pacific Messenger.

ELECTROPATHY.—Electricity has long been classed among the most effective medical agents. It possesses great advantages over the system of theropeutics hitherto relied upon, as it reaches more certainly the seat of disease, especially in nervous or rheumatic complaints. The Electropathic Institute, No. 645 Washington street, under the charge of its able Resident Physician, Dr. J. H. Josselyn, has attained a well merited celebrity for the many cures which have resulted from the skilful application of this invaluable remedy.—Daily Morning Star.

☞ All letters answered with promptness and pleasure. Office open from 9 A. M. to 9 P. M. Advice gratis.

J. H. JOSSELYN, M. D.,
jn4 Resident Physician.

R. H. McDONALD & CO.,
R. H. MC DONALD.) (J. C. SPENCER.
IMPORTING
Wholesale Druggists,
Corner of Sansome and Pine streets,
SAN FRANCISCO,
—AND—
J STREET, SACRAMENTO.

We respectfully beg leave to inform our customers and the public generally that we have opened a House in the city of San Francisco, where we will be pleased to see as many of our old friends and customers as can make it convenient to call upon us. We shall keep at both places a large and well selected stock of

DRUGS AND MEDICINES, SURGICAL INSTRUMENTS,
Dental Goods, Fancy Articles, Brushes and Combs,
SHOULDER AND BODY BRACES,
Ladies' Bandages and Supportors,
GUM ELASTIC STOCKINGS, TRUSSES,
Paints and Oils,
PATENT MEDICINES, HERBS AND EXTRACTS,
Brewers' and Soda Stocks,
CORKS (LARGE VARIETY), ASSAYERS' MATERIAL,
Burning Oils and Fluids,

Together with a large and complete assortment of all goods kept in a well supplied Wholesale Drug Store,

We respectfully solicit those dealing in our line to examine and price our stock before purchasing elsewhere.

R. H. McDONALD & CO.,
Sacramento and San Francisco.

R. H. McDONALD & CO.,
IMPORTING DRUGGISTS,
J STREET, SACRAMENTO,
AND
CORNER OF PINE AND SANSOME STREETS,
SAN FRANCISCO, CALIFORNIA.

IMPORTERS OF
DENTAL AND SURGICAL INSTRUMENTS,
TEETH, GOLD FOIL.
VULCANITE MATERIAL.

Vulcanizers, Vulcanite Base, and Impression Gutta Percha. A large variety of VULCANITE MATERIAL, Scrapers and Packers; together with a large and complete assortment of all articles of the latest and most approved styles of Vulcanite work.

DENTAL BOOKS.

We keep constantly on hand a supply of all the most approved Standard Works on DENTISTRY. Our efforts will be to keep a large and well selected stock of all Dental Material, where the Dental Profession may confidently rely upon having their orders filled in the best possible manner.

R. H. McDONALD & CO.,
Sacramento, 139 J street,
my28 San Francisco, cor. Pine and Sansome sts.

WONDERFUL TRIUMPH
IN AMERICAN DENTISTRY.

DR. BEERS & CO.,
617 Clay street,

ARE NOW MANUFACTURING THE NEW style of ARTIFICIAL TEETH so highly approved at the East, and which to be appreciated only requires to be seen. The Teeth, Gums and Plate are made of one entire piece of Porcelain without seam or joint, combining great strength and beauty with absolute purity and freedom from any metallic taste, while the coloring of the gums and the interior of the mouth are so perfect as to almost defy detection. All interested in the progress of the Arts are invited to examine samples of this work.

Superior Gold and Vulcanite Work also manufactured as usual, but at greatly reduced prices. jul8

PILES! PILES!! PILES!!!

Not piles of Gold nor yet of Silver so much coveted by all men, but the bleeding, blind, or external Piles can be easily and speedily cured by the use of

WOOD'S SUB-POSITORY.

It is a preparation totally distinct from anything heretofore offered as a remedy for this painful and often fatal complaint. The Sub-Pository is neither a pill, powder, wash or salve, and yet it has proved to be a certain remedy for the Piles. Do not doubt this assertion, nor delay testing the truth of it if you are troubled with the Piles—you will not be deceived in it.

Sold wholesale and retail by W. NEWELL,
jul1 No. 530 Merchant street.

FORTY-FOUR FIRST PREMIUMS
IN 1863!

THERE IS BUT ONE
FIRST
PREMIUM SEWING MACHINE.

The GROVER & BAKER SEWING MACHINE has been awarded Twenty-three First Premiums at State Fairs, and Twenty-one at City and County Fairs, in 1863, making Forty-four in all.

R. G. BROWN, Agent.
my28 329 Montgomery Street.

JONES, WOOLL & SUTHERLAND,
Manufacturers for the Trade
OF
SQUARE, OVAL AND ARCH-TOP MIRRORS, WINDOW CORNICES, AND PIER TABLES,
Of any Size or Pattern.

PORTRAIT AND PICTURE FRAMES
Of all Styles.

IMPORTERS OF
Fine Engravings and Artists' Materials.
312 MONTGOMERY STREET.

FACTORY—Market street, between Seventh and Eighth, opposite Yerba Buena Park. my28

J. R. MEAD & CO.,
HAVE OPENED WITH
☞ AN ENTIRE NEW STOCK ☜
OF
FINE CLOTHING!
AND
GENTS' FURNISHING GOODS.
Corner of Montgomery and Bush streets, San Francisco.
my28

REMOVAL.
HASKELL & CO.,
CANTON TEA STORE. | ESTABLISHED IN 1858.
Wholesale and Retail Dealers in
JAPAN AND CHINA TEAS, AND GROCERIES,
515 Market street,
And 15 Sutter street, three doors below Metropolitan Market, between Montgomery and Sansome streets.

It is the LARGEST STORE OF THE KIND in San Francisco my28

THE UNIVERSAL CLOTHES
WRINGER!
☞ WITH COG WHEELS. ☜
BUY NO OTHER!

This Wringer is warranted in every particular. It was pronounced superior to all others at the World's Fair at London, in 1862, and has always taken the First Premium at every State and County Fair, when exhibited in competition with other machines.

No other Wringer has the cog-wheel, without which the rubber on the rolls will get torn, and the strain on the cloth is such as to wear it out.

A liberal discount made to dealers.

WM. FAULKNER & SONS, Agents,
je4 411 Clay street, San Francisco

STERETT'S
STEAM
PRINTING HOUSE,
533
CLAY STREET.

W. P. HARRISON & CO.,
PRINTERS,
ENGRAVERS AND ELECTROTYPERS,
PRINTERS' WAREHOUSE,
417 Clay Street. my28

COMMERCIAL STEAM PRINTING HOUSE.
FRANCIS, VALENTINE & CO.,
517 CLAY and 514 COMMERCIAL STREETS.

Every description of BOOK, JOB and POSTER PRINTING done in the best style and at the lowest rates.
BOOK-BINDING and RULING done to order.

THE BANK OF CALIFORNIA.

Incorporated under the Laws of the State.

PAID UP IN GOLD COIN.

CAPITAL STOCK.....$2,000,000,

With the privilege of increasing to $5,000,000.

STOCKHOLDERS.

San Francisco.

D. O. Mills,
Wm. C. Ralston,
R. S. Fretz,
J. B. Thomas,
Louis McLane,
Asa T. Lawton,
Wm. E. Barron,
Thomas Bell,
John O. Earl,
Wm. Norris,
J. Whitney, jr.
O. F. Giffin,
A. J. Pope,
Herman Michels,
Frederick Billings,
Geo. H. Howard,
H. F. Teschemacher,
A. Hayward,
Moses Ellis,
A. B. McCreary,
R. M. Jessup,
Samuel Knight,
A. C. Henry,
J. C. Wilmerding,
Wm. Alvord.

Portland, Oregon.

Jacob Kamm.

D. O. MILLS, - - - - President,

W. C. RALSTON, Cashier.

Correspondents in New York, LEES & WALLER, No. 33 Pine street.

Correspondent in London, BANK OF LONDON.

THE UNDERSIGNED GIVE NOTICE THAT THE above named corporation has been organized for the purpose of carrying on the Banking and Exchange business in all its branches, in this city and with the interior of this State, the neighboring State and Territories, and with Mexico; also with the Atlantic cities, Europe, China and the East Indies, for which they are provided with ample facilities, and in conformity with articles of association will commence operations on the 5th day of July next, at the Banking House now occupied by Donohoe, Ralston & Co., corner of Washington and Battery streets.

With the view of giving to the business of the corporation all the efficiency and promptitude of a private banking firm, together with that confidential seclusion of private business matters so generally desired, the immediate management of its affairs is committed exclusively to D. O. Mills and William C. Ralston, as President and Cashier, respectively, to whom, or either of them, the customers of the Bank will apply in all business matters. The regular meetings of the Board of Trustees will take place monthly.

The undersigned deem it advisable to call particular attention to the following peculiarities of their organization, which are positively binding on all its members:

First—Sales of its capital stock can be effected only after due appraisement by stockholders selected for that special purpose; and the Trustees of the corporation have, in all cases, the right to become purchasers of the stock appraised at the appraisement, for the benefit of the remaining stockholders. This restriction is printed upon each certificate of stock.

Second—Loans cannot be made to stockholders, except upon collaterals other than their shares in the capital stock of this bank.

TRUSTEES.

D. O. Mills,
Louis McLane,
Wm. Norris,
Jno. O. Earl,
Herman Michels,
W. C. Ralston,
J. B. Thomas,
Thomas Bell,
A. J. Pope,
O. F. Giffin,
James Whitney, jr.

San Francisco, June 18th, 1864. jn25-1m

MANHATTAN FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY OF NEW YORK.

Cash Capital and Surplus.....$750,000
Deposit in San Francisco.....$75,000

COLUMBIA FIRE INSURANCE CO., OF NEW YORK.

Cash Capital and Surplus.....$600,000
Deposit in San Francisco.....$75,000

THE ABOVE MENTIONED WELL-KNOWN and responsible Companies, having complied with the law enacted at the last session of the Legislature, and deposited with Messrs. Donohoe, Ralston & Co.

$75,000 EACH,

As additional security to Policy-holders, will continue to insure

BUILDINGS,
MERCHANDISE,
FURNITURE,

And other property in California, Oregon and Nevada Territory, against Loss or Damage by Fire, upon the most favorable terms.

All Losses promptly paid in United States Gold Coin.

R. B. SWAIN & CO., Agents,
ju25-tf 206 Front street, corner of California.

AUSTIN & SCHMITT, Importers and Dealers in

FRENCH, ENGLISH AND DOMESTIC DRY GOODS,

Offer for sale the best assortment of the above goods to be found in the city, consisting in part of

SILKS,
SHAWLS,
MANTILLAS,
LACES,
DRESS GOODS,
Of every description. Best quality of
MOURNING GOODS,
HOSIERY,
EMBROIDERIES,
Together with a complete assortment of
HOUSEKEEPING GOODS.

247 Montgomery street,
Between Sacramento and California streets.

NOTICE TO CREDITORS.—Estate of JAMES A. MOORE, deceased.

Notice is hereby given by the undersigned, Executors of the above named estate, to the creditors of and all persons having claims against JAMES A. MOORE, deceased, to exhibit the same with the necessary vouchers, within ten months from the first publication of this notice, to the undersigned at the office of Delany & Boorman, 519 Montgomery street, in the city of San Francisco.

EUGENE O'CALLAGHAN,
MICHAEL McGRATH,
Executors of the Estate of JAMES A. MOORE, deceased.
Dated, San Francisco, June 22d, 1864. ju25-5t

REDINGTON & CO.'S ESSENCE OF Jamaica Ginger!

This valuable compound, which is now regarded as one of the most popular remedies in the domestic practice for various complaints of the digestive organs, such as Dyspepsia, Nausea, etc., is prepared solely from the WHITE JAMAICA GINGER, which is the best of all the varieties in use. In the preparation of

REDINGTON & CO.'S

ESSENCE OF JAMAICA GINGER,

Great care is taken to have none but select Root, and to manufacture it in air-tight vessels, thus preventing the evaporation of its delicate essential oil, and preserving the true aroma of the Ginger. It thereby contains in its concentrated form all the valuable properties of the Jamaica Ginger, and is guaranteed to be free from any impurities whatever

It is a grateful stimulant and carminative, giving warmth and tone to the stomach equal to Brandy, without any of its injurious effects.

It will cure Nausea, caused by riding in railroad cars, or from sea-sickness, or other causes.

Miners and others who are exposed to the heat of the Sun often whilst working in cold water, should never be without

REDINGTON & CO.'s

ESSENCE OF JAMAICA GINGER,

As by taking it as a tonic two or three times a day, it is almost a sure preventive to Chills and Fever; and to those who are farming the rich bottom lands of California it is likewise invaluable as a tonic, and should invariably be taken in the early morning before going to the fields, at the mid-day lunch, and before leaving off work at night.

Ask for REDINGTON & CO.'S ESSENCE OF JAMAICA GINGER, and take no other, if you would always have a Pure and Reliable article.

An excellent external application for Gout, Rheumatism, Neuralgia, &c.

REDINGTON & CO., Proprietors,
416 and 418 Front street,
my28 San Francisco.

RAREY'S CONDITION POWDERS.

THE MOST POWERFUL AND BENEFICIAL AGENT known on the Stomach, Blood, Lungs and Bowels of

HORSES, MULES, CATTLE, AND STOCK of all descriptions.

GREAT BENEFIT TO HARD-WORKING HORSES.

All diseased Stock SPEEDILY and CERTAINLY CURED; healthy Stock will be brought into the very HIGHEST STATE of PERFECTION by giving them a SPOONFULL, weekly.

NO LIVERY STABLE SHOULD BE WITHOUT

RAREY'S
CELEBRATED CONDITION POWDERS!

All FARMERS and RANCHMEN should use constantly

RAREY'S
CELEBRATED CONDITION POWDERS!

TEAMSTERS and STAGE COMPANIES everywhere should keep constantly on hand and freely use

RAREY'S
CELEBRATED CONDITION POWDERS!

They are equal to a Life Insurance on all Stock, as will be fully appreciated on trial by all True Economists.

REDINGTON & CO., Sole Agents,
my28 416 and 418 Front Street, San Francisco.

REMOVAL.

J. K. PRIOR,

Importer and Dealer in

GAS FIXTURES AND PLUMBING MATERIALS,

Has removed to 730 MONTGOMERY STREET, near Jackson, opposite Metropolitan Theatre. Just received, an extensive assortment of plain and ornamental Gas Fixtures, of entire new patterns. Being constantly in receipt of new goods by every steamer, the attention of the public is invited.

FOR SALE:

IRON PIPE, | LEAD PIPE,
SHEET LEAD, | SHEET ZINC,

As low as any importing house in the State. my28

G. FORREST WALTER & CO.,

EXCELSIOR

PIONEER MERCHANT TAILOR

OF THE PACIFIC.

ESTABLISHED, 1849.

NO. 611 SACRAMENTO STREET,
Three doors above Montgomery,
my28 San Francisco.

NEW YORK AGENCY.—$15 PER DAY MADE EASY, by selling our great "Original and only genuine"

PRIZE AND STATIONERY PACKAGES.

Each one contains more real valuable articles than any half dozen packages ever sold. They contain

FINE STATIONERY,
PENS,
PENCILS,
ENVELOPES,
AND A
GIFT OF JEWELRY IN EACH PACKAGE.

The whole worth several dollars if bought separate. Price, 50 cents. Wholesale rates to Agents low. Agents wanted in every town and camp on the Pacific coast. Send for our New Circular with inducements. Mailed free.

Address J. B. WILLMAN & CO.,
my28 502 Montgomery street, San Francisco

LAWRENCE & HOUSEWORTH, OPTICIANS,

IMPORTERS OF OPTICAL, MATHEMATICAL AND PHILOSOPHICAL INSTRUMENTS,

STEREOSCOPIC GOODS,

PHOTOGRAPHIC ALBUMS,

CARTES DE VISITE,

AND

JOSEPH RODGERS & SON'S

SUPERIOR CUTLERY,

No. 637 CLAY STREET,

SAN FRANCISCO,

(ESTABLISHED IN 1851,)

HAVE FOR SALE THE LARGEST STOCK ON THE PACIFIC COAST, consisting in part as follows:

720 dozen SPECTACLES, in Gold, Silver, Steel and Plated Frames.
305 dozen EYE GLASSES, in Gold, Silver, Steel, Horn, Shell and Rubber Frames.
150 dozen WIRE GAUZE GOGGLES.
300 dozen SPECTACLE GLASSES and BRAZILIAN PEBBLES.
350 dozen SPECTACLE and EYE GLASS CASES.

395 Opera and Marine Glasses.
75 Telescope and Spy Glasses,
178 dozen Magnifying Glasses,
80 doz. Pocket Compasses,
325 Hand Stereoscopes,
74 Revolving Stereoscopes
1025 doz. Stereoscopic Views
Drawing Instruments in German Silver and Brass,
Boxwood and Ivory Scales,
Microscopes in every Style,
25 Magnetic Machines for Medical purposes,
Aneroid Barometers,
20,500 Card Photographs, Photographic Albums,
600 Album Pictures—in oil colors,
50 doz. Union Card Frames,
Joseph Rodgers & Son's CUTLERY,
100 doz. Table Knives,
260 doz. Pocket Knives,
120 doz. Razors,
50 doz. Razor Strops,
130 doz. Scissors, SCISSORS, in Cases,
100 doz. Gyroscope Tops,
169 doz. Thermometers,
25 doz. Hydrometers,
Galvanic Batteries.

☞COUNTRY TRADERS will consult their own interest by examining our Stock and Prices before purchasing elsewhere.

 ORDERS FROM THE COUNTRY promptly executed.

☞CATALOGUES sent to any address FREE.

Address
LAWRENCE & HOUSEWORTH,
OPTICIANS,
637 CLAY STREET,
my28 SAN FRANCISCO.

PACIFIC INSURANCE COMPANY

436 CALIFORNIA STREET,

SAN FRANCISCO.

Insure against loss or damage by fire, on Buildings, Merchandise, Wares, and other Personal Property.

CAPITAL STOCK - - - - - - - - $750,000

The largest sum at present to be taken on any one risk is $30,000. All Losses payable in United States Gold Coin.

The Personal Liability of Stockholders, under the Law of this State, recognized.

The following List of Directors is a sufficient guarantee of the stability and responsility of the Company:

Louis McLean,
W. C. Ralston,
Frederick Billings,
H. Carlton, Jr.,
Wm. M. Lent,
J. G. Kittle,
J. B. Thomas,
J. G. Bray,
Asa T. Lawton,
J. Whitney, Jr.,
Edward Martin,
L. B. Benchly,
A. Seligman,
Wm. Sherman,
Wm. Alvord,
Charles Mayno,
Erwin Davis,
P. L. Weaver,
Samuel C. Bigelow,
Herman Michels,
H. L. Dodge,
H. L. Goldstein,
H. Hanssmann,
Morton Cheesman,
H. M. Newhall,
W. Norris,
Edgar Mills, Sacramento.
C. T. Wheeler, Sacramento.
J. H Jewett, Marysville.
J. C. Ainsworth, Portland (O.)
Lloyd Tevis,
H. F. Teschemacher,
Geo. H Howard,
A.B. Forbes,
A. L. Tubbs,
Jonathan Hunt,
J. B. Newton,
John O. Earl,
S. J. Hensley,
John Wightman,
L. Sachs,
Jas. DeFremery,
J. G. Kellogg,
G. W. Beaver,
Elie Lazard,
William Sharon,
Adam Grant,
Alpheus Bull,
A. G. Stiles,
M. P. Jones,
D. Stern,
S. M. Wilson,
D. J. Oliver,
Jabez Howes,
F. W. Brooks,
L. Lohmau, Sacramento.
T. R. Anthony, Stockton.
D. W. C. Rice, Marysville.
W. S. Ladd, Portland (O.)

J. HUNT, President.
A. J. RALSTON, Secretary. my28

BOYS! BOYS! BOYS!

NOW IS THE TIME!

H. M. LOCKWOOD & CO.,

New No. 624) CLAY STREET, (Old No. 176

Have received a Large Stock of

GENTS' AND BOYS' CLOTHING

—AND—

FURNISHING GOODS,

Which they are selling

AT VERY LOW PRICES.

Every Garment warranted. All are invited to call and examine our goods.

H. M. LOCKWOOD & CO.,
my28 624 Clay street, San Francisco.

GREAT TRIUMPH!!

STEINWAY & SONS

Were awarded the FIRST PRIZE MEDAL at the late great INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITION AT LONDON, over the two hundred and sixty-nine Pianos entered for competition from all parts of the world.

The Special Correspondent of the New York Times says: "Messrs. Steinway & Sons' indorsement by the Jurors is emphatic, and stronger and more to the point than that of any European maker."

A constant supply of the above superior instruments can be found at the Agent's,

M. GRAY, 613 Clay street.

PIANO TUNING done by a first-class Workman, from Steinway & Son's Factory, New York. my28

CARPETS, OIL CLOTHS,

UPHOLSTERY GOODS,

PAPER HANGINGS.

THE LARGEST

—AND—

BEST ASSORTED STOCK IN THE STATE,

And everything to be found in a well-conducted

Carpet Warehouse,

For Sale at the Lowest Rates.

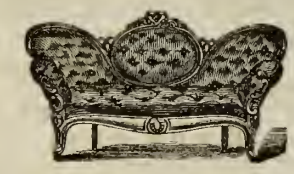
WM. M. HIXON'S

CARPET WAREHOUSE,

NOS. 606 AND 608 CLAY STREET.

One Door above Montgomery street. my28

THE MOST EXTENSIVE,



BEST SELECTED, CHEAPEST,

—AND—

LATEST STYLES

—OF—

Furniture.

GOODWIN & CO.,

No. 528 Washington street,

Are constantly receiving, and have on hand a large assortment of FINE ROSEWOOD, MAHOGANY, and BLACK WALNUT PARLOR, LIBRARY and CHAMBER SUITS, with DINING ROOM SUITS TO ORDER.

☞ We guarantee both Price and Quality satisfactory to our Patrons.

GOODWIN & CO.,
jul8 No. 528 Washington street.

FEET! FEET! FEET!

Listen all ye that deal in feet and are barefooted:

GOOD TIMES COME AT LAST!

No Assessments to Pay, but Dividends Secured at Once!

FOR SIXTY DAYS

We will dispose of our IMMENSE STOCK

AT UNPRECEDENTED LOW PRICES.

We have in store and arriving, upwards of

$150,000 WORTH

OF

BOOTS, SHOES AND GAITERS,

Which we are determined to give the public, and all our customers, for cash,

25 PER CENT. BELOW NEW YORK COST.

5,000 PAIRS LADIES' BUTTON, LACE AND CONGRESS GAITERS,

Suitable for House Shoes, Regardless of any Cost,

ON ACCOUNT OF HIGH PREMIUM ON GOLD.

We solicit a call to convince, then send along your friends, to the largest RETAIL SHOE STORE in the State.

HOLCOMBE BROTHERS,

PIONEER SHOE STORE,

Corner Washington and Kearny streets.

my28

DR. CHARLES E. ZOAH,

OFFICE, No. 621 CALIFORNIA STREET,

Between Dupont and Kearny, South side, San Francisco.

A CURE WITHOUT THE USE OF MEDICINE.

NO PAIN GIVEN.

Dr. ZOAH will cure without the use of medicine. His treatment of the following diseases is short, decisive and pleasant. Entire satisfaction given in every case.

Rheumatism, Neuralgia, Pleurisy, Dyspepsia, Lumbago, Sore Throat, and all Spinal Complaints; the most violent Toothache, Headache or Earache cured in a few seconds!

All pains or aches, no matter where located, can be removed in a short time, and charges reasonable. The poor unfortunate cured without price.

The Doctor's mode of treatment is the oldest science known for the treatment of diseases afflicting the human body, and at present is practised very extensively in the East with every success.

Dr. ZOAH will be in attendance at all hours, day and evening, at his office, 621 California street.

All letters strictly attended to. Consultations fr
jul8

WHAT KILLED HIM?

DR. HALL, in his "Journal of Health," speaking of the death of Washington Irving, asks tbo abovo question, and adds: "He might well have remained with us for some years to come had it not been for advice kindly intended, no doubt, but given in thoughtlessness and reckless ignorance.

HE HAD A COLD!

Which by some injudicious prescription had heeu converted into an asthma." Let me say to Dr. Hall, that that "proscription" was not

NEWELL'S PULMONARY SYRUP.

For that is an article calculated to remove rather than to produce asthmiatic affections. And as for COUGHS AND COLDS, the world never saw a hetter remedy, and never will, until nature produces some new ingredient out of wbich to prepare it. Don't be afraid to use it freely. Every article in it is from nature's own laboratory—the same today as they were a thousand years ago—all calculated to soothe, heal and strengthen. There is no

BETTER FAMILY MEDICINE!

Keep it in the house, use it freely yourself, and give it to your children upon the slightest indication of a cold. By so ooing you may savo yourself mauy days and uights of care, anxiety and watchfulness so inseparably connected with the chamber of the sick. jy2

JOSEPH A. DONOHOE, San Francisco. | EUGENE KELLY, New York.

DONOHOE, KELLY & CO.,

SAN FRANCISCO.

EUGENE KELLY & CO.,

NEW YORK.

Bankers.

EXCHANGE ON

NEW YORK,
BANK OF LONDON, - - - - London.
BANK OF IRELAND. jy2

PACIFIC MAIL STEAMSHIP COMPANY.

The following steamships will be despatched in the month of JULY, 1864:

July 4—GOLDEN CITY, W. F. Lapidge, Commander.
July 13—ST. LOUIS, Wm H Hudson, Commauder.
July 23—CONSTITUTION, J. T. Watkins, Commauder.

From Folsom-steet Wharf, at nine o'clock, A. M., punctually,

FOR PANAMA

Passengers will be conveyed from Panama to Aspinwall by the PANAMA RAILROAD COMPANY, and from Aspinwall to New York by the ATLANTIC AND PACIFIC STEAMSHIP COMPANY.

A. B. FORBES, Agent P. M. S. Co.,
jy2 Cor. Sacramento and Leidesdorff sts.

DEETKEN & CO'S METALLURGICAL WORKS,

WE respectfully inform the Mining community in general, that having completed our

NEW SMELTING FURNACES,

We are now ready to SMELT EVERY KIND OF SILVER AND GOLD ORES.

Parties unable to get satisfactory results hy amalgamation, will find it to their interest to have their ores smelted at our works.

LARGE CONTRACTS ACCEPTED AT LOW RATES, AND RESULTS GUARANTEED.

Facilities on hand to work all and every kind of Gold and Silver-hearing Ores, as well as it can he done in Europe.

AMALGAMATION AND CHLORATION carried on, on Silver and Gold Ores, as heretofore.

BEETKEN & CO.'S METALLURGICAL WORKS,
Office—315 Montgomery street.
WORKS—San Bruno Road. jy2

GREGORY YALE,

ATTORNEY AT LAW,

OFFICE—On second floor of Sather & Co.'s Bank, corner of Montgomery and Commercial streets, Nos. 2, 3 and 4, San Francisco. jy2

LOCKE & MONTAGUE,

IMPORTERS OF

STOVES AND METALS,

Nos. 112 and 114 Battery street,

jy2 SAN FRANCISCO.

IN THE COUNTY COURT OF THE CITY and county of San Francisco, State of California.—In the matter of the petition of JOHN DEWAR, an Insolvent Debtor.

Pursuant to an order of the Hon. Samuel Cowles, County Judge of the said County Court, notice is hereby given to all the creditors of the said insolvent, John Dewar, to be and appear before the Hon. Samuel Cowles, Judge as aforesaid, in open Court, at the court room of said Court, in the City Hall, in the city and county of San Francisco, on MONDAY, the first day of AUGUST, A. D., 1864, at 10 o'clock, A M., of that day, theu and there to show cause, if any they can, wby the prayer of said Insolvent should not be granted, and an assignment of his estate be made, and he be discharged from his debts and liabilities, in pursuance of the statute in such case made and provided; and in the mean time all proceedings against said Insolvent be stayed.

Witness, my hand and the seal of said Court, this 27th day of June, A. D., 1864.

Seal and Revenue stamp. WM. LOWEY, Clerk.
By WM. HARNEY, Deputy Clerk.

Burnett & Cleveland, attorneys for Petitioner, office 634 Clay street, Rooms 20 and 22. jy2-1aw-4w

---

McRUER & MERRILL,

WHOLESALE AUCTION HOUSE,

204 and 206 California street.

Regular Sale Days - - - WEDNESDAYS and SATURDAYS
(Advances on Consignments.)

NOTICE!

From this date Mr. A. P. EVERETT has an interest in our business. McRUER & MERRILL.
San Francisco, October 20, 1862.

A. P. EVERETT, - - - - - - - - - - Auctioneer.
jul1 3m

METROPOLITAN THEATRE.

Montgomery street.

Under the Joint Management of
JULIA DEAN HAYNE AND ANNETTE INCE.

JULIA DEAN HAYNE,
MISS ANNETTE INCE,
MRS. EMILY JORDAN,
MR. J. H. TAYLOR,
MR. FRANK LAWLOR.
MR. FRED'K FRANKS,
MISS FRANCES R. GASS.
MRS. EDWIN F. STEWART.

AFTERNOON PERFORMANCE TO-DAY AT 2 P. M., AT HALF-PRICES.

A SPLENDID BILL FOR

THIS AFTERNOON AND EVENING, JULY 2.

The grand Five-Act Play of

LESBIA,

OR, THE LION OF ST. MARC!

Which has been in rehearsal for the last two weeks.

Dress Circle and Orchestra.....$1
Parquette.....50 cents
Gallery.....25 cents
Private Boxes.....$5 and $10

Doors open at 7 o'clock. Performance commences at 8 o'clock.

MAGUIRE'S OPERA HOUSE.

T. MAGUIRE - - - - - - - - PROPRIETOR.
C. L. GRAVES - - - - - - STAGE MANAGER.
W. STEVENSON - - - - - - - TREASURER.

ENGAGEMENT OF THE CELEBRATED ACTOR,
MR. CHARLES WHEATLEIGH,
SUPPORTED BY
MR. CHARLES POPE,

MRS. SOPHIE EDWIN,
C. R. THORNE, Jr.,
PIERPONT THAYER,
MRS. H. A. PERRY,
MRS. SAUNDERS.

AFTERNOON PERFORMANCE TO-DAY,
FOR LADIES AND CHILDREN,
At HALF PRICES,
Commencing at 2 o'clock,

THIS AFTERNOON AND EVENING, JULY 2d,
And every night until further notice,
Will he presented the sensasion Drama, entitled,

THE UPPER TEN AND LOWER TWENTY!

Christopher Crookpath, - - - Mr. Chas. Wheatleigh
Zeke Ripebeart, - - - - - - - - Chas Pope
Synerite Simper, - - - - - - C R Thorne, Jr
Walsiugham Wouldhee - - - - - - Tbayer
Tom, - - - - - - - - - W O'Neil
Mrs. Crookpath, - - - - - Mrs Sophie Edwin
Mrs. Saunders, Miss Lulu Sweet, and Mrs. H. A. Perry in the other characters.

PRICES OF ADMISSION—Dress Circle and Orchestra Seats $1; Parquet 50c.; Gallery 25c.
Doors open at 7 o'clock. Performances will commence at a quartor before 8. ju25

THE SECOND
Monster Concert,
—OF—
PAUL JULIEN,

WILL TAKE PLACE

AT THE ACADEMY OF MUSIC,

—ON—

WEDNESDAY EVENING, JULY 6TH.

A Great Programme in Preparation!
jy2-1t

WILSON & ZOYARA'S Great Circus!

THIS MAMMOTH NEW HIPPOTHEATRON

Will exhibit throughout

THE INTERIOR OF THE STATE

During the present season.

THE NEW AND SPLENDID COMPANY, brought hy Mr. Wilson from New York and Havana at immense cost, have a world-wide reputation, enabling the management to produce all the ELEGANT, SENSATIONAL, THRILLING, COMIC, and ENTERTAINING NOVELTIES OF THE DAY. At the head of the Equestriau Department is the world-renowned

ELLA ZOYARA,
MLLE. ELOUISE,

And a nnmher of elegant and daring Riders, whilst

MESSRS. ROSS AND CARLO
Head the Acrobatic Corps;

MESSRS. DURAND AND PAINTER
The Gymnastic;

MESSRS. AYMAR AND WILLIAMS
The Comic Department.

The Ring is under the supervision of MR VINCENT; with TRAINED and PERFORMING HORSES, PONIES and MULES—being the most complete Company that has ever appeared in the State.

KIDD'S CELEBRATED BRASS BAND accompanies the entertainment. WILSON & ZOYARA, Proprietors.

MAGUIRE'S ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

THOMAS MAGUIRE begs leave respectfully to announce a short season of

Italian Opera,

at this establishment.

MONDAY AFTERNOON, JULY 4th,

A GRAND EXTRA MATINEE,

By the Italian Opera Troupo,

TUESDAY EVENING NEXT, JULY 4TH,

LA SONNAMBULA,

With the following distinguished talent:

MISS CAROLINE RICHINGS.

This eminent Artiste, whose delineations in the Italian and English Lyric Drama have, since her debut in this city, achieved a truly brilliant triumph, will he supported by the established favorites,

SIGNORA BIANCHI,
MADAME SIMONSEN,
SIGNOR BIANCHI,
MR. JOHN GREGG,
SIGNOR RONCOVIERI,
MONS. CHARLES,

And hy a powerful Orchestral and Choral Department, under the immediate direction of MR. GEORGE EVANS. The proprietor also feels much pleasure in anuouucing that

MR. PETER RICHINGS,

A time-worn and popular Manager of many Theatres in the East, has, at his solicitation, and with a view to carry out his policy, undertaken the management.

Opera nights of the ensuing week will be MONDAY, THURSDAY and SATURDAY.
Box Office will be open ou SATURDAY MORNING, at 10 o'clock, for the sale of Reserved Seats. ju25

PRELIMINARY RE-OPENING

—OF THE

Willows,

On Sunday and Monday, the 3d and 4th of July.

W. H. BARNARD, - - - - Proprietor.

THE HOTEL of this popular and fashionahle place of public resort has beeu so far completed as to enable the lessee to open its Saloou and beautifully shaded grounds for visitors, on SUNDAY, the 31, and MONDAY,

THE FOURTH OF JULY.

And to he kept permanently open thereafter. The Grove has been culled aud trimmed; the flower beds replauted and cultivated into fragrant bloom; the aquarium replaced, with the addition to its former feathered collection of four elegant black Australian Swans. The proprietor has also added a large collection of birds, embracing two Golden Pheasants and a brace of Silver Pheasants.

The Theatre has been entirely remodelled; the stage newly decorated, new galleries erected, the seats rendered more comfortable, and the floors replaced.

The Shooting Gallery, the Ten Pin Alleys, and the Shuffle Boards have been replaced.

The Flying Horses for children, are in readiness to perform daily duty.

Ample stabling is attached to tho premises, attended by polite and watchful grooms.

MURPHY & BRAY'S

CELEBRATED MINSTRELS,

Will give a performauce in the Theatre every SUNDAY Afternoon.

Mr. E. WOODWARD, formerly known to the San Francisco public, will give his personal attention to the Bar.

A grand opening of the WILLOWS will occur on the first of August, when the Billiard Room, the Lodging apartments, Restauraut and Ladies' Refreshment Saloou, will all be in readiness for occupancy. In the meautime, ladies, gentlemeu and children visiting the grounds will find ample entertainment and amusement. jy2-tf

---

GILBERT'S MUSEUM,

Market street, opposite Second street, over the Occidental Market.

F. GILBERT - - - - - - - - Proprietor
J. M. HUDSON - - - - - - - Superintendent

OPEN EVERY DAY AND EVENING.

THE LIGHTNING CALCULATOR!
THE GIANT BOY,
Eighteen years old, and eight feet in Height!
THE MUSICAL ANOMALY, THE TYROLEAN WARBLER,

Whose remarkahle skill in performing npon THREE WIND INSTRUMENTS AT ONCE, and whose wonderful conversion of a common COFFEE POT into a fountain of harmony, have astounded all who have seen him.

THE GREAT CEROPLASTIC
GROUP OF LIFE-LIKE FIGURES.
THE LITTLE NORTH CAROLINA SLAVE,
The smallest woman in the world,
And upwards of two thousand Curiosities.

Also, a beautiful set of Cosmoramic Views, illustrating the PRINCIPAL CITIES OF AMERICA. There is also an Aquaria Gardeu attached to the Museum.

The admission to the entire Exhibition is only 25 cents; Children 15 cents. jul1-tf

---

R. G. SNEATH,

408 FRONT STREET, SAN FRANCISCO,

Importer and Wholesale Dealer in

GROCERIES, PROVISIONS, FLOUR, RICE

TOBACCOS, LIQUORS, ETC.

Branch House, - - SNEATH & BOARMAN, - - Red Bluff.

Forwarding Agent, D. W. EARL, Sacramento, who will receive and fill orders for all kinds of Goods on my account, and keep a large stock of Flour, Barley, Potatoes, Ground Feed, etc., etc. No charge for forwarding.

ALMADEN QUICKSILVER!

Orders for Goods not in my line furnished customers without extra charge. Orders for Goods in the Eastern markets attended to promptly. Daily Prices Curreut furnished when desired.
Orders respectfully solicited. jul1-1m

HEALTH

AND AMU SEMENT,
COMBINED!

C. J. ROBINSON'S SELECT CLASSES,

In Dr. Dio Lewis's System of

LIGHT GYMNASTICS!

At MISS ALDRICH'S ACADEMY, Stevenson street,

Near corner of Market and Second streets, San Francisco,

For Scientific Physical Training and Recreative Exercise, in classes, by persons of all ages and conditions of health, and by both sexes, with light and movable apparatus, and an invariable and appropriate musical accompaniment. While the Exercises of the Light Gymnastics impart strength, grace, activity and symmetry to the person, they at the same time furnish an exhaustless fund of social enjoyment and mental recreation.

Mr. ROBINSON has recently been employed to teach this system in all the public schools of this city.

CLASSES FOR LADIES AND GENTLEMEN meet on Mondays and Thursdays at 8 P. M. For Ladies, Lads and Misses, on Tuesdays and Fridays at 4 P. M. For admission or further information, apply at the Academy.

Mr. ROBINSON will give instruction, on application to classes and private pupils, in VOCAL CULTURE and ELOCUTION, as taught by the best masters in the East.
jul1-1m

NEW BOOKS.

FOR SALE BY

A. Roman & Co.,

417 and 419 MONTGOMERY STREET,

SAN FRANCISCO.

Discovery of the Sonrce of the Nile, by Capt. Speke.
The Small House at Allington, hy Anthony Trollope.
The National Almanac for 1864.
The Annual of Scientific Discovery for 1864.
Family Pride, by the author of "Pique."
Woman's Ransom, by F. W. Robinson.
America and Her Commentators, by Henry T. Tuckerman.
Man and Natnre, by George P. Marsh.
Woman and her Era, by Mrs. Farnham.
Renan's Religious History and Criticism.
European Mosaic, hy Howard Payson Arnold.
Marshall's Christian Missions.
Father Mathew, hy J. F. Magnire, M. P.
Vigor. A Novel, hy Washington Bartlett, clerk.
Counsel and Comfort, by "The Country Parson."
Life and Correspondence of Theodore Parker, hy Weiss.
Gen. Butler in New Orleans, by Parton.
The Campaner, Thal, etc., by Jean Paul Richter.
Industrial Biography, by Samuel Smiles.
Ten Acres Enough.
Robertson's Sermons, Volume V.
Mainstone's Housekeeper. An English story.
The Federalist, (new edition,) by Hamilton.

A full and well-assorted stock of BOOKS in every department of Literature and Science always on hand.

☞ New Publications received by every steamer.

BOOKS IMPORTED TO ORDER

On the shortest notice.

Call and examine our stock and replenish yonr libraries cheaper than you can at any other establishment on this Coast.

jul8 A. ROMAN & CO.

OCCIDENTAL HOTEL—Corner Montgomery and Bush streets, San Francisco.

This House possesses all the requirements of a FIRST CLASS HOTEL, its spacious READING ROOM, with large MINERAL CABINET and extensive COLLECTION OF SPECIMENS from the different Mining Regions of the Pacific Coast—BRANCH TELEGRAPH OFFICE connecting with Lines throughout the country—and NEWS STAND—all contributing to make it the Headquarters and Home for the Californian business man and tourist.

The TABLE of this House shall not be excelled by any.

BOARD, THREE DOLLARS PER DAY.
LEWIS LELAND & CO.,
my28 Proprietors.

CONTINENTAL HOTEL,

SAN JOSE.

GEORGE T. BROMLEY.....Proprietor.

As a desirable place of resort for health or recreation, the above Hotel is not surpassed in the State.

Excellent accommodations for families, by the day, week, or month, on reasonable terms.
ju25

EDWARD BOSQUI & CO.,

517

CLAY STREET, SAN FRANCISCO.

BOOKBINDERS, PAPER-RULERS, AND
ACCOUNT-BOOK MANUFACTURERS.

Blanks of all kinds printed and ruled to any desired pattern. my28

SQUARZA'S PUNCH.

First Premium, Sacramento, 1862.
First Premium at San Francisco District Fair, 1863.
First and Special Premium, Sacramento, 1863.
Wholesale and Retail.
my28 44 Leidesdorff street, San Francisco.

The Californian.

"SURELY THERE IS A VEIN FOR THE SILVER AND A PLACE FOR GOLD WHERE THEY FINE IT."

VOL. I.--NO. 7. SAN FRANCISCO, JULY 9, 1864. TERMS { $5 A YEAR, BY MAIL, IN ADVANCE. 50 CENTS A MONTH, BY CARRIER.

CONTENTS:

ORIGINAL ARTICLES:

Things—by "Inigo"

A Lady's Trip to Washoe—by "Pigeon Wing."

John Burns at Gettysburg—a poem by "Bret."

THE COUNTESS DIANA—A Translation.

SELECTED SKETCHES, STORIES, etc.

Annie and her Master.
Mary Stuart and Chastelar.
The Young Actress.
The Unknown Painter.
Who Shot the Wolf?
The Rose Thief.
Why such Indecisive Battles?
The Old Maid's Thermometer.
The Ethics of Suicide.
Meudelssohn and Handel.
Presence of Mind
The Sea! the Sea!—its poetry and prose. } Poetry.
The Touching and Pathetic Legend of Sam Stout. } Poetry.

THE DANO-GERMAN WAR:

The Bombardment of Duppel.

PHILOSOPHIC PARAGRAPHS:

Selected sayings of Wise Men.

EDITORIALS:

The Dress Reform.
General McDowell.
Financial Affairs, Stocks, etc.
At Last

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS:

Minor Topics as They suggest Themselves.

MISCELLANEOUS PARAGRAPHS:

Interesting Items from Exchanges.

BRIEF MENTION:

The News of the Day at Home and Abroad, in Nutshells.

DRAMATIC AND MUSICAL:

A review of the Drama and Lyric Stage.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

JOHN BURNS OF GETTYSBURG.

HAVE you heard the story that gossips tell
Of Burns of Gettysburg?—No? Ah, well;
Brief is the glory that hero earns,
Briefer the story of poor JOHN BURNS:
He was the fellow who won renown—
The only man who didn't back down
When the rebels rode through his native town;
But held his own in the fight next day,
When all his townsfolk ran away.
That was in July, SIXTY-THREE,
The very day that General Lee,
Flower of Southern chivalry,
Baffled and beaten, backward reeled
From a stubborn Meade and a barren field.

I might tell how, but the day before,
JOHN BURNS stood at his cottage door,
Looking down the village street,
Where in the shade of his peaceful vine
He heard the low of his gathered kine,
And felt their breath with incense sweet;
Or, I might say, when the sunset burned
The old farm gable, he thought it turned
The milk that fell in a babbling flood
Into the milk-pail, red as blood!
Or, how he fancied the hum of bees
Were bullets buzzing among the trees.
But all such fanciful thoughts as these
Were strange to a practical man like Burns,
Who minded only his own concerns,
Troubled no more by fancies fine
Than one of his calm-eyed, long-tailed kine—
Quite old-fashioned and matter-of-fact,
Slow to argue, but quick to act.
That was the reason, as some folk say,
He fought so well on that terrible day.

And it was terrible. On the right
Raged for hours the heady fight,
Thundered the battery's double bass—
Difficult music for men to face;
While on the left—where now the graves
Undulate like the living waves,
That all that day unceasing swept
Up to the pits the rebels kept—
Round shot ploughed the upland glades,
Sown with bullets, reaped with blades;
Shattered fences here and there
Tossed their splinters in the air;
The very trees were stripped and bare;
The barns that once held yellow grain
Were heaped with harvests of the slain,
The cattle bellowed on the plain,
The turkeys screamed with might and main,
And brooding barn-fowl left their rest
With strange shells bursting in each nest.

Just where the tide of battle turns,
Erect and lonely stood old John Burns.

How do you think the man was dressed?
He wore an ancient long buff vest,
Yellow as saffron—but his best;
And, buttoned over his manly breast,
Was a bright blue coat, with a rolling collar,
And large gilt buttons—size of a dollar—
With tails that the country-folk called "swaller."
He wore a broad-brimmed, bell-crowned hat,
White as the locks on which it sat.
Never had such a sight been seen,
For forty years on the village green,
Since old John Burns was a country beau,
And went to the "quiltings" long ago.

Close at his elbows all that day,
Veterans of the Peninsula,
Sunburnt and bearded, charged away;
And striplings, downy of lip and chin—
Clerks that the Home Guard mustered in—
Glanced as they passed at the hat he wore,
Then at the rifle his right hand bore;
And hailed him from out their youthful lore,
With scraps of a slangy repertoire:
"How are you, White Hat!" "Put her through!"
"Your head's level," and "Bully for you!"
Called him "Daddy"—begged he'd disclose
The name of the tailor who made his clothes,
And what was the value he set on those;
While Burns, unmindful of jeer and scoff,
Stood there picking the rebels off—
With his long brown rifle, and bell-crown hat,
And the swallow-tails they were laughing at.

'Twas but a moment, for that respect
Which clothes all courage their voices checked;
And something the wildest could understand,
Spoke in the old man's strong right hand;
And his corded throat, and the lurking frown
Of his eyebrows under his old bell-crown;
Until as they gazed, there crept an awe
Through the ranks in whispers, and some men saw,
In the antique vestments and long white hair,
The Past of the Nation in battle there;
And some of the soldiers since declare
That the gleam of his old white hat afar,
Like the crested plume of the brave Navarre,
That day was their oriflamme of war.

Thus raged the battle. You know the rest:
How the rebels, beaten and backward pressed,
Broke at the final charge, and ran.
At which John Burns—a practical man—
Shouldered his rifle, unbent his brows,
And then went back to his bees and cows.

This is the story of old John Burns;
This is the moral the reader learns:
In fighting the battle, the question's whether
You'll show a hat that's white, or a feather!

GENERAL McDOWELL.

AS it seems to be assumed in certain quarters that Gen. McDowell has been sent to this coast to inaugurate a policy in accordance with the wishes of fanatics, who confound loyalty with blateration, and whose only idea of Unionism is that it consists in making a noise, a word as to his principles and record may not be inappropriate. Assuredly we do not presume to speak for the new Commander, or to shadow out the outline of his probable policy; but from some knowledge of his past military career, it is comparatively easy to argue what principles will govern him in his present command. Educated a soldier, and himself one of the strictest disciplinarians in the army, Gen. McDowell has from the first given in his adhesion to the established maxim, that it is for the military arm to carry out, in all cases, the policy which the Government may adopt without question or remonstrance, and not to invent or substitute a policy of its own unless the exigency is very pressing. When his troops, after weary months at Fredericksburg, on the eve of their march towards Richmond, were arrested by an order from Washington, and told to turn their steps northward, for the defence of the Capitol, it was a bitter blow to him, and he felt that had the line of march been left discretionary with him, he could have planned the movement better; but the order was received at midnight, and the grey of morning saw half of his command marching in obedience to it. During his stay at Fredericksburg, while in command of the Department of the Rappahannock, an order and discipline was maintained in his army which effectually prevented all depredations upon property, and did more to conquer the disaffected through that part of the country than the winning of a battle could have done. Camp life engenders lawlessness, and soldiers are proverbially given to pillage. But nothing of this obtained in the Army of the Rappahannock. Civilized warfare, if any warfare can be called civilized, has certain generosities, and is governed by rules, prominent among which is one to the effect that private property must be respected and private rights regarded. In wars between nations these amenities are observed, and the educated soldier sees no reason for dismissing all the usages of civilization, and inaugurating the practices of barbarians, simply because we are fighting with a disaffected part of our family upon a common hearth-stone. He gave guards to protect homes from the brutalities and insults of the soldiery, and to preserve property from pillage. The fields were green with grain, and he did not allow this to be wantonly trampled down while a turnpike road lay open for the march of his army. Citizens were not turned out from their homes to make room for him or the officers of his command; but in all his dealings with the inhabitants of his District, he conducted himself like a gentleman and a Christian as well as a soldier. For this he was howled at and abused by the correspondents of the ultra-radical fanatical press, who clamored that he should carry the blazing torch of destruction through the whole Valley of the Rappahannock, and sweep with the besom of devastation wherever a homestead was found. A courtesy which he extended in permitting a lady whose husband lay at the point of death in Richmond, to pass through our lines, was made a serious charge against him; his loyalty was impugned, and it was even hinted that he was in traitorous communication with the enemy. The soldiers under him were dissatisfied, for property lay on every side of them and yet they were restrained from pillage. Things were different in Blenker's and other commands, and they thought themselves hardly used. But neither their murmurs nor the abuse which a few correspondents shook over him from the press with which they were connected, sufficed to swerve him from his course one hair. The tract of country of which he had command was left smiling and green, a monument to his humanity and a striking contrast to the picture it presented when the licensed locusts of war subsequently swept over it. It will be useless to re-awaken the cry in Gen. McDowell's ears which assailed him when he held an active military command. He is too much accustomed to powder to much mind the smell of printer's ink, and unless we are much mistaken, he has seen so much of the radical wrongheadedness and injustice of the press at the East, that he will not permit himself to be much swayed by it here.

THE LATE GENERAL STUART.—A long obituary of General J. E. B. Stuart, in the Richmond Examiner, gives an interesting account of the dying hours of one whom the rebels call "the flower of cavaliers." During his dying moments he "reviewed in broken sentences all his glorious campaigns around McClellan's rear on the Peninsula, beyond the Potomac, and upon the Rapidan, quoting from his orders, and issuing new ones to his couriers, with a last injunction to 'make haste.' About noon Thursday President Davis visited his bedside, and spent some fifteen minutes in the dying chamber of his favorite chieftain. The President, taking his hand, said: 'General, how do you feel?' 'Easy, but willing to die if God and my country think I have fulfilled my destiny and done my duty.' To the doctor, who sat holding his wrist and counting the fleeting, weakening pulse, he remarked, 'Doctor, I suppose I am going fast now. It will soon be over; but God's will be done. I hope I have fulfilled my duty to my country, and my duty to my God." To Mrs. Gen. R. E. Lee, he directed that the golden spurs be given as a dying memento of love and esteem for her husband. To his staff officers he gave his horses. So particular was he in small things, even in the dying hour, that he emphatically exhibited and illustrated the ruling passion strong in death. To one of his staff, who was a heavy-built man, he said: 'You had better take the larger horse—he will carry you better.' Other mementoes he disposed of in a similar manner. To his young son, he left his glorious sword. General Stuart was about 35 years of age. His oldest offspring, a sprightly boy, died a year ago, while he was battling for his country on the Rappahannock. When telegraphed that the child was dying, he sent the reply, 'I must leave my child in the hands of God; my country needs me here; I cannot come.'"

WE must look for happiness in the world, not in the things of the world; but within ourselves—in our tempers, and in our hearts.

MARY STUART AND CHASTELAR.

IN THREE PARTS.

PART THREE.

Two days after the occurrences just narrated, Mary set out for St. Andrews, taking the route of the Queen's Ferry, and sleeping the first night at Dunfermline, and the second at Burnt Island. On the evening of her arrival at the latter place, the Queen, fatigued by her journey, which had been prolonged by hunting and hawking, retired early to her apartment. An instant after entering the room she was startled at seeing Chastelar emerge from behind the arras, and throw himself at her feet. Uttering loud cries, Mary by turns called for assistance and commanded him to begone.

Instead of obeying, the infatuated young man not only persisted in remaining in the position he was in, but, still keeping hold of the Queen's robe, began to rave in the language of passion and love. The Queen endeavored to release herself from his hold, and was in the act of attempting to do so, when the door of the apartment, which Chastelar had closed behind him, was violently thrown open, and the Earl of Moray entered. Having advanced two or three steps, he stood still, and, folding his arms across his breast, looked sternly but in silence, first at the Queen, and then at Chastelar, keeping at the same time sufficiently near the door to prevent the escape of the latter, in case he should make such an attempt.

Mary Stuart, pale, breathless, and trembling, met the scrutinizing glance of her brother with a look of defiance and threatening, the peculiar frown of her race strongly imprinted on her fair and lofty brow.

"Slay him!" exclaimed the Queen, in the first outburst of her indignation; "strike him down at my feet! Brother, an ye have a drop of the Stuart blood in your veins, pass your sword through the traitor who has dared to put this mortal insult upon our house."

The Queen's ladies, all scared and dismayed, followed by several officers of the household, bearing lights and naked weapons, having now rushed in, stood staring at the trio with looks of inquiry and wonderment. Moray continued to gaze on all around for some time without opening his lips, but with an ominous expression of countenance.

"Well, Sir Poet," he at length said, addressing Chastelar with cold deliberation, "pray do me the favor to enlighten me as to the meaning of your having thus intruded yourself into the Queen's apartment. Why do I find you here, sir, and wherefore have I found you in the position from which you have just now risen? Pray, sir, explain."

"I came here, my lord," replied Chastelar, with firmness and dignity, "to take leave of her Majesty before returning to France, for which I set out to-morrow."

An ironical and incredulous smile played on the stern features of Moray.

"A strange place this, methinks, and a strange season for leave-taking, and yet stranger than all, the language in which I just now heard you speak. You are aware, I presume, sir," he added, "that you are just now in the Queen's sleeping apartment, where none dare intrude but on peril of their lives. But probably, madam," he said, now turning to the Queen, without making any reply to his last remark, "you can explain the meaning of this extraordinary scene?"

"You had better, my lord," replied Mary, evasively—for, in her pliant and forgiving nature, she was still reluctant to commit irretrievably the unfortunate young man—"obtain what explanations you desire from Chastelar himself. He, surely, is the fittest person to explain his own conduct."

"True, madam," said Moray, sneeringly, "but I thought it not by any means improbable that you might be as well informed on the point in question as the gentleman himself."

"Your insinuation is rude, my lord," replied the Queen, haughtily; and without vouchsafing any other remark, she walked away to the further end of the apartment, leaving the Earl and Chastelar together.

Moray now saw, from the perfectly composed and independent manner of the Queen, that he could make out nothing to her prejudice from the case before him, nor elicit the slightest evidence of anything like connivance, on the part of his sister, at Chastelar's intrusion. Seeing this, he determined on proceeding against the unfortunate poet with the utmost rigor to which his imprudence had exposed him, in the hope that severity might wring from him such confessions as would implicate the Queen.

Having come to this resolution—

"Sir," he said, addressing Chastelar, "prepare to abide the consequences of your presumption." And he proceeded to the door, called an attendant, and desired him to send the captain of the guard and a party to him instantly.

In a few minutes they appeared, when the Earl, addressing the officer, and pointing to Chastelar, desired him to put that gentleman in ward, and the latter was immediately hurried out of the apartment. The Earl then walked up to Mary, who, with her head leaning pensively on her hand, had been silently contemplating the proceedings that were going forward.

"Madam," said Moray, on approaching her, "I think you may consider yourself in safety for this night—at any rate, from any further intrusion from this itinerant versifier; and it shall be my fault if he ever again annoys you or any one else."

"What, brother!" exclaimed Mary, in evident alarm at this ambiguous but ominous hint, "you will not surely proceed to extremities against this unfortunate young man?"

"By St. Bride, but I will, though!" replied Moray, angrily. "Why, madam, have not your reputation and your dignity as a queen both been assailed by this insolent foreigner, in this daring act he has done?"

"Nay, my lord," replied the Queen, haughtily, "methinks it will take much more than this to affect my reputation. I indeed marvel much to hear you speak thus, my lord. My dignity, again, can be abased only by my own acts, and cannot be affected by the act of another."

"Nevertheless, madam," rejoined her brother, "ye cannot stop slanderous tongues; and I know not how the world may construe this circumstance. Both your honor and station require that this presumptuous knave suffer the penalty of his crime in its utmost rigor. What would the world say else? It would have suspicious that ought not for an instant be associated with the name of Mary Stuart."

"But you will not have his life taken, brother?" said Mary, in a gentle tone, subdued by the thoughts of the severe doom that threatened the unfortunate gentleman, and placing her hand affectionately on the Earl's arm as she spoke. "Can ye not banish him forth of the realm, or imprison him?—anything short of death, which methinks would be, after all, hard measure for the offence."

"You have reasons, doubtless, madam," said the Earl, coldly and bluntly, "for this tenderness."

"I have," said Mary, indignantly; "but not, my lord, such as you would seem to insinuate. My reasons are humanity and a feeling of compassion for the misguided and unhappy youth."

"Chastelar shall have such mercy, madam, as your Majesty's Privy Council may deem him deserving of," replied the Earl, turning round on his heel, and quitting the royal bed-chamber.

On leaving the presence of the Queen, the Earl of Moray retired to his own apartment, where he was shortly after waited upon by Villemont, who had been for some time watching his return.

"Ha, Villemont!" said the Earl, with an unusual expression of satisfaction on his countenance, on the former's entrance. "Thou hast done well, friend; I found matters exactly as you stated, and am obliged by the promptness and accuracy of your information."

"Very happy, my lord, to serve you to your satisfaction," replied Villemont, bowing low.

"You did well, Villemont, and shall be suitably recompensed. Dost know how this fellow came here, and when?"

"He came across the river in a small bark, my lord; from just opposite."

"Ah, so!" said the Earl. "Well, you may now retire, Villemont. To-morrow I shall see to your reward."

Villemont bowed and withdrew. When he had retired, the Earl sat down to a small escritoire, and, late as the hour was, began writing with great assiduity, an employment at which he continued until he had written eight or ten different letters, each of considerable length. These were addressed to various members of the Queen's Privy Council in Edinburgh, and to some of the law officers of the Crown. They were all nearly copies of each other, and contained an account of Chastelar's conduct, with a charge to the several parties addressed to repair to St. Andrews on the second day following, for the purpose of holding a court on the offender, and awarding him such punishment as the case might seem to demand.

On the day succeeding that on which the occurrence just related took place, the Queen and her retinue proceeded to St. Andrews, whither the prisoner Chastelar was also carried; and on the next again, the unfortunate gentleman was brought to trial, the scene of which was the hall in the castle of St. Andrews, which had been hastily prepared for the occasion. In the centre of this apartment was placed a large oblong oaken table, covered with crimson velvet, and surrounded by a circle of high-backed chairs, with cushions covered with the same material. These were subsequently occupied by eight or ten persons of the Privy Council, including Mary's Secretary of State, Maitland of Lethington, the Scottish Machiavel, who sat at one end of the table. At the opposite end sat the Earl of Moray; the prisoner occupying a place in the centre at one of the sides. During the investigation which followed into the offence of Chastelar, the Earl of Moray made repeated indirect attempts to lead him to make statements prejudicial to the Queen; urging him, with a show of candor and pretended regard for justice, to inform the Court of anything and everything which he thought might be available in his defence, without regard to the rank or condition of those whom such statements might implicate. This language was too plain to be misunderstood. Every one present perceived that it conveyed a pointed allusion to the Queen. Chastelar, amongst the rest, felt that it did so, and indignantly repelled the insinuation.

"I have none," he said, "to accuse but myself; nothing to blame but my own folly. Folly, did I say?" went on the fearless enthusiast; "it was no folly—it was love, love, love—all-powerful love—love for her, the noblest, the loveliest of created beings, for whom I could die ten thousand deaths. It was love for her who has been to me the breath of life, the light of mine eyes, the idol of my heart; around which were entwined all the feelings and susceptibilities of my nature, even as the ivy entwines the tree. The constant theme of my dreams by night; the sole object of my thoughts by day. It has been hinted to me that I may blame freely where to blame may serve me. But whom shall I blame? Not her, surely; for she is faultless as the unborn babe; pure, spotless as the snow-wreath in the hollow of the mountain. Who shall maintain the contrary lies in his throat, and is a foul-spoken, villainous slanderer."

Here the enthusiastic and somewhat incoherent speaker was abruptly interrupted by Maitland of Lethington, who, rising to his feet, and resting his hands on the low table around which Chastelar's judges were, said, looking at the prisoner—

"Friend, ye must speak to your defence, if ye would speak at all. This that ye have said is nothing to the purpose, and ye cannot be permitted to take up the time of this court with such rhapsodies as these, that make not for any point in your accusation. Think ye not so, my lords?" he added, glancing round the table. Several nods of assent spoke acquiescence. When Maitland had concluded—

"I have done then, my lords," said Chastelar, bowing and seating himself. "I have no more to say."

A short consultation now took place amongst the prisoner's judges, when sentence of death was unanimously agreed to, and he was ordered to be beheaded on the following day, the 22d of February, 1563.

On the rising of the court, the Earl of Moray repaired to the Queen, and informed her of the doom awarded against Chastelar. Mary was greatly affected by this intelligence. She burst into tears, exclaiming—

"O unhappy, thrice unhappy countenance! thou hast been given me for a curse instead of a blessing—the ruin of those who love me best—that, by inspiring a silly passion, at once dangerous and worthless, will not permit one to remain near me in the character of a friend. My lord, my lord," she continued, in great agitation, "can you not, will you not save the unhappy young man? I beseech thee, I implore thee, by the ties of consanguinity that connect us, by the duty ye owe to me as thy sovereign, to spare his life."

"Ye know not what ye ask, madam," replied Moray, stalking up and down the apartment. "How can his life be spared consistently with your honor? Save him, and you will set a thousand slanderous tongues a-wagging. It may not—must not be."

Mary herself could not deny the force of this remark; and finding she had nothing to oppose it, she flung herself into a chair, and again burst into tears. In this condition the Earl left her to give orders respecting the execution of Chastelar on the morrow, and to put another proceeding in train for obtaining that result which he had aimed at on the trial of the unfortunate young man. Sending again for Villemont—

"Friend," he said, on that person entering the apartment, "I wish another small piece of service at your hands."

Villemont bowed, and expressed his readiness to do anything he might be required to do. The Earl carelessly nodded approbation.

"To-night, then, Villemont," he went on, "you will repair to the dungeon in which Chastelar is confined. You will see him as a friend. You understand me?"

"Well, my lord—very well."

"Just so. Then you will hint to him that you have reason to believe he might yet save his life by confessing a participation in his guilt on the part of the Queen. You may add—though not as from me, of course—that I have no doubt of his having been encouraged to those liberties for which his life is forfeited; and you may say that you know I feel for him, and would readily procure his pardon if he would only give me a reasonable ground or pretext for doing so, by showing that there were others equally in fault with him. Do you entirely understand me, Villemont?"

"Entirely, my lord," replied the latter.

"So, then, return to me when you have seen Chastelar, and let me know the result," said the Earl.

Villemont once more withdrew, to perform the treacherous and knavish part assigned him. About midnight he sought the dungeon of the unhappy gentleman, and, having been admitted by the guards, found him busily employed in writing; the indulgence of a lamp, with writing materials, having, at his most earnest request, been afforded him. Indeed, these were more willingly and readily given than he was aware of. They were given in the hope that he would commit something to writing which, without his intending it, might compromise the character of the Queen. But in this her enemies were disappointed.

On Villemont entering Chastelar's dungeon, the latter, as we have already said, was busily engaged in writing. He was inditing a last farewell to the Queen in verse. On this employment he was so intent that he did not observe, or, at least, pay any attention to the entrance of Villemont, but continued writing on till he had completed his task, which now, however, occupied only a very few minutes. On finishing—

"'Tis done," he said, and threw down his pen with violence on the table. "These are the last notes of the harp of Chastelar. Ha, Villemont!" and only now for the first time seeming conscious of that person's presence, "I am glad to see you, my countryman. This is kind. I thought there were none in this strange land to care for me. But they shall see, Villemont," he added, proudly, "how a Frenchman and a poet can die. That is, boldly and bravely. He were no true poet whose soul was not elevated above the fear of death. I said, my friend," he went on, after a momentary pause, and sighing deeply as he spoke, "that I thought there were none in this land to care for me or to sorrow for me, and perhaps it is so. But there is one, Villemont, whom I would not willingly believe indifferent to my fate. She, surely, much as I have offended her, will say, 'Poor Chastelar!' Nay, methinks I see a tear standing in that peerless eye, when she recalls the memory of her departed poet. That, that, Villemont," said the unhappy captive, with an enthusiasm which the near approach of death had not been able to abate—"that would be something worth dying for!"

Villemont smiled.

"You hold your life lightly indeed, Chastelar," he said, speaking in his native language, "if you think its loss compensated by a woman's tear."

"Ah, Villemont, but such a woman!" exclaimed Chastelar.

"Well, well," replied the former, "but you can have no doubt that she, at least, will regret your death. She loved you too well not to deplore your fate."

"Did she?" exclaimed Chastelar, eagerly, and with such a look of inquiry and doubt as greatly disappointed the assertor. "You know whom I mean, then; but how know ye that which ye have just now said? Assure me that ye speak true, Villemont, and I shall die happy."

Ah! bah! you know it yourself, my friend, better than I," replied the latter. "No use in concealing it now," he added, with an intelligent look.

"Concealing what, sir?" said Chastelar, in a tone of mingled surprise and displeasure.

"Why, the affection the Queen entertained for you," replied Villemont. "We all know, my friend, you would not have done what you did had she not encouraged your addresses. And I'll tell you what, Chastelar," he went on, "I have reason to believe that your life might be yet spared, if you would only show that this was so."

"Ah, I understand you," said Chastelar, with suppressed passion. "If I will accuse the Queen, if I will put her in the power of her enemies, her enemies will be obliged to me. In other words, I may save my life by sacrificing her reputation; and it would be little matter whether what I said should be true or not. Is it not so, Villemont?" "Then, without waiting for an answer, "Villain, devil that thou art!" he exclaimed, now suddenly giving full swing to the passion that had been raised within him, "how hast thou dared to come to me with such an infamous proposal as this? Begone, begone, ruffian, I say!" and he seized the now trembling caitiff by the throat, and dashed him against the door of the cell with a violence that instantly brought in the guards who were stationed outside. These, seeing how matters stood, hurried Villemont out of the dungeon, and again secured the door on its unfortunate inmate.

On leaving Chastelar, Villemont repaired to the Earl of Moray, but with infinitely less confidence in his look and manner than on the former occasion when his villainy had been successful. To the Earl he detailed the particulars of his interview, not forgetting to mention the rough treatment he had received from the infuriated poet.

"Then he'll confess nothing, Villemont?" said Moray, when the former had done speaking.

"Nothing, my lord. He values not his life at a pin's fee."

"Obstinate fool!" exclaimed the Earl, evidently chagrined and disappointed. "Let him die, then. You may retire, Villemont," he abrubtly added.

Villemont obeyed.

"His execution, at any rate, shall be public," said the Earl to himself, when the latter had left him. "Perhaps he may make some confession on the scaffold, and it will be well to have it amply testified."

Mary Stuart, who, later in life, on occasions when her affections were engaged, commonly showed herself so rash in dealing with public opinion, was timid and hesitating in this instance. She was, in fact, terrified at the calumnies spread, and even openly preached against her in the churches by the reformers, and yielded up to their rancour, therefore, that devoted head as a proof of her own virtue, and resisted every prayer addressed to her pardon. Having returned to Holyrood, she refused to commute the sentence of death pronounced against Chastelar by his fanatical judges, and commanded the following couplet, inscribed by an unknown hand on the wall of her chamber, to be effaced:

"Sur front de roy Que pardon soit."

Chastelar had a friend, however, in Erskine, a cousin of the captain of the Queen's guard at St. Andrews. This generous gentleman, having obtained access to the prison of the condemned poet, insinuated himself into the good graces of his gaoler, and tried to make him drunk, with a hope of effecting Chastelar's escape. But the custodian, a rigid Presbyterian, baffled every attempt to lull his vigilance asleep, and night and day narrowly watched his prisoner until he delivered him into the hands of the executioner.

Some writers seem to think that the Queen was not ignorant of this attempt at procuring Chastelar's escape. The relationship of Erskine with the captain of the guard is, in absence of proof, a point in Mary's favor.

During his serious moods, when his features lost their wonted frivolous expression, Chastelar bore a striking resemblance to the Chevalier Bayard. On quitting his dungeon for the scaffold, he recalled to many the appearance of his chivalrous uncle—alike in face, figure, and intrepid bearing. "If I am not like my ancestor, 'without reproach,'" said he, "I am at least like him, 'without fear.'"

He ascended the scaffold with the same intrepid step as though he were marching to meet the enemy, and his gentlemanlike appearance and noble bearing excited strongly the sympathy of the crowd. Whilst the executioner was occupied with the last preparations, Chastelar took a small volume from his pocket, opened it, and read aloud, with great dignity and composure, his friend Ronsard's Hymn to Death, in which occur the following lines, adapted at once to his situation and his sentiments:

"Le désir n'est rien que martire,
Content ne vit le dé sireux,
Et l'bomme mort est bien heureux,
Heureux qui plus rien ne désire."

When he had done, he turned towards that part of the castle of St. Andrews where he supposed the Queen to be, and kissing his hand, waved a graceful adieu, exclaiming, "Farewell, loveliest and most cruel princess whom the world contains!"

Having uttered these words—the last he spoke on earth—he laid his head with the utmost composure on the block. The axe of the executioner fell, and the high-souled, accomplished, but too enthusiastic Chastelar was no more.

ANECDOTE OF THE LATE DUKE OF WELLINGTON.—The Hon. Arthur Wellesley, afterwards Duke of Wellington, was, just previously to his embarkation for India, in command of a regiment at Portchester Castle. The Hon. George Pitt, afterwards Lord Rivers, commanded at the same time the Dorsetshire Militia, stationed also at the castle. After the conclusion of the war, the Parliament voted an estate to the Duke of Wellington for his great services, and Lord Rivers having offered Strathfieldsaye to the Ministry, as appropriate for the occasion, the Duke went down to see it. Lord Rivers thus spoke of the matter: "I was on my back, in a painful state of rheumatic gout, when the Duke of Wellington was announced. I desired that he might be shown into my bedroom, and in a minute or two he stood by my bedside. After condoling with me a few seconds on my indisposition, he told me he had come to survey the estate, and requested that horses and an intelligent guide might be allowed him. These were soon in readiness, and off posted the Duke and his guide to survey an estate eighteen miles in circumference. In about an hour-and-a-half after the Duke's departure he returned, expressed himself pleased with his estate, and took leave. After his departure I sent for the guide, and inquired of him as to what had passed between himself and the Duke during the progress of the survey. 'In all my life,' answered he, 'I never had such a dance. We have been quite round the estate, nearly at full speed all the way. Whether his Grace has seen it or not I don't know, for I had enough to do to keep up to him.' My man's appearance, plastered as he was with mud, sufficiently corroborated what he said. A few days after this flying visit, negotiations were commenced by the Treasury for the purchase of the estate, which terminated in its being bought and presented to the Duke. The following was the price paid: £200,000 the land; £150,000 the timber; £13,000 the mansion. £363,000 total purchase money.

DANISH PRAYER FOR THE TIME OF THE HOLY COMMUNION.—O Lord Jesu Christ, our Redeemer, honor and praise be alway giveu unto thee for feeding our souls with this spiritual and heavenly food. And we beseech thee for thy tender mercy, that as thou hast given it to us for a sacrament of continual thankfulness, of daily remembrance, and of charitable unity; even so, most merciful Saviour, lend us alway thy grace to be thankful unto thee for it, and not only by it to be continually mindful of our redemption, purchased through thy death and blood-shedding, but also in consideration thereof to increase in love toward thee, and all mankind for thy sake. — The Order of the Church in Denmark.

Recluseness has its uses. Men, like trees, must stand far apart to grow large.

WHY SUCH INDECISIVE BATTLES?

CERTAIN of the European critics, soon after our present war began, charged that the continuous battles in this country were due to the unscientific character of American warfare. They argued that this protracted fighting was similar to the rough and tumble scrambling between raw pugilists, where kicking, the shedding of blood, and expenditure of time result from the lack of pugilistic science on the part of the contestants. Trained pugilists, it was said, would not spend their strength in unavailing struggles, but would strike their blows at vital points and make them tell. So these critics alleged that, the American generals and armies on both sides being raw, the fighting was aimless and ineffectual; that neither knew how to strike a deadly blow or how to convert a rout into a victory. This complacent theory of the English and French critics seemed to be true for awhile, still the fact remains to be explained that after three years of war, in which our armies have been trained to the highest point of efficiency, and generals have been educated in the dread school of actual warfare to handle troops with skill, we now find that, instead of two or three days of fighting, the two great armies contending in Virginia continued pounding each other for ten or eleven days on a stretch without any decisive results. It is clear that the theory of the foreign critics is not now adequate to the case. We may be sure, then, that there are some other reasons why battles in the United States are not decisive in one or two days. Let us consider what these reasons are.

The difference between the duration of battles in this country and those in Europe is due to the topography of the United States. All, or most all of the battles of Europe were fought in a cultivated country, where the infantry were in full view of each other, where artillery could be put in position, and where when the time came, cavalry could be used with very great effect in creating a repulse or a retreat into a rout. The conditions in the United States, especially in the southern portion are essentially different. Battles with us are never fought in an open country, but always in woods, swamps or hilly regions, where the massing of vast bodies of infantry is out of the question, where artillery can rarely be used, and where cavalry are of no use except in picking up stragglers or destroying lines of railroad. A remarkable instance of this is seen in the first two days' battles in the Wilderness. On each of these days not a piece of cannon was used in either army. It was an infantry fight throughout; and even infantry could not be manœuvred as they could in Europe, because of the broken and rugged nature of the battle-field. General Rosecrans very happily remarked that our great battles are simply bushwhacking on a grand scale. And such they really are. We fight, after all, like Indians, only with much more destructive weapons. At Gettysburg there was some approach to a European battle, and two days sufficed to finish the fighting and decide the conflict; but even then so accustomed had our troops become to continuous fighting that the issue was not as decided as it might have been had European generals or European armies been engaged under similar conditions. As the infantry are compelled to fight in detached groups rather than in heavy masses; as artillery cannot be used to any great effect, and as cavalry are useless when opposed to even a small body of infantry protected by woods, it follows that the tremendous concussions of great bodies of troops so common in Europe are impossible here; and hence the battles renewed day after day and the indecisive character of the result. The same difficulty which makes the fighting so ineffectual almost wholly prevents pursuit of a retreating enemy; the cavalry, which in an open country are used to overwhelm a flying enemy, are brought to a stand by a rear guard of men in woods, when the nature of the ground prevents pursuit by infantry.

The idea advanced by some journals that this difference between European and American warfare is due to the superior persistence and tenacity of the American soldier is doubtless true in part, but it is not the principal reason of the continuous battles fought here. The American soldier possesses self-reliance, courage, enterprise and hope. All these qualities tell on the field and prevent panics and demoralization, so common in European armies when they are defeated. It is worthy of notice that the most marked instance of a panic occurred at Chancellorsville, not among the American but among the German troops. It is true that at the first battle of Bull Run our whole army ran away, yet it was composed mainly of foreigners and the undisciplined militia of the large cities.

The recent battles in Virginia certainly prove that American armies will stand greater losses than will the armies of Europe. The flattering estimate of superior bravery, however, is hardly borne out by the figures. Compare the numbers engaged and the losses in the recent eight days' battles with those of a single day's battle of Napoleon, and they will be found to be far inferior in proportion. Take, for example, the battles of Marengo, Austerlitz, and Waterloo. In the first, the French force numbered 28,000, and its loss was 7,000 in killed and wounded and 1,000 in prisoners; the Austrian force was 31,000 strong, and its losses 7,000 killed and wounded and 3,000 prisoners. In the battle of Austerlitz the forces of the allies and Napoleon were respectively 90.000 and 70,000, while the losses of the former were over 10,000 killed and wounded, 20,000 prisoners, and 185 guns. At Waterloo the allies had a force of 182,000 and Napoleon one of 124,000, though in the actual battle the number of men actually engaged was about 70,000 on each side; the allies lost 23,185 in killed and wounded, and the French 26,300, besides 227 guns. Each of the battles mentioned above lasted one day, but that of Leipzic, in 1813, continued two days, with one day's intermission. The French lost 60,000 out of a force of 160,000, and the allies 50,000, of an army of 300,000. Compare these with the returns of the eight days' battle in Virginia. Estimating General Grant's force at 125,000, and his losses at 35,000, the truth of the assertions we have made will be seen at once. It must be borne in mind, too, that the instruments of warfare now in use are much more destructive than those employed at the time when the battles of Marengo, Austerlitz, and Waterloo took place. The introduction of rifled guns greatly increases the efficiency of ordnance, so that not only do cannon carry with greater accuracy, but they can be used at greater distances. This fact ought to increase rather than diminish the losses in battle.

We think it is plain from what has been stated that the real cause of the prolonged battles in this war is not the lack of skill or bravery on either side, but the peculiar topography of the country, which not only prevents such heavy losses on both sides as are incurred in battles in Europe, but also prevents our battles from being as decisive as history would lead us to expect. We all know that the soldiers on either side have fought bravely, and while we praise our generals for the measure of success which they have achieved, let us not omit to make all proper allowance for the difficulties that stand in the way of winning victories that are decisive in their results, and render them all the support, moral and physical, that it is in our power to give them. In this way will we silence foreign critics, and accomplish the objects for which we entered upon this civil war.—Round Table.

PHILOSOPHIC PARAGRAPHS.

THE earth is no place of diabolic exile, which "the prince of the power of the air" ever fans and darkens with his wing; and were it even, as was once believed, appointed to perish, this would be not because its failure was complete, but because its task was done. No vengeance burns in the sunshine which mellows its fruit and paints its grass; no threatenings flash from the starry eyes that watch over it by night. It is not only the home of each man's personal affections, but the native country of his very soul; where first he found in what a life he lives, and to what heaven he tends; where he has met the touch of spirits higher than his own, and of Him that is highest of all. It is the abode of every ennobling relation, the scene of every worthy toil; the altar of his vows, the observatory of his knowledge, the temple of his worship.—Rev. James Martineau, Westminster Review, January, 1852.

—

A MAN who looks through the present disguises and humbling circumstances of human nature, and speaks with earnestness of what it was made for, and what it may become, is commonly set down by men of the world as a romancer, and, what is far worse, by the religious as a minister to human pride—perhaps as exalting man against God.—Channing, Introduction to Complete Works.

—

BEFORE all things man is distinguished by his pursuit and investigation of truth. And hence, when free from needful business and cares, we delight to see, to hear and to communicate, and consider a knowledge, of many admirable and abstruse things necessary to the good conduct and happiness of our lives; whence it is clear that whatsoever is true, simple and direct, the same is most congenial to our nature as men. Closely allied with this earnest longing to see and know the truth, is a kind of dignified and princely sentiment which forbids a mind, naturally well constituted, to submit its faculties to any but such as are at once just, lawful, and founded on utility. From this source spring greatness of mind, and contempt of worldly advantages and troubles.—Cicero, translated by J. F. W. Herschel.

—

WE are told by Goethe, in his Autobiography, that he had attained his sixth year when the terrible earthquake at Lisbon took place—"an event," he says, "which greatly disturbed" his "peace of mind for the first time." He could not reconcile a catastrophe, so suddenly destructive to thousands, with the ideas which he had already formed for himself of a Providence all-powerful and all-benevolent. But he afterwards learned, he tells us, to recognize in such events the "God of the Old Testament." I know not in what spirit the remark was made; but this I know, that it is the God of the Old Testament whom we see exhibited in all nature and all providence; and that it is at once wisdom and duty in His rational creatures, however darkly they may perceive or imperfectly they may comprehend, to hold in implicit faith that the Adorable Monarch of all the past and of all the future is a King who "can do no wrong." This early exhibition of tooth, and spine, and sting—of weapons constructed alike to cut and to pierce—to unite two of the most indispensable requirements of the modern armorer—a keen edge to a strong back—nay, stranger still, the examples furnished in this primeval time, of weapons formed not only to kill, but also to torture—must be altogether at variance with the preconceived opinions of those who hold that until man appeared in creation, and darkened its sympathetic face with the stain of moral guilt; the reign of violence and outrage did not begin, and that there was no death among the inferior creatures, and no suffering. But preconceived opinion—whether it hold fast, with Lactantius and the old-schoolmen, to the belief that there are no antipodes, or assert, with Caccini and Bellarmine, that our globe hangs lazily in the midst of the heavens, while the sun moves round it—must yield ultimately to scientific truth.—Hugh Miller.

—

MAN, from his make, constitution or nature, is in the strictest and most proper sense, a law to himself; he hath the rule of right within, and what is wanting is that he honestly attend to it. Conscience does not only offer itself to show us the way we should walk in, but it likewise carries its own authority with it, that it is our natural guide—the guide assigned to us by the author of our nature. It, therefore, belongs to our condition of being. It is our duty to walk in that path, and to follow this guide, without looking about to see whether we may not possibly forsake it with impunity.—Analogy, (Dr. Butler), Sermon No. 3.

—

PROVIDENCE always favors the heaviest battalion.—Napoleon.

—

THE gods are on the side of the strongest.—Tacitus.

—

IT is told of good Sir John, that he heard a case stated by counsel, and made up his mind; then the counsel for the other side, taking their turn to speak, he found himself so unsettled and perplexed, that he exclaimed: "So help me, God! I will never listen to evidence again!"—Emerson, English Traits.

—

GREAT men are always of a nature originally melancholy.—Aristotle.

THE COUNTESS DIANA.

[TRANSLATED FROM THE FRENCH OF MARIO UCHARD.]

XI.

AN accident which happened to poor Dr. Schultz suddenly interrupted my letter, dear William, and threw my mind into a disorder which I can scarcely control, when I think of my past sorrows; this is why you have only a mutilated chapter. The day before yesterday, while I was writing to you, old Fritz entered my room, as he often does without my calling him, solely to watch me reading or working. It is a license which I have granted this faithful Caleb, who saw me at my birth, and who cannot rest a quarter of an hour without coming to brood over me with his eyes. I would not like to disturb him, and am so accustomed to this innocent mania of his, and he walks about with so little noise, that I have concluded to be perfectly unconscious of his presence.

I know not how long he stood before me, when I saw him rush suddenly out of the room. A moment after, he returned with Hermann, who in a very agitated manner begged me to hasten immediately to Dr. Schultz, who had been suddenly seized with fits. I followed him with all speed, and found the doctor shut up in his room with the blinds closed.

"Ah! is it you?" said he to me, wildly. "You arrive in time. This brigand of a Hermann holds me prisoner; you will release me!"

My first idea was to fly with him; but in passing through the parlor, I saw the unfortunate Mme. Schultz seated calmly, a book on her knee, giving a lesson to her daughter. I thought of the despair into which this horrible disclosure, which as yet she knew nothing of, would plunge her.

"Come, let us go out," continued the doctor.

"I have some serious matters to speak to you about," said I, pretending not to notice his excited state.

"Very well! come on; you will tell me all that on the way."

"No; let us stay here," I replied. "I am not very well; besides, my communication is strictly confidential.

"Still more reason to go out," said he. "Do you not see that Madness is there? She comes to find me. She listens to us—there! there! behind you!" added he, with a wild gesture.

I shivered with terror, and I turned round, pale and trembling. A tall, immoveable dumb figure regarded us fixedly, and seemed to come out of the wall.

"Defend me! defend me!" exclaimed Schultz, filled with terror; "she is going to seize me."

I saw he was lost. Instinctively, I made a rampart of my body, and dared to face the terrible spectre. I had scarcely glanced at it when I saw our error.

"What childishness!" I exclaimed. "It is the portrait of your uncle, Dr. Wolfgang Schultz."

"No, it is she who thus disguises herself the better to ensnare us. See, she moves in the flame—touch her with your hand. It is she, I tell you, it is she!"

Probably he spoke the truth, for she knows how to assume all forms; but it was necessary to give relief to this poor bewildered mind. I bore up against my fears. I walked towards the image. My heart beat. Two steps from the picture I thought of flight. Schultz anxiously observed; he was on the point of succumbing. By a supreme effort of my will, I took the last step—I stretched out my hand, I touched——

"It is a painting!" exclaimed I, triumphantly; "it is a painting! Come near—look at it! I strike on it, and it offers a resistance to my fingers!"

I was very proud of my heroism.

"You are very sure?"

"Parbleu, mon cher! You have been the dupe of an illusion, an effect of light. See, see—"

"Perhaps it was a hallucination," replied he, sadly.

"Well! and if it was—a pretty affair. Bad digestion, a dream, the night-mare! Esquirol classes this phenomena among the passing affections. 'Hallucinations differ from somnambulism and madness,' says he, 'in that in most cases the hallucinated remember all the ideas which have troubled them, while somnambulists and fools remember nothing.'"

"You say all that to console me," said the doctor, shaking his head with an air of doubt.

"Upon honor, I quote literally," replied I. "See here, my friend—let us discuss it: Yours is a just and truthful mind; the fact here is patent; this is a picture. So you see yourself convinced of the vanity of thinking that the picture is a phantom. Your courage alone was sufficient to make it disappear. What then! You—a savan, a philosopher, a practitioner—you believe in apparitions, which would reverse all nature's laws?"

My argument went on for nearly an hour. The doctor listened to me with his head inclined to one side, as though he feared to lose one word. I observed him attentively. I felt as though I were reassuring him. Once as he turned his back I saw his face reflected in the mirror. He did not show the slightest trace of emotion. By chance he encountered my look; he made a gesture of surprise, but was troubled only for a moment. To hide his uneasiness he covered his face with his hands, but not quick enough to prevent my seeing a smile rising to his lips.

What did this smile mean? In truth, it was to be believed that his lamentation was only the work of my imagination.

"Go on, go on," said he to me. "Prove to me my foolishness. Prove to me that if I know how to comprehend the vanity of my terrors, it is because there is no organic derangement of my brain; prove to me that I abandon myself to puerile fits, and that if my will is sufficient to dissipate them, it shows that it is because I have escaped my sad inheritance."

This sensible language confirmed my victory. I had only to develop the propositions of a syllogism, of which he furnished me all the points with admirable clearness. In the heat of improvisation, I found arguments which surprised even myself—irrefutable deductions that I had never thought of before, and which pity suggested. After half an hour Schultz got up, serene and composed.

"Thanks," said he to me, with simplicity, taking my hand; and he added gaily, "Will you permit me now to go out?"

"Let us go down into the garden if you like," replied I.

"No," said he, "let us go and take a walk in the country."

I was very careful to conceal the astonishment into which this proposition threw me. Schultz spoke to me in so frank and joyous an accent that I could not deceive myself as to his intention. We understood each other intuitively.

"Let us go," said I; and we went.

This will show you, my dear William, how I stand with my doctor. I am no longer a prisoner. I have crossed for the first time in a year the barriers which my guardian has imposed on me. I am free—free by gratitude; free, with the consciousness of having saved a soul that was drifting on to lose itself in eternal darkness. Shall I confess to you, my friend, I feel an indescribable sensation of pride, as though I had accomplished a brilliant action. I believe that a mother alone can comprehend my joy in protecting a being of whom I am in some degree the reasoning power. I attach myself to this poor Schultz, whom I once hated, by that great law of love which binds together the creator and the creature; and he in turn seems to feel the same tenderness for me, except that he mingles with it submission. Perhaps, also, he is afraid I will leave him.

All this explains, my friend, how, although free, I still stay at Carlsruhe. I could not without cruelty abandon my task. Schultz is still so fearful of himself that he implores me not to go out without him. It is not in a few weeks that I can nerve him against relapse; he would believe himself lost without me. Besides, what should I do away from here? Outside of your friendship I have no future. The only love which made me live was but a dream.

You now know why I again interrupted my recital. I will resume it again to-morrow.

XII.

I KNOW not what followed the terrible shock which left me senseless at the feet of Diana. When I recovered I found myself in my bed, languid and stunned; it was night; Bastien watched by my bedside, and hearing me murmur his name, he uttered a cry of joy:

"Mon Dieu! he is saved!" said he, "Monsieur André, do you recognize me?"

"Yes, I recognize you; why are you astonished at it?"

"Ah, Madame the Countess will be glad of this; but don't talk. The doctor said that when you recovered from your insensibility you must be prevented from talking; and I will tell you everything, so that you will not be fatigued."

He told me then that I had been in bed for three weeks, stricken down by brain fever, which made them despair of my life, and that it was only two days since I had been pronounced out of danger.

"And my godmother?" said I to him.

"She has quitted you neither day nor night. It is only since day before yesterday that she took repose when night came: now it is I who am your guard, as you see; but she has commanded me, if you interrogate me, to say to you from her to be very quiet and think of her. Allons, we have reason enough," added he, "to make us obey her her; in two hours it will be day, and she will come; go to sleep like a good child, until then, to rest you."

I felt such mental lassitude that it was impossible for me to frame any other questions. Besides, he spoke to me of her, and that was more than enough to appease me. I closed my eyes, enveloping myself in thoughts of her, and then slept.

When I awoke, the sun was brightly shining through the open window. The perfume from the garden stole into my room, wafted by the morning breeze. I could almost believe that I was present at my own resurrection. A sigh near me made me turn my head, and I found myself under the gaze of Diana, who, bathed in tears of joy, held my hand in both of hers.

"It is I! it is I! my dear godmother," cried I, as if I had just returned from a long voyage.

And I commenced to cry like her.

For a moment we spoke not a word, but smiled through our tears, holding each other's hands.

"I see you again," said I, between a laugh and a sob.

"But I have never left you, André," replied she with emphasis.

Oh, divine moment, what happiness or sorrow could ever make thy remembrance fade!

I did not know with what love I loved, but our two souls had melted into one, and floated away into the open heavens.

I was still too feeble to bear such ecstacy; I nearly fainted, and Diana obliged me to be silent.

"It is necessary to be calm," said she, "if you wish to get well. I will stay here near you; do not fatigue yourself."

"It is such a long time since I have seen you," replied I, trying to resist; "and I have so many things to tell you."

"No, no, not now; if you love me, obey."

"Ah, yes, I obey you."

She quickly drew her fingers away from my grasp, and without replying, she placed her hand on my forehead as one does to make little children be good.

"Sleep, sleep," said she."

I closed my eyes, but I did not sleep. She was seated at my bedside, and through my half closed eyes I contemplated her in rapture.

She was turned towards me; a ray of sunshine played in her hair and formed a crown of glory. I observed that she was very pale; a dark circle surrounded her eyes, and her classic features were thin. I recalled the words of Bastien—I remembered her anguish and her vigils—I wept.

"Ah! you do not sleep," said she, in a tone of tender reproach.

At this moment the doctor entered: "It seems that we are recovering," exclaimed he joyously. "Ho, ho! what a countenance for a sick man! Let us feel your pulse—perfect! Well! here you are, well out of the affair, and I have only to guard you from the imprudences which would retard your cure."

As for me, I saw only Diana, and the happiness which shone in her countenance. It was for her sake that I was glad to return to life.

THE ETHICS OF SUICIDE.

THERE is something in most suicides which blunts the edge of human judgment, at least in our day. We turn from the stern old law of our forefathers, and draw the veil of temporary insanity over the end of all persons (in the upper classes at least) who have laid violent hands on their own lives. The burial by the highway, with no religious ceremony over the grave, and a stake driven through the body, has been discarded as useless and brutal; and the forfeiture of all goods and chattels to the sovereign has become a dead letter. This is all as it should be. The fear of capital punishment may deter the possible murderer from taking another man's life, but we suppose no one would contend that the fear of an ignominious burial ever hindered a man from taking his own; as to the forfeiture of personal estate, (when the blood of a felo de se was not corrupted, nor his estates of inheritance forfeited,) it is difficult to reconcile such a penalty with the principles of our law, and it is utterly opposed to equity and common sense, inasmuch as it was a simple laying of the burden of a man's crime on those who had already suffered most by it.

But it is one thing to rejoice over the disuse or powerlessness of savage old laws, and quite another to assent to some modern theories on the subject, which, to judge from our own experience, must be somewhat rife amongst us. In no fewer than three different societies we have heard it maintained within the last few days that suicide is no crime at all; that it is not contrary to natural morality, but in entire accordance with it; that a man should exercise absolute control over his own life, should use his discretion as to when and how to keep it, spend it, or throw it away, exactly as he does with respect to any other piece of property. It is urged further, that the Christian faith, so far as it speaks at all on the subject, must be taken to sanction this view. You acknowledge, it is said, self-sacrifice as the very foundation of the law of God. You preach the sacrifice of life as the highest sacrifice; where do you draw the line? A jumps into the water to save a drowning child, gets drowned himself, and you very rightly pension his family and call him a hero. B sits down on his bed, considers within himself whether he is likely to profit himself or any other living soul by staying in the world. Having for his part come to a definite conclusion, B puts a pistol in his mouth and blows his brains out, and you say he has been guilty of a great crime; and, but that he must have been mad, you would dishonor his name and ruin his family. Your morality may be sound, but you must go elsewhere than to Christianity to support it.

If it is only meant that the definite command, "Thou shalt not take thine own life," is not to be found in so many words in the New Testament, we readily admit the position. We have heard arguments in favor of many other miscalled human rights, of polygamy, for instance, based on the like grounds, and are not going to waste time in proving that the faith which teaches that every power and gift comes direct from God as a trust to man, and not as property, can lend no shadow of a sanction to the notion that the wonderful gift of life is an exception to the universal law. But there is no need to appeal to Christian ethics. The old heathen saw clear down into the heart of this matter as he strolled under the grey olives in the bright Attic air. "The Great Captain has set you in your ranks, you may not break your rank on the strength of your own private notions; it is an outrage on the common life in which your own is bound up," is the sum of the thoughts of Plato and his master, and without appealing to a greater than Plato or his master, we can be quite content to rest the case on their teaching. The ground-motive of suicide is cowardice. A man will not meet some one of the consequences which his own acts have raised up to confront him; shame or dishonor, real or fancied, stare him in the face, casting the whole visible creation into the shade, and the invisible can hold nothing more terrible for him in its mysterious depths. There he may escape from his enemy; here he quails and owns himself vanquished; and then comes the pistol or the deep pool in the river.—London Spectator.

The Lyons journals announce the death of M. Gérard, director of the Park of the Tete-d'Or, caused by the bite of a venomous fly. He was bitten on Wednesday, and died on Saturday.

FINANCIAL AFFAIRS, STOCKS, ETC.

THE most notable event during the week, announced by telegraph from Washington, has been the resignation of the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Chase. At this juncture, when the financial operations of the Government require all the wisdom and skill of a statesman well versed in financial matters, it is to be regretted that the nation will lose the services of so able a Cabinet officer.

The Honorable ex-Secretary wielded a strong arm, and the success which has attended his official career may be attributed in some degree to the fearlessness with which he grappled every financial problem that rose from time to time during the war. It is doubtful whether the national finances could have been as well managed in other hands. He displayed on more than one occasion consummate ingenuity and tact in relieving the necessities of the Government and in supplying its exchequer with ample resources to meet the expenses of his Department. The resignation of Mr. Chase appears to have created some confusion in Eastern financial circles, and the late rise in the premium on gold has been doubtless, in a measure, occasioned by this unexpected circumstance. Until his successor becomes familiar with the actual condition of the Treasury and can devise a wiser and more efficient scheme for a curtailment of the currency, and at the same time provide means for the disbursement of the accumulating liabilities of the country, gold is not likely to be much less desirable as a speculative commodity than now, and it may enhance in value. If telegraphic advices correctly inform us of the condition of the money market in New York, a very extraordinary pressure has prevailed there for a few days past. It is stated that rates were ranging from ½ to 2 per cent. for ten days. This is quite an anomaly for Wall street; but there may be causes operating to effect so unusual a state of affairs that are not disclosed to us. Neither the retirement of Mr. Chase nor the rise in gold would seem to afford sufficient cause for so sudden and severe a panic.

The late Secretary of the Treasury, in his communication to the Committee on Ways and Means, of the 29th ult., says: "The aggregate of revenue from all sources for the year closing with the 30th of June, reaches $242,000,000; and the expenses of the Government, excluding two months pay to the army, due July 1st, $880,000,000." Taking the highest amount estimated, and assuming that the miscellaneous receipts will reach $35,000,000, the whole amount of revenue for the next year cannot be put down at more than $318,000,000, while the expeuditures are likely to reach $850,000,000. This is not as flattering an exhibit as was expected; but Congress, before its adjournment, provided for the deficit (beyond the amount furnished by the loan bill) in ncreased taxation.

In home finances we have nothing of special interest to present. The money market continues to grow easier, and but for the uncertainties attending the future of currency matters East, and the apprehension that still exists among certain capitalists as to the uncoustitutionality of our Special Contract law, a large amount of unavailable capital would seek employment at lower rates of interest than have heretofore ruled in this market. At no period in the history of California has there been so much money lying idle in the vaults of bankers and others as now. For legitimate commercial purposes and for the promotion of other interests in the course of regular business not tainted with speculation, there is no scarcity of money at bank rates; (1½ per cent. per month;) but for outside operations, mining enterprises, etc., no capital is to be had from those who are so fortunate as to have it to loan.

Legal Tender notes have been in moderate request during the week at from 45 to 46¼. The market is well supplied at the close at $44. Latest telegraphic advices from New York quote gold at 255 and 260, under date of the 7th.

The Mining-share market has been stagnant the past few days, except in one or two leading stocks, and transactions were trifling.

Gould and Curry opened on Tuesday at $1,625, rose on Wednesday to $1,850; then declined to $1,600, rallied slightly to $1,630, and closed yesterday afternoon at $1,600—some 90 feet changing hands. Sales are now made ex dividend of $50 per foot, declared on Saturday last. The lower portion of the mine continues to improve.

Ophir is steadily maintained at about $730, at which rate some sales were made.

Potosi is in rather less favor, declining from $1,000 to $925. The receipts of bullion are now large, and a dividend is anticipated at an early day.

Challar has improved, and rose from $390 to $425 bid, $450 asked, closing yesterday at $430. Belcher advanced to $1,050. Yellow Jacket was sold at $800 and $775.

North American rose to $75, buyer 30, fell to $67½, and was sold yesterday at $62. Baltimore American advanced from $40 to $47½. Bullion declined to $62; Burning Moscow to $20, and De Soto to $12½.

Lady Bryan fell under large sales from £22 to $11, and was sold yesterday at $10. Golden Age and Empire was dealt in at $17 and $18; Melones at $20; North Potosi at $50 and $53, and Nevada (J. G.) at $24 and $25.

The Patria of Naples announces that the brigand chief, Schiavone who has committed so many acts of cruelty in the Basilicate, has been captured by five peasants, and conveyed to Tricario.

DRAMATIC AND MUSICAL.

OUR old acquaintance, The Octoroon, has been reproduced at Maguire's Opera House, where it was brought out, for the first time in this city nearly four years ago, by Mr. Wheatleigh. Old play-goers will remember how, at that time, its sensation qualities were much heightened by hisses from some portions of the audience, how mild conservatives opened their eyes at some queer things it hinted of, and how, on one occasion, a sympathizing occupant of the pit endeavored to out-bid the principal villain, McClosky, at the sale of the "Octoroon." But all these things are, haply, of the past. The incidents that nightly made women weep and strong men grit their teeth in impotent rage, are passing into history. The world's a stage, and queer changes are sometimes brought about between the falling of the act drop. How pleasantly Boucicault might alter the dénoument of his drama, by adding another act, in which, at the critical moment, a Federal soldier should rush in with the Proclamation, and thus rescue suffering virtue. This change would materially add to the success of the play in England, where, in concession to the public demand, he was obliged to restore "Zoe" to life after a sleep to which Juliet's furnishes a parallel.

The story of The Octoroon is older than the play. It is said to have been borrowed by Boucicault from Capt. Mayne Reid's Quadroon, and there certainly is something of the Captain's swampy luxuriance of sentiment in the drama. Boucicault reduced the fraction but added to the interest by changing the title to The Octoroon. The authorship of the rather impossible but highly effective episode of the photographic plate is quite undecided. But we must not forget to give Boucicault the highest credit for one character he drew in the play—a character seldom before attempted. He gave us a stage Yankee whom we can respect, who has some gentlemanly qualities, who does not exist solely as a buffoon, who is not obliged to wear a ridiculous blue coat, strapped trousers and high shirt-collar to make his character distinctive, and who occasionally excites other than the risible faculties. It is hard that the true Yankee of the American drama, to be faithfully dealt with, should have to sit for his portrait to an Englishman; but it is none the less true. The stage Yankee, known to us through Hill, Locke, and other comedians, has done much to degrade the national character in our own as well as in European eyes, by showing only its exaggerated and unheroic features.

No one actor has been able to embody this conception of Boucicault more thoroughly and gracefully than Mr. Wheatleigh. His "Salem Scudder" has all the craft, ingenuity and hard philosophy of the Yankee character; but beneath this is the clear intellect, the hardihood, the independence, self-reliance and quick wit which is as essential to its portrayal. Although not an American by birth, Mr. Wheatleigh has many of the physical peculiarities of the race; so that his make-up of the character is perfect. To see him is to read one of Lowell's best Biglow papers, with illustrations by Darley. The Colleen Bawn with Mr. Wheatleigh as "Danny Mann" will be brought out at the Opera House this evening.

The Academy of Music has been doing as well during the week as it deserves, and this is not an equivocal compliment in the estimation of those who have frequented it, a category which includes all the musical taste of the town. On Tuesday evening La Sonnambula was produced to an excellent house, Miss Richings as "Amina," Mrs. Simonsen as "Lisa," Bianchi as "Elvino," and Gregg as "Rodolfo." Miss Richings displayed that mastery of the music and skill in the interpretation of its more subtle meanings to which we have alluded in previous notices. It may be set down as one of this artiste's principal charms, that while playing the lady on the stage, the grace and dignity of her demeanor carry with them the impression that she is a lady when off from it. Bianchi scarcely seemed up to his role in any part of the piece, and in the last act sung frightfully false—unintentionally, it is to be presumed, but putting the patience of the prima donna and the success of the chorus to a very severe test. It is a pity that so good and practised a musician, and one who is generally so artistically correct, should have so far forgotten himself as to peril the harmonies of the entire scene. Gregg did very well, showing the compass of his voice in the duet between "Rodolfo" and "Amina" to excellent advantage. Why can he not be content to rely upon his voice and modify the uncouthness of his style—to quit, in short, his barbarous gulping and settle down to what in the reportoire of the lobbies is called "square singing?" And why will he not devote an hour or two a day to the study of Italian, enabling him to obviate the ludicrous effect of English consonants where Italian liquids are meant to flow, and remove the impression he at present conveys of a Cockney at a fancy dress ball. "I call him Clifford and he calls me madam," is the complaint of the heroine in the Hunchback, but what comparison in enormity and cruelty does that complaint bear to the one which "Amina" could frame of singing to "Rodolfo" in Italian and having him reply in English. "Lisa" marred the effect of her otherwise excellent rendition by indulging in too much buffoonery. On Monday evening Ernani will be given, Miss Richings as "Elvira." The remainder of the cast will be seen in the advertisement in the proper columns. Norma is in rehearsal.

Paul Julien's concert on Wednesday evening was as complete a success as could be desired; and we question whether a more charming entertainment was ever given in this city. We know of no violinist on the continent who equals him, none anywhere who surpasses him. The music he draws out of the instrument is wonderful, and he handles it with a grace which is only exceeded by the delicacy of his touch. The violin in common hands does not exhibit the performer to very eminent advantage, suggesting to the practical mind the idea mainly of a man nursing a baby; but with Julien it is very different. We were on the point of saying that he is master of the instrument, but it occurs to us that the violin may better be called his mistress, and he the ardent and persuasive lover. It is an experience in life to hear Julien play Home Sweet Home; and it is little wonder that the feeling of the audience was manifested without regard to a preservation of the integrity of kid-gloves. But why would they persist in encoring? Why are they so selfish as to torture the artist who entertains them? Encoring seems to be a peculiarly Californian practice, and it is indulged in with an utter disregard of the rights of the performer. When a danseuse has toiled through a piece which leaves her physically prostrate, and makes rest a necessity for her, you will see an audience clamor for a repetition, as though she were a machine incapable of fatigue; and the same with cantatrices and all other artists. We hope that Julien's concerts will be many. He certainly found sufficient encouragement in the house that greeted him on Wednesday evening—tastefully dressed, and filling the Academy to its utmost limit. He found inspiration, too, and hence perhaps the secret of his playing so marvellously well; for the house was redolent with beauty as a flower-garden, lilies in balconies, roses in parquet, and pinks of perfection scattered thick as summer daisies everywhere. He gives another matinée on Wednesday next.

The Metropolitan has been busy with Lesbia, the Lion of St. Marc during the week, in which play Mrs. Hayne was decidedly the lioness, carrying off the honors and furnishing an excellent piece of acting to those capable of appreciating it. That these are few is betrayed, we fear, by the fact that the houses have uniformly been very far from what the merits of the piece and the playing demand. Lesbia was translated for Matilda Heron, but that lady never succeeded in making in it even an approach to that triumph which she achieved as "Camille." It is intensely dramatic, however, startling in its situations, and preserving all the elements that should please the popular taste. The cursing scene, where an amount of objurgations is indulged in that would make one fancy the two parties to it ex-officio professors of the art, is especially taking, and even Lear might learn a lesson from the Chief of the Council of Ten, who curses as though he were intrusted with the duty of doing it for all the other members. To say that the Lion of St. Marc was well played in the mane would be to pun at the expense of truth, for Mr. Taylor over-played the part of "Orsceola" by several degrees of latitude and longitude, and Miss Ince lacked in warmth and vigor quite as much as he exceeded. If a compromise between the two could have been effected, the result would have been some approach to what the respective parts actually demanded. Miss Ince took her benefit last night, but had to struggle against Trovatore at the Academy, and the consequence was visible.

Mrs. Jordan takes her benefit on Wednesday night in Aurora Floyd, the first piece in which she achieved a reputation as an actress and won the public to say that she brought histronic ability to her profession as well as beauty. Long the popular manageress of the Metropolitan and a native, so to speak, of the soil, Mrs. Jordan has won hosts of friends, and these will have an opportunity to show themselves on Wednesday night.

MEYERBEER.—A correspondent writing from London, May 4th, says:

Meyerbeer died this week. He was born in Berlin, September 5, 1794. He was a precocious boy, and at nine (the age at which Mozart was already great) a critic spoke of him as one of the best pianists in Berlin. His father, a Jewish banker, James Beer, was fortunately too wealthy to put the child forward too much, so Meyerbeer had a healthier life than usually is allotted to musical geniuses in Germany. When he grew older, Meyerbeer seemed to turn to the less severe style of music, and, indeed, Italianized his name into Giacomo and his music in the same way. His first opera, Jeptha's Daughter, was represented in Munich in 1812, with but little success. But his Crociato in Egitto, brought out in 1825 in Venice, laid the foundation of his reputation. In 1831, his greatest work, Robert the Devil, was brought out, and his fame was established. A fine success, too, was The Huguenots, appearing soon after (1836). The Prophète, in 1849, was well received. L'Etoile du Nord, in 1854, and the Pardon de Ploermel, later, marked a decline. L'Africaine had been for some time composed, and will now, no doubt, be brought out. Rossini, a hale, hearty, and humorous old man, the toast of the salons of Paris, where he resides, is now the last link that connects the present musical generation with the past. He and Meyerbeer had lived to see new stars ascend in the zenith in Wagner and Gounod, whose operas rule where once their own were unrivaled. Still there are no better comrades than Gounod and Rossini—the one white-haired, the other plump and boyish—who may be seen now and then sipping coffee or eau sucrée on the boulevards.

WE should read books, not to quote them, but to strengthen our intellects and suggest thoughts of our own. We fatten a sheep with grass, not to obtain a crop of hay from his back, but that he may feed us with mutton, and clothe us with wool.

ANNIE AND HER MASTER.

CHAPTER IV.

On the following Friday Herr von Heilmann and the Fraulein Gruppe had a slight altercation, if such it could be called. The lady was angry and excited (perhaps, beginning to despair of her game, she sometimes let her mask slip on one side;) the gentleman was courteous, severe and resolute.

"You desire that Fraulien Gresham should play at your concert, madam. Well, I think it a pity; she is too nervous for it not to be painful to her to do so—too nervous to do herself or me justice; but if I bow to your desire in this matter, I cannot be dictated to as regards the composition she should render."

"As to her nervousness, mein Herr, she must conquer that. In her position, she has no business to indulge in any such nonsense. Upon her playing I shall insist; and I much desire that she should play the Prelude and Fugue in C minor, composed by my late lamented father on the occasion of the death of the most worthy Princess Wilhelmina."

"Impossible, madam. The merit of the composition is a question upon which I will not presume to enter; but that it should be played by such hands as these (here with the most entirely business-like gravity, a complete absorption in the matter under discussion, he took up one of Annie's hands—she was sitting at the piano beside him—and laid it upon his own) is a physical impossibility. These fingers are lithe, and the wrist (raising it and giving it a little shake) is finely flexible; still the composition of which you speak is not for such hands as these." So saying, he seemed suddenly to awake to the consciousness that the hand he had again placed on his—the more strongly, by force of contrast, to mark its minuteness—was something more than a piece of dainty mechanism. He gently replaced it on the keys of the piano with a look as he said, "Verzeihen sie, gnadigste, Fraulein," that was from him a caress. But Annie, sitting passive while her fate was discussed, did not raise her eyes.

He turned again to the watchful Fraulein Gruppe, and continued, severely: "As to this concert, the credit or discredit of it will be entirely mine; the arrangement of the programme and the allotment of the music is therefore wholly my affair, and I cannot and will not submit, madam, to even such judicious and wise co-operation as yours would doubtless be. With my other pupils the playing or not playing on this occasion has been a matter of choice. I do not see why it should be compulsory on the part of the Fraulein Gresham. I therefore ask her: Miss Gresham, is it agreeable to you that your name should be placed upon the programme?"

The question was put in the severe tone which he had used to Fraulein Gruppe, but the thoughtful eyes were full of kindness when they met Annie's. Annie cared for nothing in the matter but to please her master. It was impossible to her, after meeting that look, to answer his question otherwise than with another.

"Do you wish it?"

This time she detected a certain pleasant change in his face enough to assure her that she had pleased him. Before he answered he appeared to reflect for a moment, then said, "On the whole, I think, yes."

"I must stipulate," he continued, turning upon Fraulein Gruppe, "that Miss Gresham shall have the use of a piano for at least three hours daily." As he rose to go, he added; "I have always had pride and pleasure in my English pupils, finding among them some of the most intelligent and industrious of my scholars. I assure myself that it is not Fraulein Gresham who will prove the exception."

He did not allow himself to seek an answer in Annie's face or he would have met a very bright one.

"I cannot make them out!" Fraulein Gruppe remarked to her confidential friend. "If there is anything between them, she is the slyest little thing. I have watched and watched, and I cannot detect a spark of coquetry or consciousness in her conduct. She is altogether the good pupil! sits and looks like a demure baby: 'Mais il n'est, comme on dit, pire eau que l'eau qui dort.'"

"The English women are so controlled, so quiet and so deep, you see dear Angel," answered the friend addressed. "This girl is no doubt cunning enough to know the kind of matter-of-being (Art zu seyn) likely to catch a grave man of middle-age like Herr von Heilmann, who in a wife would probably like to find the docility that other men who marry earlier, look for in their children."

"'Catch!' 'wife!' You don't mean to tell me, my dearest"—the voice was sharp and angry—"that you think there is any danger—that you fancy he means to marry her?"

"No, no, no; a thousand times no!" cried the alarmed confidant. "Last time I had the happiness of seeing him with you, I thought there was a decided, a pronounced—in short, a something difficult to describe, but a something in his manner towards you, dearest Angel, very different from his manner towards other women."

After that Friday, Annie set her heart to her music more than she had ever done before, though she had always loved it, and often found in it the one delight of dreary days. She no longer relinquished to the first claimant the hours of study to which she had a right and by rising very early she secured others which no one contested with her. She had set her heart towards her music, and yet, though she loved it, not for its own sake, the heart set towards the art was set upon pleasing her master. With the singular simplicity and singleness of purpose of which she was capable she kept this aim in sight. She was conscious that he especially desired her success; she did not question "why." Also she was conscious that she especially desired to please him; she did not question "why" or "what more." To the publicity of the concert she looked forward with no dread and no pleasure, but with intense anxiety. She would be no more nervous in playing before fifty people than in playing before her master only; their presence would merely affect her in as far as it affected him, making her more desirous to do well because she believed that it made him more desirous that she should do so. The one thing she cared about was, that she should not shame or disappoint him.

But before that day came, other things happened to Annie.

CHAPTER V.

"A visit" and "Fraulein Gresham" were words that fell on Annie's ear as she sat in class one morning—unwonted words falling there so strangely that she paid them no heed, did not believe that she had heard rightly. But when the class was over, Fraulein Gruppe sent her down to the refectory to receive a visitor. The refectory was a long bare room; long tables and long forms, and the inevitable piano were its only furniture. Visitors were ordinarily received in the saloon, but Annie was so greatly out of favor that any place was good enough for a friend of hers.

"What dungeon do I find you in!" exclaimed a clear ringing English voice as Annie entered the room. Her hands were taken and her cheeks were kissed by a moustached mouth before she had time to recognize her visitor.

"Cousin Basil!" her tone was half joyful, half doubtful.

"Do you doubt it? Will you have me turned away as an impostor? Have you quite forgotten me?"

"You are grown from a boy into a man, remember, and I had no reason to expect to see you. Where have you dropped from? Oh, it is pleasant to hear a home voice and see a home face."

"I'm glad you think so. I have had a world of difficulty in finding you out. I am here for a few days en route for home. This place is not really en route, but I made it so to see you. And now how can I see you in any satisfactory way? Do you ever get out? I am staying in a very pleasant family—the family of a friend of mine out there. They are really hospitable people—will be delighted to see you. Can I speak to the principal here and get you leave of absence? You could tell her I'm your brother if you think she would not trust you with a cousin."

"She knows I have no brother—no near relations," Annie answered, smiling.

"No near relations! What do you call me, then, eh?"

"A second cousin is hardly near, though he may be a dear relation, Basil. Though you used to be like a brother to me, I cannot pass you off as one. Oh, how long do you stay? Of course, I must see something of you. I will manage it somehow."

"I only meant to stay a couple of days, but I fancy it may be a couple of weeks. To tell the truth, one of my friend's sisters is an uncommonly nice girl, and she can speak English, and it's uncommonly jolly to hear her do it. But I must get home before Christmas, however. Annie, what becomes of you in the holidays? Why not come over with me?"

"That is perfectly impossible, Basil."

"I know of old that 'perfectly impossible' of yours; it was always a settler. But how about getting out? Can't you come at once? The day is glorious; it is a shame to lose it in this den. Couldn't you take a good walk with me in these gardens? I have a world of things to tell you about."

While Annie was hesitating, Fraulein Gruppe came into the room, curious as to her teacher's visitor. For some reason of her own she proved wonderfully gracious, accepted the guarantee of cousinship as all-sufficient, was charmed that her young friend should have the pleasure of seeing a countryman, granted immunity from all the duties of the day, and urged that they should enjoy the beautiful weather by going out-doors at once.

"At what hour is it likely to be most convenient for me to take my music-lesson, madam?" Annie asked; this is Herr von Heilmann's afternoon, you remember, and I shall wish to return for my lesson."

"Excuse yourself that, also, for once, my too industrious Mees," was the answer in broken English, "I charge myself with your excuses."

"Yes, yes; a whole holiday. As madam is so good, I claim you for all the day?" cried Basil. "This evening we are going to the opera; you must join us, Annie. There are to be ladies of the party, madam."

"Exactly, sir; I can quite well confide my young friend to your care, I perceive. Go, dear Mees, and prepare yourself; the while I will entertain your cousin."

"An easy-going soul for a school-mistress," was Basil's comment as they left the house. "Young and handsome herself, she's fond of gaiety, no doubt, and so has more sympathy with the pleasures of other people. Are you comfortable with her, Annie?"

"I might be worse off; on the whole, I am not unhappy," was Annie's evasive answer.

"And that is all you can say for yourself, poor little thing?" Basil drew his cousin's hand through his arm as he spoke. She did not like to withdraw it, though there were reasons why she would not have had it there.

The day was keen and bright. Annie enjoyed the brisk movement through the light clear air, the sense of freedom, her cousin's merry reminiscences of their early happy country life; above all she enjoyed the befriended feeling his presence gave her, the sense of kinship, of belonging to somebody. A second cousin was something to one so friendless, who so often felt herself so mere a "waif and stray." But in her enjoyment Annie did not forget her music or her master, or her determination, unrevealed to the Fraulein Gruppe, to be at the school by the time Herr von Heilmann was due there. After her lesson she would go out again—go to the opera, if Fraulein Gruppe chose to permit her. Of this she was doubtful; but she would take her chance—any way not sacrifice her lesson. The school-house was not far from the gardens; the iron gate of its prison walls was visible through the vista of the grand avenue. As they returned towards it, laughing and talking gaily, eyes and cheeks bright with the keen yet sunny air, drawing many eyes (of which they were wholly unconscious) upon them, Annie saw Herr von Heilmann leave the gate and come towards them.

Annie hurried on her companion; she wished to meet her master, to question, to explain. It still wanted half an hour of the time at which he usually began to give his lessons. Just as they were about to meet, Herr von Heilmann, lifting his hat to Annie with grave courtesy, turned into a narrower side-path.

"I say, Annie, who's your friend? That grand, soldierly-looking fellow?" asked Basil.

"That was Herr von Heilmann," Annie answered, in rather a choked voice.

"Who is Herr von Heilmann?"

"My music-master," spoken with still more difficulty. "I am too late! He has given his lessons earlier, and she did not tell me. I am too late." Annie pulled down her veil.

"So much the better: no need to go in then. That man a music-master! I should not have dreamt it. What a pity; he ought to be colonel of a regiment; he might be a great general. He reminded me of some of the portraits of Garibaldi."

Poor Annie! she felt as if all her pleasure in her holiday was gone; she let her companion take her just where he would. But Annie's was a light, elastic temperament; not fickle, but flexible; true as steel, and bending rather than breaking, as does highly-tempered steel.

The people to whose house Basil took her were friendly and kind. She so seldom had any change or gaiety, so seldom saw kind faces and heard kind words, that when she found herself one of a merry circle gathering round the table where the afternoon coffee was being poured out, and the object of universal kindness and interest, she could not help brightening up again—feeling her own heart expand in that heart-full home-atmosphere. She would be happy, she resolved; yet Herr von Heilmann's grave face and stately bow frequently presented themselves to her; she feared that he was pained and displeased; for the displeasure she did not so much care, because she had not merited it, and could by a word of explanation remove it; but the pain—she took that to heart, as her pain.

The operetta given that night was a light, sparkling piece—it suited Basil's taste well, and it amused Annie. Without stirring or delighting, it amused her; while the brilliant scenes, the dazzle of light, and the mirth of her companions, excited her. Annie was very gay; her look of enjoyment and her sweet yet piquante prettiness drew many eyes upon her. She did not know this, for she was an unconscious little creature, who gave herself wholly, as far as the outer world was concerned, to the interest of the moment—to seeing what she had come to see, and hearing what she had come to hear. So she was unrestrainedly gay till, during the last act, she became aware that Herr von Heilmann was in the house—in the box of the beautiful young Grafinn Rosalie von Thauenwald. The box commanded that part of the parquet in which Annie sat—he must surely have seen her; but after she became aware of his presence he did not look towards her. He stood behind the Grafinn's chair; leaning against a pillar, he looked towards the stage. Again and again Annie felt her eyes irresistibly drawn towards him; his face expressed neither pleasure nor displeasure; he looked quiet, cold, critical, a man of marble. Suddenly the wonderful thought came to Annie of how it was this man, who had once drawn her to his breast, held her against his heart. Should she ever, ever be again so near him? Or would the lovely face of that young Grafinn some day rest there? How strangely she felt as this thought filled her with its marvellously mingled sweet and bitter.

Annie had looked once too often; she blushed overpoweringly, meeting the eyes of the Grafinn. She turned away towards the stage, but she was conscious of how the Grafinn turned to Herr von Heilmann, touched his arm with her gloved hand, offered him her glass, and whispered some words in the ear inclined towards her. Then she was conscious that Herr von Heilmann looked towards where she sat, as if for the first time: she turned to meet the look—she could not help it. With an air of grave respect, the master inclined his head to Annie as he declined the offered glass. No smile of his answered that which rippled all over the face of the Grafinn.

After this Annie neither saw nor heard much; she sat surrounded by a dream-atmosphere; between her and all she looked upon was a haze. All color and sparkle left her face; she was tired—very tired, she thought; she was glad when the curtain fell, and it all was over. In the corridor, after they had taken leave of their other friends, Basil having to take Annie back to the school, they met Herr von Heilmann. The Grafiun, richly shawled, and her lovely face framed by a delicate white hood, was leaning upon his arm. He stopped to speak to Annie.

"You are tired with your day's pleasure, Fraulein," he said, kindly. Then with a sterner air, "Did you know that I had changed my hour?"

"I did not know—I was going back for my lesson when I saw you."

"Good!" Then a moment's pause. "To-morrow at eight, if not too early an hour for you, I can give you the lesson you lost to-day."

Annie had no time to thank him, except by the light flashing all over her face. The Grafinn murmured something of the draught from the staircase; with a bow he moved on. Annie and Basil, pushed by the crowd, for a moment followed them closely.

"Who is the charming Englanderinn?" asked the Grafinn, her heart perhaps not at ease. Annie's face, all bright again, had looked too bewitching, shining out of the pale pink hood—a hood that had been lent her by Basil's fair friend; and Herr von Heilmann had looked too kindly upon that little face.

Annie heard the question, and she heard the answer, paternally grave, stern in its repression of any light comment, such as that upon which the Countess had before ventured.

"A favorite little pupil of mine—a dear child of whom my mother is very fond."

Then Annie could hear no more, and could therefore attend to Basil. He was saying:

"Your music-master's wife is a very lovely creature; but do you know, I think she is of a jealous temper. I think she is jealous of you, Annie. I saw her watching you perpetually, and she didn't seem to like his stopping to speak to you. The music-masters must have a fine time of it in this place. That woman looks like a born countess at least, and her dress and jewels were magnificent."

"She is a 'born countess,' Basil; the Countess Rosalie von Thauenwald."

"Not Herr von Heilmann's wife?"

"Not Herr von Heilmann's wife."

"A widow?"

"Yes."

"She wishes to be his wife then, I should say."

CHAPTER VI.

Annie hardly slept that night, the day had been one of so much excitement. She was up and in the music-room with the first light of morning. It was piercingly cold, and the stove was not lighted. For a long time it was in vain that she tried to get the stiffness out of her fingers.

As the clock struck eight, Herr von Heilmann came, the morning fog thickly beadiug his mustache and beard. Annie's music was open before her, seeing which he said "Good," and she began at once.

He hardly had occasion to interrupt her. When she had finished, and turned to him timidly, she was met by a smile, very slight, but kind and encouraging, and the words—"Right industriously studied."

That was praise enough to make Annie brighten all over. Herr von Heilmann was chary both of praise and blame, a man of few words. How well Annie remembered the first time she had played to him, and the mingled despair and ambition—despair of all her present ambition for the future—of which that first lesson had left her full.

After letting her play through the Sonata of Beethoven's which had been her ambitious choice then, he had said, with a grim smile:

All that should be quite otherwise. Put it aside for the present; later you may be able to understand it."

To-day Annie felt that her master was, on the whole, content with her; indeed, when the lesson was ended, he said as much.

Then Annie tried to thank him for his "great goodness" in sparing her an hour when he was, she knew, so fully occupied. She spoke rather blunderingly, and before she had finished what she had meant to say, she stopped suddenly, for she saw something in the listening face that made her fancy she was paining or displeasing her master. When she stopped, Herr von Heilmann continued silent for a moment. He had risen to go, and stood leaning one hand on the piano; his eyes, contracted in that manner peculiar to him, looked past Annie out of the window behind her, and he gnawed the ends of his moustache with an air of somewhat grim meditation.

"My mother gave to you, Fraulein, the message I left with her for you?" were his first words. He paused, so Annie answered "Yes," in a voice scarcely audible, but which he caught.

"I think you can hardly have understood my message, or can hardly have given me credit for sincerity, if you talk of my 'great goodness' for you, because in so simple a matter I do not choose to see you treated with injustice. I remind you of that message this morning, Fraulein, and beg you to credit its sincerity, because I now have a message to deliver from my mother to you. I demand your permission to repeat a word of warning from her to you on a subject which only one accredited as a friend, in a full sense, could be allowed to toueh."

Annie flushed and trembled, but managed somehow to express that she was proud to have him for a friend, ready to listen to him or to his mother on any subject on which they wished to speak.

"I know not the custom in your England, Fraulein"—he spoke with hesitation, studiously avoiding to look at Annie's face, while some heat tingled into his own—"but here, in Germany, a young girl—Ein junges Madchen—does uot before her betrothal appear in public alone with——. In short, to you, my Fraulein, a word is enough. I would not have allowed myself this freedom in addressing you had not the matter seemed to me urgent, and had I uot known that the Fraulein Gruppe neglects her duty towards you in many respects. Have I your forgiveness?"

Their eyes met now; his face betrayed the greater embarrassment, though hers was working with emotion.

"No," was her first word. She had meant to explain it by saying how strongly she felt his kinduess—had even meant to explain the truth, though in her heart was a painful consciousness of the Grafinn Rosalie, and a painful doubt as to whether it would not be more generous to her master to leave him in error; but these things were hardly recognized, and truth-speaking was a necessity of her nature. At that moment, just as that "no" had been uttered, Fraulein Gruppe entered the room. She had only just heard of Herr von Heilmann's presence in the house, and entered in a state of great excitement as to what it could mean.

Herr von Heilmann's explanation was as brief and frigid as was consistent with his invariable courtesy. Fraulein Gruppe escorted him from the room and across the hall, half-deafeuing him with her exclamations about his great goodness. Having closed the door behind him, she passed into the empty refectory, and, pacing up and down, took counsel with herself. Should she or should she not dismiss Annie?—could she afford this gratification of her rage?—finally, would it be any gratification? What resource would then be opeu for the girl other than that of taking refuge with Frau von Heilmann, and to what might that not lead? This cousin—who she didn't believe was a cousin at all—if he would but take Annie off her hands! She must wait, she decided; wait and see if he showed any intention of doing so, meanwhile throwing the two together as much as possible.

Herr von Heilmann had forgotten one of his gloves—it lay upon the floor. Annie did not notice it till a few minutes after he had left; she looked to see what it was she trod under her foot. Then she lifted it up, audibly expressed her sorrow that she had trampled upon it, shook the dust of the not yet swept floor from it, smoothed and stroked it; touched it with her cheek, finally with her lips; then as the door behind her opened, she started guiltily, hid it under her little apron, turned and faced Herr von Heilmann: he had come to seek it.

What could she do? She had thought him already out of reach, or she would have sent after him. For a musician's hand to be gloveless in that climate on such a morning was no light matter, and Herr von Heilmann, she knew, inherited his mother's complaint—was often disabled by rheumatism. Then for so dear a hand to suffer through her fault! What could she do? While she thought, Herr von Heilmann, after a rapid glance around the room, a word explaining what he sought, retired gloveless.

When the door had closed, Annie drew the treasure from its brief hiding place and ran after him. She held it to him without a word; he took it with only a bow. Did he suspect anything? No; he was far too grandly simple. He merely thought it strange he should have overlooked it.

Annie could eat no breakfast that morning, and again that night she had no sleep. She kept thinking over all that she wished she had said, fretting herself that she had not said it. She wondered, "If he had known that I kissed his glove, what would he have said? How would he have looked?" What would he have thought of her if he had known that, when he was in the house, she crossed the hall oftener than there was any need, just for the chance of being able, unobserved, to lay her hand with a caressing touch upon his fur coat? If he had seen her, once when she had found it thrown upon the ground, hold it a moment in her arms, burying her face in its soft warmth before she revereutly restored it to its proper place?

Had Herr von Heilmann known these things, he might perhaps have hardly found them to his taste, but it is difficult to say how this would have been. He had on some subjects "old-fashioned" and "peculiar" notions. His ideal of womanhood he placed upon a pedestal; before it men were to bow down and worship. But the true knight-errautry in him modified the somewhat cold chivalry. A poor little friendless girl like Annie could hardly be put upon a pedestal for distaut worship; if she was, she would feel herself placed in a very comfortless position. Did he not know this instinctively, and long to give her a warmer and lowlier place? When he sat beside her, formal, courteous, kind, was not this longing often very strong within him?

Perhaps Herr von Heilmann was one of those men who, through their own high manhood, are enabled in their manner of loving unconsciously to combine the worshipful reverence, which the ideal of womanhood inspires in them, with the tender, protective tolerauce for which the faulty weaknesses of the individual woman so largely calls. When the man loves in this sort, with what manner of loving can the woman most fitly answer his love?

Should not her life be one unconscious effort, by the intense and utter humility of her love and the religious devotion of her life, to raise herself towards less unworthiness of the higher and more abstract, while she is warmed, fed and cherished by the dearer and more familiar half of this twofold devotion? And is it unbeautiful that an unreasoning fidelity of allegiance should endow with something of the dearness of the man who so loves her, all things that are or have been his?

THE UNKNOWN PAINTER.

Murrillo, the celebrated artist of Seville, often found upon the canvas of some one of his pupils sketches or specimens of drawings, imperfect and unfinished, but yet bearing the rich impress of genius. They were executed during the night, and he was utterly unable to conjecture the author. One morning the pupils had arrived at the studio before him, and were grouped before an easel uttering exclamations of delighted surprise, when Murrillo entered. His astonishment was quite equal to their own on finding an unfinished head of the virgin, of exquisite outline, with many touches of surpassing beauty. He appealed first to one and then to another of the young gentlemen to see if they could lay claim to the choice but mysterious production, but they returned a sorrowful negative.

"He who has left this tracery will one day be master of us all. Sebastian," said he—a youthful slave stood trembling before him—"who occupies this studio at night?"

"No one but myself, señor."

"Well, take your station here to-night, and if you do not inform me of the mysterious visitant to this room, thirty lashes shall be your reward."

He bowed in quiet submission, and retired. That night he threw his matress before the easel and slept soundly till the clock struck three. He then sprang from his couch and exclaimed: "Three hours are my own, the rest are my master's!" He then siezed a pallette, and took his seat at the frame, to erase the work of the preceding night. With brush in hand to make the oblivious stroke, he paused: "O, those eyes," said he, "they pierce me through! that blood will run from those purple veins; I cannot, O, I cannot crase it! rather let me finish it."

He went to work; and soon the slave, the darkened brow, the child of toil and suffering, are merged into a youthful spirit, rising from the impetus of his own deathless energies into a sphere of liberty and bright beauty.

"A little coloring here, a touch there, a soft shade here;" and thus three hours rolled unheeded by. "O those beaming eyes! those lips will speak and bless me! my beautiful! O, my beautiful!" A slight noise caused him to look up. Murrillo with his pupils stood around; the sunshine was peering brightly through the casement, while yet the unextinguished taper, burned. Again he was a slave, and the spirit's folded wing scarce seemed to flutter. His eye fell beneath their eager gaze.

"Who is your master, Sebastian?"

"You, señor."

"Your drawing-master, I mean?"

"You, señor."

"I have never given you lessons."

"No; but you have given them to these young gentlemen, and I heard them."

"Yes, you have done better—you have profited by them. Does this boy deserve punishment or reward, my dear pupils?"

"Reward, señor," was the quick response.

"What shall it be?"

One suggested a suit of clothes, another a sum of money; but no chord was touched in the captive's bosom. Another said:

"The master feels kindly to-day: ask your freedom, Sebastian."

He sunk on his knees, and a groan of anguish burst from him; he lifted his burning eyes to his master's face, "The freedom of my father."

The death-chill had passed from his heart, and he breathed. Murrillo folded him to his bosom. "Your peneil shows that you have talent, your request that you have a heart; you are no longer my slave, but my son! Happy Murrillo! I have not painted, but made a painter!"

There are still to be seen in classic Italy many beautiful specimens from the pencils of Murrillo and Sebastian.

A POSY OF QUESTIONS.

What wisdom more, what better life, than pleaseth God to send
What worldly goods, what longer use, than pleaseth God to lend?
What better fare than well content, agreeing with thy wealth?
What better guest than trusty friend, in sickness and in health?
What better bed than conscience good, to pass the night with sleep?
What better work than daily care from sin thyself to keep?
What better thought than think on God, and daily him to serve?
What better gift than to the poor, that ready to be sterve?
What greater praise of God and man than mercy for to show?
Who, merciless, shall mercy find, that mercy shows to few?
What worse despair than loath to die, for fear to go to hell?
What greater faith than trust in God, through Christ in heaven to dwell?

—Thomas Tusser, Author of Good Husbandry." 1557.

WHO SHOT THE WOLF?

The Isaak Walton Trout-fishing Club, with its yearly visit to the "North Woods" of New York, has been so long an established fact, that any particular description of it or its members is entirely unnecessary among knowing ones. Our present respected Mayor, Professor L. de Garno Brookes; U. S. Treasurer Spinner, of greenback signature notoriety; George Dawson, of the Albany Evening Journal; and a host of other good fellows belong to it, all sufficient vouchers for its stability and aristocratic standing.

But to the sketch, drawn from life, that awaits the reader's eye:

It was "leafy June," in the year before the Rebellion of '61, that about a dozen members of the club started in from Booneville, the terminus of the Black River Railroad, to go to the camp of the club, then situated on the Fourth Lake of the Fulton chain, in the celebrated "John Brown tract."

There was the "Boot's Cashier," from Utiea; Bill Dutton, also from the same place; the "Alderman," from the Hudson below Albany; George Dawson, and the "Skeleton," who so likes pork and greens, that salmon, moosemeat or venison are nowhere, when they are about, with him, all in company besides others whose names do not occur to me at this moment.

The party not "cocked" but all "well primed" started from the Booneville Hotel at the dawn of day to foot it to Arnold's—their traps, with the exception of various guns and revolvers, having started the night before, under the care of Ed. Arnold, the old man's red-headed son, with the horse train.

It is some twenty miles in to Arnold's, and the road, cut or picked out about a hundred years ago, having improved backwards ever since, is not exactly a turnpike or very pleasant for a ramble. On over roots and stones, rocks and gullies, through mud as deep as purgatory and twice as sticky, went our party at the rate of about two miles an hour, certainly not more, perhaps less. The "Skeleton" labored fearfully, for he was carrying weight be it known, and even the honest face of Journalistic George gave forth a dew that bespoke unusual exertion on his part.

But perseverance is ever rewarded, and just as the last rays of the setting sun were gilding the tree tops, the grey roof of old Alden's hostelry gladdened their weary eyes.

Just then, the Alderman, who had brought a new rifle in with him, was regretting that they had seen no game on the way. As if to reproach him for his want of faith in Providence, at that moment a huge grey animal, with a long bushy tail, bounded down the road towards them.

"A wolf! a wolf!" cried Dawson and two or three others, who were supposed to be well versed in the knowledge of wild beasts and beastesses.

In an instant every gun and revolver in the party was cocked and raised with deadly aim towards the advancing animal. Another moment, and every gun and pistol was discharged, and the animal, with a wild, unearthly howl, fell dead to the ground.

The exulting party rushed on to view the body of their victim.

It appeared upon examination that only one shot had taken effect, and that had struck the beast between his eyes, and of course killed him instantly.

"That was my shot!" cried the Alderman. "I aimed for his eyes!"

"No, sir—it was mine!" cried Mr. Gunther. "I fired at his head and it is well knowu that I never miss my aim!"

"Gentlemen yon are both mistaken!" said the Profcssor. "I had a bead on the centre of his forehead, and I shoot an Ogden rifle you know!"

The dispute was growing hotter and hotter, when another person joined the party, it being no less than old Arnold, who was, as usual, half drunk, and now in a towering rage.

"Who in thunder has shot my dog?" he yelled. "I want $50 from the man that shot my dog!"

"Your dog?" cried George Dawson. "Why, man, it is a wolf?"

"No, sir, only half wolf! The other half hound, and worth more than any other dog on the tract. I want $50 from the man that killed him."

There was a silence then and there among the disputants for the honor of having fired that death-shot. The Professor forgot in a moment that he with his Ogden rifle had "drawn bead" on the fated beast. The Mayor did uot recollect that he had fired at the head of the wolf.

Aud to this day it remains unknown who shot old Arnold's wolf dog.

An Expert French Poisoner.—The evidence against Dr. Couty de la Pommerais, accused of having poisoned more than one woman, in order to obtain from an insurance company large sums for which their lives were insured, is complete. It appears that M. de Gonet, the magistrate to whom the investigation of the case was confided, having carefully examined the bedchamber in which the last of the doctor's alleged victims expired, remarked several stains on the floor near the bed. Having been informed that these stains were caused by natural causes, he had the floor scraped. The scrapings having been collected, a pigeon which eat a portion died very quickly. Experiments were likewise made on frogs. The heart of a frog was exposed to view, and, the operation having been carefully performed, the frog lived for a long time without the appearance of any disturbance of its vital functions. A second frog was operated on in a similar manner, and a drop of digitaline was let fall on its heart, that substance having been found in the stomach of the last person supposed to have been poisoned. The movement of the frog's heart diminished gradually, its pulsation became slower, and it very soon died. A very small portion of the scrapings off the floor were placed on the heart of a third frog, and the result was the same. Death ensued almost immediately. The two last frogs died while the first was living, nor did there appear to be any derangement in the pulsation of its heart. It is said that these experiments are to be repeated in the presence of the jury summoned to try this mysterious affair.

NOTICE

The publication of "The Californian" takes place on Saturday mornings, and copies may be obtained in the City at all News-stands, and of our News-agents through the country. It will also be served by carriers on the morning of publication.

* Correspondents will address all communications, business and otherwise, to C. H. WEBB, Office of "The Californian," 728 Montgomery street, San Francisco.*

THE CALIFORNIAN.

SAN FRANCISCO, SATURDAY, JULY 9, 1864.

THE DRESS REFORM.

THE feminine element, never easy in any part of the world unless it is doiug something, is astir at the East just now with a new reform—not a reform in morals or in manners, but a reform in dress. It is proposed, during the continuance of the war, that ladies should refrain from the purchase of imported luxuries, silken gowns, camels' hair shawls, embroidered jupes and the like, and wear articles of home manufacture instead. By the terms of this Calico Conference, the mothers and daughters of the land are to put on frills no longer, neither are they to wear laces—stay-laces and shoe-laces excepted; and even the Balmoral, which decidedly comes under the head of "imported luxuries" is to be put far from them. Of course the reform will find its way to this coast—everything good does. So hear it, husbands and fathers! glory in it, brothers and lovers! It will henceforth be possible for you to be affectionate and economical at the same time. A wife is no longer to be regarded as an extravagant necessity, but as a cheap luxury, costing more perhaps than an occasional game of billiards but less than a yacht. The partner of your affections, not always a silent partner, will no longer inform you with a loving light in her eyes that she saw such a magnificent pattern in some store on Montgomery street, such a seductive shawl displayed on the shoulders of one of those accursed lay figures which are exposed by insidious shopkeepers in their windows with the direct intention of ruining heads of families. Arabella's heart is no longer to be taken by parallels of tulle or skilful approaches of marvellous French faus; he who kneels and woos must change his tactics. The husband in the millennium that is dawning can delight the lady, whose board bills he has the privilege of paying, by a linsey woolsey jacket or a gunny-bag morning-wrapper. Augustus can win Arabella by cheap expenditure at the haberdasher's, and will perhaps find his readiest passport to the maiden's heart if he comes clad in sackcloth and ashes, bringing presents of similar pattern. For under the new dispensation a husband's affection is not to be measured by the breadth of his wife's flounces nor the bills which he permits her to run up. Neither is the lover's devotion to be gauged by the costliness of the trinkets which he brings to crown the head or jewel the fingers of "the purest and loveliest of her sex."

But this reform will bring its attendant disadvantages. Matrimonial short-comings and nocturnal absences can no longer be atoned for by the judiciously-timed arrival of small but valuable packages. Silk will no longer be permitted to intervene as a non-conductor of conjugal wrath between the husband who returns late and his offended spouse. There was a time when matrimonial differences could be bridged over by pontoons of some light, airy, floating fabric—when lovers' quarrels could be "made up" as easily as the least difficult article of wearing apparel; but that will all have changed under the new era. It is very doubtful whether any woman in the present practical day will consent to compromise on cotton; it is more than doubtful whether outraged feeling and wounded affection can be consoled by calico. Is it not probable that, in consequence, divorces will multiply alarmingly and weddings lessen in a frightful proportion? Certainly, we hope not; but humanity is proverbially weak, and in the midst of life we are in difficulty.

Seriously, belonging to that small but responsible division of the human race which is expected to pay for the dresses of the other, we go in for the proposed reform heartily. So far from thinking that women should have nothing to say in politics or war, we insist that since it is plainly impossible to prevent them from having a say in anything in which they choose to take an interest, it is as well open the gates of discussion and action to them at once. Let them beat the steel of their "skeletons" into swords, and turn their hair pins to any warlike account they please, so they do not wage war where they have promised to obey and ought to keep the peace. But we are not at all sure that the proposed movement is going to help the soldier, for whose aid it is intended, one whit. The lighter and more delicate fabrics which enter into the feminine toilet but are not commonly displayed to the unassisted vision, might very well be scraped into lint or torn up into bandages. Of flannel skirts, excellent cannon cartridges could be made. But we do not see how refraining from wearing silk or casting jewelry aside is to advance the war or aid the sick soldier. It is very certain that the rebellion cannot be smothered by throwing a cheap crinolline over it. If the difference between expensive dresses and what Mrs. Gummidge would call "common gowns" were to be given to the Sanitary Fund, or if the jewelry were to be melted down and used for the purchase of powder, we could then see benefit to the loyal soldier and woe to the rebel cause in this sudden flank demonstration on the part of the Feminine Brigade. But to simply refrain from spending money and hoard it, inures principally to the good of the party who practices the economy. Old Gunnybags will find his expenses less at the end of the year, and young Gunnybags will have more when the old one dies; but does the reform go any further? It may prove a step in the right direction, inasmuch as it lessens importations and will keep our gold at home; but the field for this reform is so broad that we despair of its universal adoption, and anything else is the merest drop in the bucket. To cut off the importation of all foreign articles not strictly necessities, bringing people down to home manufactures at once, would benefit the country and help to keep the price of gold down within reasonable limits. But we apprehend that it will be some time before our people wear home clothes made on domestic looms from wool shorn from the backs of native sheep, or drink native wines pressed by a rude process from a native grape of singular but scarcely pleasant flavor, or smoke cigars rolled by indigenous fingers from native tobacco. Still, though despairing of any very practical result, to this movement of the ladies we say: Right dress! Let them go on and be as simple and economical in their wearing apparel as they choose, relying on it that those who support them will heartily support the reform, and that in Salt Lake, where each man has twenty wives, it will meet with special favor. The best thing about it is, that it will leave shoddy very little to stand upon, and that if universally adopted by women of polite birth and breeding, we will once more have a distinguishing mark between those who are ladies and those who are not.

THINGS.

San Francisco, Saturday, July 9th, 1864.

THE Fourth has gone from my gaze, like a beautiful dream, or a firework, or a dear gazelle, or anything else that is evanescent.

The smell of powder yet lingers in my nostrils, and in my ear yet reverberates the sound of bursting crackers; but the Fourth has gone. Where has it gone to? Do they pack these Fourths away in the grim caverns of the Past, along with our dead loves and our Christmases, and all the other jolly days of life and the year?

The celebration this year was one worth having. Coroner Sheldon led the procession, and rode a real horse, and a white horse at that. The vision of the Apocalypse was thrown entirely in the shade, and altogether it was a magnificent undertaking!

It was, perhaps, in compliment to the worthy Coroner that a bier wagon was conspicuously driven in the van.

But I cannot, for the life of me, see why the whole effect of a national procession should be destroyed by making it an advertising medium. Were the lumbering carts of a slop-shop clothing house rung in to remind us of the "shoddy" in which our soldiers shivered through the inclement winters of the East, that those who contracted to clothe them might wrap the drapery of their greenbacks around them, and lie down to pleasant dreams in Fifth Avenue?

The bakers' carts were not so much out of place, for the national emblem is a bird, and a baked eagle would be a very pretty dish to set before a king.

Among the other specimens of home industry and manufacture, the children formed a very pretty feature of the procession, though my sympathies were strongly excited in behalf of the poor little things, paraded out among buffalo bulls and meat axes, to ride through clouds of dust and sand that a stout man would scarcely care to face.

But to return again to the charge, leaving the children to the parental charge, why were such gross advertising outrages permitted to be perpetrated in the name of patriotism? Is it not enough that every sidewalk and every wall must be plastered with the names of proprietors of cheap stores, or the inventor of a hair-wash or skin-lotion, without having them brought prominently to mind when we turn out to celebrate a national anniversary, mingling a memory of Washington with reminiscences of Chatham street, and compelling even the national airs to blow for some second-hand clothing store, while the national banner waves its bright stars above the advice to buy your trousers at Hewgag & Co.'s Great Emporium, or have your corns cut by John Bunion, the Chiropodist of the Period!

Why are people permitted to cram the almighty dollar down our throats on occasions like these? Is it not possible to sink the shop for one day, and give this small fraction of the year to memories of our country's past and hopes for its future, unalloyed by any selfish considerations of gain? Must we cry all our figs in the name of the Prophet?

A fig for the patriotism of those who do so.

It makes my blood boil with indignation to see this accursed greediness, the bane of our national character and the prime cause of the convulsion which is now shaking our country to its centre, cropping out on all occasions, and in the most inopportune places. A man cannot even give a quarter to buy powder for a national salute, without wanting to have the name of his tripe-shop or eel-stand rammed down the mouth of the cannon, and blown to the four winds of heaven as an advertisement.

Patriotism has been made a cock-horse long enough, and the sooner it is rescued from pollution the sooner will the American Nation attain true dignity and greatness.

I wonder whether any objections would have been made had it been proposed to put Gilbert's Giant, and the Fat Boy and the Lightning Calculator and the Tyrolean Warbler, who performs on three wind instruments at once, and the Learned Seal, and everything else that is Gilbert's, at the head of the procession; a huge wagon advising the public to go and be cured of skin diseases by some seventh son of a son of a gun, or the barouche of the Retired Physician whose sands of life have nearly run out bringing up the rear.

This stone is erected to the memory of John Buttons, a devout Christian, an accomplished gentleman, a thorough scholar, and a kind husband, by his affectionate wife, who still carries on the business of making horn spoons at the old place! If ever a monument is erected to the memory of our national dead, I expect to see every brick in it inscribed with a somewhat similar epitaph . . .

The best feature of the day was the fireworks at night.

An excellent idea of these could be obtained by wading through the sand a mile or two, and then taking a balloon That is what I did.

I noticed a number of fireworks from my stand-point. Prominent among these were Roman candles, which I suppose may be called the light of other days.

What pleased my fancy most, though, was the mottoes of the larger pieces. These were many and varied.

Conspicuous among them I remember the following:

The unities must and shall be preserved.

Miscegenation is the mother of invention.

Regeneration is the thief of Time.

Equivocation is the best policy.

The Union as it wasn't and the Constitution as it isn't.

Our Generals—Fuss in peace, fuss in war, and fust in the pockets of their countrymen.

Church, State and Bishop, Kip! Kip!! Hurrah!!!

But I have not time to enumerate all the sentiments that found display in the brilliancy of the evening celebration. Coming down to the actual truth, a difficult thing to do when one is writing for a paper published once a week and expected to keep up in mendacity with the ones published daily, the fireworks were excellent, and a credit to the manufacturers as well as to the purchasers.

They were made by Church, I believe, who, since he believes in fireworks and deals in them, is probably an orthodox Church.

I know little of the events of the week, aside from the glorious Fourth, if we except Miss Richings' opera nights and Julien's concerts.

Between them I'm lost, or, rather, I'm always to be found there.

After seeing La Sonnambula the other night, I left my room-door unlocked, not knowing but what some young lady who was betrothed to another would walk in by mistake.

But ne'er a time. In fact, I scarcely think the young ladies of this village are given to such mistakes much. These things obtain more in Italy.

But I wonder whether "Elvino" believed "Amina's" story?

Julien has fairly captivated me. I never hear him play without wishing I was a violin, so I could talk as pretty to a woman as it does.

If that Cremona of his is what is popularly known as a "viol of wrath," I am content to have it poured out on my devoted head every night. . . .

If I were not Inigo I think I'd rather be a Sacramento river steamer than anything else in life! For running people down is my strong suit.

The Washoe is on the stocks now for repairs. For my part (if Capt. Poole were talking he'd say for my ram-part) I don't go much on Washoe stocks, and whoever relies for recuperation on them will get fooled—or Pooled.

In hopes that the difficulty may yet be settled, and that the lion and the ram and the Kidd will yet lie down together, I write with my usual grace the signature of Inigo.

At Last.—The famous Alabama has at last met her doom, an illustration that pirates as well as pitchers may go to the well once too often. The once Mobile vessel now lies immobile at the bottom of the ocean. It is rumored that the commander of the Kearsarge will be made Commodore Winslow in reward for the service he has done to the nation and its commerce. It is certain that many an admiral in our navy would gladly give his rank and all its insignia to be the hero of this exploit. The theory that some men are born to good luck seem to hold good in regard to Capt. Semmes. After escaping capture with his vessel so often, and running the gauntlet of rocks and reefs, as well as of the war steamers sent in pursuit of him, he even escaped capture when the vessel he commanded was sunk, finding refuge on the decks of an English yacht that singularly enough seems to have been cruising in the neighborhood. It is rather a novel feature in naval warfare for a neutral vessel to slip in like a fairy godmother and whisk away prisoners from the hands of their captors, as well as a curious epoch in the history of pleasuring for a yacht to be around at such a time. A little question of international and maratime law will probably arise in consequence of this event. Let the question be decided as it may, English yachts can scarcely be around on such occasions for the future without running the risk of catching a few chance shot or shell from the Federal vessel. How Capt. Winslow came to permit his prisoners to be taken away from under his guns remains yet to be explained.

"OUR TRIP TO WASHOE."

[BY THE "CALIFORNIAN'S" LADY CORRESPONDENT.]

IN THREE PARTS.

PART FIRST—"PIGEON WING'S" RIDE OVER THE MOUNTAINS.

I WILL never believe again that Friday is an unlucky day. From my youth up I have been a martyr to this popular superstition. As a child my nurse taught me that if I began anything on a Friday I would never live to finish it. Consequently, nothing could induce me to cut out a dress for my doll, or go on an excursion, such as birds-nesting or nutting, on that day, because I believed it to be unlucky. I have never yet had the courage to cut out a piece of work on a Friday; and as for beginning a journey on that day, it always seemed to me like defying fate to do so. Imagine the horror with which I heard that the party with whom I had engaged to go to Washoe was to start on a Friday! I tried to change the day in vain. I tried to withdraw from my engagement in vain. I was bound hand and foot, and had nothing left for me but to make my will and bid a final adieu to all my friends. When I went on board the Chrysopolis, it was with a sort of premonition that she would either blow up or sink before we got to Sacramento; and when I waved a parting to my friends on the wharf, it was with a handkerchief wet with tears, and an inward consciousness that I should never see them again. It was a delusion, but it has cured me of a life-long superstition. One is never too old to learn wisdom, and it is better to be rid of an old error than to learn a new truth. Never, in the course of five-and-twenty years of travelling, have I made so delightful a journey as that which began upon a Friday! Imagine fifteen days of uninterrupted good fortune. Fifteen days in which the heavens, the earth, and men and women smiled upon us—fifteen days in which no single thing occurred to mar our perfect enjoyment!

Our pleasures began to bud upon the Chrysopolis, under the genial influence of Captain Chadwick's smiles and good stories; but after a cosy little supper of terrapin and broiled chicken, baptised in sparkling Veuve Cliquot, they fairly blossomed out, and we were radiant. When we awoke at Sacramento, we found a lovely morning all ready for us. The dew still lingered upon the tender leaves of the cottonwood trees which make long, shady arches over the dusty streets. The city seemed asleep or dead, it was so quiet, and the country for miles around looked deserted. Nothing seemed alive except the train which flew along, leaving long clouds of dust behind it. The fields were parched and dry; even the light-footed squirrels, as they scampered away to their holes, raised a tiny cloud of dust, and the owls that sat upon the thresholds of their underground habitations looked the color of dust. The very air was dust. We breathed dust, we wore dust, we were dust. "Dust thou art, to dust returnest, was not spoken of the soul," but it was the sole thing of which it might not have been spoken in the Valley of the Sacramento.

Our real journey did not begin until we reached Folsom and exchanged our comfortable railway carriage and iron horse for an old-fashioned stage coach and four horses. The sight of these dusty, muddy vehicles, with their wild, restless horses and devil-may-care drivers and miserable looking passengers, huddled together irrespective of age, sex or condition, revived in my mind all the stories I had heard of the horrors of a trip to Washoe. I began to realize all the terrors of "stage fright," and inwardly reproached myself for having left the comforts of home for such a wild-goose chase. However, I had not time to indulge in many forebodings, for, after a sort of preliminary "all right?" interrogatively uttered by a fierce-looking man as he slammed the coach door, and an imperative "go ahead!" to the driver, who answered by a sort of Indian war-whoop as he touched up his leaders, off we bolted as if we had been shot like a shell from some great mortar, and might explode at any moment. It took away my breath for several minutes, and when I got it back again, it was by fits and starts between the jolts. I have a very confused idea of the scenery, for between the dust which obscured everything and the difficulty I had in keeping my feet upon the bottom of the coach, and my head from the top, I was too much occupied to pay much attention to anything else. After half-a-dozen miles or so, our fiery untamed steeds became a little tired, and quieted down sufficiently for us to look around. We were a party of four equally divided between the "ins" and the "outs." Those who were "out" approved of the rein-ing administration, while those who were "in" opposed it, and were most anxious to get out. They thought the reins were held too loosely and affairs propelled at too rapid a rate; in short, that the whole thing was too fast. The "outs" did not see it in that light, and as they carried more weight than the "ins" they had it all their own way. And so we flew onward, mile after mile, up hill and down hill, by fields and forests, over bridges and through villages, rousing up the whole population, setting the dogs to barking, the children to screaming, the women to popping their heads out of the windows, and the men to fairly deserting the billiard and bar-rooms and the discussion of their favorite political subject, to rush frantically into the streets and gaze wonderingly at us.

Every ten miles or so, we drew up at certain stations for relays of horses, and it was curious to see the lordly manner with which our driver would throw down the reins and saunter into the house, leaving the smoking horses to obsequious hostlers. If there were any loungers around, it was delightful to watch the condescending air with which he received their awe-struck and respectful salutations. He was evidently a great man among them. When fresh horses were put to the stage, the reins gathered up, and "all ready!" proclaimed by the lieutenant in command, forth would come our captain, a fresh cigar in his mouth, his hat on one side of his head, a knowing expression upon his face, and, drawing on his gloves with a dignified deliberateness, he would mount the box, the "lieutenant" would present the reins, and with a magnificent flourish of the whip we were off again.

I remember that we dined at Placerville, and that we washed the dust out of our eyes sufficiently to see that it was a very good dinner, and that we got another driver—a handsome, dashing fellow, whose name is Charley Watson. It should have been "Jehu," for he drove as furiously, but with a wondrous grace and skill, worthy of all praise. I remember that we ran over a pig and killed three small chickens during the afternoon; and I remember Mud Springs, made classic by reminiscences of Billy Birch, and that it reminded me of the Celestial alphabet by the number of Chinese characters standing in rows on each side of the street. I remember its beautiful weeping willows and its prodigality of roses, which made it a perfect bower of beauty and freshness in a desert waste of country. I remember other straggling little villages of which we had barely time to catch a glimpse before we were gone, vanished in a whirling cloud of dust. I remember long trains of wagons, blue and red, and innumerable mules, large and handsome, in teams of ten and twelve, with jingling bells upon their collars, which rang out merrily as they stepped. I remember their wide-eyed look of astonishment as they pricked up their long ears, and gazed at us through the dust in solemn wonder as we went dashing by.

By-and-by we began to ascend into a higher region; the dust became less thick, our driver drew it a little milder, and I could look with pleasure on surrounding objects. Trees grew larger, rocks were higher and rougher, and were jumbled more promiscuously together. Our road grew more interesting, not to say dangerous; it wound around the sides of the mountains like a great dust-colored snake, and looked down over frightful precipices into deep ravines, where clear, sparkling torrents were playing at leap-frog over the dripping rocks. Tall fir trees, feathery hemlocks, and rich brown-stemmed pines stood thickly in stately clusters; and now and then, upon the borders of a stream, we caught a glimpse of the rose-tinted azalia. Everywhere the vegetation, the streams, the mountains reminded me of the Mariposa country—the same flowers, the same shrubs, even to the tiger lilies which on many a sunny slope shot up their tall spires, hung with tawny bells, where busy honey-bees rang all day long their drowsy chimes.

It was only 6 o'clock when we reached Strawberry Valley; but the high mountains, where the snow still lingered, shut out the sunshine, and in their shadow it looked cold and cheerless. We had taken the name literally, and expected to find a green valley filled with luscious fruit. "Here is the valley," we exclaimed, "but where are the strawberries?" Then our driver, taking his cigar from between his lips, told us that a man by the name of Berry once kept the station, and as he always gave his lodgers straw beds to sleep on he got the name of Straw-Berry. After this explanation he resumed his cigar, and looked as if he thought we believed him. Nevertheless, we had strawberries for supper, and very comfortable beds, which we are quite sure were not made of straw, and in the morning we had trout for breakfast, which one of our party, an enterprising fishermen, had caught the night before.

After a pleasant shower which sufficed to lay the dust we resumed our journey, but under another administration. Our dashing driver of the day before, (Charley Watson,) had to leave us here, and by a wonderful exercise of diplomacy on the part of one of us, and by the amiability of Mr. Swift, the obliging agent of the line on the other part, we had succeeded in securing the services of the most distinguished driver on the Pacific coast—the very King of Reinsmen, the Napoleon of the Whip, the driver of Horace Greeley—HANK MONK himself! I draw a long breath as I write that name. I draw a long breath whenever I think of it. It will require a great many expansions of my lungs to make up for the short breaths and the ineffectual efforts, when sometimes for several minutes I had no chance to breathe at all between the jolts—the 'bated breaths when the sight of a precipice suddenly sent my heart into my throat and choked me, and the long breaths of relief which I would essay, but which, before I had time to complete, would end in spasmodic sobs, as my head came in contact with the roof of the coach.

When I took my place in the coach it was upon the back seat, my friend occupying the front—but by some strange combination of circumstances we found ourselves continually changing situations. I can safely declare that in the course of a few hours I sate on every seat in the coach—on "every one by turns," and none of them long. We found it necessary to change our base as often as the Army of the Potomac. To heighten our enjoyment, after every particularly hard and lofty jolt, the "outs" would exclaim, "Isn't this jolly?" and we would answer, "Oh, very!" in a tone that was meant to be very sarcastic.

If we had had more weight in the coach we should have been more comfortable. The "outs" had the best of us in every respect; they rode more smoothly, were less troubled by the dust, had a much better view of the country and had nothing to smash their hats down over their eyes, as we had inside. Nevertheless, there was a certain exhilaration about the ride which enabled us to bear all its discomforts; and, when we reached the summit, and our driver paused a moment to let us enjoy the magnificent picture spread out before us, we felt that we were fully repaid for all our joltings. Lake Bigler lay beneath us, blue as the summer sky above us. Through the tops of lofty pines we looked down into a deep green valley, like a great emerald basin. The great blue mountains, which linked their arms around the lake and held it lovingly in their embrace, were wreathed with newly-fallen snow, and when the sun shone on it, it looked like gold.

Our reining monarch did not give us long to look, and he evidently meant to make up for lost time by the speed with which we flew down the mountain. Down the steep grade, around short curves—so short that the leaders were on one side while the coach was still on the other—along the edge of precipices to which there was no visible bottom, around long trains of wagons, skirting the brink so close that the very track of our wheels crumbled and fell away into the abyss below—over rocks and ruts we flew, as if the very Old Nick was after us, or was driving us, until we reached the valley. There I fondly hoped that our speed would abate, and that we should be able to proceed in comfort. Vain hope! After a change of horses our flight recommenced with redoubled speed. Our steeds seemed to have wings as well as limbs. Never saw I such a race. John Gilpin's was nothing to it; the Wild Huntsman of the Hartz Mountains and the Flying Dutchman could not be compared to it. On we sped at the rate of six miles in twenty-five minutes, our six horses on a dead run all the way. The great pine trees flew past us like giant spectres, faster and faster—over great level stretches of valley, over sloping uplands brown and breezy—past green savannas trailing their velvet mantles to the water's edge, past flowing streamlets, over bridges and quiet pools where the shy trout leaped, past the log cabins of pioneers and the snug homesteads of thrifty farmers, past fences, past solitary graves—marked here and there by rude palings, disturbing not their dead—past wandering Indians gazing at us stolid and immovable, past the very wind which whistled in astonishment at our rapid flight, past everything, until, with a graceful curve, our flying leaders drew up before the Lake Hotel.

Next week I will take up the thread of my story where it now drops, and tell the further particulars of my pilgrimage.

PIGEON WING.

BE PATIENT.—Patience is a virtue, which the contributors to all newspapers, and the readers of many, are specially called upon to exercise. Let those who have sent us articles which, in their own critical judgments, they know to be good, rest assured that they will make their appearance in time. For instance, the authoress of "Never Despair" must adopt her own motto, and not despair of soon seeing her poem embalmed in the amber of clear and handsome columns; and also let the authoress of "Lines to the Ocean" rest assured that her other verses, equal in merit, telling how her troth was plighted—and a pretty plight it was—will soon find a place.

BOOKS RECEIVED.—Roman sends us a number of new books received by the last steamer from the East. They are too late for notice in this number, but will receive attention in our next. Among them are Woodburn, a novel by Rosa Vertner Jeffrey; a beautiful edition of the Pilgrim's Progress, printed on tinted paper, President Lincoln's Administration, by H. J. Raymond, of the New York Times; Patriotism and other Papers, by the late Thomas Starr King, with a memoir of the author; Stumbling Blocks, a new book of essays, by Gail Hamilton; and Seven Stories, by the popular author, Donald G. Mitchell (Ik Marvel).

RATHER EQUIVOCAL PRAISE.—The Lackawanna Register disagrees with the New Nation—the Fremont organ—in many things, but praises it for the earnestness with which it combats the course of the Administration. The New Nation is so pleased with the compliment that it reproduces it. But the same, and even more, may be said of the Richmond Enquirer; and if opposition to the Administration be a virtue, Jeff. Davis has greater claims to canonization on that score than Fremont.

MADAME DE STAEL AT LAKE LEMAN.—It was to the large rambling chateau here that Madame de Stael retired when first banished from Paris by Napoleon. Talleyrand, her friend, was to communicate the edict to her, and he did it after this fashion: "I hear, madame, that you are going into Switzerland." "Oh, no! you are wrong," said she; "I have no such intention." "Pardon me," was the rejoinder, "I am told, on the very best authority, that you will quit Paris in three days." And so she went to Coppet.

A young lady having met with a disappointment in love, resolved to throw herself into the Elbe. She did so from the "New Bridge," and greatly to the astonishment and the amusement of the lookers on, found herself seated on the ice, forgetting that it was frozen.

Lord Overstone's fortune, says the Spectator, is estimated at £5,000,000.

THE SEA! THE SEA!

POETRY.

Kind reader, should you see a nantical swell,
Whose clothes not of tar but of patchouli smell—
They're but lately sent home by the tailor—
Who swears that his home is the rolling tide,
That his bark—not his Bella—shall be his bride,
In spite of stern father and all bedside,
That's my poetical sailor.

You may know him at once by his sailorly walk,
His language adorned with sailor's talk,
And his confidential predictions
About the weather: "'Twill rain ere noon,"
Or, "from the hazy state of last night's moon,
We shall have a terrible hurricane soon,
Then see if I prophesy fictions."

In the summer months you may meet him at Cowes,
Where he'll tell you the nautical world allows
That the Saucy Fan, with her clipper bows,
Has no match between Land's-end and Dover.
In some drawing-room at Paris, Florence, or Rome,
Assuring some damsel "the billowy foam
Is the home of a bloodthirsty rover."

Kind reader, imagine yourself, if you can,
In the well-furnished cabin of Saucy Fan,
For her owner has kindly invited
A host of friends for a summer's cruise.
There's Frank from the Line, and Gus from the Blues,
And a bevy of charmers who'd like to refuse,
But profess themselves "really delighted."

Hurrah! we're off, for our anchor's weighed,
The canvas is spread and all sail is made,
That the Saucy Fan can carry.
The guests on the quarter-deck laugh and talk,
And whisper soft nothings, as slowly they walk;
While jealous Augustus determines to baulk
Miss Clara's flirtation with Harry.

But what interrupted that langh of glee?
Oh, the Saucy Fan has shipped a sea,
And washed poor Augustus to "looward!"
The gentlemen groan and the ladies shriek,
And their stall-room's sacred privacy seek;
While as soon as drenched Augustus can speak,
He faintly calls for the steward.

The steward gives Augustus a glass of punch,
And the owner invites all his friends to lunch,
Provided by Fortnum and Mason.
But all are aware that a chicken's breast,
Though washed down by champagne of the very best,
Instead of giving the stomach rest,
Only serves the crisis to hasten.
So after the meal
Each guest 'gan to feel
Nature's urgent demand for a basin.

'Tis a business maxim, "demand creates
A supply of basins, or jugs, or plates;"
And the present instance—oh! cruel fate!—
Proved the rule seldom has an exception.
For those who sat down to lunch or to dine,
And in foaming goblets of sparkling wine
Poured out libations at Venus's shrine,
Ere long sacrificed to Neptune.

"Put back! put back!" cries the owner brave,
"Or the yawning billows will be the grave
Of the young and fair, the lordly brave,
That came on this yachting excursion."
And quoth he, aside, "Let the breezes blow
Our yacht to her moorings just of Bordeaux;
Then we'll tell our adventures, and who shall know
If we give an apocryphal version?

"We'll tell how fiercely the breezes blew,
And praise the Saucy Fan's captain and crew,
But I'll be the chief retailer
Of my own brave deeds; for I always boast
I fear neither tempest nor rock-bound coast;
When my hearers are guests and I am their host,
None will doubt I'm a true British sailor."

PROSE.

In order to satisfy those who yearn
The practical side of the sea to learn,
The bard must take a prosaic turn,
And write of its dangers and duties.
Let others sing of the "wind that blows,"
Or chant the praise of "the ship that goes;"
The reverse of the picture your servant shows,
Its horrors as well as its beauties.

The sea! the sea! the deep blue sea!
Who would not wish for a life on thee?
The grave of the young, and brave, and free;
For asleep 'neath the stormy billow
Lie those for whose coming fond mothers wait,
And weep that the noble vessel is late;
And the maiden, but whilom with joy elate,
For some sleeper shall wear the willow.

Oh! foaming, tempestuous, boisterous sea,
What deeds of destruction are wrought on thee,
When to dreaded lee-shore with hellish glee,
The storm-fiend pursues some vessel!
As she strikes he cries, "Puny mortals, mark
The end of your boasted gallant bark,
That was built with the waves to wrestle."

Oh! peaceful, beautiful, glassy sea,
What scenes of horror are wrought on thee,
When the fire demon lights his torches;
When through the ship rings the cry of "Fire!"
When the wreathing flames mount higher and higher,
Till the vessel is one vast funeral pyre,
For the prey that it mockingly scorches.

Oh! deceitfully smiling, treacherous sea,
What tales of woe might be told by thee—
Horrors no human eye may see
Or human ears hear a word of!
For, alas! oh heaving, mysterious brine,
No tongue can ever portray but thine
The vague extent of that awful line,
Left harbor and never since heard of!

Oh! grandly beautiful, awful sea,
What deeds of daring are wrought on thee,
What acts of heroic devotion,
Surpassing romance of sword or glave,
When the lifeboat speeds on its errand to save
Some shipwrecked crew from a yawning grave,
And to rescue the sons of the ocean!

Oh! fearfully cruel, revengeful sea,
Saturn was not more malignant than thee
When he made a luncheon, or dinner, or tea,
Of one of his sons or daughters!
Though he treated his children like penny buns,
And ate up a dozen daughters or sons,
What thousands of Franks, Goths, Vandals, and Huns,
Are swallowed up by the waters!

What costly argosies, past all price,
Have been crushed and shattered as in a vice,
And rent and torn by thy cruel ice,
In North or South Polar region!
Till their hardy crews thought a slice of bear
Or a tender seal steak was lordly fare,
For their feast days, like angels' visits, were rare,
And the name of their fast days Legion.

Then be not deceived by the men who boast
"They fear neither tempest nor rock-bound coast;"
And when in their cups everlastingly toast
Poll or Sue, "and wish they could hail her;"
But let the hard ask for a hearty cheer,
For the sailorly pluck to all Englishmen dear;
And it were not unmanly to shed a tear
O'er the hardships endured by the sailor.

THE YOUNG ACTRESS; OR, THE MANAGER AND HIS CONTRACT.

Some time since a beautiful young girl made her first appearance on the stage of one of the minor theatres in Paris. Her grace and loveliness attracted admiration, which her rising talent promised to secure. She concluded a long engagement with the manager, giving her services for a very moderate remuneration, but which sufficed for her wants and those of an invalid mother who was totally dependent on her exertions. According to the usual custom, a clause in the contract stipulated that a forfeit should be paid in case of its non-fulfilment by either party.

Theatrical managers never fail to insert this article in the treaties signed with their actors; and it often happens that a very small salary is accompanied by an immense forfeit. In this case it was fixed at ten thousand francs, ($2,000;) but the young actress attached no importance to the amount, being fully resolved to fulfil her engagement, and steadily apply to the cultivation of her powers. She felt how much depended on her success, and on she walked in the right path, refusing to be turned from it by the flattering vows and insidious homage which she daily received. But in our uncertain world, the good and prudent may sometimes change their plans as suddenly as the foolish and the fickle.

One day the young actress entered the manager's room, and announced to him that she wished to leave the theatre.

"How!" cried he; "you are the last person from whom I should have expected such caprice."

"Indeed, sir, it is not caprice."

"It is, then, the offer of another engagement."

"It is, sir, and one which I cannot refuse. It is from an excellent young man, who wishes to marry me."

"Here's a pretty business; a marriage in question."

"My happiness for life, sir, I feel is in question."

"Then don't hesitate an instant; marry at once."

"But the person who has proposed for me would not wish his wife to continue on the stage."

"A fine prejudice, forsooth! What is his situation in life?"

"He is at present a merchant's clerk, but he intends to set up in business, and he will want me to attend our shop."

"My dear girl, I shall want you also to study your part in a new afterpiece which I have just received."

"Then, sir, you refuse to set me free?"

"I must think about it. At all events you have it in your power to break the engagament by paying the forfeit."

"Ten thousand francs! 'tis very dear."

"It was very dear when you signed your name; but now your services are worth more than that."

"Alas! it will prevent our marriage!" said the poor girl, in a voice choked with tears, and with a despairing heart she left the room.

Two days afterwards the manager was seated close to the grate in his apartment, trying with all his skill to kindle a fire. All the theatrical attendants were engaged at rehearsal, so he was obliged to dispense with their assistance.

The cashier entered with a visage wofully elongated. The affairs of the theatre were in a critical state; the receipts had diminished; and pay-day at the end of the month approached with a menacing aspect.

"Yes," said the manager, "our situation is certainly embarrassing. And this plaguy fire that won't light."

Astonished that he could be so indifferent under the circumstances, the cashier retired. As he was leaving the room, the young actress entered.

"Ah! is it you?" said the manager. "You are coming from rehearsal?"

"No, sir; I have come to return the part you gave me to study."

"So it seems you think of quitting the stage?"

"I have brought you the forfeit."

"The ten thousand francs?"

"Here they are."

"And how have you procured this sum?"

"My intended husband gave it me."

"Is he, then, so rich?"

"These ten thousand francs are nearly all he possessed. But he said, 'What does it signify? we shall only have to defer setting up business; or perhaps I may succeed in borrowing the money.'"

"Going in debt? That's a fine prospect for young housekeepers! So, the dowry you mean to bring your husband is want and ruin; you take from him the hard-earned fruit of his industry, and you oblige him to renounce the prospect of an honorable independence."

"Pray, sir—pray don't speak so cruelly!" sobbed the young girl.

"Have you considered that such a union cannot fail to be unhappy? Listen to reason—take back this money and return it to him who gave it you; and if you are absolutely resolved to leave the theatre, I'll show you a simple way of doing it, that won't cost you anything. Take this paper and have the kindness to put it in the grate."

So saying, he handed her a sheet of paper carefully folded, which she threw among the smouldering sticks.

The manager watched it as the languid flame gradually curled round it, and then shot up in a bright blaze.

"Do you know," said he, "what that paper was? It was your signed engagement! And now I have no longer any claims on your services, and consequently can demand no forfeit. Go, my good girl, and employ your little capital well, and be happy."

Deeply affected by this generous deed, the young actress expressed her gratitude as fervently as her tears permitted.

"Don't talk to me of gratitude," replied the manager; "we are only quits. See, for the last hour I have been blowing in vain at that obstinate fire; you threw your engagement into it, and directly it blazed up. Thanks to me, you are now free; and thanks to you, I am giving my hands a good warming."

THE DANO-GERMAN WAR.

THE BOMBARDMENT OF DUPPEL.

On the range of low sand-hills which lie to the north and the west of Duppel were established a series of Danish entrenchments, designed for the defence of the real fortifications of the town. These entrenchments, one by one, after a series of desperate and bloody encounters, were taken by the allies, and in their place were planted cannon and mortars, with which to bombard the Danish stronghold. On these sandy elevations, some two hundred and fifty Austro-Prussian guns and mortars were set up; and on the appointed day they began their discharges on the devoted town. The Danes replied with equal vigor, and for about six hours an incessant exchange of shot and shell took place. From the enormous number of guns engaged—being altogether over four hundred—the noise of the combat was of the most deafening description. The thunder of the artillery was heard at a distance of more than twenty miles. In a short time, a thick canopy of smoke covered the whole scene, while a perfect hailstorm of shot and shell rained on town and encampment.

Under cover of a cloud of smoke, a strong party of Prussians advanced, surprised and captured a Danish outpost, after which they forced their way into the very heart of the town.

Here a heartrending incident occurred. The Prussians were fired upon from the doors and windows of the houses. They returned the fire, when a little blue-eyed and golden-haired girl of about four years old, who, by some means had eluded her mother's care, was standing in the street, and, with the confidence of innocent childhood, gazing upon the advancing soldiers, and wondering what the terrible commotion could be all about. In the excitement and confusion of the affray, it is almost certain that the Prussians did not see the child; for it would be nothing less than blasphemy against human nature to suppose that any man of woman born, or anything less callous than a fiend, would have aimed a murderous instrument at the poor child. We must therefore attribute the fatal shot which pierced the heart of this little Danish maiden to that terrible chance which so extensively mingles in the most carefully-prepared battles, sometimes baffling the most experienced generals, and imparting to war some of its most painful and revolting characteristics. The shriek of the hapless little maiden, as she threw her arms in the air, and dropped down a lifeless corpse, with her heart's blood pouring forth a crimson tide, was heard by her mother, who rushed to the door to learn what was the matter with her child. By this time the Prussian soldiers had come up, and formed a horror-stricken circle round the victim of kingly ambition. The inhabitants who had heard the cry, or saw the death of this child, were, reckless of all consequences, rushing to the spot, and, as if by a mutual though unexpressed agreement, a momentary armistice was established. But the Prussians stood on guard, and, with fixed bayonets, formed a cordon of glittering steel points round the murdered child, whom one of their comrades had lifted in his arms.

The mother of the child, having either heard from some bystander, or divined by the mystic operations of maternal love, the evil which had happened to her child, rushed frantically on the soldiers. The bayonets lowered instinctively before her, and in an instant she was in the centre of the group, and the full horrors of the scene unfolded to her eyes. A whole eternity of anguish was concentrated in a single moment in that bereaved mother's heart. Language cannot describe the agony of that poor woman's soul. For a time she was speechless, and motionless as a statue. She gazed upon her murdered child in the arms of the soldiers at first with a sort of vacant stare, as if her reason was struggling to resist the evidence of her senses. Then, with the fury of a lioness robbed of her cubs, she darted upon the soldier, snatched her lifeless child from his arms and hissed rather than exclaimed, "My curse upon the Germans!"

This was the signal for the renewal of the strife. The Prussians were surrounded by a frenzied multitude of men and women. Some of the men were Danish soldiers, and therefore armed; but the great majority of the mob were destitute of martial weapons. To this circumstance, combined with the blind fury which incapacitated the mob for effective action, the safe retreat of the greater number of the Prussians is to be attributed. For that day, in spite of the daring of the Prussians, Duppel remained in the possession of the Danes.

But the war has ludicrous and comical, no less than tragic and horrible, phases. One of these we subjoin. A few days prior to the first bombardment, a Prussian sergeant of foot was engaged on patrol duty. In the course of his perambulations he fell in with a Danish sergeant employed on the same task. The two antagonists eyed each other with surprise, mingled with something of admiration; for it so happened that both men were extraordinarily tall and handsome, and bore a striking resemblance to each other. They were both fired simultaneously with the same thought, which was to effect the capture of the other—the slaying of isolated parties or individuals, when not engaged in battle, being prohibited by the custom of war. But they were as equally marked in strategic ability as in physical appearance; so each sergeant had to return to his quarters without the prize which he coveted. Next day, and the day following, the same thing took place, and with similar result. The German told his comrades of his curious encounter with what he called his Danish "Doppel-Ganger," or "Double;" expressing at the same time, his determination to have his "Double" taken prisoner. The Dane made a precisely similar communication to his comrades.

The superior officers of the respective sergeants were informed of the incident, and no small interest was excited in both camps in consequence.

One day the Prussian sergeant marched out as usual, but with more than his usual resolution to "bag" his "Doppel-Ganger." In the ardor of pursuit he had strayed further than his wont, and, indeed, beyond the proscribed limits from his quarters. The ground over which he proceeded was somewhat uneven—hills and hollows, bushes, small ravines and streams.

All at once the Prussian sergeant came upon a very small soldier's tent. He was somewhat startled at the moment, nothing of the sort being presented to his eyes the moment before. The fact is, that the tent was placed in a hollow in the midst of the adjacent plateau, and that it was not visible ten paces from its site.

The Prusrian wisely deemed that, in such close proximity, retreat would be as dangerous as advance—that a gunshot or a bayonet-prod on the back part of the person is as dangerous as a wound in the front. So he boldly advanced, and challenged the occupant of the tent to come out and show himself.

To his surprise, the Danish sergeant, his "Double" and acquaintance of the last few days, presented himself—in his hand neither sword or bayonet, but a simple cup of coffee.

The two foes laughed and nodded at each other.

"Glad to see you," says the Dane. "Won't you walk in, and taste some of my coffee?"

"I like my coffee very sweet," said the German.

"That is very unfortunate," replied the Dane, "as, at this particular moment, it so happens that I am short of sugar."

"I can supply you," returned the Germau, covering the Dane with his rifle.

"You would not shoot me?" said the Dane.

"This instant," said the German, "unless you come out and surrender yourself my prisoner."

"It is contrary to the usages of modern warfare," urged the Dane.

"Never mind," said the German. "I have sworn to take you, dead or alive. So I tell you that if you attempt to retire or to arm yourself, I will instantly fire."

"A very hard case, truly," remarked the Dane; "but before you proceed to extremities. let me ask you, as a favor, to mark the shining tube which protrudes through the tent a few inches to my right."

The eye of the German followed the direction indicated, and a momentary pallor overspread his face.

"That tube," continued the imperturbable Dane, "is the barrel of the rifle of my comrade Haus, now crouched behind. Hans, let me tell you, is a good fellow, and one of the most unerring shots in all Denmark. For the last five minutes you have been covered by his aim; and, of course, if you should attempt any of your pranks upon me, Hans will fire. Speak, Hans! and assure this gentleman that you know how to avenge the injury done to an old friend."

"Of course I do," was the response of the invisible Hans.

"Well," said the Germau, "I see how it is. You and I are well mated."

"Checkmated," replied the Dane.

"Once more, then, let us part as we have met. I think it is about the best thing we can do. First, however, let me know your name, for I begin to take quite a liking to you," said the German.

"John!" was the curt reply of the Dane.

"Strange!" exclaimed the Prussian.

"What is strange?" inquired the Dane.

"Why," continued the German, "it is strange that your name should be John, for that is my name too."

"Wonderful!" replied the Dane, "seeing that 'John' is such an uncommon name." They laughed.

The two sergeants parted. That evening the Prussian sergeant was more than usually taciturn; to every inquiry of his companions, as to his encounter with his "Double," he gave short, evasive answers. He was by no means satisfied with himself; he felt that he had rather the worst of the matter in his latest meeting. However, being a prudent as well as brave man, he made up his mind to make to-morrow compensate for the misfortune of to-day.

Next morning he set out on his now regular excursion, armed with a double stock of caution and resolution, in the hope of meeting his "Double."

He was not disappointed; for, far in advance of his usual bounds, he beheld the Dane coming towards him, not as formerly, with military step and well-pcised rifle, but at headlong pace, and without any weapon.

The German was astonished. What could it mean? He had no time to answer his own mental inquiry, before he heard the sharp ring of two or three rifles, fired in rapid succession. His eyes followed the guidance of his ears, and saw a party of Danish soldiers, as if in hot pursuit of the flying sergeant.

In a few more seconds, the latter, with flushed face and most unsoldierlike eagerness, was beside him.

"I surrender myself your prisoner," said the Dane. "For heaven's sake, take me to your quarters, or I shall be a dead man!"

"Explain yourself," said the German.

"That is easily done," continued the Dane; "but let us hasten to your camp. See, they are close upon me. The fact is," the Dane went on, "that having, within the last few days, been observed in such close and frequent communication with you, I am accused of treason, and betraying important military secrets to the enemy. That Hans who was with me yesterday is a double-dyed scoundrel. He swears that he heard me yesterday describe to you our positions, and the means by which they may be surprised. But for heaven's sake, let us hasten to your camp."

The German was completely thrown off his guard.

"I am truly grieved for you, namesake."

"And good cause you have," said the Dane, darting with wild-cat agility on the German, snatching his rifle from his hand, and pointing its muzzle to the Prussian's breast.

"And now, John," said the Dane, "own yourself at length overmatched. You are my prisoner—resistance is useless. Attempt to fly and the contents of your own rifle, if not the bayonet, shall be inserted in your heart. And see, here are four more of us, so there can be no disgrace in one German surrendering to five Danes."

"Is this honorable?" said the German.

"It is war," replied the Dane.

And so Prussian Long John was marched a prisoner to the Danish fortifications at Duppel.

An Egg-shell-ent Joke.—Simple Simon writes to ask whether sailors get their scal-eggs in the same way as they get turtle's eggs? What a want of information—dira egg-jestas! We beg to inform this wight and yokel that, as regards the sailors procuring sea-legs, all we can say is, "Walker."

THE OLD MAID'S THERMOMETER.

Age.

15. Gets perfectly disgusted with the nursery, and makes her entrance into civilized society.
16. Begins to have some idea of the tender passion, and feels the pricks from Cupid's dart.
17. Talks of disinterested affection, and has a strong inclination for gaiety and amusement.
18. Fancies herself in love if she happens to be flattered.
19. She is a little more conceited in consequence of having been flattered.
20. Commences the fashionable, and dashes.
21. Still confident in her attractions; expects a brilliant offer.
22. Refuses a good offer because he is not a man of fashion, her motto being "Excelsior."
23. Flirts with every man she meets with.
24. Begins to wonder why she is not married; but her motto is "Nil Desperandum."
25. Rather more circumspect in her conduct; wears her ring on the forefinger of her right hand.
26. Thinks a large fortune not quite so indispensable.
27. Composes poetry, and most decidedly prefers the conversation of rational men to flirting.
28. Wishes to be married in a quiet sort of way with a snug income.
29. Almost despairs of entering the married state, but still hopes on, her motto being, "Dum spiro, spero."
30. Rather afraid of being called an old maid.
31. A greater love of dress, with the addition of a lap-dog, which is her sole joy.
32. Affects good humor in her conversation with the male sex.
33. Affects good humor in her conversation with the male sex.
34. Wonders how men can leave the company of sensible women to flirt with chits.
35. Very jealous of the praises of other women; ill-nature sets in.
36. Thinks herself shghted in society, and resigns herself up with Christian resignation and fortitude to training the young idea at the Sunday-school.
37. Jealousy and ill-nature increases; scandal burns.
38. Turns district visitor, and gives away tracts.
39. Not having the felicity of being in the married state herself, finds the greatest consolation in talking of her acquaintances who are unhappily married.
40. Gets more ill-natured and disagreeable; very officious and fickle.
41. As a last resource makes love to a young man with a small income; but,
42. Not succeeding, rails against the male sex.
43. Partiality for cards and scandal increases.
44. Very severe against the manners of the age.
45. Takes great interest in all parish matters; strong predilection for the parson.
46. Enraged at his desertion.
47. Becomes very desponding; takes to elder wine and snuff.
48. Turns all her remaining sensibility to maimed animals of every description.
49. Talks of the offers she has had, and rejoices in every bit of scandal she hears; rails against everybody in general.
50. At this period she is not more disgusted with the world than the world is with her. Not being at all partial to old maids, I have not interested myself sufficiently to know what they do after fifty, but having had the pleasure of watching the process from living models to the above average, I can safely say it is quite correct.

THE ROSE THIEF.

The prison of St. Lazare, so called because it stands on the site of an ancient hospital for lepers, contained within its walls, some years ago, an interesting inmate commonly known as "La Folle des Roses." One morning, shortly after the restoration, some laborers, who were going to their work, found the body of a soldier, who had apparently been assassinated, and close at hand a young girl, who was well known in the neighborhood. On seeing the men approach she attempted to escape, but they stopped her; and as she either could not or would not account for her being there at that early hour, she was arrested on suspicion. On being interrogated, she said that she had been on the preceding evening at a fete with some young companions, where she had danced and amused herself like the rest. In their company she had returned to her father's house, and when they left her she had seated herself on a stone bench at the door.

She remembered that the evening breeze had borne to her a powerful odor from the roses that are cultivated in profusion in that neighborhood; but what happened subsequently she could not tell, as she recollected nothing further, nor could conceive how she came to be found near the dead soldier. Under these circumstances Marie M—— was committed to St. Clare; but her confinement was short, it being soon ascertained that the soldier had been killed by one of his comrades in a drunken fray. The prisoner was free, but public curiosity remained unsatisfied; nobody could make out how she became mixed up with the affair at all, and many persons persisted in believing that she was not altogether innocent of the crime that had been imputed to her.

A year had elapsed, and again the gates of St. Lazare opened to receive Marie M——; and this time she was really convicted of stealing roses. Repeatedly the owners of the flowers had forborne to prosecute, in consideration of her youth; but their patience was exhausted, and she was sent to prison. Sentence was pronounced upon her as a common thief; but everything tended to show that her offence should have been considered from another point of view.

Some peculiar sensibility to the perfume of the rose, with which the atmosphere of that neighborhood is redolent at certain seasons, appears to have caused a sort of monomaniacal desire to possess the flowers, and the first invasion of that malady had taken place on the night the soldier had been assassinated. Innocent, simple, and almost a child in years, Marie was thrust into this den of impurity, where every vice was rife; but strange to say, the refuse of God's creatures that inhabited the jail understood the poor girl better than the élite of the wise who had sent her there.

They surnamed her "La Rose," and, instead of ridiculing her fancies, they pitied and indulged them; they made subscriptions among themselves, and not only procured her real flowers, as far as they were able, but the women obtained gauze and wires, and made artificial ones to please her.

Fortunately, one of the overseers was sensible and humane enough to encourage, instead of suppressing this singular charity; and perceiving the dexterity which the female prisoners, inspired by good will, were acquiring in this new art, he established a manufactory of artificial flowers, and set Marie to work among the others. She took to this employment with ardor, and at the end of six months she no longer thought that the roses beckoned to her, or that they uprooted themselves from the earth to follow her footsteps; though she always retained a tender reverence for the plant which had been the cause of her misfortune. She became, after her release, one of the most celebrated makers of artificial flowers in Paris, and was one of the principal manufacturers employed by M. de Bernardiere, by whom Louis XVIII. commanded samples of all the indigenous plants in France to be constructed in whalebone.

THE TOUCHING AND PATHETIC LEGEND OF SAM STOUT

Sam Stout he drove an omnibus
With horses ne'er outdone;
They never melted in the heat,
Though always in a run.

He ate and drank enough for six
Between his hourly rides,
And thought it not extravagant
While he had twelve "insides."

But soon his appetite fell off,
And fewer were his draughts;
For, spite of all his driving skill,
Love struck him with his "shafts."

'Twas Kate he loved—a barmaid fine,
Who'd often filled his glass—
An Irish girl, squat, fat, and plump—
In short, a Catholic "mass."

"Ah! Kate," he said, "be mine; you'll find
Such love is very rare,
And when you ride no fare you'll pay,
Yet be my constant 'fair.'"

She vowed she'd fix her heart on him,
But 'twas a wicked flam;
For Sam's conductor's badge she wore,
And only badgered Sam.

And soon, alas! he found her false,
Which made his senses reel;
So, driving reckless through his woe,
He cared not for his wheel.

"False girl," he cried, "no more you'll fill
My glass with smiles and titters;
My thoughts, if now I drank your gin,
Would make it gin-and-bitters.

"Ah! Kate, when at St. Paul's you look
You'll think of one with gloom,
Who once 'stood' there as stoutly built
And with as dark a doom.

"For I'm resolved to die, and quit
The ills this life bestows,
And leave my omnibus to gee
Without me and my woes."

So he got into an empty butt,
And, closing up the end,
Felt grateful for its friendly aid,
Though but a hollow friend.

The brewers came to take him off,
And thought stale beer they'd there;
But, uh! stout's load of grief was more
Than porter e'er could bear.

They rolled him then along the kerb,
And knew not, simple souls,
How much he'd rather starved in peace
Than had so many rolls.

Says he, "In vain to summon me
Informers long combined,
But now these brewers think me beer,
I shall be surely 'tinned.'

"I gasp and can no longer breathe,
But die a cruel death;
For though these horses draw this dray,
They cannot draw my breath.

"False gal," he cried, "though you may think
I shun this dying state,
You'll find at last my smothered end
Is quantum suff—O Kate!"—[London Fun.

How shall we spell Shakspeare's Name?—Mr. Hargrave Jennings has written the following letter to the papers respecting the spelling of the name of Shakspeare:

One of the most surprising things to a close examiner of Shakspeare's autographs is the very different manner in which people spell that immortal name. The signature in the British Museum is probably the really undoubted one. Every man is supposed to best know the way in which his name is spelt, and Shakspeare's spelling is "Shakspeare" without the final "e"—to use the strong idiom—"as like as it can stare." Make the reference yourself and you will be clear as to this point. It is very interesting to remark of this signature in the British Museum that Shakspeare, in writing his name, thinking, probably, when he executed the deed, of other things, miscalculated his space to the folding over of the parchment where the seal is placed, and so abbreviated the last syllable of his name with indistinct and curtailed marks, the natural result of the constricted room then striking his eye.

As an addendum to the above, we may say that the variety of ways of spelling Shakspeare's name are so many, that we have found it amusing to make a collection of the several forms of orthography employed, which are as under:

Chaesper,	Shakespere,	Shaknspeare,
Saxpere,	Shakespear,	Shakxeper,
Saxspere,	Shakespeere,	Shaxkespere,
Schaekspere,	Shakespere,	Shaxkspere,
Schakespeare,	Shakespeyre,	Shakyspere,
Schakespiere,	Shakispere,	Shakysper,
Schakespere,	Shakspeare,	Shaxper,
Schakspare,	Shakespeare,	Shaxpere,
Schakspeare,	Shakspere,	Shaxspere,
Shackspere,	Schakspere,	Shaxsper,
Shackspire,	Schaksper,	Shaxpeare,
Shagspere,	Schakspeyr

Furthermore, we may mention that a Frenchman has denied that any one of these forms is correct; for the original must have been Jacques Pierre, (James Peter,) a common Christian name in France, and has been corrected into "Shakspeare" by Shakspeare's ignorant ancestors.

BRIEF MENTION.

AT HOME.

The Fourth of July passed off gloriously in this city and through the State. Much powder was burned, many flags were displayed, and thus far, there are remarkably few accidents to record.

Gould and Curry has declared a dividend of $50 a foot, for the month of June. Under the new management, it is thought the mine will soon resume its former dividends, if it does not increase them.

A stock broker named Robinson levanted on the last steamer, with $6,000 not honestly his own. It is little wonder that men possessed of so many "feet" should walk off.

A former member of the Legislature was knocked down on Tuesday evening on Post street, opposite Union Square and robbed of his money and shirt-studs, even of his boots.

Our war steamers, the Saranac and Narragansett, have been recruited with negroes, brought out from New York by the last Aspinwall steamer.

Gen. McDowell has entered on the active duties of his command. Colonel Drumm retains the same position on Gen. McDowell's staff which he so long occupied on Gen. Wright's.

The Navy Department has telegraphed that the Camanche will very soon be built under the proper auspices, requesting the city to cease any action in the matter.

A soldier, James Barrett, shot and killed a man named McGowan, in a saloon, on Tuesday night. He alleges in his defence that he heard McGowan talking "Secesh" some days previous.

A terrible murder occurred on the Marysville road, about 12 miles from Sacramento, on Tuesday morning. George Selby, a ranchman and teamster, was shot through the head while asleep in bed, the pistol with which the murder was committed burning and scorching his wife's face in its discharge. The murderer is yet undetected.

A new daily paper, called the Washoe Evening Herald, has been started in Virginia, by Fitch and Bennett. It has a business-like and attractive look.

Much excitement still prevails relative to the running down of the Opposition steamer Washoe, by the Yosemite, of the Regular line; and Capt. Poole's card, asking for a suspension of public opinion, does not seem to produce much of a counter-current.

ABROAD.

The Duke of Sutherland, one of the heaviest "swell's" in England, "runs wid de masheen," belongs to the fire brigade, never misses a fire, and is passionately fond of "contending with the devouring element."

The Pope of Rome has sent $500 from his private purse to the Sanitary Commission, and expressed sympathy for our wounded soldiers.

Switzerland, already so rich in beautiful scenery, has had a new feature added to its wonders of nature. Near St. Maurice, in the Canto de Vaud, a grand crystal cavern has been discovered, at which one arrives by a boat on a subterranean lake. The cavern lies 400 metres, or 1,300 feet below the surface of the earth, and is said to be beautiful beyond description.

The "pretty waiter-girls" have all been expelled from the concert saloons in Philadelphia, under the operation of a new law enacted by the Legislature.

The Paris police report over 10,000 dead new-born infants having been found at the gratings of the reservoirs, into which the sewers empty, during the past year.

The hard-working car horses in New York are kept in good order upon thirteen pounds of hay and seventeen pounds of meal per day.

A contributor of the New York Times asks the people to leave off eating meat for ten days or two weeks, so as to punish speculators in that article.

It is said that Garibaldi naively remarked of the legion of photographers who wished to do the General, "Would it not be possible to give them a séance, so that they might photograph me all at once?"

It is said that the official records of the military authorities show that upward of one hundred and fifty female recruits have been discovered, and made to resume the garments of their sex.

The Weathersfield people are in good spirits because their onion seed, which sold at 42 cents a pound before the war, now sells for $3 or $4.

Mrs. Greenhow appeared in Paris as a representative woman from the Rebel Confederacy. She attracted much attention, and it was said that she had had an audience with the Emperor.

We have got a vessel in the navy—the Pensacola—that can make more headway with sails than with steam. Under steam her speed is from six to eight knots; under sail without steam, twelve knots.

Among the anti-Renan publications we find a pamphlet entitled, L'Ame de Mlle. Henriette Renan a son Frere Ernest, auteur de la 'Vie de Jesus.'

The King of Denmark has set aside 4,000 thalers a year for the next ten years to aid in supporting the widows and children of the fallen Danish soldiers.

A new park for Paris is being opened at the Buttes St Chaumont.

The Richmond Illustrated News announces the name of John Mitchel in the list of contributors, and says that "the style of this distinguished scholar is by turns 'raspingly' critical, passionately enthusiastic, exquisitely droll, and metaphysically profound."

It is said that the young ladies in the upper ranks of French society have of late declined to dance.

PRESENCE OF MIND.

Madame Aubry lives in a solitary chateau not far from the town of ———. The family consisted only of M. Aubry, his wife, a child about a year old, and one maid servant. In the little town every light is out at 10 o'clock, and, of course, the most perfect solitude reigns at that hour in their house, which lies off the road, and is completely hidden by trees. One night last winter Mme. Aubry was sitting alone, reading. Her husband had left her in the morning to visit a friend some six or eight miles off, and, as he expected to bring home a considerable sum of money, he had taken the usual precaution of arming himself with a pair of pistols. About 6 o'clock the lady went up to her room to put her child to bed. Her apartment was a large room on the first floor, filled up on one side by an old-fashioned chimney, and on the other by a deep and spacious alcove, near which stood her infant's cradle.

The night was a gloomy one, cold and dark, and every now and then drops of rain beat against the Gothic windows. The trees in the garden bowed to the wind, and their branches came sweeping against the casement; it was a night in which the solitude of the mansion was more complete and melancholy than usual. Mme. Aubry sat down on a low chair near the fire, which, by its sudden flashes, cast an uncertain light over the vast apartment, throwing its antique carvings and mouldings by turns into brighter relief or deeper shade. She had her child on her lap, and had just finished preparing it for the cradle. She cast her eye towards the alcove to see if the cradle was ready to receive its little occupant, whose eyes were already closed. Just then the fire flashed up brightly, and threw a strong light on the alcove, by which the lady distinguished a pair of feet cased in heavy-nailed shoes peeping out under the curtain in front of the bed.

A thousand thoughts passed through her mind in an instant. The person hidden there was a thief, perhaps an assassin—that was clear enough. She had no protection—no aid at hand. Her husband was not to return till 8 at soonest, and it was now only half-past 6. What was to be done? She did not utter a single cry, nor even start on her seat. The servant girl probably would not have the presence of mind. The robber probably meant to remain quiet where he was until midnight, and then seize the money her husband was to bring with him; but if he should find that he was discovered, and that there was no one in the house but two women, he would not fail to leave his hiding-place and secure their silence by murdering them. Besides, might not the girl be the robber's accomplice. Several slight causes of suspicion entered her mind at once, and all these reflections passed through her mind in less time than we take to write them. She decided at once what she would do, which was to send the girl out of the room.

"You know that dish my husband likes," said she, without betraying her alarm by the least change in the tones of her voice. "I ought to have remembered to have got it ready for his supper. Go down stairs and see about it."

"Does not Madame require my help?" asked the servant.

"No, I will attend to everything myself. I know my husband would be pleased if he was to come home, after his long ride in such very bad weather, and find a good supper ready."

After some further delay, which increased in the lady's mind that suspicion she was forced to conceal, the girl left the room. The noise of her steps on the stairs died away gradually, and Mme. Aubry was left alone, with her child, with those two feet, motionless at their post, still peeping out under the curtain. She kept by the fire, with the child on her lap, continuing to caress it and sing to it, almost mechanically. The child cried; it wanted to be put to bed, but its cradle was near the alcove—near those dreadful feet, how could she find courage to go near them? At last she made a violent effort. "Come, my child," she said, and got up. Hardly able to stand erect, she walked toward the alcove, close to the robber. She put the child in the cradle, singing it to sleep, as usual. We may imagine how much inclination she had to sing. When the child fell asleep she left it, and resumed her seat by the fire. She did not dare to leave the room; it would arouse the suspicions of the robber, and of the girl, probably his accomplice. Besides, she could not bear the thought of leaving her child, even if it was to purchase her own safety.

The clock pointed to 7. An hour yet—a whole hour before her husband would come! Her eyes were fixed on those feet, which threatened her with death at any moment, with a sort of fascination. The deepest silence reigned in the room. The infant slept quietly. We do not know whether even an Amazon, in her place, would have been bold enough to try a struggle with the robber. Madame Aubry had no arms; besides, she made no claims to valor, but only to that passive courage founded on reflection, which is far the rarer of the two. Every few minutes she would hear a noise in the garden. In that noise a ray of hope showed on her face for a moment—it was her husband, it was her deliverance! But no—it was only the wind and rain, or the shutters creaking. What an age every minute seemed to be. Oh, heavens! his feet moved! Does the thief mean to leave his hiding place? No; it was only a slight, probably involuntary, movement, to ease himself by changing his position. The clock strikes—only once, it is the half hour only—and the clock is too fast, besides! How much anguish, how many silent prayers, in the trying minutes! She took up a book of devotion and tried to read, but her eyes would wander from the page to fix on those heavy shoes. All at once a thought arose that chilled her to the heart. Suppose her husband should not come! The weather is stormy, and he has relatives he went to. Perhaps they have persuaded him it was unsafe to travel at night with so large a sum of money about him; perhaps they have forced him, with friendly violence, to yield to their urgent invitations to wait till morning. It is striking 8—and nobody comes. The idea we have alluded to appears to her more probable.

After two hours of such agony, the unhappy lady, whose courage had been kept up by the hope of final rescue, feels her strength and hope fail. Soon she heard a noise under the window, and listens doubtfully. The heavy outer door creaks on its hinges, and shuts with a clamor; a well-known step is heard on the stairs, and a man enters—a tall, stout man. It is he, it is he! At that moment, if he had been the worst of all husbands, he would have been perfection in his wife's eyes. He had only taken off his wet cloak, and put away his pistols, and, delighted at again seeing what he loves most on earth, opens his arms to embrace his wife. She clasps him convulsively, but, in a moment recovering her self-possession, puts her finger on his lips, and points to the two feet that were peeping out under the curtain.

If M. Aubry had been wanting in presence of mind, he would not have deserved to be the husband of such a woman. He made a slight gesture to show he understood her, and said aloud, "Excuse me, my dear, I left the money down stairs. I'll be back in two minutes." Within that time he returned, pistol in hand. He walks to the alcove, looks at the priming, stoops, and with the forefinger of his right hand on the trigger, with the other hand he seizes one of the feet, and cries with a voice of thunder, "Surrender, or you are a dead man!" He drags by the feet into the middle of the room a man of most ill-favored aspect, crouching low to avoid the pistol which is held within an inch of his head. He is searched, and a sharp dagger found on him. He confesses that the girl was his accomplice, and had told him that M. Aubry would bring a large sum home that night. Nothing remains now but to give them over to the authorities. Mme. Anbry asked her husband to pardon them, but the voice of duty is louder than that of pity. When M. Aubry heard from his wife all she had gone through, he could only say, "Who would have thought you courageous!" but in spite of her courage, she was attacked that night with a violent nervous fever, and did not get over her heroism for several days.

MENDELSSOHN AND HANDEL.

If, turning from this more abstract discussion, we endeavor to define the place of Mendelssohn among modern musicians, we shall perhaps not be far wrong in saying, that of the numerous progeny of the school of Sebastian Bach, he is the composer who, with an unmistakable stamp and character of his own, has combined the most eclectic tendencies. Mendelssohn was essentially a learned musician, whose every fibre was first of all soaked through and through with Bach, the object of his fervent adoration, and he was never weary, moreover, of ransacking the musical libraries of Europe, hunting up old manuscripts with the zeal of an antiquarian, and going into ecstacies of delight if a sympathetic friend introduced him to some new parchment of some forgotten composer. Yet it would be impossible to accuse him of plagiarism, for every bar of his music is as unmistakably marked with his own seal as if the same or a similar combination had never occurred to any other writer. No man was less likely to fall into the absurd cant of what is called the "music of the future." His whole temper was alien to the very idea. But it is easy to see how strongly he was influenced by the modern spirit, and how the vague and dreamy element, the restless and troubled spirit arising out of the rush and turmoil of modern life, worked upon his naturally ardent mind, and everywhere peeped out of his music, even through the classical and scientific forms with which his studies had supplied him. If we were asked in one word to define the pervading characteristic of Mendelssohn's music, we should say, "movement." And by movement we do not, of course, mean rapidity of execution—although many of his allegros are remarkable for their headlong impetuosity, as it were, their tumultuous rush; (as of cataracts in motion); and although many friendly critics objected to the tremendous pace at which he always took his own music—but, as it seems to us, even in his slow movements there is always a suggestive, prospective, and anticipatory effect, as if arising out of a sigh of expectation for something longed for and looked forward to. And, in this, he differs in a very marked degree from the older classical composers, who seem, in working out a theme, to be dwelling emphatically upon something in the past, building up everlasting temples of silvery sound to forgone and blessed memories, rather than hastening towards something ever beyond. Hence, too, and branching out of the same characteristic, arises, we think, Mendelssohn's great success in scherzos and fairy music of all sorts—which are, in fact, the very poetry of motion and unrest. Handel, when he painted the motion of the crowd, painted it, like a great historical painter, as in the past. We see the beginning and the end. The frame of the picture is laid, and the details worked out; but there is not the vestige of a yearning on the part of the composer towards a something beyond him, towards which he is unconsciously striving. In Handel's music, the song of the singers and the shout of the crowds, however tender and sublime, or august and magnificent, are things of the past; it is, according to Handel, how they sang and shouted, if they sang and shouted at all; it is not Handel's own yearning in other men's months. But in all that Mendelssohn wrote, we do not know a bar which does not seem to be the intimate expression of the composer's own aspirations. And as he was a great master of classical, that is to say, abiding forms, it is this embodiment of the strictly modern anxious spirit, in a permanent mould, which to our minds constitutes the great charm of his music. There is also a peculiarity and richness of color in his compositions, due to his studied instrumentation, which many critics have thought, especially in his younger days, excessive. This he toned down as he grew older; but in all stages, it was as distinctively Mendelssohnian—always remembering the common fountain-head from which he, no less than Beethoven, Mozart, and Schumann, drew his materials—as Thackeray's etchings were peculiar to Thackeray.—National Review.

In the Royal Library of Paris is a written contract, drawn up in 1297, between two persons of noble birth in Armagnac. The document bound the husband and wife to faithful wedlock for seven years. It stipulated that the parties should have the right to renew the tie at the end of that time if they mutually agreed; but if not, the children were to be equally divided; and if the number should chance not to be even, they were to draw lots for the odd one.

Cock-fighting was practiced by the Greeks. Themistocles, when leading his troops against the Persians, saw two cocks fighting, and roused the courage of his soldiers by pointing out the obstinacy with which these fowls contended, though they never fought for their country, their families, nor their liberty. The Persians were defeated; and the Athenians, in memory of the victory and the incident, ordered annual cock-fighting, in the presence of the whole people.

LITTLE JESTS.

"Is the sense of smelling more pleasiag than the sense of tasting?" was the subject up before a debating club. Skilton was the last to speak upon the negative, and all were anxious to bear him, when, ringing the bell, he ordered up a glass of hot whisky punch, and drank it off with great gusto. Theu, turning to his opponents, he hnnded the empty glass to the leading disputant, and thundered out: "Now, sir, smell it!" It is needless to add that Skilton "brought down the bonse," and carried the decision for the negative.

"What is the difference," asked a bishop of a young clergyman he was examining, "between a form and a ceremony? The meaning seems nearly the same; yet there is a very nice distinction." Various answers were given. "Well," he said, "it lies in this: You sit upon a form, but yon stand on ceremony."

A man hearing of another who was a bundred years old, said contemptuously: "Pshaw! what a fuss about nothing! Why, if my grandfather was alive he would now be a huudred aud fifty years old."

"Mr. Brown, why do you wear that shocking bad wide-awake?" inquired a neighbor. "Because, my dear sir," said he, "Mrs. Brown vows that she will not go out of the house with me till I get a decent hat."

The industrious old lady who walked all over town with a can in her hand to procure a quart of the "milk of human kindness," has been more successful in gettiug a little jam out of the door. She got the jam on her fingers.

Thackeray being told that an acquaintance of his, who was notorious for his love of beer, had sailed for India, replied: "He was a good fellow. Take him for half-and-half, we shall not look upon his like again!"

The last case of indolence is that of a man named John Hole, who was so lazy that in writing his name he simply used the letter "J," and theu punched a hole through the paper.

An Iowa editor acknowledges the receipt of Congressional documents "in advance of the mail," in consequence of a flock of wolves and bears chasing the rider across the prairies.

A grave friend of ours tells us that he and his wife always go to bed quarrelling. "And yet," said he, "with all our differences, we never fall out."

A magnetic mountain has been discovered in Swedish-Lapland. It is creating a great sensation, and, as may be expected, is drawing immensely.

The best adhesive label you can put on luggage is to stick to it yourself.

What is the difference between a sailor and a soldier. One tars his ropes, the other pitches his tent.

"Let me collect myself," as the man said when he was blown up by a powder mill.

Why should a thirsty man always carry a watch? Because there's a spring inside of it,

An offender fined a second time is not necessarily refined.

Men don't like wives of buy-ways and cross-ways.

"THE CALIFORNIAN."

WHAT THE PRESS SAYS OF IT.

The following are the notices which appear in our city cotemporaries:

THE CALIFORNIAN.—The fourth number of this journal has made its appearance, and the character of the paper is established. But it is a character peculiar to itself. It is very different from any other paper. Unlike other quarto journals of its size, it would rather be entertaining than altogether original, but its selections are made with rare judgment. Here is gossip for newsmongers; there ghost stories for spiritualists and lovers of the marvellous; and again, an article that shows how our neighbors live, or how the nation is governed. But the original part of the CALIFORNIAN is the best. The novelette is probably good—as good as other novelettes. The political leaders are solid. The fashion articles are entertaining. But the wit is the spice of the paper. Webb can make fun without buffoonery or bad spelling, and apparently without effort and without end. He may not be equal to Holmes or Saxe in verse, but in prose we scarcely know where to find his equal. It is not necessary to mention the names of those who have become famous by abusing our language, but they all have been or will be forgotten. Webb, we imagine, is capable of "things" that will live. His paper is now, next to Punch, the wittiest publication known to us. The CALIFORNIAN is certainly a credit to the editor and to the State.—Alta, June 19th.

THE CALIFORNIAN.—The fourth number of this very excellent weekly journal appeared yesterday. What we said of the first number applies with equal truth to its successors. It is a paper of a manly and a gentlemanly tone, fit to be read anywhere, in one's office or parlor, and no publication among us is better suited for perusal to-day. The present number has several good papers—such as Mary Stuart and Chastelar, Things, etc.—Call, June 19th.

THE CALIFORNIAN.—We have carefully looked over the first number of this literary weekly, and can say unqualifiedly that we like it. To make use of a trite comparison, newspapers, like individuals, have a certain character, apparent in a degree at first sight, and becoming more positive in proportion as acquaintance increases. The CALIFORNIAN impresses us as would a refined, well-bred man of the world. The style is that of charming repose, easy address and delicacy of perception. There are many original thoughts scattered throughout its columns; but the chief merit of the paper lies not so much in this as in the thoroughly graceful manner in which they are conveyed to the reader. If a really creditable weekly journal has been, as some suppose, a want in this community, there can be no reason to doubt that by the CALIFORNIAN it is supplied. If its success be equal to its deserving, the projector will soon find himself floating on the tide spoken of by Shakspeare; a tide which, alas! but rarely makes for journalists. Daily Morning Call, May 29th.

THE CALIFORNIAN.—The first number of a literary paper (weekly), bearing this title, has been received from the Sacramento agent, C. A. Carolan. In size and general appearance it resembles the New York Round Table. The contents of this number, original and selected, establish the presence of editorial taste and the command of intellectual resources to insure a literary success, at least. To render the CALIFORNIAN acceptable to the State at large, however, San Francisco, the locality of its publication, should not occupy too much space in its columns. C. H. Webb, a gentleman of considerable journalistic experience, and a facile, lively, piquant writer, is responsible for the advent of this publication.—Sacramento Daily Union, May 30th.

THE CALIFORNIAN.—This new literary weekly presents itself to the public with the modest but easy air and address of a well-bred gentleman making his entrée into a drawing-room. Since the decease of the short-lived California Home Journal, which was a compromise between a belles lettres publication and the common type of American "literary" journals, we bave had no weekly on this coast that exhibited any of the higher features that characterize such papers as the London Spectator, Saturday Review, etc., or the New York Round Table, which is modelled upon them. The new paper furnishes evidence, in every department, of precisely the kind of ability required in such an enterprise. Its typographical appearance is excellent, with the exception of the "head," which is not in keeping, and strikes us as being more appropriate for a sporting than a literary journal. The first two numbers contain several graceful and lively articles on the lighter topics of the fashions and the minor conventionalities, which evidently emanate from some accomplished female pen.—News Letter, June 11th.

THE CALIFORNIAN.—The first number of a new weekly bearing the above sententious title was laid upon our desk last Saturday. Its editor and proprietor is C. H. Webb, the "Inigo" of the Golden Era, and the late local editor of one of our permanent dailies. We have read its contents with considerable pleasure, for its originality and versatility are alike commendable. It will supply a void in literary circles, which has long been felt in the community, and should its existence be prolonged, unlike many of its predecessors, we shall look for a healthier tone to home-made literary merit. It has our best wishes for its success.—Police Gazette.

THE NEW WEEKLY REVIEW.—The weekly journal we have already announced made its appearance yesterday. The CALIFORNIAN (such is its title) contains an immense quantity of matter, selected with an exquisite taste, worthy of the distinguished literary man who has conceived this work, Mr. C. H. Webb.

This compilation will be sought after by those of our compatriots who wish to become familiar with English literature, and read at the same time writings varied, instructive, amusing and always worthy of attention.

The modesty of the editor equals his merit, and in order to give a proof of this we translate the lines in which he presents this journal to the public:

"This is the first number of the CALIFORNIAN. Little has been said about it through advertisements, no prospectus has been published, not from motives of economy, but simply because the proprietor thought that the best advertisement and prospectus of a paper that can be published is the paper itself. Such we now offer."

We wish the CALIFORNIAN every success. It is published in sixteen pages, printed in three wide columns. The price is 50 cents a month, and $5 a year. The office is No. 728 Montgomery street, San Francisco.—Echo du Paeifique.

THE CALIFORNIAN.—A new candidate for public favor, in the shape of a Saturday literary sheet, made its appearance yesterday under the above title. It is a handsomely printed paper of sixteen pages, and the issue before us gives an earnest of the capacity of Mr. C. H. Webb to conduct such a journal with credit to himself and the literary progress of California. It will be found a welcome visitor in every house, and we wish it success. It is readable and interesting, and cannot fail making friends.—Daily Alta, May 29th.

THE CALIFORNIAN.—The first number of Mr. Charles H. Webb's new paper—the CALIFORNIAN—has been received. It contains sixteen pages, and forty-eight columns of reading matter. Its general appearance is similar to the New Nation and the Round Table; which means that the mechanical department is unsurpassed in elegance and neatness. Mr. Webb is very modest in his salutatory—only occupying five lines and a half, to tell the public about the CALIFORNIAN. He thinks, and very correctly too, that "the best advertisement and prospectus of a paper that can be published is the paper itself." We doubt not that the CALIFORNIAN will be liberally supported—it is certainly worthy of it in every respect. We bid it all hail and welcome.—Daily Democratic Press, May 30th.

CALIFORNIA literature has been enriched by a new weekly paper, the CALIFORNIAN, published under the direction of Mr. C. H. Webb, who has already known how to make his capacities as a distinguished writer appreciated. This new organ is consecrated to the propagation of literature and scientific works, and merits a kind reception.—Franco-American Union, June 1st

THE CALIFORNIAN.—We have been favored with a copy of the CALIFORNIAN, a new literary paper, which will make its first appearance to-day. The columns, in measure and style, are similar to those of the Round Table, published in New York, and its typographical face is very pleasing. Mr. Charles H. Webb, a gentleman of acknowledged literary attainments, and at one time one of the editors of the Bulletin, is its editor and proprietor. Mr. Webb's articles in the Golden Era, over the signature of "Inigo," were a great addition to that journal, and were eagerly sought for and read. We notice that "Inigo" is one of the features of the new publication. That the new issue will be a meritorious one there cannot be a doubt, and we wish Mr. Webb every success in his enterprise.—Spirit of the Times, May 28th.

THE CALIFORNIAN.—This new Saturday newspaper, owned and edited by Mr. C. H. Webb, who has become well known to the public under the nom de plume of "Inigo," made its first forward step on the threshold of existence yesterday. It contains sixteen pages of matter, and promises to be conducted with ability. We are sincere in wishing the proprietor all sorts and sizes of good luck.—Sunday Mercury, May 29th.

THE first number of the CALIFORNIAN, a weekly paper, was published in this city last Saturday. Mr. C. H. Webb, recently one of the editors of the Evening Bulletin, is editor and proprietor. The CALIFORNIAN contains sixteen pages, is conducted with marked ability, grace and dignity, and presents a remarkably handsome appearance. It promises to become one of the best literary journals published in the country.—Monitor, June 4th

THE CALIFORNIAN, a new literary journal, C. H. Webb, editor and proprietor, made its first appearance Saturday morning, May 28th. Mr. Webb is widely known as the writer of "Things," in the Golden Era. He has also been connected editorially with the Bulletin. His paper (16 pages) presents an elegant and attractive appearance.—Golden Era, May 29th.

And the following we clip from the exchanges which have reached us:

THE CALIFORNIAN.—We have received the second number of the new hebdomadal literary sheet recently started in San Francisco by C. H. Webb, under the above title. This new enterprise seems to be receiving golden opinions from the press in all parts of the State, and from the specimen before us we are satisfied they are well deserved. The high literary reputation of its publisher, the taste and judgment displayed in its selections, and its neat typographical execution, give assurance that our new cotemporary is destined to fill a high place in the ranks of journalism on the Pacific coast.—Sonoma County Democrat.

THE CALIFORNIAN is the title of a large and neatly printed weekly literary paper that has made its appearance in San Francisco. It is edited by Mr. C. H. Webb, a graceful writer and experienced journalist. Some person with more taste in literature than honesty "nipped" the first number from our table before we had examined it; the second number, however, is before us, and we find it filled with reading matter, orginal and selected, of the highest order. We shall hereafter treat our readers to some of the articles of our new cotemporary, and feel assured that they will indorse our judgment as to their merit.—Mountain Messenger, June 11th.

THE CALIFORNIAN.—This is the title of a new weekly literary journal which has just made its appearance in San Francisco, the first number of which has found a place on our table. It is got up in very fine style, and edited by C. H. Webb, a gentleman of considerable newspaper experience. From what we have seen of its contents, we believe the CALIFORNIAN will be a welcome visitor to the family fireside. Its editorials appear to be of a high-toned, liberal and finished order, while the selections are of such a character as should have a place in a respectable literary journal. It is not of the wishy-washy, sentimental, sickly order of publications, but one which we hope Californians will be proud to recognize as one of the productions of our coast.—Marysville Express, June 1st.

THE CALIFORNIAN.—The first number of this new literary weekly is on our table. It presents a beautiful typographical appearance, and we may safely say is the neatest printed paper in California. C. H. Webb, who has gained a local literary reputation under the nom de plume of "Inigo," is its editor. The CALIFORNIAN promises to be a popular and successful publication, and we add our quota of recommendation most cheerfully to this end.—Marysville Appeal, June 1st.

THE CALIFORNIAN.—This new weekly paper, published in San Francisco by Charles H. Webb, has been handed us for perusal. It is a literary paper of the highest order of merit, and deserves success. It contains, among other things, a highly humorous rhyme—The Ballad of the Emeu. Charles A. Carolan is agent for this city.—Sacramento Evening Star, May 30th.

THE CALIFORNIAN.—This is the title of the new literary hebdomedal which made its appearance in San Francisco last Saturday. It is edited by C. H. Webb, formerly of the Bulletin, a gentleman of rare scholarly attainments and ripe judgment in conducting a newspaper. The journal is beautifully gotten up after the English style of literary papers, and is by far the handsomest journal of its character on the Pacific coast. The people of California are in need of just such a paper as the CALIFORNIAN appears to be, and if the publisher will send us his journal in exchange for ours we will wish him the success he merits.—Napa County Reporter, June 4th.

THE CALIFORNIAN.—This new weekly candidate for literary honors and public patronage made its best bow on the perilous stage of newspaperdom last Saturday. It is published by Mr. C. H. Webb, late local editor of the Bulletin. Its general appearance is good, and its sixteen pages are prolific with amusing reading matter. Long may it keep its head above water.—Daily Despatch, May 30th.

We have received from Bradshaw the first number of THE CALIFORNIAN, a literary weekly published by C. H. Webb, the "Inigo" of the Golden Era. It is neat and plain in typography, and gives evidence of the best of editorial talent.—Placerville Weekly News.

THE CALIFORNIAN is the name of a new weekly literary paper which is to make its début in San Francisco to-day. C. H. Webb is editor and proprietor. Mr. Webb is a gentleman of education, fine fancy, and sound common sense. If he has the tact to manage the business affairs of his journal properly, it is sure to succeed, for in other respects he will have no rival.—Stockton Independent, June 3d.

THE CALIFORNIAN.—This is the name of a new literary paper in San Francisco, published by C. H. Webb, a literary gentleman of considerable ability. It is the best looking paper ever printed in the State, and well filled with good reading matter. Carolan is the agent for this city.—Saeramento Daily Bee, May 30th.

PACIFIC INSURANCE COMPANY

436 CALIFORNIA STREET,

SAN FRANCISCO.

Insure against loss or damage by fire, on Buildings, Merchaudise, Wares, and other Personal Property.

CAPITAL STOCK - - - - - - - - $750,000

The largest sum at present to be taken on any one risk is $30,000. All Losses payable in United States Gold Coin. The Personal Liability of Stockholders, under the Law of this State, recognized.

The following List of Directors is a sufficient guarantee of the stability and responsility of the Company:

Louis McLean,	Lloyd Tevis,
W. C. Ralston,	H. F. Teschemacher,
Frederick Billings,	Geo. H Howard,
H. Carlton, Jr.,	A.B. Forbes,
Wm. M. Lent,	A. L. Tubbs,
J. G. Kittle,	Jonathan Hunt,
J. B. Thomas,	J. B. Newtou,
J. G. Bray,	John O. Earl,
Asa T. Lawton,	S. J. Hensley,
J. Whitney, Jr.,	John Wightman,
Edward Martin,	L. Sachs,
L. B. Benchly,	Jas. D. Fremery,
A. Seligman,	J. G. Kellogg,
Wm. Sherman,	G. W. Beaver,
Wm. Alvord,	Elie Lazard,
Charles Mayne,	William Sharon,
Erwin Davis,	Adam Grant,
P. L. Weaver,	Alpheus Bull,
Samuel C. Bigelow,	A G. Stiles,
Herman Michels,	M. P. Jones,
H. L. Dodge,	D. Stern,
H. L. Goldstein,	S. M. Wilson,
H. Haussmann,	D. J. Oliver,
Mortou Cheesman,	Jabez Howes,
H. M. Newhall,	F. W. Brooks,
W. Norris,	I. Lobman,
Edgar Mills, Sacramento.	Sacramento.
C. T. Wheeler, Sacramento.	T. R. Anthony, Stockton.
J. H Jewett, Marysville.	D. W. C. Rice, Marysville.
J. C. Ainsworth, Portland (O.)	W. S. Ladd, Portland (O.)

J. HUNT, President.

A. J. RALSTON, Secretary. my28

THE CALIFORNIAN.

A PAPER FOR THE TIMES.

Devoted to Live Topics,

AND THE

BEST INTERESTS OF CALIFORNIA.

Is published

EVERY SATURDAY MORNING,

AT

728 MONTGOMERY STREET.

Nothing will be spared that will enable THE CALIFORNIAN to appeal to the Public for support, not only as the

BEST JOURNAL ON THE PACIFIC COAST,

But also as being

THE EQUAL OF ANY ON THIS CONTINENT!

Imperial paper, of a quality and weight never before brought to this market, is ordered from the East

EXPRESSLY FOR THE CALIFORNIAN,

And will arrive here as soon as it can be brought by Isthmus transportation.

THE BEST TALENT OF THE STATE

Is employed upon the CALIFORNIAN, and arrangements have been made with contributors abroad for

EASTERN AND FOREIGN CORRESPONDENCE.

THE TERMS OF THE CALIFORNIAN are $5 per year by mail to subscribers, invariably in advance; 50 cents per month served by carriers.

All communications and correspondence must be addressed to

C. H. WEBB,
Editor and Proprietor CALIFORNIAN,
728 Montgomery street.

UNION STATE AND CONGRESSIONAL DISTRICT CONVENTIONS.

THERE WILL BE HELD AT SACRAMENTO, on the 30th day of August, A. D. 1864, a Union State Convention, for the purpose of nominating Presidential Electors to be supported by the Union Party at the ensuing Presidential Election, to appoint a State Central Committee, and for the transaction of such other business as may properly come before it.

There will be held also at Sacramento, immediately after the adjournment of the State Convention, Congressional District Conventions for the First, Second and Third Congressional Districts, for the purpose of nominating Candidates for Congress for their respective Districts, and to appoint District Committees.

Each county will elect delegates in pursuance of notice of its Union County Committee, according to the following apportionment:

Alameda	8	Plumas	8
Amador	13	Sacramento	21
Alpine	6	San Bernardino	3
Butte	11	San Diego	2
Calaveras	13	San Francisco	52
Colusa	3	San Joaquin	12
Contra Costa	6	San Luis Obispo	2
Coso	5	San Mateo	5
Del Norte	2	Santa Barbara	3
El Dorado	19	Santa Clara	11
Fresno	1	Santa Cruz	6
Humboldt	4	Shasta	6
Klumath	3	Sierra	13
Lake	2	Siskiyou	7
Lassen	3	Solano	9
Los Angeles	5	Stanislaus	3
Marin	4	Sutter	5
Mariposa	6	Sonoma	10
Mendocino	4	Tehama	4
Merced	1	Trinity	6
Mono	6	Tulare	4
Monterey	4	Tuolumne	12
Napa	6	Yolo	5
Nevada	16	Yuba	11
Placer	13

In any County where the Union County Committee shall not order an Election of Delegates specially for its Congressional District Convention, or where Delegates from such District may not have been elected pursuant to notice of such County Committee, then the Delegates from such County to the State Convention shall be Delegates to the District Congressional Convention for the District in which such County may be; and when such District Conventions shall have met in Sacramento as aforesaid, each Convention will determine when and where the Convention will make its Congressional nomination. All citizens who are in favor of a vigorous prosecution of the war to the final success of the Federal Government—who endorse the platform of the Union National Convention, and who will pledge themselves to support the National, State and Congressional Nominees of the Union Party will be entitled to vote for such Delegates.

It is recommended that no Delegate be elected, unless he be a legal resident of the county whence he is chosen, and that no proxies be given by Delegates to any except citizens of the county which they shall be elected to represent.

NATHANIEL HOLLAND,
Chairman Union State Central Committee.

J. T. HOYT, Secretary. ju25

CALISTOGA SPRINGS,

NAPA VALLEY,

The great wntering place he Pacific, not excelled in Europe or America.

BATHS OF EVERY DESCRIPTION,

GRAND HOT MINERAL SWIMMING BATH,

STEAM BATH,

From the Naturnl Springs—a sure cure for tho Rheumatism, Gout, Sore Eyes, and pulmonary Complaints, being impregnated witb Sulphur, Iron and Magnesia.

CELEBRATED HOT MUD BATH,

The same as used by the Romans in Italy two thousand years ago.

An elegant TROTTING PARK, one mile in length.

The best TROUT FISHING and SHOOTING within one mile.

Seven hours from San Francisco, by Steamboat and Stage, four hours by boat and three hours by stage—starting at 9 o'clock every morning. Fare by steamer and stage, five dollars.

Thirty miles from the Geysers stages running every day.

Telegraph line connecting with a parts of the State.

 No finer public accommodations on the continent.

jul1-1m F. B. GILMORE, Landlord.

REOPENED FOR THE SEASON.

THE CRYSTAL SPRINGS HOTEL,

Situated four miles from the San Mateo Railroad depot, in a most splendid valley, surrounded with large, beautiful, natural trees, is now open for the public. The road from San Mateo to the house has been recently macadamized, making it the finest drive in California. The House and Cottages have been refitted and thoroughly renovated. New spring beds and every modern improvement have been added to the sleeping department. The larder, as usual, contains all the delicacies of the season. Stages leave San Mateo depot on the arrival of the trains for Crystal Springs.

A fine stable is now opened at San Mateo by Messrs. Byrnes & Ames, who will furnish horses and carriages, or saddle horses, at low rates, to the public. Parties wishing rooms or meals, on arrival, can engage them by telegraph, via San Mateo.

jul1-tf TONY OAKES, Proprietor.

NOTICE.

THE Copartnership in the Banking business heretofore existing between Eugene Kelly of the city of New York, and Joseph A. Donohoe, Wm. C. Ralston and Ralph S. Fretz of San Francisco, under the firm name of EUGENE KELLY & CO., New York, and DONOHOE, RALSTON & CO., San Francisco, will cease on the first (1st) day of July, 1864—Eugene Kelly and J. A. Donohoe withdrawing from the copartnership.

The business will be settled in New York by Eugene Kelly, and in San Francisco by Wm. C. Ralston and R. S. Fretz.

Depositors are requested to hand in their books for settlement at the banking-house of Donohoe, Ralston & Co.

EUGENE KELLY,
(Per J. A. Donohoe, Attorney.
J. A. DONOHOE,
W. C. RALSTON,
R. S. FRETZ.

San Francisco, June 13, 1864.

THE Undersigned have formed a copartnership for the transaction of a general Banking and Exchange business, under the firm names of DONOHOE, KELLY & CO., in San Francisco, and EUGENE KELLY & CO., in New York, commencing July 1, 1864. Their Banking House in this city will be at the southeast coaner of Montgomery and Sacramento streets.

EUGENE KELLY.
JOSEPH A. DONOHOE.

San Francisco, June 15, 1864. jul8

NOTICE.

THE Copartnership in the Banking business heretofore existing between Eugene Kelly of the city of New York, and Joseph A. Donohoe, Wm. C. Ralston and Ralph S. Fretz, of San Francisco, under the firm name of EUGENE KELLY & CO., New York, and DONOHOE, RALSTON & CO., San Francisco, will cease on the first day of July, 1864, Eugene Kelly and Joseph A. Donohoe withdrawing from the copartnership.

The business will be settled in New York by Eugene Kelly, and in San Francisco by Wm. C. Ralston and R. S. Fretz.

Depositors are requested to hand in their books for settlement at the Banking House of Donohoe Ralston & Co.

EUGENE KELLY,
(Per J. A. Donohoe, Attorney.)
JOSEPH A. DONOHOE,
WM. C. RALSTON,
R. S. FRETZ.

San Francisco, June 13, 1864.

THE Undersigned, calling attention to the above card, give notice that on and after the first day of July next, they will continue the business of the above copartnership without interruption, at the old banking-house of Donohoe, Ralston & Co., in this city under the firm name of FRETZ & RALSTON, and in New York, through the agency of Messrs. LEES & WALLER, No 33 Pine street: and that on and after the 5th of July next, they together with Messrs. D. O. Mills, J. B. Thomas, Louis McLane, Asa T. Lawton, Wm. E. Barron, Thomas Bell, Jno. O. Earl, Wm. Norris, J. Whitney, Jr., O. F. Giffin, A. J. Pope, Herman Michels, Frederick Billings, Geo. H. Howard, H. F. Teschemacher, A. Hayward, Moses Ellis, A. B. McCreery, R. M. Jessup, Samuel Knight, A. C. Henry, J. C. Wilmerding and Wm. Alvord of San Francisco, and Jacob Kamm, of Portland, Oregon, having become duly incorporated under the laws of this State, will carry on the business of Banking in all its various branches, at the same place and through the same agency, and upon the basis of a Gold and Silver Currency, under the name of

THE BANK OF CALIFORNIA.

D. O. MILLS and WM. C. RALSTON will be charged with the management of the business of the Corporation.

WM. C. RALSTON,
R. S. FRETZ.

San Francisco, June 15, 1864.

LOCKE & MONTAGUE,

IMPORTERS OF

STOVES AND METALS,

Nos. 112 and 114 Battery street,

jy2 SAN FRANCISCO.

JOSEPH A. DONOHOE, San Francisco. | EUGENE KELLY, New York.

DONOHOE, KELLY & CO.,

SAN FRANCISCO.

EUGENE KELLY & CO.,

NEW YORK.

Bankers.

EXCHANGE ON

NEW YORK,
BANK OF LONDON, - - - - - London.
BANK OF IRELAND.

jy2

McRUER & MERRILL,

WHOLESALE AUCTION HOUSE,

204 and 206 California street.

Regular Sale Days - - - WEDNESDAYS and SATURDAYS
(Advances on Consignments.)

NOTICE!

From this date Mr. A. P. EVERETT has an interest in our business. McRUER & MERRILL.

San Francisco, October 20, 1862.

A. P. EVERETT, - - - - - - - - - Auctioneer.

jul1-3m

R. G. SNEATH,

408 FRONT STREET, SAN FRANCISCO,

Importer and Wholesale Dealer in

GROCERIES, PROVISIONS, FLOUR, RICE

TOBACCOS, LIQUORS, ETC.

Branch House, - - SNEATH & BOARMAN, - - Red Bluff.

Forwarding Agent, D. W. EARL, Sacramento, who will receive and fill orders for all kinds of Goods on my account, and keep a large stock of Flour, Barley, Potatoes, Ground Feed, etc., etc. No charge for forwarding.

ALMADEN QUICKSILVER!

Orders for Goods not in my line furnished customers without extra charge. Orders for Goods in the Eastern markets attended to promptly. Daily Prices Current furnished when desired.

Orders respectfully solicited. jul1-1m

DINNER SETS.—We have just received,

ex Giscours, several extremely fine

FRENCH CHINA DINNER SETS,

WITH TEA SET, COMPLETE.

A SUPERIOR ARTICLE to anything ever offered in this market.

Connoisseurs will find great pleasure in examining our stock of VERY RARE CHINA, and

ELEGANT GLASS SETS,

FRENCH BRONZE STATUARY,

Comprising some very fine pieces.

PARIAN STATUARY, ELEGANT VASES, ETC., ETC.

HAYNES & LAWTON,

516 and 518 Sansome street, corner Merchant,

my28 San Francisco.

GREGORY YALE,

ATTORNEY AT LAW,

OFFICE—On second floor of Sather & Co.'s Bank, corner of Montgomery and Commercial streets, Nos. 2, 3 and 4, San Francisco. jy2

DEETKEN & CO'S

METALLURGICAL WORKS,

WE respectfully inform the Mining community in general, that having completed our

NEW SMELTING FURNACES,

We are now ready to SMELT EVERY KIND OF SILVER AND GOLD ORES.

Parties unable to get satisfactory results by amalgamation, will find it to their interest to have their ores smelted at our works.

LARGE CONTRACTS ACCEPTED AT LOW RATES, AND RESULTS GUARANTEED.

Facilities on hand to work all and every kind of Gold and Silver-bearing Ores, as well as it can be done in Europe.

AMALGAMATION AND CHLORATION carried on, on Silver and Gold Ores, as heretofore.

BEETKEN & CO.'S METALLURGICAL WORKS,
Office—315 Montgomery street.
WORKS—San Bruno Road. jy2

OCCIDENTAL HOTEL—Corner Montgomery and Bush streets, San Francisco.

This House possesses all the requirements of a FIRST CLASS HOTEL, its spacious READING ROOM, with large MINERAL CABINET and extensive COLLECTION OF SPECIMENS from the different Mining Regions of the Pacific Coast—BRANCH TELEGRAPH OFFICE connecting with Lines throughout the country—and NEWS STAND—all contributing to make it the Headquarters and Home for the Californian business man and tourist.

The TABLE of this House shall not be excelled by any.

BOARD, THREE DOLLARS PER DAY.

LEWIS LELAND & CO.,
my28 Proprietors.

CONTINENTAL HOTEL,

SAN JOSE.

GEORGE T. BROMLEY.....Proprietor.

As a desirable place of resort for health or recreation, the above Hotel is not surpassed in the State.

Excellent accommodations for families, by the day, week, or month, on reasonable terms.

jun25

R. H. McDONALD & CO.,

R. H. McDONALD.) (J. C. SPENCER.

IMPORTING

Wholesale Druggists,

Corner of Sansome and Pine streets,

SAN FRANCISCO,

—AND—

J STREET, SACRAMENTO.

We respectfully beg leave to inform our customers and the public generally that we have opened a House in the city of San Francisco, where we will be pleased to see as many of our old friends and customers as can make it convenient to call upon us. We shall keep at both places a large and well selected stock of

DRUGS AND MEDICINES, SURGICAL INSTRUMENTS,

Dental Goods, Fancy Articles, Brushes and Combs,

SHOULDER AND BODY BRACES,

Ladies' Bandages and Supporters,

GUM ELASTIC STOCKINGS, TRUSSES,

Paints and Oils,

PATENT MEDICINES, HERBS AND EXTRACTS,

Brewers' and Soda Stocks,

CORKS (LARGE VARIETY), ASSAYERS' MATERIAL,

Burning Oils and Fluids,

Together with a large and complete assortment of all goods kept in a well supplied Wholesale Drug Store,

We respectfully solicit those dealing in our line to examine and price our stock before purchasing elsewhere.

R. H. McDONALD & CO.,
Sacramento and San Francisco.

R. H. McDONALD & CO.,

IMPORTING DRUGGISTS,

J STREET, SACRAMENTO,

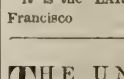
AND

CORNER OF PINE AND SANSOME STREETS,

SAN FRANCISCO, CALIFORNIA.

IMPORTERS OF

DENTAL AND SURGICAL INSTRUMENTS,



TEETH, GOLD FOIL.

VULCANITE MATERIAL.

Vulcanizers, Vulcanite Base, and Impression Gutta Percha. A large variety of VULCANITE MATERIAL, Scrapers and Packers; together with a large and complete assortment of all articles of the latest and most approved styles of Vulcanite work.

DENTAL BOOKS.

We keep constantly on hand a supply of all the most approved Standard Works on DENTISTRY. Our efforts will be to keep a large and well selected stock of all Dental Material, where the Dental Profession may confidently rely upon having their orders filled in the best possible manner.

R. H. McDONALD & CO.,
Sacramento, 139 J street,
my28 San Francisco, cor. Pine and Sansome sts.

JONES, WOOLL & SUTHERLAND,

Manufacturers for the Trade

OF

SQUARE, OVAL AND ARCH-TOP MIRRORS, WINDOW CORNICES, AND PIER TABLES,

Of any Size or Pattern.

PORTRAIT AND PICTURE FRAMES

Of all Styles.

IMPORTERS OF

Fine Engravings and Artists' Materials.

312 MONTGOMERY STREET.

FACTORY—Market street, between Seventh and Eighth opposite Yerba Buena Park. my28

J. R. MEAD & CO.,

HAVE OPENED WITH

AN ENTIRE NEW STOCK

OF

FINE CLOTHING!

AND

GENTS' FURNISHING GOODS.

Corner of Montgomery and Bush streets, San Francisco. my28

REMOVAL.

HASKELL & CO.,

CANTON TEA STORE. | ESTABLISHED IN 1858.

Wholesale and Retail Dealers in

JAPAN AND CHINA TEAS, AND GROCERIES,

515 Market street,

And 15 Sutter street, three doors below Metropolitan Market, between Montgomery and Sansome streets.

It is the LARGEST STORE OF THE KIND in San Francisco my28

THE UNIVERSAL CLOTHES WRINGER!

WITH COG WHEELS.

BUY NO OTHER!

This Wringer is warranted in every particular. It was pronounced superior to all others at the World's Fair at London, in 1862, and has always taken the First Premium at every State and County Fair, when exhibited in competition with other machines.

No other Wringer has the cog-wheel, without which the rubber on the rolls will get torn, and the strain on the cloth is such as to wear it out.

A liberal discount made to dealers.

WM. FAULKNER & SONS, Agents,
je4 411 Clay street, San Francisco

FORTY-FOUR FIRST PREMIUMS

IN 1863!

THERE IS BUT ONE

FIRST

PREMIUM SEWING MACHINE.

The GROVER & BAKER SEWING MACHINE has been awarded Twenty-three First Premiums at State Fairs, and Twenty-one at City and County Fairs, in 1863, making Forty-four in all.

R. G. BROWN, Agent.
my28 329 Montgomery Street.

STERETT'S
STEAM
PRINTING HOUSE,
533
CLAY STREET.

W. P. HARRISON & CO.,

PRINTERS,

ENGRAVERS AND ELECTROTYPERS,

PRINTERS' WAREHOUSE,

417 Clay Street. my28

COMMERCIAL STEAM PRINTING HOUSE.

FRANCIS, VALENTINE & CO.,

517 CLAY and 514 COMMERCIAL STREETS.

Every description of BOOK, JOB and POSTER PRINTING done in the best style and at the lowest rates.

BOOK-BINDING and RULING done to order.

WONDERFUL TRIUMPH

IN AMERICAN DENTISTRY.

DR. BEERS & CO.,

617 Clay street,

ARE NOW MANUFACTURING THE NEW style of ARTIFICIAL TEETH so highly approved at the East, and which to be appreciated only requires to be seen. The Teeth, Gums and Plate are made of one entire piece of Porcelain without seam or joint, combining great strength and beauty with absolute purity and freedom from any metallic taste, while the coloring of the gums and the interior of the mouth are so perfect as to almost defy detection. All interested in the progress of the Arts are invited to examine samples of this work.

Superior Gold and Vulcanite Work also manufactured as usual, but at greatly reduced prices. jul8

G. FORREST WALTER & CO.,

EXCELSIOR

PIONEER MERCHANT TAILOR

OF THE PACIFIC.

ESTABLISHED, 1849.

NO. 611 SACRAMENTO STREET,
Three doors above Montgomery,
my28 San Francisco.

EDWARD BOSQUI & CO.,

517

CLAY STREET, SAN FRANCISCO.

BOOKBINDERS, PAPER-RULERS, AND

ACCOUNT-BOOK MANUFACTURERS.

Blanks of all kinds printed and ruled to any desired pattern. my28

REMOVAL.—DR. H. J. PAINE,

DENTIST,

No. 522 CALIFORNIA STREET,

Room No. 19, Second Floor,

BETWEEN MONTGOMERY AND KEARNY STREETS

Four doors west of Wells, Fargo & Co.,

je4 San Francisco.

PILES! PILES!! PILES!!!

Not piles of Gold nor yet of Silver so much coveted by all men, but the bleeding, blind, or external Piles can be easily and speedily cured by the use of

WOOD'S SUB-POSITORY.

It is a preparation totally distinct from anything heretofore offered as a remedy for this painful and often fatal complaint. The Sub-Pository is neither a pill, powder, wash or salve, and yet it has proved to be a certain remedy for the Piles. Do not doubt this assertion, nor delay testing the truth of it if you are troubled with the Piles—you will not be deceived in it.

Sold wholesale and retail by W. NEWELL,
jul1 No. 530 Merchant street.

THE BANK OF CALIFORNIA.

Incorporated under the Laws of the State.

PAID UP IN GOLD COIN.

CAPITAL STOCK.....$2,000,000,

With the privilege of increasing to $5,000,000.

STOCKHOLDERS.

San Francisco.

D. O. Mills,
Wm. C. Ralston,
R. S. Fretz,
J. B. Thomas,
Louis McLane,
Asa T. Lawton,
Wm. E. Barron,
Thomas Bell,
John O. Earl,
Wm. Norris,
J. Whitney, jr.
O. F. Giffin,
A. J. Pope,
Herman Michels,
Frederick Billings,
Geo. H. Howard,
H. F. Teschemacher,
A. Hayward,
Moses Ellis,
A. B. McCreary,
R. M. Jessup,
Samuel Knight,
A. C. Henry,
J. C. Wilmerding,
Wm. Alvord.

Portland, Oregon.

Jacob Kamm.

D. O. MILLS, - - - - President,

W. C. RALSTON, Cashier.

Correspondents in New York, LEES & WALLER, No. 33 Pine street.

Correspondent in London, BANK OF LONDON.

THE UNDERSIGNED GIVE NOTICE THAT THE above named corporation has been organized for the purpose of carrying on the Banking and Exchange business in all its branches, in this city and with the interior of this State, the neighboring State and Territories, and with Mexico; also with the Atlantic cities, Europe, China and the East Indies, for which they are provided with ample facilities, and in conformity with articles of association will commence operations on the 5th day of July next, at the Banking House now occupied by Donohoe, Ralston & Co., corner of Washington and Battery streets.

With the view of giving to the business of the corporation all the efficiency and promptitude of a private banking firm, together with that confidential seclusion of private business matters so generally desired, the immediate management of its affairs is committed exclusively to D. O. Mills and William C. Ralston, as President and Cashier, respectively, to whom, or either of them, the customers of the Bank will apply in all business matters. The regular meetings of the Board of Trustees will take place monthly.

The undersigned deem it advisable to call particular attention to the following peculiarities of their organization, which are positively binding on all its members:

First—Sales of its capital stock can be effected only after due appraisement by stockholders selected for that special purpose; and the Trustees of the corporation have, in all cases, the right to become purchasers of the stock appraised at the appraisement, for the benefit of the remaining stockholders. This restriction is printed upon each certificate of stock.

Second—Loans cannot be made to stockholders, except upon collaterals other than their shares in the capital stock of this bank.

TRUSTEES.

D. O. Mills,
Louis McLane,
Wm. Norris,
Jno. O. Earl,
Herman Michels,
W. C. Ralston,
J. B. Thomas,
Thomas Bell,
A. J. Pope,
O. F. Giffin,
James Whitney, jr.

San Francisco, June 18th, 1864. ju25-1m

MANHATTAN FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY OF NEW YORK.

Cash Capital and Surplus.....$750,000
Deposit in San Francisco.....$75,000

COLUMBIA FIRE INSURANCE CO., OF NEW YORK.

Cash Capital and Surplus.....$600,000
Deposit in San Francisco.....$75,000

THE ABOVE MENTIONED WELL-KNOWN and responsible Companies, having complied with the law enacted at the last session of the Legislature, and deposited with Messrs. Donohoe, Ralston & Co.

$75,000 EACH,

As additional security to Policy-holders, will continue to insure

BUILDINGS,
MERCHANDISE,
FURNITURE,

And other property in California, Oregon and Nevada Territory, against Loss or Damage by Fire, upon the most favorable terms.

All Losses promptly paid in United States Gold Coin.

R. B. SWAIN & CO., Agents,
ju25-tf 206 Front street, corner of California.

AUSTIN & SCHMITT, Importers and Dealers in

FRENCH, ENGLISH AND DOMESTIC DRY GOODS,

Offer for sale the best assortment of the above goods to be found in the city, consisting in part of

SILKS,
SHAWLS,
MANTILLAS,
LACES,
DRESS GOODS,

Of every description. Best quality of

MOURNING GOODS,
HOSIERY,
EMBROIDERIES,

Together with a complete assortment of

HOUSEKEEPING GOODS.

247 Montgomery street,
Between Sacramento and California streets.

NOTICE TO CREDITORS.—Estate of JAMES A. MOORE, deceased.

Notice is hereby given by the undersigned, Executors of the above named estate, to the creditors of and all persons having claims against JAMES A. MOORE, deceased, to exhibit the same with the necessary vouchers, within ten months from the first publication of this notice, to the undesigned at the office of Delany & Boorman, 519 Montgomery street, in the city of San Francisco.

EUGENE O'CALLAGHAN,
MICHAEL McGRATH,
Executors of the Estate of JAMES A. MOORE, deceased.

Dated, San Francisco, June 22d, 1864. ju25-5t

REDINGTON & CO.'S ESSENCE OF Jamaica Ginger!

This valuable compound, which is now regarded as one of the most popular remedies in the domestic practice for various complaints of the digestive organs, such as Dyspepsia, Nausea, etc., is prepared solely from the WHITE JAMAICA GINGER, which is the best of all the varieties in use. In the preparation of

REDINGTON & CO.'S

ESSENCE OF JAMAICA GINGER,

Great care is taken to have none but select Root, and to manufacture it in air-tight vessels, thus preventing the evaporation of its delicate essential oil, and preserving the true aroma of the Ginger. It thereby contains in its concentrated form all the valuable properties of the Jamaica Ginger, and is guaranteed to be free from any impurities whatever

It is a grateful stimulant and carminative, giving warmth and tone to the stomach equal to Brandy, without any of its injurious effects.

It will cure Nausea, caused by riding in railroad cars, or from sea-sickness, or other causes.

Miners and others who are exposed to the heat of the Sun often whilst working in cold water, should never be without

REDINGTON & CO.'S

ESSENCE OF JAMAICA GINGER.

As by taking it as a tonic two or three times a day, it is almost a sure preventive to Chills and Fever; and to those who are farming the rich bottom lands of California it is likewise invaluable as a tonic, and should invariably be taken in the early morning before going to the fields, at the mid-day lunch, and before leaving off work at night.

Ask for REDINGTON & CO.'S ESSENCE OF JAMAICA GINGER, and take no other, if you would always have a Pure and Reliable article.

An excellent external application for Gout, Rheumatism, Neuralgia, &c.

REDINGTON & CO., Proprietors,
416 and 418 Front street,
my28 San Francisco.

RAREY'S CONDITION POWDERS.

THE MOST POWERFUL AND BENEFICIAL AGENT known on the Stomach, Blood, Lungs and Bowels of

HORSES, MULES, CATTLE, AND STOCK of all descriptions.

GREAT BENEFIT TO HARD-WORKING HORSES.

All diseased Stock SPEEDILY and CERTAINLY CURED; healthy Stock will be brought into the very HIGHEST STATE of PERFECTION by giving them a SPOONFULL, weekly.

NO LIVERY STABLE SHOULD BE WITHOUT

RAREY'S
CELEBRATED CONDITION POWDERS!

All FARMERS and RANCHMEN should use constantly

RAREY'S
CELEBRATED CONDITION POWDERS!

TEAMSTERS and STAGE COMPANIES everywhere should keep constantly on hand and freely use

RAREY'S
CELEBRATED CONDITION POWDERS!

They are equal to a Life Insurance on all Stock, as will be fully appreciated on trial by all True Economists.

REDINGTON & CO., Sole Agents,
my28 416 and 418 Front Street, San Francisco.

WHAT KILLED HIM?

DR. HALL, in his "Journal of Health," speaking of the death of Washington Irving, asks the above question, and adds: "He might well have remained with us for some years to come had it not been for advice kindly intended, no doubt, but given in thoughtlessness and reckless ignorance.

HE HAD A COLD!

Which by some injudicious prescription had been converted into an asthma." Let me say to Dr. Hall, that that "prescription" was not

NEWELL'S PULMONARY SYRUP.

For that is an article calculated to remove rather than to produce asthmatic affections. And as for COUGHS AND COLDS, the world never saw a better remedy, and never will, until nature produces some new ingredient out of which to prepare it. Don't be afraid to use it freely. Every article in it is from nature's own laboratory—the same today as they were a thousand years ago—all calculated to soothe, heal and strengthen. There is no

BETTER FAMILY MEDICINE!

Keep it in the house, use it freely yourself, and give it to your children upon the slightest indication of a cold. By so doing you may save yourself many days and nights of care, anxiety and watchfulness so inseparably connected with the chamber of the sick. jy2

LAWRENCE & HOUSEWORTH, OPTICIANS,

IMPORTERS OF OPTICAL, MATHEMATICAL AND PHILOSOPHICAL INSTRUMENTS,

STEREOSCOPIC GOODS,

PHOTOGRAPHIC ALBUMS,

CARTES DE VISITE,

AND

JOSEPH RODGERS & SON'S

SUPERIOR CUTLERY,

No. 637 CLAY STREET,

SAN FRANCISCO,

(ESTABLISHED IN 1851,)

HAVE FOR SALE THE LARGEST STOCK ON THE PACIFIC COAST, consisting in part as follows:

720 dozen SPECTACLES, in Gold, Silver, Steel and Plated Frames
305 dozen EYE GLASSES, in Gold, Silver, Steel, Horn, Shell and Rubber Frames.
150 dozen WIRE GAUZE GOGGLES.
300 dozen SPECTACLE GLASSES and BRAZILIAN PEBBLES.
350 dozen SPECTACLE and EYE GLASS CASES.

395 Opera and Marine Glasses.
75 Telescope and Spy Glasses,
178 dozen Magnifying Glasses,
80 doz. Pocket Compasses,
325 Hand Stereoscopes,
74 Revolving Stereoscopes
1025 doz. Stereoscopic Views
Drawing Instruments in German Silver and Brass,
Boxwood and Ivory Scales,
Microscopes in every Style,
25 Magnetic Machines for Medical purposes,
Aneroid Barometers,
20,500 Card Photographs, Photographic Albums,
600 Album Pictures—in oil colors,
50 doz. Union Card Frames,
Joseph Rodgers & Son's CUTLERY,
100 doz. Table Knives,
260 doz. Pocket Knives,
120 doz. Razors,
50 doz. Razor Strops,
130 doz. Scissors, SCISSORS, in Cases,
100 doz. Gyroscope Tops,
169 doz. Thermometers,
25 doz. Hydrometers,
Galvanic Batteries.

☞COUNTRY TRADERS will consult their own interest by examining our Stock and Prices before purchasing elsewhere.

 ORDERS FROM THE COUNTRY promptly executed.

☞CATALOGUES sent to any address FREE.

Address

LAWRENCE & HOUSEWORTH,
OPTICIANS,
637 CLAY STREET,
my28 SAN FRANCISCO.

PACIFIC INSURANCE COMPANY

436 CALIFORNIA STREET,

SAN FRANCISCO.

Insure against loss or damage by fire, on Buildings, Merchandise, Wares, and other Personal Property.

CAPITAL STOCK - - - - - - - - $750,000

The largest sum at present to be taken on any one risk is $30,000. All Losses payable in United States Gold Coin. The Personal Liability of Stockholders, under the Law of this State, recognized.

The following List of Directors is a sufficient guarantee of the stability and responsibility of the Company:

Louis McLean,
W. C. Ralston,
Frederick Billings,
H. Carlton, Jr.,
Wm. M. Lent,
J. G. Kittle,
J. B. Thomas,
J. G. Bray,
Asa T. Lawton,
J. Whitney, Jr.,
Edward Martin,
L. B. Benchly,
A. Seligman,
Wm. Sherman,
Wm. Alvord,
Charles Mayne,
Erwin Davis,
P. L. Weaver,
Samuel C. Bigelow,
Herman Michels,
H. L. Dodge,
H. L. Goldstein,
H. Hanssmann,
Morton Cheesman,
H. M. Newhall,
W. Norris,
Edgar Mills, Sacramento.
C. T. Wheeler, Sacramento.
J. H. Jewett, Marysville.
J. C. Ainsworth, Portland (O.)
Lloyd Tevis,
H. F. Teschemacher,
Geo. H. Howard,
A.B. Forbes,
A. L. Tubbs,
Jonathan Hunt,
J. B. Newton,
John O. Earl,
S. J. Hensley,
John Wightman,
L. Sachs,
Jas. DeFremery,
J. G. Kellogg,
G. W. Beaver,
Elie Lazard,
William Sharon,
Adam Grant,
Alpheus Bull,
A. G. Stiles,
M. P. Jones,
D. Stern,
S. M. Wilson,
D. J. Oliver,
Jabez Howes,
F. W. Brooks,
I. Lohman, Sacramento.
T. R. Anthony, Stockton.
D. W. C. Rice, Marysville.
W. S. Ladd, Portland (O.)

J. HUNT, President.
A. J. RALSTON, Secretary. my28

BOYS! BOYS! BOYS!

NOW IS THE TIME!

H. M. LOCKWOOD & CO.,

New No. 624) CLAY STREET, (Old No. 176

Have received a Large Stock of

GENTS' AND BOYS' CLOTHING

—AND—

FURNISHING GOODS,

Which they are selling

AT VERY LOW PRICES.

Every Garment warranted. All are invited to call and examine our goods.

H. M. LOCKWOOD & CO.,
my28 624 Clay street, San Francisco.

GREAT TRIUMPH!!

STEINWAY & SONS

Were awarded the FIRST PRIZE MEDAL at the late great INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITION AT LONDON, over the two hundred and sixty-nine Pianos entered for competition from all parts of the world.

The Special Correspondent of the New York Times says: "Messrs. Steinway & Sons' indorsement by the Jurors is emphatic, and stronger and more to the point than that of any European maker."

A constant supply of the above superior instruments can be found at the Agent's,

M. GRAY, 613 Clay street.

PIANO TUNING done by a first-class Workman, from Steinway & Son's Factory, New York. my28

CARPETS, OIL CLOTHS,

UPHOLSTERY GOODS,

PAPER HANGINGS.

THE LARGEST

—AND—

BEST ASSORTED STOCK IN THE STATE,

And everything to be found in a well-conducted

Carpet Warehouse,

For Sale at the Lowest Rates.

WM. M. HIXON'S

CARPET WAREHOUSE,

NOS. 606 AND 608 CLAY STREET.

One Door above Montgomery street. my28

THE MOST EXTENSIVE,

BEST SELECTED, CHEAPEST,

—AND—

LATEST STYLES

—OF—

Furniture.

GOODWIN & CO.,

No. 528 Washington street,

Are constantly receiving, and have on hand a large assortment of FINE ROSEWOOD, MAHOGANY, and BLACK WALNUT PARLOR, LIBRARY and CHAMBER SUITS, with DINING ROOM SUITS TO ORDER.

☞ We guarantee both Price and Quality satisfactory to our Patrons.

GOODWIN & CO.,
Ju18 No. 528 Washington street.

FEET! FEET! FEET!

Listen all ye that deal in feet and are barefooted:

GOOD TIMES COME AT LAST!

No Assessments to Pay, but Dividends Secured at Once!

FOR SIXTY DAYS

We will dispose of our IMMENSE STOCK

AT UNPRECEDENTED LOW PRICES.

We have in store and arriving, upwards of

$150,000 WORTH

OF

BOOTS, SHOES AND GAITERS,

Which we are determined to give the public, and all our customers, for cash,

25 PER CENT. BELOW NEW YORK COST.

5,000 PAIRS LADIES' BUTTON, LACE AND CONGRESS GAITERS,

Suitable for House Shoes, Regardless of any Cost, ON ACCOUNT OF HIGH PREMIUM ON GOLD.

We solicit a call to convince, then send along your friends, to the largest RETAIL SHOE STORE in the State.

HOLCOMBE BROTHERS,

PIONEER SHOE STORE,

Corner Washington and Kearny streets.

my28

DR. CHARLES E. ZOAH,

OFFICE, No. 621 CALIFORNIA STREET,

Between Dupont and Kearny, South side, San Francisco.

A CURE WITHOUT THE USE OF MEDICINE.

NO PAIN GIVEN.

Dr. ZOAH will cure without the use of medicine. His treatment of the following diseases is short, decisive and pleasant. Entire satisfaction given in every case.

Rheumatism, Neuralgia, Pleurisy, Dyspepsia, Lumbago, Sore Throat, and all Spinal Complaints; the most violent Toothache, Headache or Earache cured in a few seconds!

All pains or aches, no matter where located, can be removed in a short time, and charges reasonable. The poor unfortunate cured without price.

The Doctor's mode of treatment is the oldest science known for the treatment of diseases afflicting the human body, and at present is practised very extensively in the East with every success.

Dr. ZOAH will be in attendance at all hours, day and evening, at his office, 621 California street.

All letters strictly attended to. Consultations fr
ul8

THE EUREKA BILLIARD SALOON—over the Eureka Theatre, on Montgomery street, between California and Pine—is the most superbly fitted-up establishment on the Pacific Coast. It contains seven of Jacob Strahle's ables, unequalled by any other in elegance of style and finish. Messrs. Fitch & Wetherbee are the gentlemanly proprietors, and so conduct their establishment as to merit and maintain the leading patronage of gentlemanly knights of the cue, of the city and State. jul8

CENTRAL RAILROAD COMPANY OFFICE, No. 229 Bush street, San Francisco: Location, City and County of San Francisco, State of California.—Notice is hereby given, that at a meeting of the Directors of said Company, held on the 8th day of June, 1864, an assessment of Five Dollars ($5) per share was levied upon the Capital Stock of the said Company, payable immediately in United States gold coin, to the Secretary of said Company, at the office of said Company, in the city of San Francisco. Any stock upon which said assessment shall remain unpaid on the TENTH DAY OF JULY, 1864, will be advertised on that day as delinquent, and unless payment shall be made before, will be sold on the Twenty-third day of July, 1864, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with costs of advertising and expenses of the sale. By order of the Board of Directors. JAS. T. HOYT, Secretary.
jul8 Office, 229 Bush street.

TO THE TRAVELLING PUBLIC!

THE UNDERSIGNED, FOR MANY YEARS IN COMmand of steamers on the inland waters of this State, can point with just pride to his past record as sustaining the assertion that he has always been vigilant and zealous in the protection of life and property committed to his care, and that he has never wantonly trifled with or deliberately injured the life or property of others. He feels that wherever he is known, notwithstanding the vituperation with which he has been assailed, he requires no justification; and from that portion of the community with whom he is unacquainted he asks a suspension of opinion in regard to the collision between the steamers Washoe and Yosemite until the result of the investigations in relation thereto can be made public and the blame fixed where it properly belongs. E. A. POOLE.
jy9-1t Master Steamer Yosemite.

THE THIRD

Monster Matinee,

—OF—

PAUL JULIEN,

WILL TAKE PLACE AT

MAGUIRE'S ACADEMY OF MUSIC,

—ON—

WEDNESDAY NEXT, 13TH JULY,

AT TWO O'CLOCK IN THE AFTERNOON.

Box Office now Open.

jy9

SAN FRANCISCO AND SAN JOSE RAILROAD.

CHANGE OF TIME.

On and after MARCH 1st, 1864, Trains will leave the Depot on Brannan street, between Third and Fourth, for San Jose and Way Stations, as follows:

Leave San Francisco at 8 A. M. and 4:30 P. M.
Leave San Jose at 7:30 A. M. and 4 P. M.

SUNDAYS.

On Sundays, Three Trains will be run, as follows:

Leave San Francisco at 8 1-2 and 10 1-2 A. M., and 4 1-2 P. M.
Leave San Jose at 8 A. M. and 4 and 7 P. M.

Passengers can reach the Depot by either the Third or Fourth street lines of city cars.

A. H. HOUSTON,
my28 General Superintendent.

MARKET STREET RAILROAD.

CHANGE OF TIME TABLE.

ON AND AFTER APRIL 1, 1864, Trains will start from the City and the Mission as follows:

Between the hours of 8:20 A. M. and 6 P. M., every 40 minutes, instead of, as heretofore, every 30 minutes, thus

FROM THE MISSION.

9:40	10:20	11:00	11:40

FROM THE CITY.

10:00	10:40	11:20	12:00

And so on till 6 o'clock.

Before 9 A. M. and after 6 P. M., the running will be the same as before.
my28 F. McCOPPIN, Superintendent.

DEETKEN & CO'S METALLURGICAL WORKS,

WE respectfully inform the Mining community in general, that having completed our

NEW SMELTING FURNACES,

We are now ready to SMELT EVERY KIND OF SILVER AND GOLD ORES.

Parties unable to get satisfactory results by amalgamation, will find it to their interest to have their ores smelted at our works.

LARGE CONTRACTS ACCEPTED AT LOW RATES, AND RESULTS GUARANTEED.

Facilities on hand to work all and every kind of Gold and Silver-bearing Ores, as well as it can be done in Europe.

AMALGAMATION AND CHLORATION carried on, on Silver and Gold Ores, as heretofore.

BEETKEN & CO.'S METALLURGICAL WORKS,
Office—315 Montgomery street.
WORKS—San Bruno Road. jy2

MAGUIRE'S OPERA HOUSE.

T. MAGUIRE - - - - - - - - PROPRIETOR.
C. L. GRAVES - - - - - - - STAGE MANAGER.
W. STEVENSON - - - - - - - TREASURER.

ENGAGEMENT OF THE CELEBRATED ACTOR,
MR. CHARLES WHEATLEIGH,

The Octoroon!

Will be the

AFTERNOON PERFORMANCE TO-DAY,
FOR LADIES AND CHILDREN,
At HALF PRICES,
Commencing at 2 o'clock,

SATURDAY EVENING, JULY 9th, 1864,

GRAND REVIVAL

—OF—

Boucicault's great Irish Drama of

The Colleen Bawn!

MR. C. WHEATLEIGH, as DANNY MANN.

First appearance in California, of

MISS UTIE CLIFFORD,

—AS—

ANNE CHUTE.

Myles na Coppaleen	W O'Neil
Hardress Cregan	C R Thorne, Jr
Mr Corrigan	Mr Stephenson
Father Tom,	D C Anderson
Eily O'Connor	Mrs Sophie Edwin
Mrs Cregan	Mrs. C R Saunders

PRICES OF ADMISSION.—Dress Circle and Orchestra Seats $1; Parquet 50c.; Gallery 25c.
Doors open at 7 o'clock. Performances will commence at a quarter before 8. jy25

METROPOLITAN THEATRE.

Montgomery street.

BENEFIT

—OF—

MRS. EMILY JORDAN!

WEDNESDAY EVENING, JULY 13TH,

On which occasion the popular drama of

AURORA FLOYD,

Will be presented.

Dress Circle and Orchestra	$1
Parquette	50 cents
Gallery	25 cents
Private Boxes	$5 and $10

Doors open at 7 o'clock. Performance commences at 8 o'clock.

WILSON & ZOYARA'S Great Circus!

THIS MAMMOTH NEW HIPPOTHEATRON

Will exhibit throughout

THE INTERIOR OF THE STATE

During the present season.

THE NEW AND SPLENDID COMPANY, brought by Mr. Wilson from New York and Havana at immense cost, have a world-wide reputation, enabling the management to produce all the ELEGANT, SENSATIONAL, THRILLING, COMIC, and ENTERTAINING NOVELTIES OF THE DAY. At the head of the Equestrian Department is the world-renowned

ELLA ZOYARA,
MLLE. ELOUISE,

And a number of elegant and daring Riders, whilst

MESSRS. ROSS AND CARLO
Head the Acrobatic Corps;

MESSRS. DURAND AND PAINTER
The Gymnastic;

MESSRS. AYMAR AND WILLIAMS
The Comic Department.

The Ring is under the supervision of MR VINCENT; with TRAINED and PERFORMING HORSES, PONIES and MULES—being the most complete Company that has ever appeared in the State.

KIDD'S CELEBRATED BRASS BAND accompanies the entertainment. WILSON & ZOYARA, Proprietors.

IN THE COUNTY COURT OF THE CITY and county of San Francisco, State of California.—In the matter of the petition of D. J. McCARTHY, an Insolvent Debtor.

Pursuant to an order of the Hon. Samuel Cowles, Judge of the said County Court, notice is hereby given to all the creditors of the said insolvent, D. J. McCarthy, to be and appear before the Hon. Samuel Cowles, Judge as aforesaid, in open Court, at the Court Room of said Court, in the City Hall, in the city and county of San Francisco, on MONDAY, the 8th day of AUGUST, A. D., 1864, at 10 A. M. of that day, then and there to show cause, if any they can, why the prayer of said insolvent should not be granted, and an assignment of his Estate be made, and he be discharged from his debts and liabilities, in pursuance of the Statute in such case made and provided; and in the mean time all proceedings against said insolvent be stayed.

Witness, my hand and the Seal of said Court, this 8th day of July, A. D. 1864.

Seal and Int. Rev. Stamp. WM. LOEWY, Clerk.
By J. NATHALY, Deputy Clerk.

R. F. Ryan, Attorney for Petitioner, Metropolitan Block, No. 35. jy9 4t

MAGUIRE'S ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

THOMAS MAGUIRE, - - - - - - Proprietor.
PETER RICHINGS, - - - - - - - Manager.

FIFTH NIGHT OF

Italian Opera,

The following artists will appear:

MISS CAROLINE RICHINGS.
SIGNOR BIANCHI,
MR. JOHN GREGG,
SIGNOR RONCOVIERI,
MONS. CHARLES,
MR. HENNECART.

Musical Director, - - - - Mr. G. T. EVANS.

MONDAY EVENING NEXT, JULY 11TH,

Will be presented for the first time in this theatre,

Verdi's Grand Opera, in four Acts, entitled

ERNANI,

Donna Elvira,	MISS CAROLINE RICHINGS
Ernani,	SIGNOR BIANCHI
Don Carlos,	Mr. John Gregg
Don Ruy Gomez,	Sig Roncovieri
Don Ricardo,	Mons Charles
Don Iago,	Mr. Hennecart
Donna Juana,	Mme Klehs

In rehearsal, Bellini's opera of

NORMA.

Opera nights of the ensuing week will be MONDAY, THURSDAY and SATURDAY.

Box Office will be open on SATURDAY MORNING, at 10 o'clock, for the sale of Reserved Seats. jy25

